Suddenly, breaking the silence till then, these words left the Emperor's lips.

Just as it seemed that the tension pervading the throne room would subside, it grew heavier instead, constricting the hearts of the troops.

Vincent narrowed his almond-black eyes and gazed at Berstetz, who had continued to pledge his fealty with his palm and fist put together in front of his chest,

Vincent: “Since when had the emperors of my country begun to take notice of its people’s anguish?”

Berstez: “…I understand what you are saying, Your Excellency. However, the reality is that the people’s rumors have raised concerns about Your Excellency’s reign. If this is neglected, this poisonous blood will spread like a disease throughout the Empire.”

Vincent: “Are you advising to spill all this poisonous blood?”

Berstetz: “Most humbly, even Your Excellency the Emperor would lose his life if he were decapitated. Would it not be imprudent to lose one’s head to spare a limb?”

Vincent: “…”

Berstetz: “Of course, it would be ideal if this matter could be repressed with just fingers, ears, and nails.”

Concluding his final remark with a bow, Berstetz thus stated his own opinion.

That frank, or, in other words, inconsiderate proposal, made the other troops shudder. But at the same time, they admired him for speaking for them and saying what needed to be said.

After all, Berstetz expressed the collective opinion of all the troops about the rebellion spreading throughout the Empire.

The Imperial Soldiers were furious at the people resigning to Vincent’s reign, bandwagoning with the ones occasionally raising their voices, and rising up in rebellion all over the place.

If one were to be a part of that first group, they would also be qualified to take the stage as a valiant adversary. But what of the shamefulness of those that followed?

Fighting, winning, and securing were the fundamental principles of the people of the Empire.

The people of the Empire must be strong, too many people misinterpreted the intent of that saying, and used it for their own gain. Wouldn't exterminating them be the only way that the intent of "the people of the Empire must be strong" could be truly embodied?

However, Vincent had not taken proactive countermeasures against these rebellions and relied on the spread out garrisons to fend them off. Although—

Berstetz: "Dispatching all the Generals of the First-Class just to nip the rebellions in the bud will not fundamentally resolve the situation."

Vincent: "—Quite eloquent, Berstetz. Facing me directly, with all the troops in formation behind you, makes it look as if you were the head of the rebellion."

Berstetz: "You jest. I am not prepared to lead a rebellion and drive Your Excellency away from the throne."

Vincent: "Hmph."

With a small snort, Vincent paid no mind to Berstetz's refutation.

Nevertheless, it was understandable why Vincent would say such a thing. After all, all of Berstetz's words had been spoken on behalf of the hearts of the Imperial troops for quite a while.

Including the point where he mentioned the anticipated deployment of the Generals of the First-Class, and advised against it as being insufficient.

Setting aside the blood-soaked, sharp-tongued exchange that followed—.

Berstetz: "Your Excellency, this rebellion is…"

Vincent: "I have heeded your counsel. However—"

Berstetz: "…"

Vincent: "—I too have a plan."

Vincent's gaze swept over Berstetz and the assembled generals and troops, erasing any lingering distrust they might have had of the Emperor.

When the meeting was called and they were initially assembled in the throne room, each of the troops had their own feelings about Vincent's reluctance to take a stand against this rebellion.

In fact, it was Berstetz who advocated on behalf of the troops, but the feelings of the troops were shared by all of them, which became all the more amplified when they heard what he had to say.

Those feelings, which in a sense were about to spread like the flames of rebellion, were extinguished.

Like a great fire being doused by wind and water, they were slowed, weakened, and drowned out.

And then—

Vincent: "Or, do you doubt my words?"

Berstetz's eyebrows quivered as he was asked by the Emperor, the owner of such profound wisdom.

What kind of emotions were flickering behind those thread-like narrow eyes, uninferable by the rest, was unknown to anyone in attendance.

Only one thing was certain.

Troops: "—No, absolutely not!"

It was that the troops were in unison with their voices, and they answered the Emperor's question in a gallant manner.

Stamping their feet, the military officers drew and raised the swords from their waists. The civilian officials clasped their palms and fists together in front of their chests, each making the most respectful bow appropriate for their position and responding as such to the Emperor’s question.

No one could decipher the thoughts of Emperor Vincent Vollachia.

However, if the question being imposed here was whether to dismiss that which they could not comprehend as being something untrustworthy, then that was a no.

If what was needed for trust was words and accomplishments, Vincent had demonstrated a proven record.

His achievements were worthy of note, beginning with his “Imperial Selection Ceremony” to become emperor, which was followed by a reign free of major turmoils.

Having demonstrated his performance, the Emperor had also spoken the words necessary for trust.

—Do you doubt my words, he had asked.

Vincent: “I’ve given this rebellion a great deal of thought. So, unless I tell you everything, from beginning to end about this, is it the case that you cannot even satisfactorily obey?”

Troops: “—No, absolutely not!”

Vincent: “Then if that is so, prick up your ears, and do what needs to be done before your eyes wander about. I have no intention of sugarcoating the veneers of your position for those who fail to do what needs to be done.”

The Emperor’s speech was both cold and sharp, which was why he seemed so familiar to the troops.

Vincent’s gaze and tone of voice had the power to manipulate the zeal of others’ souls. His devilishness, which was capable of being hot or cold, made the hearts of the troops burn at that moment.

The troops’ eyes glazed over with anxiety and suspicion as they wondered what he was thinking.

No concrete answer was given. But the clouded eyes of the troops cleared. —Because their Emperor made it clear to them that he was working his deepest machinations.

Only then could the many Imperial Soldiers trust in victory and fight on.

Berstetz: “What would you like to divulge to me and the troops, if only a little?”

Vincent: “For what purpose? If I reveal it, it will cast a shadow over my strategy. Instead, what would be gained? Peace of mind for you, and those troops who are frightened of what lies ahead?”

Vincent brushed Berstetz off with a harsh tone, as if to say there’s no merit to comparing these.

But the troops supported Vincent’s answer. They no longer had the feeling in their hearts from earlier that Berstetz’s words spoke for them.

Rather, they even felt angry and frustrated at Berstetz’s proposal. Vincent made it clear that he had his own thinking. That should be enough.

Vincent: “You may disagree. I, however, do not intend to offer an explanation based solely on the prestige of the Empire.”

Looking at the silent Berstetz, Vincent added to his words.

At the sound of the Emperor’s voice persuading his unconvinced opponents, many of the troops inwardly shook their heads. No further words were needed. And yet, the Emperor continued.

Vincent: “But as I stated. I have no desire to reveal my intentions to you. Instead, I have only one word for you.”

Berstetz: “Your Excellency…”

Vincent: “The people of the Empire must be strong.”

Berstetz: “…”

Vincent: "—I shall prepare a battlefield befitting the way of the Sword Wolf."

Nodding deeply, Vincent promised the assembled troops, over Berstetz.

A beat later, a scorching passion burned through the troops' bodies. The inferno that clad them was no less ferocious than the fires of rebellion spreading throughout the Empire.

If the rebellion was a flame of distrust of the Emperor, then the burning within the troops became a flame of confidence in the Emperor.

Vincent and Berstetz: "…"

Vincent and Berstetz looked at each other silently as the heat quietly built among the troops.

The Emperor and the Prime Minister, both of whom occupy the highest positions in the Empire thanks to their ingenuity; the surrounding troops could not guess the intent of the glances exchanged by the two.

However, Berstetz did not make any further statements that would undermine the Emperor's intentions.

But instead—

Berstetz: "—Your Excellency, with all due respect, I have one more question."

Vincent: "More questions and suspicions? Unlike the first time, those behind you do not appear to be on your side."

Berstetz: "It is very difficult for one in the position of Prime Minister to decide whether or not to make a recommendation based on the presence or absence of allies."

Vincent: "Your mouth works. Speak."

Vincent urged him to do so, giving a jerk of his thin jaw.

In response, Berstetz prefaced his remarks with the words, “Then,” and then continued.

That was—

Berstetz: “—The Crown Prince with the black hair.”

Vincent: “…”

Berstetz: “The ones who rebel throughout the land, have championed him as their leader. He is a black-haired, black-eyed boy, and his origins are… that of being an undisclosed Son of His Excellency.”

Like Fire Magic Stones infused with mana, Berstetz’s act of throwing them in, for better or for worse, once again made the troops around him, who couldn’t grasp their surroundings clearly, speechless.

The troops had heard the rumors about this. Even for them, it would be a lie to say that they did not care about the truth of the rumors. But they did not have the courage to confirm them.

Berstetz questioned this directly, and yet again there was anticipation, as the troops, who should have been overcome with animosity, seemed to do an about-face.

The existence of the Crown Prince was now the sole focus of attention of all the people of the Empire.

How it appeared to Vincent’s eyes, how his ears heard it, and how his mouth spoke of it.

After a short pause, Vincent called out to the Prime Minister with a “Berstetz”.

And then—

Vincent: “Do not be swayed by such frivolous rumors. I have no children. If necessary, find out where these rumors come from and bring the heir to the throne before me. I will keep him as a clown for my amusement.”

And with a wicked smile on his face, the black-haired Emperor assured them so.

2

Berstetz: “—Is the Crown Prince truly not Your Excellency’s son?”

It was the same question that was posed a few minutes ago in the presence of a large crowd.

However, the tone of emotion in his voice was slightly different and carried more weight. It was a serious question and a voice that only those who heard it would understand.

After all, it was a matter of life and death for the old man who asked the question.

The location was neither the throne room nor the Crystal Palace, but the Prime Minister’s residence within the Imperial Capital.

Although they were both in charge of the government of the Empire, the tension between Vincent and Berstetz was always on edge and the perception around them was that they did not get along, to put it politely.

For that reason, their dialogue was sure to be a great shock to those who witnessed it.

Vincent Vollachia secretly visited Berstetz Fondalfon’s mansion and they faced each other in a room in this way.

Of course, if you went by the meaning of the word “shock”, it would be far more on the side of reality.

Vincent: “…”

Vincent narrowed his black eyes at the question, fixed his eyes on his partner and remained silent. Rather than simply deliberating, the Emperor took pauses in order to drive his opponents into a corner, so Berstetz was in no hurry.

He was an old man who knew the effects of both silence and pauses.

In fact, although it was called a “matter of life and death”, there was not a trace of anxiety, agitation, or self-preservation in Berstetz’s appearance as he posed the question and waited for an answer.

Indeed, there was not the slightest hint of self-preservation. That was what was most alarming about this old man.

Vincent: “Obviously.”

Berstetz: “…”

Vincent: “The answer changes not. I have no heirs. All of that is nonsense.”

Berstetz: “As I told you before, the discussion here will not leak out. Even if it were General First-Class Olbart, his strained ears will not pick up anything. You know this.”

After a long pause, Berstetz responded to Vincent’s answer.

The “tea chamber” in Berstetz’s mansion was a small fortress with all the necessities for the sole purpose of holding secret talks. There was talk that within Vollachia, the mystical barriers that used rare magic were employing things like mysterious curse arts or Meteors.

It was rumored that this “tea chamber” alone cost enough to buy an entire city.

Berstetz: “I have received the necessary stipend. I will offer it to you after my death, so you may put it to good use.”

Vincent: “Do you think a room named “tea chamber” would suit the Crystal Palace?”

Berstetz: “The name and interior are not important, so you can redecorate it as you like. What’s important is its function… Here, you don’t need to wear a false skin.”

Rather than using implied meanings, Berstetz spoke in a frank register to strip him of his mask.

At that, Vincent closed one eye. It was not contemplation. The answer was obvious. This was just another pause, another period of silence.

Even though he knew it would have no effect on the old man before him, he would not cut corners.

He was not going to deviate from what he had already decided. He had been told bluntly by easygoing old acquaintances that it was not a game, but it was in his nature.

Vincent: “I have no reason to follow your lead. You and I are in a relationship of mutual struggle based on our mutual interests. Do not misunderstand that.”

Berstetz: “I see. If that is the case, I would like you to dispel my doubts.”

Vincent: “…”

Berstetz: “I will ask again. You do not have a son, do you, Your Excellency the Emperor?”

Vincent: “—. The answer remains the same.”

Vincent repeated the same answer over and over again. Berstetz responded with a short, “I see,” without a trace of disappointment or relief on his face.

If he considered the goal of this old man, he understood just what he had to respond with, but as Vincent was connected to the matter at hand, he asked a question in return.

Vincent: “For the sake of argument, if I had a child, what would you do?”

Berstetz: “If His Excellency had a son, it means that His Excellency was willing to fulfill the duties of the Emperor. The son would be secured as soon as possible and we would have the real His Excellency return to the throne.”

Vincent: “Hmm. Then, what about me?”

Berstetz: “As to how traitors meet their end, we both know, don’t we?”

Berstetz was thorough in his response, which was matter-of-fact and calm.

It was refreshing to see a man who had come all this way to the extremes of selflessness in order to serve the Empire’s way of being. The fact that there was not a speck of uncertainty in his appearance made the abnormality stand out even more.

With that, despite Berstetz’s thoughts—

Vincent: “—The rumors about the Crown Prince must have been spread by the man himself, who keeps on getting away.”

Berstetz: “Do you think it will provoke rebellion in various places? Is it possible that there were children of whom even you and General First-Class Cecilus weren’t informed?”

Vincent: “It is not possible.”

Berstetz: “Even you don’t know everything about His Excellency.”

Vincent: “—It is not possible.”

Vincent shook his head at Berstetz, who liked to iron out the finest details.

This was not wishful thinking, a desire, or pretending to understand. It could not have happened. He could assure him without a shred of doubt.

Regardless of authenticity, Vincent Vollachia did not have a child.

The man must have been very thorough to leave no room for such suspicions or even a glimmer of possibility. To eliminate any doubt, he had never even shared a bedchamber with a woman.

A steel will to never close his eyes in front of others, that was what made him stick to his way of being.

Therefore—

Vincent: "—Vincent Vollachia does not have a child. Your actions were just."

Berstetz: "Just? If this can be called just, then I ought to usurp the throne with my own hands. When that cannot happen, it is not just. To begin with…"

Vincent: "…"

Berstetz: "With these arms that feel like the withered branches of an old tree, I am unable to protect the might of the Empire."

The old man's flat tone of voice seemed to be more of a frenzied obsession than anything else.

Many people believed that they were doing the right thing and acted accordingly. Otherwise, they would not be able to fully demonstrate their abilities and, of course, they would not be able to validate themselves.

Just how many people in this world could remain unwavering while they were realizing that they were making mistakes? Unwavering, they returned with only these results.

So then—

Vincent: "…"

—So then, as they moved forward while making mistakes, just what awaited on the path ahead.

Berstetz: "If all doubt has been dispelled, what I ought to do shall remain unchanged."

While Vincent was contemplating, Berstetz was speaking in an unconcerned voice.

Perhaps he did not anticipate the existence of a Crown Prince in the first place. If he was told by his closest confidant that there was no such possibility, he could withdraw his doubts for the time being.

Consequently, Berstetz's attention and topic of interest also quickly moved to the next subject.

Berstetz: "Then, how do we deal with the rebels who turn their blades against you?"

Vincent: "Were you unsatisfied with the exchange from the throne room?"

Berstetz: "I dared to represent the troops, but I am ultimately in a different position from them since they have complete trust in your wisdom and authority. —We have sent General First-Class Arakiya and General First-Class Madelyn to various parts of the country to crush the seeds of rebellion, but that alone is not enough to compensate."

Vincent: "…"

While propping up his chin in his chair, Vincent listened silently to Berstetz's report.

In fact, Berstetz's behavior in the throne room was not arranged. But given the situation within the Empire and Vincent's position, it was the best tactic possible.

With that, the troops' frustration and suspicion were redirected. However, Berstetz, who had knowledge of the fact that Vincent was merely sitting on a vacant throne, was doubtful about his authority.

Berstetz: "Normally, this is the point in the plan where the commanding ability of either General First-Class Chisha or General First-Class Goz is required. Since it is difficult to mobilize both of them, an alternative plan… how about bringing General First-Class Groovy back?"

Vincent: "—The movements of the Northwest are awfully suspicious. Whether it is Kararagi or another party, we have no option of moving them away from that border at this time."

The original duties of a General First-Class was to uphold domestic security and keep external threats in check.

This situation was caused by Vincent and Berstetz's collaboration, but if it jeopardized the Empire's footing, it would be like putting carriage before Galewind Horse—strangling it to death because of self-centered leadership.

Groovy Gumlet's deployment was also an indispensable linchpin in the defense of the Empire.

Berstetz: "Then, how about General First-Class Olbart?"

Vincent: "We do not want to carelessly move him away from the Imperial Capital and unnecessarily expose him to the rebel forces. It is essential to keep him in the Capital and deploy him at strategically important points. At least, for now, as long as he is willing to follow us."

Berstetz: "There is also the recuperation for the arm that was lost in the incident in the Demon City. Given the circumstances, it will not be too difficult to keep him in the Imperial Capital. If that is the case, then General First-Class Moguro."

Vincent: "For him, there is a duty that only he can fulfill."

Tapping the floor with the toe of his shoe, Vincent dismissed Berstetz's suggestions one after another.

The Nine Divine Generals had all been given critical assignments. There were only a few of the Nine Divine Generals that did not fall into this category.

Berstetz: "Is General First-Class Cecilus still an unknown?"

Vincent: "It is extremely difficult for him to distinguish between friend and foe. His beliefs do not change no matter what principles or great causes one has. Therefore, I have removed him from the board."

They had known each other for a long time, suffice it to say. But not once had they felt like they understood one another.

Perhaps no one but Cecilus could understand Cecilus. His ability with the sword was undisputed, but there was no room they could afford to leave for the uncertainty in his standpoint.

Though for Cecilus, who desired to stand on the grand stage, it seemed to be quite a regrettable story.

Vincent: “In any case, there is no chance of him returning. More than ones that can not be used, pawns that are troublesome when used will only derail the calculations. In general, the rebels should be looked at in a similar manner.”

Berstetz: “—. If he is not returned to the board, I have no objections. If so, what war potential do you have in mind to engage the Crown Prince, insolently presenting himself as His Excellency’s son, the rebels gaining momentum, and General First-Class Yorna?”

Vincent: “Arakiya, Olbart Dunkelkenn, and Madelyn Eschart.”

Berstetz: “…”

Vincent: “If you think it insufficient, add in Chisha Gold and Moguro Hagane.”

At the word “insufficient”, Berstetz shook his head and just said, “Not at all”.

Although it was doubtful how open-minded one could be about this, it was an extraordinary situation to have five of the Nine Divine Generals face off against an adversary. In addition, there were also the Generals of the Second-Class, with Kafma Irulux at the front, who could virtually be called a General First-Class in terms of strength, and were not few in number.

Therefore—

Vincent: “—In the Imperial Capital of Lupugana, we shall engage the rebels.”

Berstetz: “Perhaps the rebels will change their war strategy once they assemble all their forces.”

Vincent: “A black-haired Crown Prince to gather forces, and a bunch of collaborators using him as a symbol of deception? How can such a group of people be so united in their insistence on the authenticity of a non-existent Crown Prince? In the short term, this might be a clever move to light the fire of rebellion, but discrepancies will inevitably build up over time.”

The rebels took advantage of this opportunity to raise their voices, many of them under the banner of a fake crown prince.

Even if all the rebel forces from all over the country were to gather in the Capital, they would not be able to coordinate with each other. However, Vincent Vollachia certainly had not failed to consider such a possibility.

With that in mind, it left some element of unease. And, speaking of unease—

Berstetz: “—A decisive battle in the Imperial Capital, hm? Ever since the founding of the Sacred Vollachian Empire, for a group of rebels to march on the Imperial Capital, it’s just like in “Magrizza’s Guillotine”.”

Vincent: “Berstetz.”

Berstetz: “Yes?”

Vincent: “You certainly seem to be enjoying yourself.”

At Vincent’s remark, Berstetz gave an unusually confused “Huh?”. However, when he pinched his cheek with his fingers, he became aware of these feelings for the first time.

Thoroughly probing for the joy that had slightly spread, and for its true origin,

Berstetz: “I am terribly sorry. I know it’s me of all people, but I offer my heartfelt apology.”

Vincent: “Apologies are unnecessary. Why do you smile?”

Berstetz: “A smile …It’s just, I thought it was as expected.”

Vincent: “As expected?”

Berstetz: “As expected, the depiction of a maelstrom of war, that very thing is the Vollachian Empire itself.”

To anyone outside the Empire, it would have sounded like a silly thing for an old man to say.

However, this was probably a sentiment held by almost everyone in the Vollachian Empire, young and old, and Berstetz was not unique in this regard.

—No, of course, it was rare for anyone to say such a thing, even in this position.

Vincent: “Is the existence of the Vollachian Empire entirely determined by that?”

Berstetz: “We each have our own picture of the future we envision. Your Excellency… no, I’m sure you do too.”

Vincent: “…”

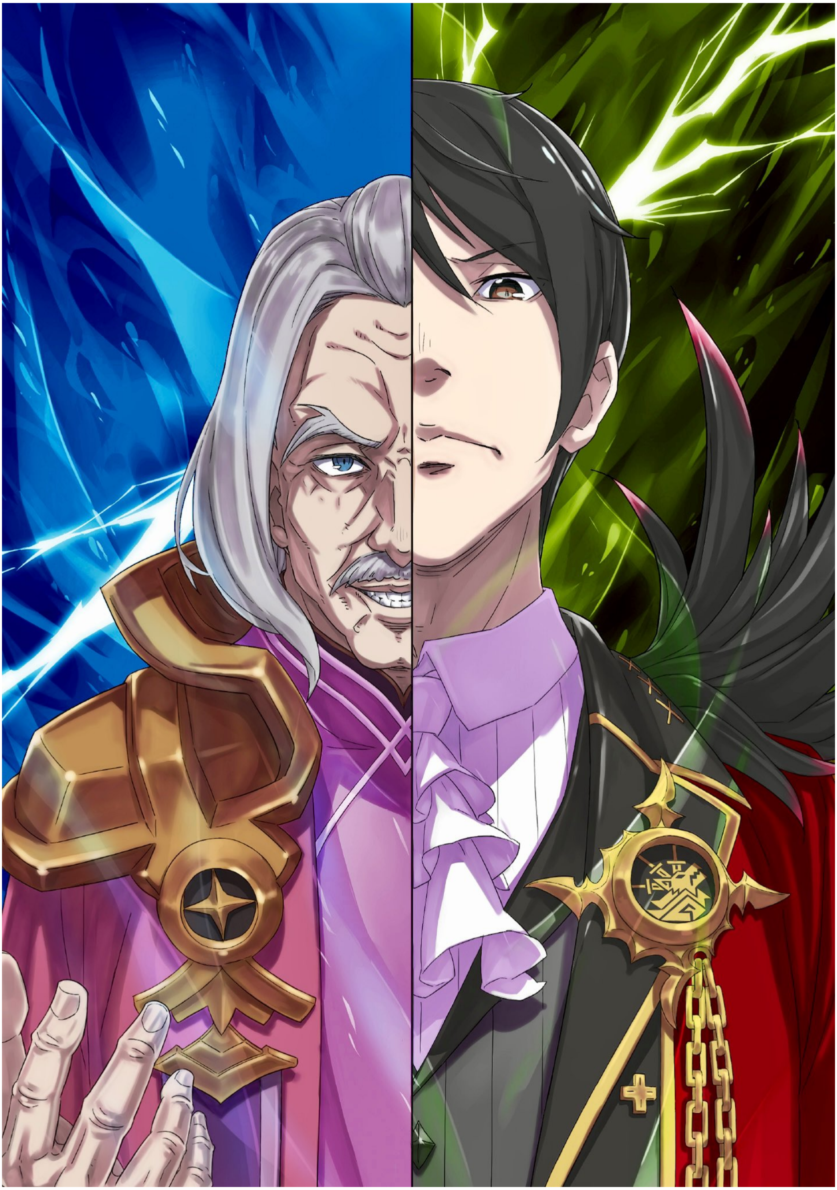
In the tea chamber, there was no margin for eavesdropping, nonetheless, he had said a bit too much.

This kind of talkativeness was uncharacteristic for Berstetz, and perhaps it was proof that human blood flowed through his veins. If that was the case, then perhaps Vincent may not have human blood in him after all.

The reason was—

Vincent: “—You said too much, Berstetz. Just who do you take me for?”

Indeed, in the quiet words of his response, the elation and lamentation that should have been there, had not been present whatsoever.



Chapter 85:
Fhrend

1

???: “A rather gloomy atmosphere has spread within the mansion over the past few days, don’t you think?”

Rem quietly muttered at the tingling sense of tension in the air.

The dry air and cold winds brought in from outside seemed to be mixed with faint human anxiety and irritation surging up on the battlefield.

Although it was only for a short time, Rem had roughly experienced what it means to be on a battlefield on a few occasions.

If one yielded to that feeling, the tension they experienced on their skin would increase day by day, waiting for the moment to collapse. Even the soldiers guarding the mansion appeared to be gradually losing their composure.

That being said, that too was probably due to the influence of the current circumstances.

Rem: “I heard that the rebel army has the upper hand… Now rebellions are taking place in various parts of the Empire. The Imperial Army has been so busy dealing with them that they haven’t been able to respond proactively.”

Ironically, what had ended up triggering those rebels’ simultaneous uprisings was the battle at the Fortress City of Guaral, which also caused the abduction of Rem and many others—the Imperial Army’s all-out offensive, with even a Divine General having been dispatched, had been narrowly staved off by the hodgepodge rebel army.

The rebel army—It was a conflicting way of referring to them for Rem who knew the fact that Abel, the one leading them, was the real Emperor, but she had heard that the resistance forces were continuing to grow.

There even was a rumor praising an indomitable city which splendidly repelled the merciless attack led by the Flying Dragon General, further boosting the belief that there was naught to fear from an Imperial Army helplessly driven away.

Rem: “It could perhaps be said that they’re not lying, but…”

From Rem’s perspective as someone involved, the commander of the flying dragons Madelyn did not retreat for strategic reasons, and it was questionable to conclude that a city damaged to such an extent was the winner.

Of course, from the rebel army’s point of view, a victory was still a victory, and there was also no reason to pass up the perfect opportunity to spread their agenda. Because of it, insurgents from all over the place have been joining the surging rebellion.

Strategically, there was nothing strange about it. —Indeed, nothing strange at all.

There were also other reasons why the rebels have been in high spirits.

Rem: “…”

One other reason besides the narrow victory of the Fortress City that explains the unprecedented success of the rebel’s uprising, being that the ruler of the Demon City of Chaosflame, General First-Class Yorna Mishigure, has joined the cause.

The defection of this capricious General First-Class known for her exceptional capabilities had sparked the rebel’s momentum.

And that in particular was Abel’s plan from the start, as well as the plan of Natsuki Subaru who went with him.

Rem: “…He could’ve just been following along, and there’s the possibility he wasn’t useful at all.”

What proportion of these events have been set in motion by Subaru?

After mentioning the possibility that he had not been useful for anything, Rem herself admitted how unconvincing those words were. Hypothetically, if he had actually been useless, then it was only because all of Subaru's words and actions had been blocked off.

And since she could not imagine Subaru keeping his mouth shut and not acting in the slightest, he probably accomplished at least something. —Or even convince a General First-Class to change sides.

Then again, she is probably overthinking it.

Rem: "Do I…?"

An undeniable premonition made her ask herself that question.

The rebels had risen up simultaneously, and the foundations of the Empire were shaking unlike ever before. Winds filled with the scent of blood and steel were blowing in the Imperial Capital as well, even reaching Rem and the others who had been taken captive.

To what extent had Abel possibly foreseen this situation?

Rem: "Was even the initial self-directed hostility part of his calculations?"

He had probably even calculated the spread of the rebellion and that the fake Emperor would assemble his forces in the Imperial Capital following the successive outcry of the rebels.

Even Subaru was simply used as a pawn by Abel to realize his greater plan.

Subaru probably had not been told the full details of the plan to begin with. In the end, Subaru was nothing more than a pawn to be used for Abel's goals. —Not that she was not aware of the reason for it.

She was shameless to feign ignorance of such a deception.

Rem: "…"

At this rate, would the small rebellion sparked off in the village of the People of Shudraq engulf the entirety of the Empire and turn into a political upheaval for the history books?

If so, how would Abel and Subaru, who were at the center of it, end up being spoken of?

And in the midst of it all, just what exactly should she accomplish—.

???: "—Hey."

Rem: "Ah…"

???: "What are you spacing off for? Y-You're the one that said you wanted to do it. Properly, yes, properly take responsibility and do so until the end."

With those words, Rem snapped back to reality from being lost in thoughts with wide open eyes.

At her first glance, Rem noticed a woman playing with her dark brown hair—Katya. She had been staring sternly at Rem through the mirror on the dressing table in front of her.

Her unruly hair was tangled around Rem's fingertips. That was only natural, as Rem had been right in the middle of doing Katya's hair.

Rem: "Sorry. I was thinking about something."

Katya: "You don't need to tell me, of course everyone always has something on their mind, haven't they? Don't report every single thing like it is an excuse."

Rem: "…"

Katya: "—Ah, not that I am saying you shouldn't, but."

Thinking she might have gone too far, Katya awkwardly corrected herself.

The apologetic Rem inadvertently ended up feeling delighted at the attitude of the puppy-eyed girl.

Katya Aurélie—A woman held captive in Prime Minister Berstetz's mansion and, just like Rem, was under house arrest.

Unlike Rem, who had been brought along as a healer for a wounded Flop and put under house arrest by a concerned Berstetz, it seemed she was here because of different circumstances.

It was not like they exchanged the details of their respective circumstances, but compared to their meeting, even being able to talk like this meant they considerably warmed up to each other. Katya was the kind of person that would snap at the slightest remark, and double the distance to someone going through the trouble of getting close to her.

Katya: "…What's with that expression? It is quite irritating."

Rem: "Sorry. Even now, I also haven't properly gotten used to seeing it either. It's almost like it's from a stranger."

Katya: "C-Could you not say scary things? After hearing the story about you losing your memories, I can no longer tell when you are serious, it's scary!"

Staring in a gloomy manner towards the mirror, Katya brought her own finger to her mouth and bit at it.

Whenever something went awry, Katya had the habit of biting her nails like that. Rem had only known her for a short while, but for better or worse, she would often resort to that when feeling on the edge.

Biting her nails, Katya's reproachful gaze was reflected in the mirror as she glared at herself and Rem standing behind her. Behind the woman sitting in the wheelchair, Rem was still staring at her reflection in the mirror on the dressing table.

After all, what she had told Katya was an exaggeration.

Even Rem, without her “memories”, had long since accepted that this was not the expression of a stranger, but her own. She could ill afford to snap at everything she sees and touches.

If she starts doubting the kindness of Louis, the People of Shudraq, Medium, Flop, Priscilla or Schult, wouldn’t nothing be left her but an empty self?

Since she knew that, wasn’t it about time for the very first person to lend her a helping hand to—.

Katya: “…You’re good at doing hair.”

Rem: “Eh?”

Katya: “Like I said, you’re quite good at doing hair. Maybe, before you forgot everything, you were doing this as your job… but there’s no way, right?. I-I said something stupid. Forget about it. Just forget it. Forget it.”

Looking away from her reflection in the mirror, Katya blushed at the sight of Rem absent-mindedly doing her hair. Before she even noticed, Rem had finished doing her hair and her skill was clearly worthy of praise.

Using both hands to softly hold the pigtails steady, hanging down on either side of her head, Katya glared at Rem, her lips trembling.

Katya: “You’re spacing off again… I-If I’m such a boring person to talk to. Then! Please don’t and look, yes, look to someone else!”

Rem: “No, everyone else in the mansion is in the middle of working.”

Katya: “Then, am I just the only one loafing around? And then, coming to me of all people…”

Rem: “It’s not like that. Please don’t put me in the spot like that.”

Katya: “Which one of us…!”

Turning the wheels of her wheelchair, Katya fled to the back of the room. There, biting her nails and glaring upward, she was as ferocious as a cat whose territory had been violated.

Rem's unclear attitude made Katya uneasy.

Rem: "Katya-san, I am sorry for the misunderstanding. I didn't come to Katya-san's room because she was the only one free in the mansion."

Katya: "Then, then, what are you saying?! Why did you come to me…"

Rem: "That is…"

Asked for an appropriate reason, Rem thought for a moment.

Just as she had answered to Katya, Rem did not take her position lightly enough to seek out someone to kill time in this situation. However, after a little contact, she realized that Katya was not a particularly important person, nor did she hold any of the Empire's secrets.

From Rem's point of view, who was in a hurry to do something, there was no doubt that there was little to be gained by interacting with her.

Still, Rem actively tried to get involved with Katya because—

Katya: "Wh-Why? Tell me! If you won't say…"

Rem: "I think it's because Katya-san and I are friends."

Katya: "…"

Rem: "Katya-san?"

She seriously tried to look inwards and search for words that seemed to fit, but all that came out were hazy thoughts.

Rem did not have any sort of shrewd thoughts when it came to Katya. So, she could not give Katya a reason why she wanted to be there.

Rem would be in trouble if she could not convince Katya.

Katya: “Fhrend… Who the hell is Fhrend!”

Rem: “Huh? Ah, that’s not someone’s name. Friend means something like a companion.”

Katya: “Fhrend… eh, com… panion?”

Katya looked wide-eyed in astonishment, as if she had heard an unbelievable word. Katya’s reaction made Rem suddenly think that referring to her as a friend was too familiar.

To begin with, the relationship with Katya was one that Rem was forcing on her.

It may have been a bit thoughtless to call two people friends when they got to know each other while being unwillingly placed under house arrest in Berstetz’s mansion.

Rem: “I’m sorry, that was self-serving. It’d be better to say “fellow house arrestee” or “house arrest companions”…”

Katya: “Fr-friend!”

Rem: “Yes?”

Katya: “I said we’re friends. Yeah, I said it… We’re not particularly good friends, but still…”

Putting both hands on her face, Katya said so while looking away.

When Rem blinked at those words, Katya exhaled “Ah.”,

Katya: “But if you don’t like it, you know, you can stop anytime?”

Rem: “I understand. Then…”

Katya: “You, you want to stop?”

Rem: “I don’t want to stop. No, I mean that Katya-san and I are friends.”

Unexpectedly, Rem nodded, hoping that the person in question agreed. Katya’s eyes widened, then she pulled her hair down, bit her nails, and muttered, “Yes.”.

@ddukae

Rem had analyzed that she bit her nails when feeling anxious, but since she just did it right in front of her just now, Rem was wondering whether she offended or scared her.

However, she didn't look upset, so Rem decided to reconsider why she was biting her nails.

Including that hard-to-understand part, Rem felt that Katya was someone who could not be left alone. Rem did not know much either. However, this would be enough to meet the requirements of a friend.

Katya: "…Despite that, you, that is…"

Rem: "That is?"

Katya: "Yes, umm, that! …You seem to know a lot about the rebellion out there."

Katya, who had been biting her nails and closing her eyes, changed the subject as if she suddenly remembered.

For a moment, Rem was confused as to what she was saying, but quickly realized that she had just been lost in thought while doing Katya's hair.

Rem: "I'm not sure if I know enough about it to say I'm well informed, but I have an interest in it because I was originally brought in from a battleground. Is it different for you, Katya-san?"

Katya: "…Not exactly, no. However, I don't want to think about it too much. My older brother… My stupid brother died, and I hate war."

Rem: "—Oh."

Dropping her gaze, Katya muttered while intertwining the fingers of both hands in her lap.

The death of Katya's brother was not news to Rem. He must have been very important to Katya. She often spoke of her dead brother like this.

The most recent part of Abel's rebellion resulted in the death of Katya's brother. Perhaps his death was not unrelated to the battle in which Rem was involved.

Rem would also hate fighting if someone close to her died. Even now, she wished that there was no conflict.

Rem: "Still, even if I block my ears, it won't go away. I was told that Katya-san's fiancé is also on the battlefield. I'm sure you're worried."

Katya: "Not him…! H-He won't die no matter what. However."

Rem: "You thought the same of your brother, right?"

Katya: "…"

Perhaps it was something that could not be avoided if you were born into this Empire, especially if you were born into an aristocratic family.

Her brother died in battle, and her fiancé also went off to war. Rem had mixed feelings about going into battle as an Imperial Soldier. —Abel would show no mercy to his enemies.

The same was true even if the soldiers were formerly supposed to be his subordinates.

Rem: "It's strange…"

To begin with, Rem was not inspired by, nor in agreement with, Abel's philosophy.

Originally, she was taken prisoner in the Imperial camp, and Subaru enlisted the help of Abel and the People of Shudraq to take her out of there. In order to pay off that debt, Subaru cooperated with them —Rem also acted with them in an effort to make amends, but there should have been no obligation to do so.

Yes, it should not have happened, but it was already in the past.

Rem: “For Louis-chan, Priscilla-san, Mizelda-san’s group, Flop-san, and so on…”

One could say that the people related to Rem were either taking care of or looking after each other.

Such people shared the same path as Abel. Before she knew it, Rem had a hard time closing off her heart from it. But such things did not concern either the hostile Imperial Soldiers or Katya.

If Katya knew the reality of Rem’s situation, would she forgive Rem?

Katya: “…”

Due to Katya grieving the loss of her dear brother, Rem did not have the courage to open her heart to her.

Katya: “…You?”

Rem: “Ah, no, it’s nothing. If I seem to know the details of what’s going on outside, I think it’s because of the people who have been assembled somewhere else in the mansion grounds as of late.”

Katya: “Somewhere else in the mansion grounds… Ah, those guys.”

Hearing Rem’s story, Katya’s voice lowered a notch and her eyes grew stern.

That unsettled reaction by Katya was understandable. To begin with, Katya was shy and distrustful of people, and it took a lot of effort for Rem to approach her.

From her point of view, it was unwelcome to have more and more people in the mansion. And even more so with the flags of rebellion gathering from all over the country.

Katya: “There are so many of them, do you really think he’s there, among them, His Excellency the Emperor’s…”

Rem: “—Illegitimate child”

Katya: “…I’ve already been found out, so I have nothing to hide.”

Cutting off Rem’s reply, Katya made an uncomfortable face.

Another redundant word, she seemed to think, but Rem paid it no mind. More than that, the meaning of the word was far too captivating.

In Berstetz Fondalfon’s mansion, in a separate part of the mansion where Rem had also been under house arrest, a large number of youths from the battlefields throughout the Empire had been assembled.

—All of them were teenage boys, a trait shared by the black-haired Crown Prince.

Katya: “There were all these stories about how strange it was that His Excellency doesn’t have a son, well, there was…”

Muttering this in a hushed voice, Katya reminded Rem of the time when she met Berstetz one-on-one right after she was brought to the mansion.

Berstetz, who ousted Abel from his throne and replaced him with a false emperor, was claiming that Abel resigned from his role as Emperor as the reason for his treason.

Their neglected role was the lack of an heir to the throne.

Katya: “His Excellency never took an Empress, and …all the previous emperors have had many spouses and children …so it falls to them to select the next Emperor.”

Rem: “That is the conventional practice to do so. And yet, Abel-san, …No, Emperor Vincent did not abide by that. Then there were rumors of a black-haired Crown Prince.”

Katya: “It seems that you are saying that the Empire cannot be left in the hands of His Excellency. Utterly ridiculous.”

Rem: “Ridiculous, you say?”

Rem raised an eyebrow at Katya, who muttered with heartfelt hatred while looking downward.

It seemed like Katya’s rebellious remarks stemmed from her anger towards the people who started the war rather than her irritation at the causes of the war.

Rem: “Katya-san, what is your judgment about Emperor Vincent?”

Katya: “I, I would never do anything so presumptuous as judging His Excellency the Emperor! …But, in an Empire where the strong dominate, there is no place for someone like me, and …in peaceful times, there is not really a difference between the two. So it was comfortable.”

Rem: “Comfortable, is it…”

Rem’s eyes were downcast as Katya stammered and faltered as she revealed her feelings.

It did not seem like Abel’s capabilities were lacking, and Berstetz said that he would not have contemplated rebellion if it had not been for the heirship matter. In fact, the Empire had been at peace for so long that there were probably more than a few with opinions like Katya’s.

While there was no fighting, there would be fewer people risking their lives.

Katya’s brother died as soon as the fighting started, and her fiancé was dragged off to the battlefield. From Katya’s perspective, it would be difficult to have a good impression of the war.

However—

Rem: “I don’t think there’s a real Crown Prince to be found in that place.”

Whether or not Abel really had a child, Rem had come to that conclusion.

Hearing Rem's answer, Katya asked in a hushed voice, "Why?". Rem averted her gaze by turning her head towards that far-off person.

Rem: "The ones being held captive in that separate area are the Crown Princes who participated in the rebellions all over the country… At the very least, they're calling themselves that."

Katya: "Th-That's what I've heard too, but… But, can it be?"

Rem: "If you asked me, a self-proclaimed son of His Excellency the Emperor instigating a rebellion, and promptly getting himself captured does not sound like a well thought out situation."

Katya had difficulties ascertaining such a thing with certainty. There were just too many circumstances and bits of information she could not talk about.

Not only had these Crown Princes been taken prisoner from many battlefields, they had also been taken alive so that the facts could be ascertained. They had been assembled at this separate section of the mansion, as to wait for the time the matter of their position would be addressed.

Since Rem already knew the character of Abel, the real Emperor, he would be more cautious when it came to his child. At least, she did not think he would be that foolish.

In the first place, shouldn't supporters of the rebels side cooperate with Abel since he is their leader?

Considering that father and son would be working together to oust the fake Emperor, it was hard to believe that this Crown Prince so effortlessly captured was actually the real deal.

Rem: "Of course, there is no way to be sure…"

Even Rem could not state that her thoughts and impressions were absolute, either.

Even Abel was not almighty. Surely there was a scenario where he could be captured and rendered unable to act by some unforeseen mistake. However, being defeated in battle and taken prisoner was a different story.

If there was a calculated plan to include getting captured, she might consider it, but it was not clear that one of the Crown Princes in the separate house had planned to do so.

Katya: "I, I am by no means confident, but what are you to, …His Excellency the Emperor?"

Rem: "—. I have never met him. I think the man himself would even insist on it. But, I wonder if the people who would share my opinion on this far-away Crown Prince are that few."

Katya: "You mean, they're deceiving people with a fraud? What's even the point of such a dreadful thing…"

Rem: "…It's probably just a good way to recruit people."

Using the Emperor's biological son as a propaganda move would be the best possible pretext to claim the throne.

From what she had heard, there were no instances in the Vollachian Empire in which the Imperial throne had been superseded by usurpation. However, the logic of the Empire does not forbid usurping the Imperial throne.

If one seized the Imperial Capital, took the throne, and beheaded the Emperor, that person would become the next Emperor.

It was very convenient to support the next Emperor candidate as a pretext for gathering the necessary manpower to carry out such a plan.

Rem: "In addition, the Crown Prince has never been seen publicly, and we don't know anything about him except that he has black hair and black eyes, first come, so people are free to make up claims for their own benefits."

Katya: "…Um, who are the people who started saying that?"

Rem: "I guess it means they're part of the rebellion…"

Katya's question made her think about the people around the captive Crown Princes, rather than himself. These so-called "comrades" would not get away scot-free if the Crown Prince had been taken from them.

There was only one destination for those who defy the Emperor.

Katya: "They use you, they get taken advantage of, and then they get killed or arrested for it. …such stupid people."

Rem: "Katya-san…"

Katya: "Wha, what? Did I say something wrong? Or did you just say you're a hostage too? Are you saying that they are better than me?"

Katya's voice faltered as if she was having a tantrum, causing her eyes to tear up.

Perhaps the reason why she insists on being different from those far-off people in such an exceedingly malevolent way was because she came to realize how much she has in common with them contrary to her belief.

Katya often cursed herself for her own inadequacies, because the awareness of her captivity and the remorse she felt were a burden for the ones around her—first of all her fiancé.

Rem: "…"

Because Rem knew how she felt, she was at a loss for words.

She would be called a fraud if she was to oppose, and any words of understanding would be met with insults for being arrogant. At this point, she was not convinced that they had grown close enough for her to relieve Katya's heart without causing an argument.

Pondering about what she should say, Rem gripped her cane in frustration.

And then—

???: "—You're friggin' noisy, girl."

Rem: “…”

With those words, a terribly cold voice echoed through the room, and Rem and Katya held their breath. —No, Rem may have been able to settle for this, but not Katya.

Shocked, Katya faced her wide-eyed gaze behind Rem to the room’s window that looked out onto the courtyard. The voice had come in from the window, so in other words, the person speaking was there.

Katya made direct eye contact with the other person, and had ended up completely frozen in place.

Katya: “Ah, uh…”

???: “Enough of your grating voice. Quit being an eyesore. It is a mark of disrespect before this dragon.”

Wide-eyed after having let out a ragged breath, Katya was struck by a cold voice. As if her whole body was being gripped tightly by that voice, Katya’s throat had not even been able to properly respond.

At the sight of Katya trembling violently, Rem bit her lip and turned to look back.

There—

Rem: “—Madelyn-san”

Madelyn: “Healer-girl, what are you doing here? You should be fulfilling your duties. Did you get carried away in the absence of this dragon?”

Rem: “That was not my intention.”

With the focus of that strict voice directed towards herself, this time Rem was the one feeling intimidated. However, Rem shielded Katya behind her from that gaze and faced the other party directly.

Standing in the courtyard, outside the window of the room, was a petite girl in lovely clothes and two black horns growing out of her head—Madelyn Eschart.

She was one of the Nine Divine Generals, and the person responsible for bringing Rem to this mansion. When she made her return after leaving the mansion on Berstetz or Vincent's command time and time again, Rem would be surprised at the appearance of the girl.

It was not about her appearing. Because of her fierce appearance.

Madelyn stood confidently in the courtyard, her appearance stained with sticky black blood.

Rem: "Is that blood? Are you injured?"

Madelyn: "Don't change the subject. I, the dragon, surely told you to heal that man's wounds."

Rem: "I'm not changing it. Flop-san's wounds are being properly handled one step at a time. More importantly, please answer me. That blood is…"

Madelyn: "—. It's not this dragon's blood. This is the blood splatter of victims."

With an annoyed frown, Madelyn pulled at her clothes and answered Rem's question. The crispy sound it made was probably because the dried blood had already stuck her clothes to her skin.

Rem caught her breath upon being told that that large amount of blood was that of victims. In just what way could you have hurt someone else, or perhaps how many people would you have had to hurt to be bathed in that much blood?

Rem: "Have you been fighting?"

Madelyn: "A fight is something done with an opponent you recognize as an equal. Do you think there is anything that could stand on equal footing with this dragon? What this dragon has been doing is hunting. Hunting with bothersome limitations."

Rem: "Bothersome…"

Madelyn: "Let those with black-hair live. Kill the rest."

Rem could not respond carelessly to Madelyn’s direct manner of speaking.

However, she was able to understand that Madelyn bore the duty of bringing back the Crown Princes from various battlefields in order to be held prisoner in a separate building.

As expected, Berstetz was probably the one who ordered the securing of the Crown Prince.

Given the original purpose for bringing about the rebellion, if Abel truly had an illegitimate child, that fundamental reason itself would end up being lost.

Rem did not know whether Berstetz feared that or welcomed it.

She did not know, but—

Rem: “If he’s saying to capture, and not to kill… l”

If a real Crown Prince was found, she had a feeling that the old man would die satisfied.

That was a supposition that chilled Rem’s heart.

In any case—

Rem: “So, did you return to stick another Crown Prince in the separate building again? Or, to make sure I was not slacking as Flop-san’s healer?”

Madelyn: “Chattering, does this dragon have a reason to chat with you? Don’t get carried away, you. At this stage, even without you, the Imperial Capital has plenty of healers…”

Rem: “Will those healers be able to keep a secret? If the Prime Minister hasn’t appointed them, finding such a person will be very difficult.”

Madelyn: “—Don’t friggin’ get carried away, you.”

Rem, unintentionally forceful in her reply, was not trying to be pushy. Madelyn stepped up to the window and narrowed the pupils of her golden eyes, as if she had been offended by it.

At the sight of this fierce, chilling presence, Rem felt a slight shiver run down her spine.

Katya: “I-Idiot! Don’t say anything you don’t have to! It, it’s not true at all!”

And then, with squeaking wheels, Katya came rushing out in a great hurry.

Katya, with her pale face turning more white, turned to face Madelyn who was looking through the window, her throat quivering beneath her gaze.

Katya: “Y-you don’t have to take anything she says seriously, don’t worry… don’t worry about it! Sh-she just doesn’t know anything, because she forgot everything, she’s an idiot.”

Rem: “K-Katya-san…”

Katya: “She’s an idiot, but it’s better if she’s here, so, st-stop it. … Um, properly! I’ll let you do your job properly. And she’ll fix the one with the blond hair, too…”

Rem quietly gulped at Katya’s frantic choice of words. Madelyn’s eyes narrowed at Katya’s vigor, and she stared at her.

Then, wondering what to do in the case there was an outrageously dangerous expression on her face, Rem waited for Madelyn’s next move, ready to protect Katya with her body.

And then—

Madelyn: “—Do not defy this dragon, such a weak thing like you. There will be no next time.”

Katya: “Eek!”

Madelyn placed her hand on the window sill and squeezed it as she spoke indifferently. With a violent sound, Katya’s throat caught as the masonry was crushed with a light touch.

However, despite finding Katya’s attitude to be inexcusable, Madelyn seemed to have decided to let it slide—

Rem: “Please correct what you said, calling Katya-san a weak thing. A weak person would not have chided you like that.”

Katya: “S-Stop! Stop, idiot! Die! Idiot! Stop!”

Rem: “Katya-san! But…”

Katya: “No buts! Just stop! Die! Stop!”

Katya collided into Rem, who was walking with her cane and had tried turning around to face Madelyn. Since she was frail, it was a weak ramming attack, and even Rem could easily stop it, but since Katya looked desperate after that as she extended her arms, naturally Rem could not shake herself free.

As for Rem, she had wanted Madelyn to retract her excessively condescending statement about Katya, but if Katya frantically stopped her like that, there was nothing she could do.

Madelyn snorted and turned her back on Rem, who had thus abandoned her direct appeal.

Madelyn: “Watch your mouth, girl. I’ll seriously arrange for a replacement healer.”

Rem: “Please wait. Where are you going?”

Madelyn: “To that man’s place. This dragon has something to discuss with that man.”

Rem: “If you are going to Flop-san’s place, please go after you’ve washed off the blood and changed your clothes. Since he is injured, you need to also take heed of his state of mind. Please take this into consideration.”

Madelyn: “You…”

Without hesitating, Rem declared that to her back when she was about to leave. There Madelyn once again made an unpleasant face, and Katya said, “Die!”, as she pulled on Rem’s sleeve.

However, Rem could not die, and she could not let Flop die.

Covered in blood as she was, it would be extremely filthy and unsanitary. No matter the common sense of the dragonkin or the Empire, on that alone Rem would not compromise.

Rem: “Take a bath.”

Madelyn: “…Got it.”

Rem: “Please also change your clothes. We have lots of cute clothes to change into properly…”

Madelyn: “I friggin’ said I got it! Friggin’ persistent girl!”

Baring her fangs and raising her voice, the overpowerment in Madelyn’s scream struck Rem, and incidentally Katya, like the wind and made them catch their breaths.

Still, Madelyn also probably understood that she should not go against Rem’s instructions. That was Flop’s major achievement for having successfully won her over.

Some day, would he be able to get Madelyn to change sides in that way?

Madelyn: “Don’t look at this dragon with insolent eyes, girl. — Everything you scheme is futile.”

Rem: “I don’t think you can say it’s futile. No matter what you do.”

Madelyn: “That’s not what I friggin’ mean. I’m friggin’ saying there’s no time to do anything.”

Rem: “No time?”

Tilting her head, Rem narrowed her eyes and tried to search for the true meaning of Madelyn’s words.

However, there was no need for her to search for the true meaning. Madelyn should have hated Rem, but even still, perhaps because of the dragonkin's pride and way of life, she hated things like lying and deceiving.

Therefore she properly explained clearly the meaning of the words she had said.

She had said.

Madelyn: "The decisive opportunity to settle things with those who defy the Emperor is friggin' near. It was for that purpose that this dragon was called back. —Your role also friggin' ends there."

So she spoke.

2

With that, leaving behind these seemingly hopeless words, Madelyn departed from the garden.

Since she did not head straight for Flop's room, she presumably would follow Rem's advice to bathe and change her clothes, and from there she would pay a visit to his room.

Flop would be welcoming of that in itself, and if he was not going to be hurt, then Rem had no reason to stop her.

However—

Rem: "—The decisive battle, with the rebel army."

Katya: "Sh-she didn't say where though…"

Rem: "…"

While biting her nails and still worrying about the movements outside the window of Madelyn, who had gone away, Katya was harboring the same apprehensions that Rem was.

The concern she had was about the decisive battle between the Imperial Army and the Rebel Army—Specifically, the time and the place.

From Madelyn's words, she indicated that it was not far off. But where would the location be? Was there somewhere suitable for an all-out confrontation?

With rebels rising up all over the Empire and battlefields scattered here and there, if you could prepare to take down such an opponent in one fell swoop, it would be—.

Katya: "…Sheesh, they really are just idiots. You too. You're a big idiot!"

Rem: "Katya-san…"

Katya: "Th-that was a Divine General, a dragonkin who can't be communicated with, right?! And yet, that kind of behavior could have resulted in death! If you want to be stupid, go ahead and die on your own! Die, you idiot!"

Katya blamed Rem in a tearful voice, replacing the anxiety of waiting with the frustration of the immediate situation.

Unlike Rem, who had settled her resolve, Katya had been pushed too much. In fact, if Katya had not intervened, it was quite possible that Madelyn's anger could lead to Rem getting hurt, if not killed.

Rem: "My apologies, thank you. But I couldn't keep quiet after she said bad things about Katya…"

Katya: "L-like I care! I'm used to being told what to do! And yet, that kind of idiot…"

Rem: "It is ridiculous to get used to being told what to do. So no matter how many times you say it, I would argue the same way again in the same situation."

It was not a good feeling to hear Katya belittling herself. Still, humiliation had its due reason and consideration. Though, Rem could not bear to see blades turned on a complete stranger.

—I think it's selfish to look back at myself, though.

Rem: “That’s what I think, so I…”

She knew it was selfish, but she did not want to cease having a voice.

Katya’s eyes blinked repeatedly and her mouth fluttered at Rem’s answer.

Then she glared at Rem with sharp, teary eyes and bit her nails.

Kayta: “L-like I care… Things like your matters, like I care! S-stop it. Just stop. We’re not friends. For me, I’ll just stop…!”

Rem: “No, I should have the choice whether to stop. I refuse.”

Katya: “Such a one-sided conversation!”

Rem smiled wryly as Katya retorted to her, with her throat choking up.

While softening the tightness in her chest slightly, Rem thought.

—The decisive battle of which Madelyn spoke, if that is so close at hand.

Rem: “…I wonder, just what can I do?”

In her empty self with nothing contained therein, was it even possible for something to resound?

That was the only thing which continued to make Rem’s heart pound so badly.

Chapter 86:
The Five Bastions

1

—The “Giant Eye” Izmail, was a valiant warrior of the Cyclops Tribe and the hope of his clan.

In the center of his valiant face, a large blue eye fixed its gaze clearly on the future without hesitation.

As the name suggested, the Cyclops Tribe was a race which had no more than a single eye. If one took into account the fact that most races were born with a pair of eyes, a single eye could almost never have an advantage in survival.

In that case, was the Cyclops Tribe a pitiful race with an inferior ability to survive?

—Absolutely, that could be denied.

For the Cyclops Tribe, which had only one eyeball, in exchange for their weakness of their survival ability diminishing with the loss of one eye, that single eyeball possessed many peculiarities.

With the basis of an eyesight that could see much further into the distance than other races, and while it varied based on the individual, there were many who could see the concentrations of mana or heat, or those who were abnormally superior at seeing movement.

The Evil Eye Tribe was another race with an eye that possessed peculiarities, but unlike them, who were often born with weak bodies in exchange for their unique abilities, the Cyclops Tribe was also physically strong.

In a sense, the “Eye” was superior to all other abilities in battle.

Needless to say, in day-to-day life, the amount of information obtained from what one could see accounted for the majority of perception, and that became even more obvious on the battlefield where it was more directly tied to survival.

Therefore, the Cyclops Tribe could be called a superior species that was well equipped for producing excellent warriors.

Returning to the topic at hand, let us speak of the “Giant Eye” Izmail.

Having turned twenty-one, Izmail was a fighter who wielded an enormous battleaxe with his well-trained body. As mentioned before, a single blue eye blinked in the center of his face, and had become something which members of the Cyclops Tribe trembled at due to its excellence, and members of other tribes trembled at due to its intimidating air.

For the sense of beauty of the Cyclops Tribe, there were many ratings for the beauty in the shape and size of that eye, as well as its color and radiance, but Izmail’s eye was an exceedingly first class item in each category.

With a beautiful big blue eye, he was expected to follow a different path from the ordinary as soon as he was born, and was nicknamed “Giant Eye” from a young age, and along with the hopes of his clan, he became a boy, he became a young man, and he became a warrior.

Wielding a battleaxe taller than himself, the “Giant Eye” would tremendously mow down the battlefield—If he was in an era where war raged in the Vollachian Empire, that name would be famous not only in his clan, but throughout the country.

However, the times had not waited for him to grow up, and he complacently plunged into a state of stagnation and relaxation.

Many cursed that bad luck of Izmail’s. However, fate had not abandoned him.

The torchlight of rebellion that had begun in the East, before long it had spread its flames throughout Vollachia, and invoked Izmail, deprived of the opportunity to fight, to the battlefield.

Izmail: “As long as I have a chance to fight—”

Then with this battleaxe, I will achieve results in battle that no one can imitate.

That was Izmail’s pride, and the promised future that everyone in the clan believed in without question. In the Empire, at the peak of military prowess were those known as the Nine Divine Generals, but if the same chance that those people had been blessed with had presented itself, he would astonish all of them.

Therefore, when Izmail the “Giant Eye” shouted that the Emperor must be defeated, not a single member of his tribe dissented, and they also had actively helped search for the black-haired child.

Just as the signs of rebellion had spread throughout the Empire, so too did the existence of the black-haired Crown Prince—It was not about whether he actually existed or not that was important, but that there was a bill making a justifiable claim.

Simply put, having a black-haired boy was the qualification to join the great uprising that had begun in the Vollachian Empire, and those who failed to see the opportunity undermined the righteous cause they were joining at that point.

Those who quietly observed these circumstances, standing by and watching the competition for supremacy from outside, went against the ways of the Empire.

—The people of the Empire must be strong.

To this day, it was a teaching that had been spread throughout the Empire, even to the people that were unconnected to its capital. Those who could not understand that principle were not qualified to participate in this great uprising, nor were they qualified to live in the Empire afterwards.

When Izmail fulfilled his ambitions, he would uproot all of them and create a more powerful nation.

For that purpose—

Izmail: “—It is I who shall reign supreme over this Vollachian Empire!”

Pressing the tips of his feet against the base of the colossal stone wall, Izmail’s body ascended to the sky.

A wall that had probably been thought of as insurmountable for the people outside, with the people inside absolutely not allowing any hostility to pass through it whatsoever, easily traveling over that, he planted his feet on the wall.

Seeing Izmail, who had landed atop the rampart, the soldiers there who had drawn their bows were in chaos, and they panicked as they tried to draw the swords at their waists, but they were too slow.

Izmail: “What unsightliness for soldiers of the Empire!”

Gripping the handle of the battleaxe he carried on his back, the muscles in his right arm swelled, then, a flash.

The huge blade that was released swept through the air without a sound, and the upper bodies of the five soldiers in its path were obliterated simultaneously. Having lost everything above the waist, their lower bodies slowly collapsed, a great amount of blood flooded out, and the surrounding soldiers screamed.

His eardrums grasped that those people were filled with intense caution and a meager amount of trepidation,

Izmail: “Boorish.”

Rather than warriors that harbored vigilance and nervousness, the ones who succumbed to cowardice were exceedingly disappointing. Izmail blinked his blue eye once, and switched the world he could see.

At that moment, bright colors vanished from the vividly-colorful world and his field of view was filled with dark colors. —No, not just dark colors. Red, yellow, and blue lights emerged from the darkness. Those were the emotions carried by living things, perceiving them as colors was the special trait of Izmail's eye.

With the power of his eye, Izmail could catch a glimpse of whether or not the enemy had the will to fight, what kinds of skills they had mastered, and their history as a warrior.

Possessing a field of view of those omitted colors, Izmail chose his enemies.

Namely—

Izmail: "Disappear you cowards!"

Stepping forward, the battleaxe swung towards the mediocre people who harbored a blue light, with their minds already detached from the battlefield, those who were trying to prioritize self-preservation.

Mowing down the backs turned towards him, denying the legs that tried to run away, smashing the faces of those who tried to beg for their lives, death and blood were spreading atop the wall.

And thus he rampaged, seeing the blue lights increase one after the other, his disappointment intensified.

Izmail: "What the hell is this? This should be the Imperial Capital, the territory at the side of His Excellency the Emperor of the Vollachian Empire!"

Pointing his battleaxe towards the interior side of the rampart, Izmail shouted his fury from atop of the wall.

Out in the distance at the center of the Vollachian Empire, the symbol of a powerful nation that no one had ever been able to defeat, the Crystal Palace, considered the most beautiful castle in the world, could be seen, and Izmail could reach it in less than a few minutes.

He would rush into the Crystal Palace, defeat the soldiers arrayed there, and take the head of the Emperor sitting on the throne.

That was what Izmail wanted. However, that was—

Izmail: “It’s not such a cheap honor that can be obtained by tyrannizing such cowardly soldiers!”

Feeling betrayed by what he believed in, Izmail’s angry voice sounded like lamentation.

Even so, the diligently forged battleaxe was precisely aiming for the enemy’s life, and with each and every step, life was wiped out, and the disappointment grew more intense within the “Giant Eye”.

Following Izmail as he did so, warriors of the same Cyclops Tribe reached the top of the wall one after another. They, too, used their weapons to drive away fleeing soldiers, knocking them down and taking their lives.

He wanted to be proud of that. He wanted to make it known that the Cyclops Tribe was here.

Izmail: “But, that’s not going to happen if our opponent is you guys…”

???: “W-wait! St-stop…!”

In front of the sorrowful eyes of Izmail, the man he was chasing collapsed.

The man ran away from the warriors and fell in front of the person who was the most dangerous to approach, seeing Izmail with a sneer on his face, and yelped “Aah!” with a quivering voice.

Putting both his hands forward, he scooted back on his buttocks while he grudgingly shook his head at Izmail.

Soldier: “Don’t kill me! I don’t wanna, I don’t wanna die!”

Izmail: “—. Stop it already. Don’t live in such dishonor any longer.”

Soldier: “Ah, aaaaah!”

Izmail: “That’s enough.”

Izmail’s face contorted at the soldier’s attitude, which was so miserable and pathetic. When it was too disgusting to hear any more, he raised the battleaxe up high in his hands.

With a gleam, the blood-soaked blade shined dully, and the soldier's eyes were stained with despair,

Izmail: "If you're a warrior, I'll at least give you a fitting end—"

Soldier: "Y-you're wrong! I'm not a warrior! I'm not a soldier!"

Izmail: "What?"

As he swung his battleaxe down, his arm stopped just before he was about to split the life out of his opponent along with his skull. With a snap, the axe stopped near the skin on his head, and the man exhaled a "Phew" as he slackened.

Though, it was not that he spared that life on a whim. The brief comment from just before, that was what stopped him.

Izmail: "Not a soldier, what do you mean? You're currently equipped as a soldier."

Soldier: "They made me wear it! Wearing this, taking a bow and fighting! If I do that…"

Izmail: "If you do that?"

Soldier: "I'd be pardoned! They'd release me, and I could leave the prison…"

Izmail: "…"

He peeked at the desperate man's face. There was no lie to be found in his pale, cold complexion.

A reasonable amount of trembling would be created in the face of someone who was lying and trying to conspire against you. Izmail's eye, which did not overlook the subtleties of this case, did not find any deception.

Izmail: "There's no way."

Now, taking in what he had just seen, Izmail's looked around the top of the wall.

Pursued by the Cyclops Tribe who had climbed the wall, the Imperial Soldiers had fallen into disarray atop the wall—All of them had a cowardice that made him want to close his eye, but no matter how much they resisted, it would never be enough.

On the way to attack the Imperial Capital, the soldiers of the garrison with spears still put up a better fight. Izmail was disappointed that the regular soldiers in charge of the defense of the Capital were in such a state.

Were they not regular soldiers, but criminals who had been given equipment?

If so, for what purpose did they—.

Izmail: "…"

After thinking about it, Izmail suddenly realized the answer.

If his thoughts were correct, then right now, the only people on top of the wall were the warriors of the Cyclops Tribe which he led, and the criminals they were doing battle against.

In other words—

???: "—Burn all at once."

Suddenly, a quiet voice struck Izmail's eardrums amidst a sky reverberating with angry shouts and screams.

The volume of the voice, which should not have been audible and the fact that it was heard, made his whole body alert. A rare phenomenon on the battlefield, the kind of thing where power resided in even the voice of a powerful being.

A somewhat idiotic voice seemingly lacking in seriousness reached the ears of the "Giant Eye."

Izmail: "…"

Widening his large single eye, Izmail looked up at the sky of the Imperial Capital.

Inside the ramparts of the city, protected by solid walls where the buildings were lined up in an orderly manner, there was a brown-skinned woman floating in the sky with her legs having become fire.

With one of her eyes covered by an eyepatch, she turned her blood-red eye toward him, and the woman—

Izmail: “RAAAAAHHHHH—!!”

The moment he saw her, Izmail let out a war cry, and kicking off the ramparts, he soared.

Swinging his large battleaxe, he furiously swooped down on the woman in the sky. It was such a mighty blow that even if it did not hit a vital point, but only grazed a part of the body, it would send a painful blow throughout her entire body.

The cells in his body were screaming that he had to fire a shot with all his might, a shot that was an order of magnitude different from the one he had fired at his cowardly opponent on the wall, and that he could not win without unleashing it.

Without missing, he plunge it into the slender body of the woman floating in the sky—

???: “Disappear.”

Following the woman’s single word, a light filled his vision with white that enveloped Izmail’s world.

2

???: “Kah…uh…hah…hk”

Coughing and suffering from a burning sensation all over his body, he sat up.

His throat burned, and when he reached for his throat quickly, his ragged, charred skin and fingers began falling off. Witnessing the damage, he realized that it was a miracle that he had managed to survive.

—No, it was not a miracle.

Right away, he had used his battleaxe as a shield to protect himself from the oncoming flames. Even that was only possible because of the scorching heat that seemed to overwhelm everything and anything in its path.

Only, Izmail understood that he was probably the only one who had barely managed to survive.

Izmail: "…"

When he forced his trembling eyelid open and looked up, he saw the ramparts of the Imperial Capital glowing red hot, and that the warriors of the Cyclops Tribe who had been fighting ruthlessly, as well as the mobilized criminals, had been burnt to nothing all at once.

There was no doubt that most of them were engulfed by the flames without knowing what had even happened. Or perhaps they had understood, and those who were able to react had their suffering prolonged.

Suffering and still being the only one left alive, this death was a cruel one.

And, most cruelly of all.

???: "—What, there are still survivors? You had good luck…no, would it be bad? You sure are a bad guy."

Amidst the smell of the burning vegetation and human flesh, stepping on ground which had been covered with ash and soot, a single man appeared.

The man that carried an axe on his shoulder tilted his head and looked down at Izmail in the burnt field. Looking into his terrible, cold, parched eyes, Izmail felt an instinct.

Stationing the criminals on the rampart, and burning them together with Izmail and the others who were fighting them, this man was the one responsible for carrying out that brutal strategy.

Izmail: “Y-you… everyone is…”

???: “—? Don’t be ridiculous, I’m not the one who burned them. I couldn’t have done such an outrageous thing. It was done by a monster who could do it. If you’re going to hold a grudge, hold it against them.”

Izmail caught his breath at the tone of the man’s voice, neither mocking nor playful, but as if he sincerely believed that from the bottom of his heart. Then, he quickly switched the vision of his single eye, and concentrated it in order to see through the man.

However, Izmail was then astounded. —He was blue.

Those who harbored a strong fighting spirit would be red, if they had a strong degree of nervousness and anxiety they would be yellow, and if they turned their back on the battle with panic or fear, they would be blue.

Despite the fact that he had managed to successfully trap and round up Izmail and the others, he was blue.

This man was not even a warrior. Nor was he a coward. He was something far more horrifying.

Izmail: “I cannot let you live—!!”

Indeed, acting in accordance with the appeal of his instincts and the world seen by his single eye, Izmail jumped up.

The flames showered upon him had scorched his internal organs, and his left arm was completely lost to the fire from his shoulder onwards. Due to the wounds he had sustained all over his body, his movements were slow compared to when he was in his best condition. However, even the melted and misshapen battleaxe lying beside him was enough to strike his opponent dead.

With all his might, he swung his battleaxe straight at the man, hearing the creaking of his burnt arm and the cracking of his flesh.

???: “I agree that we can’t keep you alive. Also, this is something that I’ve been thinking about for a while, but…”

Izmail: “—Hk?!”

???: “There’s no way that a guy with only one eye could be strong.”

In front of the eye of the charging Izmail, the man threw a small package from his waist. The package opened while mid-air, and spilled out its contents of black powder.

It was a kind of spice, and there was no way for one to avoid it from being used against them as a smoke screen. The right arm gripping his battleaxe could not shake it off, and it was needless to speak of his left arm that was missing, and as a result, his vision was blinded by the black powder.

Letting out a grunt of “guh”, his battleaxe attack was interrupted and he flew backwards.

Although those of the Cyclops Tribe possessed excellent eyesight, his weakness was exploited nicely. However, they should not be underestimated. Targeting the eyes of the Cyclops was a common practice, so there were countermeasures prepared.

The large eyes of the Cyclops Tribe could secrete a large amount of tears in an instant, laced with—.

Izmail: “—Oh.”

Izmail had stimulated his tear glands to secrete tears, but he did not open his eyes again.

The next moment, a shell from a Magic Stone Cannon hit Izmail, who had closed his eyes, and completely blasted away that “Giant eye” altogether.

3

Todd let out a sigh when, before his eyes, the Cyclops Tribe was blown to pieces by cannonballs.

He finished it without having much trouble since he had precisely set a trap for them, but if he had originally tried to have a fair fight, he was not sure if he had a chance to win; that was the kind of expert he was.

Todd: “Insurance is something you gotta have.”

While looking at the corpses of the Cyclops Tribe that had been blown away and the traces of cannonballs that had caved in the surroundings, Todd raised his clenched fist to the sky, communicating to the gunners on the wall that there was no need for a pursuit.

Make the enemy’s vanguard ascend the ramparts, and keep them there using allies whose deaths do not matter. Then, use massive firepower to burn everyone on the opponent’s side to a crisp, it was really a simple strategy.

However, the result was immediate.

Todd: “In most cases, the people with confidence are the first spears to breach enemy lines.”

When it came to battles like this that involved a great number of people, those who volunteered for the role of the vanguard were eager in their desire for glory, or they thoroughly understood the importance of a preemptive attack in war.

For example, no matter who the opponent was, if their thrust went through, it would become troublesome later. In a double sense, it was necessary to stop the vanguard.

Todd: “Well, we’ve crushed the opponent’s initial charge, but how will they proceed?”

Even if they had defeated the utmost vigorous Cyclops Tribe, there was no shortage of those who would dare to try killing His Excellency the Emperor. It was an exhibition of the belligerent tribes that had assembled from all over the Empire.

In addition to the Cyclops Tribe, he was preparing for a mountain's worth of people with differences in the number of limbs and eyes, in the size of body parts, in the color of their skin and blood, and in languages, such that it was troublesome to even think about how to deal with them.

However—

Todd: "No matter how many strange tribes the opponent gathers, I don't think it's going to have a considerable impact. At any rate…"

As Todd muttered that, Arakiya flew overhead, her whole body clad in a swirling wind.

The charge of the Cyclops Tribe, there should have been attacks at the same time, but to the lot that had missed that opportunity, he felt like attacking. Additionally, at the bastions of the star-shaped ramparts that surrounded the city, at the four places separate to the one Todd's group was in charge of, the guardians in charge of those places had commenced their attacks.

—Purple thorns rampaged, mowing down the large army of half-man, half-horse Centaur People who were trying to advance.

—The exceedingly huge Flying Winged Blade tore through the sky, and the Weaponkin, who used one part of their body as a weapon, were chewed to pieces.

—The fists of stone golems which sprang up from the ground, struck down the pitiful Winged People who grew wings incapable of flight.

—A group of deviants who had mastered the art of slaughter, massacred the Glow People, who each had a scintillating stone embedded in their foreheads.

Todd: "If the circumstances involve monsters, then our side will have a good match."

—Becoming one with nature, and reducing the Cyclops Tribe to ashes with bright red flames as if it was the same as just breathing.

Five monsters, equally capable, stood at the bastions of the wall that protected the Imperial Capital of Lupugana. With five monsters at five bastions, did the rebels, who had only spirit and ambition, have a way to surpass this?

Todd: “In any case, if it was me, even if I was asked I would absolutely refuse. Nevertheless…”

There was a plan to keep them from approaching the walls, a plan for how to kill those that did, a plan for those they failed to kill, and a plan to escape.

It would be best if they did not end up all the way at that last plan, but the circumstances in a battle were hard to predict.

In the first place, the fact that the rebels arrived at the Imperial Capital like this, and that this battle had even begun, exceeded what Todd had imagined before the war moved into full-swing.

Todd: “Because of that, even though I’ve returned to the Imperial Capital, I haven’t been able to meet with Katya… Just how long must you get in the way of my meeting with Katya before you are satisfied.”

It was not a discontent which he could say about anyone or towards anyone, and if he had to say it would be towards the world, so while he did that, Todd looked up to the sky thick with the scent of death, and kicked off the ground of the burnt field.

Many more, many more, many, many more people would die.

Just how many more people would have to die for a decisive person to lower their weapons?

Todd: “Enough with this, you war-mongering freaks.”

4

???: “—Unfortunately, you guys are out of your depth! I shall not let you go any further!!”

In an imposing stance atop the rampart, he spread both arms wide as he caused peristalsis throughout his entire body.

Immediately after, the inside of General Second-Class Kafma Irulux's body pulsated, and purple thorns were released from those arms with tremendous vigor, flying towards the group of Centaur People fiercely galloping across the farmland—with their upper-halves as human, and their lower-halves possessing horse-like characteristics, the bottoms of their feet were mowed down, their torsos were pierced, and they were sunk into the solid ground.

Evading the thorn attack, the brave men came even closer to the rampart and brandished their spears, throwing them.

The leg strength and vigor of a horse was transmitted to their upper bodies, and the hurled javelins' power was no less than that of a Magic Stone Cannon. Unlike Magic Stone Cannons which took a huge amount of money to get in sufficient numbers, as long as the Centaur People had spears and some run-up distance, their javelins would exhibit more than enough destructive power.

It was the defensive wall safeguarding the Imperial Capital. Inscribed with the Divine Protection of Earth, it would not collapse under ordinary attacks, but if it was struck by hundreds of spears of that power, some damage could get through.

However—

Kafma: "It was your ill fortune that you happened to choose the bastion I am protecting."

Declaring so, Kafma spread the arms which had let the thorns loose wide open. In accordance with that movement, the thorns would mow sideways across the battlefield, and deal the warriors of the Centaur People that had tumbled a finishing blow.

However, the javelins and the brave men who threw them evaded the thorns' pursuit.

Therefore, Kafma invoked not thorns, but a different "insect" that had entered him.

Kafma: "—hk!"

There was a sound of bones creaking with pain, and Kafma's chest wearing light armor burst open from inside. White ribs opened outwards from inside his body, and they pointed their sharp tips downward while trembling.

The brave men of the Centaur People galloped forth, and at that group was aimed the gap of the ribs exposed from Kafma's open chest, as they readied themselves for whatever that may happen.

However, even if they readied themselves, there was no use.

—Immediately after, Kafma's entire body rebounded violently, and the recoil sent his tall figure sliding back. His heels that had been firmly dug in, pared through the rampart, and Kafma looked forward as he endured the tearing pain.

Below him, the line of fire that Kafma's ribs had aimed at was completely hollowed out, and it swallowed up all the Centaur People who should have been on their way, annihilating them.

Like the thorns, it was a new "insect" suitable for taking on a large number of enemies at once—He had been nervous that he would once again be in a pupa state during an essential scenario.

Kafma: "…But, I made it in time. As long as I am here, you shall not pass by the protection of the Imperial Capital."

Firmly, he stroked down his torso that had moved the Centaur People aside, and his ribs closed back inside his open chest.

The new "insect" was powerful, but the backlash was just as great. It was a double-edged sword that completely took away the strength of his mind and body, and it should not be fired rapidly.

However, even if he had to reach out to such a menace, there was value in attempting it.

Kafma: "You damn rebels are thoughtlessly trampling on the peace that His Excellency brought about through his ability."

As a "General", he had seen the reign of Emperor Vincent Vollachia up close.

As a man of the rare and constantly shunned Insect Cage Tribe, he had lived in the world created by Emperor Vincent Vollachia.

As the person known as Kafma Irulux, he had seen with his own eyes the magnitude of Emperor Vincent Vollachia's great accomplishments.

For what reason, should a blade be turned to Vincent Vollachia?

How could anyone else rival the supremacy of a man who attempted to change the state of things in the Empire, and who was in fact continuing to change it?

Therefore—

Kafma: "I cannot afford to let the likes of you lot proceed to the front of His Excellency the Emperor."

???: "—Gee, y'sure got quite th'great resolve, don't ya? I don't hate it."

Evading both the thorns and the white bombardment, a figure kicked off the farmland and leapt up to the rampart. While looking down at his short opponent, Kafma narrowed his slitted eyes.

He was a newcomer, and had enough skill to reach the spot the brave men of the Centaur People had not. —Simply put, he was a formidable enemy.

From the start, he had not been good at cutting corners. He was also not very good at going easy or playing around.

However, Kafma had determined that this was an opponent with whom he would not have an ounce of leeway.

Kafma: "General Second-Class of the Vollachian Empire, Kafma Irulux."

Thus introducing himself with that, six transparent wings protruded from Kafma's back, tearing through the cloak he had worn from the inside. Seeing that preparation for war—No, rather than preparation for war, he accepted that as an introduction.

It was proper for a warrior to give their name when taking on another warrior. Of course, on the battlefield, there were more than a few who did not follow that way of doing things—

Garfiel: “—Garfiel.”

Kafma: “…”

Garfiel: “My amazin’ self’s the “Gorgeous Tiger” Garfiel Tinzel. —In truth, my amazin’ self was told not give my name, but there are times where I ain’t got a choice.”

With that, the man with a ferocious smile on his face—Garfiel, brought both of the beautiful gauntlets on his arms together in front of his chest, making a pleasant sound like an instrument would.

Entrusted with guarding the ramparts of the Imperial Capital, Kafma had been prepared to stick it out till the end, no matter how many days it took.

—The crucial bout that had arrived on the first day of the war, the strongest man of the Empire’s Second-Class Generals had not misjudged it.

Chapter 87:
Decisive Battle at the Bastion

1

The siege of the Imperial Capital Lupugana by the rebel army, for the purpose of defeating the Emperor Vincent Vollachia, rebels had gathered from all over the country in cooperation, and it had begun as a united front—was not what had happened at all.

There was certainly a great number of rebels who were currently gathering around the Imperial Capital of Lupugana.

Gathered from all over the Empire, they laid siege to Lupugana, the heart of the Vollachian Empire, and prepared a force that overwhelmed the number of Imperial Soldiers the Imperial Capital held.

In most cases, battles were decided by numbers.

The larger the scale of the battle, the more decisive this rule became, and it could be said that the rebel forces, which had been able to gather more than double the number of troops in simple forces ratio, gained an overwhelming advantage in their attack on the Imperial Capital.

However—

???: "—That is, if the assembled troops can function as a cohesive unit."

In the innermost place of the Imperial Capital Lupugana, seated atop the throne in the audience chamber of the Crystal Palace, Vincent's black eyes narrowed as he received reports of the all-out offensive with the rebels that had begun.

The Capital was surrounded by rebel forces and attacked with an overwhelming difference in troop strength. Despite being in a predicament unprecedented in the history of the Empire, there was no sign of fear or impatience in his cold, demonic appearance.

This was largely due to the analytical factor that he had just mentioned himself.

Vincent: “The objective of the assembled rebels may be united around my head, but there is no room for compromise in the methods used to be able to do it. From the beginning, they were the ones who strived to stand at the front after things began to occur.”

???: “The harder they try not to be outdone, the more difficult it is for them to come to terms with the idea of coordinating with the others. This sure gets me to remember, back to the times of the Imperial Selection Ceremony.”

Vincent: “…”

???: “In order to determine the next Emperor, a blood ritual in which the siblings of the Vollachian Imperial Family vie for the Imperial Throne… Even on that occasion as well, those who refused the alternative were removed from the board. Most of all…”

With that, Berstetz, who was standing next to the throne, cut off his words and accumulated them for a moment. Within those eyes as narrow as a single thread, the old man’s emotions could not be read, but one could get a rough idea of what he was feeling.

After all, Berstetz was yet another one of the people who had experienced the bloodshed of the Imperial Selection Ceremony.

Berstetz: “At that time, there was wariness regarding the personality of His Excellency Barthroy, who had created the largest faction, and as expected, he was quickly removed, though.”

Aside from those inner thoughts of Vincent, Berstetz touched the moustache under his nose as he vocalized the end of his accumulated words.

The way he spoke about it was as if it were some other person’s business, that was terribly ingenuine.

Vincent: “You dare to speak of such? Was it not none other than you and Lamia who removed that elder brother?”

Berstetz: “While it is shameful, I followed the judgment of Her Excellency Lamia. In addition, I was unable to see the true intentions of His Excellency Barthroy, so even now I continue to live in disgrace.”

Vincent: “Elder brother Barthroy’s intentions, hm.”

Berstetz: “Indeed. It was a conspiracy hatched by none other than His Excellency Vincent and His Excellency Barthroy.”

Deeply drawing back his chin as he gave that response, Berstetz’s expression did not change.

Considering the events that took place, one might expect him to harbor a grudge, but he was a man free from such miscellaneous human emotions. And, moreover, he was reasonable enough to know that it was useless to say anything to Vincent.

That deed was Vincent Vollachia’s—no, it was the result of the actions of Vincent Abellux, from before he became the Emperor,

???: “Since the real His Excellency is outside the walls at this time, the feelings of His Excellency the Prime Minister, who gets lost at the brunt of offense, are something that I can understaaand~.”

Berstetz: “…”

???: “Hmm~? The two of you are giving me stern looks… Did I say something unnecessary?”

The gentle man who shrugged his shoulders in an aloof manner as he faced Vincent and Berstetz, the highest ranking members of the Empire, was an unorthodox being who was permitted to visit the Crystal Palace regardless of his rank—the Stargazer, Ubilk.

It was not that the heckling Ubilk suddenly broke into the conversation. He was there from the beginning when Vincent and Berstetz spoke with each other, he just had not interjected.

Nonetheless—

Vincent: “Even if no one else is around, it is not something you should feel relaxed discussing.”

Ubilk: “Ah~, it was unnecessary to top it off with the title of “real”, wasn’t it. No wonder His Excellency the Emperor and His Excellency the Prime Minister would get so angry. Though, if I don’t let it out once in a while, it may inadvertently come out through an outburst. —Don’t you feel sorry for the soldiers who, even now, continue to risk their lives to protect the Imperial Capital.”

Vincent: “…”

Ubilk: “If it were to be inadvertently revealed that His Excellency the Emperor Vincent, who everyone is all trying so hard to protect, is actually a fake…”

Putting his hand over his mouth, Ubilk brazenly spoke aloud what he had just been rebuked for.

His abilities had made him a valuable asset, but his behavior certainly had the frivolity of a clown. However, the duties of being a clown could not be seen as merely a permit for making practical jokes.

Even if his abilities as a Stargazer were excellent,

Vincent: “Your repeated rudeness cannot be written off. If everything until now comes to fruition, I will cut off your head myself.”

Ubilk: “Of course, I’m aware of this. But, Your Excellency… No, you are a prudent one. Until the very, very last moment, I had been assuming that my life couldn’t be taken.”

Even when he was pierced by a glare from the throne, Ubilk met his gaze with a smile. He continued, “More than that,” and looked over to Berstetz,

Ubilk: “I’m more afraid of His Excellency the Prime Minister. It seems that within him, he is hiding hell itself.”

Berstetz: “It’s not like the Stargazer to be afraid of someone like me.

Why not ask the stars whether someone like me is deserving of your fear?”

Ubilk: “My apologies, Your Excellency the Prime Minister. The stars look down on this world from high in the sky, and unless they assert their dazzling selves, they cannot be seen.”

Those who are insignificant are not reflected in the future that Stargazers see.

Whether that was a facade or his true thoughts, was impossible to read from Ubilk’s speech and conduct. But peacetime nonsense aside, Ubilk’s words could not be ignored when he was performing the role of a Stargazer.

Nine years had passed since Ubilk began serving the Vollachian Empire as a Stargazer—Perhaps it could be said that his achievements have been building for the sake of this very moment.

Ubilk: “—Woah.”

Suddenly, a thunderous roar from the distant sky reached the audience chamber, which had fallen into silence.

A slight tremor was felt under their feet, and the atmosphere of a fierce battle could be felt even in the depths of the Crystal Palace. That said, the phenomena which caused this thunderous roar was probably someone on the side of the Imperial Capital for the most part.

Ubilk: “Even though In terms of numbers, the rebels surrounding the Imperial Capital should outnumber ours…”

Vincent: “In the end, it is just a disorderly mishmash of people… No, they are not even cohesive, but a bunch of outlaws who may even drag each other down in some cases. That is no way to compete with the pack of Sword Wolves who are governed by the law of Iron and Blood.”

Ubilk: “I see. However, no matter how out for blood the Imperial citizens are, they will not invade the Imperial Capital without a chance to win. Isn’t that why each tribe will throw in their own hero?”

Vincent: “Have you forgotten what you said in front of me just now?”

Vincent spoke to Ubilk, who tilted his head, shifting his attention to the battle outside due to the shaking. Ubilk closed one eye at those words, and Vincent rested his chin on one hand,

Vincent: “If there is dazzling light of the stars above the ground, you said that you would notice it. In that case, it would not be strange if a glittering star that could move this war situation had let you gaze upon it beforehand.”

Ubilk: “Ah~.”

Vincent: “Has there been such an occurrence? Stargazer.”

Narrowing his black eyes, Vincent quietly posed a question. Ubilk laughed at the question as he scratched his cheek with his finger, and,

Ubilk: “Unfortunately, I haven’t heard anything of the sort.”

Berstetz: “In that case, it aligns with your own role as well, I guess that’s how it is.”

With that statement, Berstetz put Ubilk’s forced smile to an end.

Ubilk was at a loss with an awkward look on his face, but there was no sense of being cornered. To begin with, regardless of whether Ubilk was a Stargazer or not, it was something he thoroughly understood.

Certainly, all the insurgents would come to take the head of Vincent, the one sat upon the throne. For that purpose, each tribe would dispatch their strongest warriors to try and proclaim their supremacy.

But, that notion was misguided to begin with since it was based on a widespread misconception.

It was bound to happen. —Just what did they think the Nine Divine Generals were?

Vincent: “They were already setting themselves up for failure by measuring the heroes of each tribe based on such small standards. To begin with, what other criteria do they believe were utilized to select the Generals of the First-Class, the Nine Divine Generals?”

Vincent Vollachia had gathered the strongest entities within the Vollachian Empire.

The unofficial heroes within the lands of the Empire were no match for them. If a sleeping giant of the sort did exist, it would never have gone unnoticed by Vincent.

No matter what it took, he had kept them close at hand and bestowed them status befitting their abilities to take precautions for the future.

Once they failed to meet Vincent’s expectations, a hero was subpar compared to a monster.

—The Emperor of the Sacred Vollachian Empire had assembled “monsters” that no hero could ever hope to stand a chance against.

Lupugana, the impregnable Imperial Capital, was protected by star-shaped ramparts which had never permitted outsiders to trespass, ever since the founding of the Empire. And, at the five bastions of the points of the star wall, these “monsters” awaited any invader.

All those superior transcendent entities would, without mercy, crush the arrogant heroes that had gathered. Upon witnessing this scene of devastation, even the most hot-headed among them would come to realize.

That they had averted their eyes from reality, casting them towards a dream called madness.

Berstetz: “However, it would be difficult to expect all the rebels to be well-behaved.”

Vincent: “It seems so. In that case, what shall we do?”

Berstetz: "I know it is not my place to come out from the curtain when the prominent Generals have already chosen their battlefields, but… Merely sitting idly by is unbearable."

Ubilk: "My myyy, that's awfully… our ally, His Excellency the Prime Minister is awfully out for blood."

Bending at the waist, Berstetz gave a bow towards Vincent as Ubilk pierced him with those words. But the old Prime Minister took that being pointed out in stride, and,

Berstetz: "In the end, I am also a man of Vollachia."

And, leaving those words without even showing his smile, Berstetz walked out of the audience chamber. Without stopping that back, Vincent silently saw the old veteran off as he made his departure.

With the door closing and Berstetz taking his leave, Ubilk shrugged with a "Is that fine?",

Ubilk: "As he said himself, there's nothing His Excellency the Prime Minister can do to influence the current war situation. I also think that, but…"

Vincent: "Contrary to my expectations, he endured it with perseverance. He has always been someone who has restrained himself for the sake of his ideals. If I were to put it in a way that you would, I would like to avoid an outburst."

Ubilk: "I see… By the way, is His Excellency the Prime Minister in the know?"

Hooking his thumb on the hem of his robe, over his chest, and wriggling his other fingers, Ubilk posed that question. Vincent, understanding the significance of that unfriendly question, closed one eye.

Receiving that silence, Ubilk nodded and said, "As I thought",

Ubilk: "I had a hunch about that, so I just refrained from being overly careless with my words… But whether I should be happy or sad about my hunch coming true, I have pretty complex feelings about it, y'know."

Vincent: "Sad? Can you even comprehend such human emotions?"

Ubilk: "What a terrible thing to say. You make it sound like I'm not even human, so I feel very hurt. Compared to the First and the Second, I'm much more reasonable, don't you think?"

Vincent: "If you raise Cecilus as an example, he stands little chance in most topics. Arakiya is also a girl that lives by the logic of a beast rather than that of a human, but she can be managed once she has settled on an owner. However…"

Cutting off his words there and then, Vincent's black eyes pierced Ubilk. His presence was unwavering to whatever cruel gaze was cast at him as paying no heed to his own life was his way of living.

Vincent: "You are but a husk in the shape of a man, made of human flesh."

Ubilk: "…Oh, that really hurts my feelings."

At Vincent's words, Ubilk lowered his eyebrows with a forced smile on his face.

Doing so would make him appear sad or bitter. A forgery of emotions, as though someone had taught him to do so; at the very least Vincent's eyes perceived it as such.

With an expression that did not betray that impression, Ubilk placed his hand on his chest and,

Ubilk: "By your logic, all those with the same role as me… all the Stargazers lending an ear to the "commandments", are husks?"

Vincent: "I do not know any Stargazers aside from yourself. I have no inclination to answer you."

Ubilk: "There you go again, you don't need to lie like that. I don't think you would put that much trust in me. Of course, I expected you would track down and torture every Stargazer in the country instead."

Vincent: "…"

Ubilk: "I fully believe that you wouldn't thoughtlessly base your decision of what the Stargazers are solely on me."

Confronted with Ubilk's trick question, Vincent's expression did not budge an inch.

He did not state whether the former's points were factual or mistaken. The only thing he was convinced of, was that every single Stargazer who had been bestowed a commandment, without exception, had a mental disorder.

He also did not intend on going out of his way to state how he had reached that conclusion.

Vincent: "Otherwise, how could you possibly commit an act as barbaric as to destroy your own Evil Eye, just to prove your identity?"

Ubilk: "Ah~, that was quite painful. The feelings of loss weren't normal either. But thanks to that, you became willing to listen to me, didn't you?"

While he spoke, Ubilk pulled his hand on his chest further back, exposing his bare skin. Directly in the center of his slender chest, a large burn mark had been painfully seared.

In the past, Ubilk used a branding iron to burn the Evil Eye at that spot to crisp, leaving nothing but that scar.

He destroyed his very meaning for existence as a member of the Evil Eye Tribe. —A deed just to prove that he did not pose any danger, and if he had not been stopped, he might have even crushed his own limbs.

Henceforth—

Vincent: "I do not demand an honest answer from you. Just, answer carefully."

Ubilk: "Your wish is my command."

Vincent: “There is not even a whisper of a new commandment in your ears. Without any doubt.”

Ubilk: “—Yes. I, for one, wouldn’t lie. No new commandment has been handed down. In the first place, without completing the previously passed down commandment, one wouldn’t try for a new commandment to be passed down, however…”

Shaking his head loosely side-to-side, Ubilk smiled.

With a truly inhuman smile lacking any resemblance of joy or abasement, he continued.

Ubilk: “The board you have created won’t be thrown into disarray by any interference from the heavens. —Virtually everyone across the Empire resides in the palm of your hand.”

Vincent: “…”

Ubilk: “Is anything the matter?”

As those assertive words did not yield the desired effect, Ubilk appeared puzzled. To his question, Vincent shook his head with a “No”.

He did not believe Ubilk’s statement just now had been a lie. He was a man who valued the whispers of the mysterious stars more than his vassalage to the Emperor, but his lack of selfishness was genuine.

Therefore, Ubilk himself probably had no ulterior motives with his declaration.

It was just that—

Vincent: “—The people of the Empire are in the palm of my hand, you say?”

Those decorative words that had been deliberately left unspoken, had left an unease in the mind of the man playing the role of Emperor.

2

—And then, that unease on the throne proved to be correct.

???: “Oh, Ooooooooh—!!”

At one of those bastions of the star-shaped wall, a war cry rose up and a tiger rushed furiously.

With both arms mantled with shining silver gauntlets, he stepped right in front of an enemy with lightning speed in order to be able to reach someone who had pulverized a group of Centaur People in a dreadful manner.

One step, two steps, and Garfiel Tinzel charged forward in a blink of an eye.

However—

???: “Indeed, many-on-one is my specialty, but—”

Garfiel: “—Hk.”

???: “Even a one-on-one fight, won’t cast any clouds over my brilliant technique!”

In opposition, Kafma Irulux readied both arms to intercept that brave voice.

His tattoo-covered dark-brown skin bulged from the inside, and immediately after, an enormous amount of thorns shot out, completely filling Garfiel’s field of view as he charged head-on.

The speed of the thorned vines growing countless spines gave the impression of a carnivorous beast leaping at its prey. In other words, it was the fastest attack to reap the life of an opponent.

Garfiel: “Brash—!!”

Atop the rampart, the considerably thick wall for the protection of the Imperial Capital was quite broad as a place to stand, but compared to an open battlefield the restricted mobility felt like being strangled.

With the thorned vines spreading sideways and surging forth like a great wave, closing off any means of escape, rather than poorly evading, Garfiel chose to hold up his gauntlets and plunged into the thorny vines.

Trusting in the strength of his gauntlets and legs, he went in a straight line into the storm of vines—

Kafma: “That resolve is admirable, but your decision was a mistake.”

At the same time Kafma muttered that, Garfiel made contact with the leading edge of the surging thorned vines, but the next moment, Garfiel clenched his teeth at an impact greater than what his gauntlets could presumably receive.

Garfiel: “—Guh.”

Even if unleashed in such an unusual way, vines were still vines, and from the size of the ivy and thorns, he had readied himself for a certain degree of power. However, the actual power of the vines far exceeded his assumptions, and the speed of Garfiel’s advance faltered.

Without exaggeration, the pressure was like that of a whole forest crashing into him.

Upon being struck down by a literal forest of overgrown thorns brought forth by a single person, Garfiel adapted his approach.

Garfiel: “Then, what about this!!”

Kafma: “What?!”

Clenching his teeth so hard they creaked, Garfiel swung his foot down fiercely after being struck by the surging wave of thorned vines. The force spreading from the sole of his shoe rose up the portion of the wall he was standing on and tilted Kafma’s foothold on the opposite side of the vines, causing the stunned “General” to lose his position.

It was an effect of Garfiel's Divine Protection of Earth Spirits. Essentially, the Divine Protection made it possible to receive power from earth and conversely interfere with it, but the scope was largely depending on the interpretation of the Divine Protection's wielder.

In Garfiel's case, as long as his feet were on solid footing, that was the earth.

Garfiel: "As long as I'm not flyin'!"

It would be a different story with the dragon ships that are carried by the famous flying dragons in the Vollachian Empire, but otherwise, Garfiel could firmly believe it was the earth.

Kafma shifted his footing not once, but two, three more times as the rising foothold pursued him, and the man of the Insect Cage Tribe dealt with it while flying backwards. Meanwhile, dealing with the thorns disrupting the precision of his attacks, Garfiel pushed forward while his cheeks and shoulders were torn up by the thorns he failed to block.

Bright red blood splattered and sharp pain cut through his entire body, but the distance between them shrank and shrank.

And just when the distance remaining between them was nearing a few meters,

Kafma: "Then I'll just cut deep!"

Abandoning his mid-range thorn attack, Kafma, who was about to fall back, reinitiated his attack.

For a moment, he was still wary of the unleashed shockwave that mowed down the Centaur People, Kafma did not open up his chest, but he severed his control over the thorned vines from his arms and started buzzing the wings on his back.

Momentarily, those wings fluttered so fast they were difficult to see, and at the same time, the sight of Kafma having kicked off the rampart appeared right beside Garfiel. Rather than just being quick, he varied his speed.

Via this method, he went around and entered from behind Garfiel's awareness.

However—

Garfiel: "I won't let ya!"

Forcibly shutting off his circumvented directional awareness, Garfiel roared.

Along with his roar, the released back-handed blow was striking into Kafma's face that had appeared beside him. Against that, Kafma threw up his arms in defense—both being covered with black carapaces.

Like Garfiel's gauntlets, it was protection for himself. However, with thorns, wings, ribs, and now carapaces, he already had four abilities. Just how many "insects" did he have in his body?

Kafma: "Sh—!"

One blow was struck, but the pair's battle did not stop there.

Ultra-close range was favorable for Garfiel. He took a full swing with his left fist using the momentum of turning all the way back around from the position where his back-handed blow had been stopped, and then drove a headbutt into his opponent who had tried to parry the blow.

Impacts and cries of pain bursted between the two, and from there fierce punches aimed at vital organs were exchanged.

Garfiel & Kafma: "—Hk."

Gauntlets and carapaces, both sides exchanged blows with their reinforced fists. However, his prior pride was not misguided. Being within reach was favorable for Garfiel, and getting beaten from that position was out of the question.

Garfiel: "Gah, aaaaaaaaah!!"

He turned and caught the incoming fist, in return, he drove a fist into his opponent's chest and torso. From below, Garfiel's opposite fist shot up into his loosely dangling jaw and then he drove a knee into his torso that had bent backwards. With a cry of pain, Kafma flapped his wings and greatly leaped backwards.

Garfiel: "Yer not gettin' away!!"

Kafma: "—Guh."

Seizing Kafma's leaping legs, he forcefully slammed him back down against the rampart. He then pressed Kafma's body to the ground and started dashing ferociously to tear the wings from his back.

On the wall, Garfiel ran while raising a plume of smoke, and Kafma's back spurted out blood as one wing, two wings, were torn to shreds. At that rate, he was about to—

—A moment later, Kafma's chest opened as the wings on his back flapped powerfully, lifting him off the ground. Beyond his protruding ribs, his eyes caught a glimpse of the golden "insect" within his chest.

Garfiel: "…"

Following the urging of every survival instinct, he abandoned Kafma's body and leaped directly to the side. It was the correct decision. Right where Garfiel had previously been, the golden insect had gouged out the entire top of the city wall in its line of fire. As short hairs on his body were shaved away, Garfiel felt a chill run his spine.

Kafma: "—I admit my lack of insight."

Garfiel: "Oh?"

Immediately after experiencing the sensation of bloodlust, Garfiel was drawn back by his voice.

His gaze caught Kafma kneeling on the wall, touching the torn wings on his back, looking at Garfiel with admiration and reverence in his eyes.

He wiped the blood running down the edge of his mouth with his hand and rose to his feet.

Kafma: “I was unaware of the existence of a brave warrior like you. I am ashamed of my ignorance.”

Garfiel: “Heh, I don’t blame ya if ya didn’t know. I’d be more worried if ya did.”

Kafma: “—? What do you mean?”

Raising a chivalrous eyebrow, Kafma questioned the truth of Garfiel’s words.

From his point of view, it would have never occurred to him that a person from another country, especially from the Kingdom, would be involved in such an important event within the Empire.

Otto: “If they find out who we are and where we are from, it could lead to a very difficult diplomatic incident. For that reason, please avoid being provoked by the other side, and carelessly saying unnecessary things.”

Otto, who remained behind at the main camp, had said this to Garfiel before he jumped into the battlefield.

Kafma had already identified himself to him, and he has already identified himself back, but if he gives any more information, there was a possibility that Kafma, who seemed to be smart, would be able to guess all of this.

There was no way they could turn this insurrection in the Empire into a gigantic war that involved the Kingdom.

Garfiel: “Sorry, but I was only lettin’ ya’ know about my name. But I can let one thing slip. About “Two-Faced Kurulukiak”, that is.”

Kafma: “—. I have no doubt that you are a person of great skill, whether you keep your mouth shut or not. That’s why I’m also regretful.”

Garfiel: “…Regretful?”

Kafma shook his head and lowered his voice, causing Garfiel to frown; there was no falsehood in Kafma's delivery, and it was laced with regret, with no intention to provoke.

But the regret was not attributable to Kafma himself—

Kafma: "If it weren't for the circumstances, I would've liked to have had a straightforward conversation with you."

Garfiel: "What the—"

It was the moment he was thinking about whether he should question the meaning of his words.

Taking a step forward, Garfiel's knee gave out, and he knelt down in place. With an "Ah?", a gasping breath leaked out, his eyes growing bloodshot as he held his own chest.

His heart was beating and pounding so very loud and perilous. —Garfiel realized what he heard: the alarm bells of his horrified instincts pleading for his life.

—There was something crawling around inside of him.

Garfiel: "Gaag…"

Kafma: "If you were going to fight in close quarters with me, you should have avoided getting hit."

Kafma stuck out his hand to Garfiel, whose teeth were trembling, bitter tears streaming down his face. At the tip of Kafma's five bent fingers, could be seen a tube holding a white, wriggling "insect".

An "insect" had implanted an egg through these tubes in one of the wounds inflicted by the thorns. It hatched inside Garfiel's body and crawled around inside him.

Garfiel: "Guooo…"

The moment he realized this, Garfiel embraced himself and activated his healing magic.

Intense healing waves enveloped Garfiel's body in a pale light, forcibly healing the wounds he had sustained. Witnessing this, Kafma slightly raised his eyebrows, revealing his surprise.

Kafma: "Healing magic, which means you are also a healer. Its versatility is something to keep an eye on. However."

Garfiel: "—Hk, Aa, oh."

Kafma: "The purpose of the insects that circulate inside you is not to wound you, but to make your body a seedbed for their own. —You can heal the wound, but you cannot heal the transfiguration."

Kafma's cruel declaration, it was proven correct by the unhealable malaise.

Garfiel gasped in agony and cursed the result of clawing at his own chest, thinking that he had, in fact, blocked the escape route of the "insects" in his body.

His breathing became agonized and his vision turned bright red. Unable to bear the sight of Garfiel's agony, Kafma stepped forward with a somber look on his face.

Kafma: "Your skill and prowess, I, Kafma Irulux, will surely bear them in my heart. —Sleep valiantly."

His right arm was once again encased in a black carapace, and his fist thrusted into Garfiel, who was unable to move. The impact smashed his skull, causing blood to spray and his body to tumble violently.

He rolled, and rolled, and rolled, and bounced right off the edge of the ramparts, consumed by a sense of floating, and fell.

Garfiel: "—Ah."

Garfiel's faint death cry escaped his throat, and his powerless body fell unprotected beneath the city ramparts.

Otto: “Listen, Garfiel, please remember this well.”

Otto: “If they find out who we are and where we are from, it could lead to a very difficult diplomatic incident. For that reason, please avoid being provoked by the other side, and carelessly saying unnecessary things.”

Otto: “Though I do say that, since it is you, I am not expecting you to be so patient. I am not telling you to exchange words in a tit-for-tat as a merchant would. Therefore—”

Otto: “Therefore, make sure you properly remember this one thing.”

Otto: “If you get caught up in an exchange of words—”

4

—In the battle against the Insect Cage Tribe, it would be impossible for many to avoid being killed upon first sight.

The “insects” that they put inside their bodies had evolved and grown beyond the bounds of human imagination, and their abilities could be said to be of an infinite variety.

In addition, if they harmonize with the “insects” bred within their own bodies, and hasten the development of their skills even further, then the Insect Cage Tribe did not yield two warriors who were the same.

Not to mention, Kafma Irulux had been born as a genius among the Insect Cage Tribe.

Kafma declined to be promoted to the Nine Divine Generals because of his own beliefs and philosophy, and his abilities were recognized by Emperor Vincent as being on par with those of the Generals of the First-Class.

As a warrior of Vollachia, he was an exceptional individual who was allowed to stand atop the summit.

Naturally, since he was born into the Insect Cage Tribe, he had no hesitation or guilt in borrowing the power of “insects” and using their abilities as his own.

Including the power of “insects”, that was the strength of the warrior known as Kafma Irulux.

And yet—

Kafma: “I am not without my own thoughts.”

Unable to expect anything but victory, Kafma, who demanded the destruction of as many enemies as possible, did not have the time to fight against just a single warrior.

Therefore, using an underhanded move in order to bring down his opponent as fast as possible, he defeated the enemy.

Kafma: “…”

The ritual of inserting “insects” into the body was the culmination of careful preparation, even for the Insect Cage Tribe.

From the time they were newborn babies, their bodies were altered in preparation for the future insertion of “insects,” but the ritual was forbidden until they reached the age of twelve. That was to say, it took at least twelve years of preparation before an “insect” could be inserted into the body.

If the process was skipped and an insect was implanted, the subject’s body would not be able to withstand it.

Henceforth—

Kafma: “It pains me to have to settle this with you in this way.”

Declaring his regretful feelings, Kafma closed his eyes and offered a silent prayer to his vanquished opponent. But, the time he immersed himself in sentiment was short-lived, and Kafma quickly turned around and once again looked beyond the rampart.

Although he had fended off the initial attack of the Centaur People, the second group would launch their attack on him. No matter how many times they rushed at him, it would be fine. Each time, he would fend them all off—It was the moment directly after he thought that.

Kafma: "—Hk, What?!"

In an imposing stance, Kafma tried to call forth the thorn "insects" that were circulating in his body, but there was a thunderous roar that erupted right nearby him—He widened his eyes at the tremendous impact which appeared to be an explosion.

For a moment, Kafma suspected that the rebels had brought out some kind of weapon to breach the rampart, but he quickly realized that he was mistaken.

However, that understanding did not lead to relief.

The reason was—

Kafma: "—Garfiel Tinzel."

In Kafma's shuddering vision, Garfiel stood, having crawled back up the fallen ramparts.

Taking on the form of an enlarged ferocious beast, the mad warrior, his entire body wrapped in a blazing fire, stood.

5

It was a blessing in disguise that the place where he fell was on top of an open field.

If he had fallen down onto the ramparts, he might not have been able to muster the strength to get back up. By virtue of falling onto the ground, the earth itself had taken Garfiel's side.

Still, the damage done to his body was severe, with his head split, the sensation of his body being stirred up from the inside beckoned for death to encroach on Garfiel's life with every passing second.

A split head could be restored with healing magic. However, an "insect" was preventing the activation of it. Since the "insect" was not actually attacking, healing magic could not get rid of it either.

In the first place, there was no time to use the healing magic, and with the interference of the “insect”, his head was split and the blood was, blood was, blood was, blood was.

Garfiel: “Gah, ough.”

Clenching his back teeth and holding on to his tenuous grasp on life, he stopped using his head.

Naturally, it was a split head. It could not be relied upon. What was needed was the instinct to live, to follow it, to move the body forcefully, and then.

And then, the Magic Stone Cannon that had been prepared on the wall, ready to intercept the enemy coming from outside the walls, he had swallowed the magic stone loaded inside it and crushed it in his belly.

Instantly, the mana that had been stored within swelled up inside Garfiel, burning the “insect”. Once the “insect” was burned, all that Garfiel was left with were fierce scars.

—No, it was just the wounds, and the enemy.

Otto: “Listen, Garfiel, please remember this well.”

Otto: “If they find out who we are and where we are from, it could lead to a very difficult diplomatic incident. For that reason, please avoid being provoked by the other side, and carelessly saying unnecessary things.”

Otto: “Though I do say that, since it is you, I am not expecting you to be so patient. I am not telling you to exchange words in a tit-for-tat as a merchant would. Therefore—”

Otto: “Therefore, make sure you properly remember this one thing.”

Otto: “If you get caught up in an exchange of words—”

Garfiel: “If, I got…”

Speaking inarticulately, while his rationality became dim due to the reflexive beastification to heal his severe injuries, what Garfiel heard endlessly in his brain were the words of someone akin to his older brother, the man he could count on in any situation.

Ahead of where he looked as he slowly turned around while being burned by the swaying flame, there was a fearsome enemy confronting him.

That enemy was needed.

To carry out what his older brother told him to do, an enemy was needed.

After all, he had said that to him. —Otto Suwen had said that to Garfiel.

Otto: "—Make sure to beat that opponent up until their legs can no longer stand!"

Garfiel: "I'll fuckin' crush yaaa—!!"

The roar of the beast rose again, and the transformed Garfiel, now a raging beast, trampled and smashed as he soared across the ramparts. Upon witnessing such a display of might, the enemy in front of him—Kafma opened his eyes and smiled.

Grinning, Kafma raised both of his arms overhead, and rushed forward.

Kafma: "Come, Garfiel Tinzel!!"

Garfiel: "AARHAAAAaaaaaaaa—!!"

The furious attack of the golden tiger, baring his fangs as he leapt in, crashed right through waves of purple thorns cramming his vision from directly opposite to them, and a crack was formed at the bastion on one of the star's points.

Undoubtedly, it was just as if that was substantiating the unease harbored by the Emperor on the throne—.

Kafma: "…"

—It was the retaliation of the crack engraving the falls of the indomitable heavens upon the history of the Empire.

Chapter 88:
New Wind

1

—The siege of the Imperial Capital of Lupugana had begun with a fierce battle that neither side would willingly concede.

By all rights, there was no need for Emilia and the others to take part in this all-out war between rebels, who bore discontent against the current Vollachia, and its national military, who were trying to protect these peaceful times.

Originally, the reason for Emilia's party entering the Empire was in search of people.

Of course, they harbored a sense of compassion and duty for the people they had met on their travels after they successfully entered into Vollachia in secret.

Regardless of the borders of The Kingdom and the Empire, there were people whom they wanted to make happy, and even those they wished to lend their strength to. Everyone in the party agreed on that.

However, no matter how unmistakably soft-hearted Emilia's party was, they still had their priorities.

To ignore their original objective would be getting their priorities backward, and the party had people (Otto, Petra) with the judgement to admonish the others (Emilia, Garfiel) whose conscience made them reflexively try to save others.

After being attacked by flying dragons, they only had taken part in the ultimately hellish battle of the Fortress City because they had reason to believe the friends they were searching for had been in that city.

Since things had gone contrary to their expectations, logic would normally dictate that there was no reason for Emilia and the others to join in on the rebel army's attack on the Imperial Capital.

In fact, even as they heard about the Empire's domestic affairs being burned to crisp day after day, Emilia's party had steeled themselves to be minimally shaken in their sense of purpose.

No matter what—

???: "—Since the one who abducted that girl was "The Flying Dragon General", she is likely located in the Dragonkin Madelyn Eschart's residence, the mansion of her owner."

Positioned in front of a map spread in a room on the topmost floor of the Fortress City's City Hall, Abel had answered Emilia's question while touching the Oni mask that concealed his face.

Hearing Abel's answer, Emilia muttered, "Madelyn's owner…".

—Time looped back, to a few days before the siege of the Imperial Capital of Lupugana.

With their hopes of uniting with Subaru dashed, who should have returned to Guaral after heading to the Demon City, and having just missed the awoken Rem, Emilia's party had been unsure as to what course of action to take from then on.

They pondered whether they should prioritize the search for Subaru, whose whereabouts were completely unknown after the destruction of the Demon City of Chaosflame, or Rem, for whom they have only identified her abductor so far.

The opening words had been what Abel told Emilia, who wanted some basis for making the decision.

Abel: "It was not like one would ever hear from the fractious Dragonkin, but she was a General First-Class recommended by Prime Minister Berstetz Fondalfon. If anything were to happen, she should return to his side."

Emilia: "…"

Abel: “What? Do you have doubts?”

Emilia: “No, it’s not that… I just thought “owner” was a reaaally mean way of putting it.”

Emilia, who had exchanged only a few words with Madelyn, but rather fiercely quarreled with her, had thought that Madelyn would get extremely angry at the way Abel just formulated that.

Remaining silent at what Emilia had pointed out, Abel narrowed his eyes behind his mask. She hoped he would reflect on his statement and realize that it had not been nice.

In any case, Abel’s knowledgeable opinion was helpful for understanding the circumstances of the Imperial side of things, which Emilia and the others had not known.

With the rising rebellions all throughout the Empire in the air, the look of the sky and the dryness of the air growing worse made Emilia have this sense of foreboding, even though she wanted to think things through as much as possible.

Since they had failed to meet the people they were looking for at every possible opportunity, their time in the Empire had been nothing but poor.

Emilia: “But if Madelyn went back to that Berstetz guy, then Rem also…”

???: “If Rem-chan’s there, then so is big bro!”

Emilia retraced the flow of the conversation, and Medium, who had been holding onto the operations desk placed there, joined in.

Emilia’s lips relaxed as her eyes met Medium’s, who vehemently stretched her small body to its fullest. Together with Rem, her precious brother had also been taken by Madelyn.

Medium, surely very anxious and worried, did not show any sign of being weakened.

That undauntedness made Emilia think how she could learn a thing or two from her.

???: “Prime Minister-san… Berstetz Fondalfon-sama is this very talented and capable man, said to be the keystone of the Empire.”

Next to Emilia, who had been struck by Medium’s admirableness, was Petra cutting into their conversation.

Unable to let Emilia go alone, Petra leapt, sticking close to her. Putting a finger to her lips, Emilia murmured, “Is that so?” and tilted her head.

Emilia: “The “keystone of the Empire” sounds like a reaaally remarkable evaluation, but isn’t that the Emperor?”

Petra: “Of course, I think The Empire always being peaceful was because of the capabilities of His Excellency the Emperor. However, His Excellency the Emperor’s capabilities also include properly utilizing his talented subordinates.”

Emilia: “Ah, that’s right. Even if the Emperor is reaaally strong and reaaally smart, that doesn’t mean he can do everything all by himself.”

Despite her assiduous efforts, Emilia could not imagine seeing things the same way as Vollachia’s Emperor. However, since she eventually needed to, she had to keep trying her hardest.

However, no matter how hard she tried, Emilia would always be reliant on everyone’s help.

That should have been the same for the Emperor of Vollachia.

However, while Emilia and Medium were impressed, Abel seemed to harbor a completely different impression. His sharpened gaze radiated through his Oni mask directly at Petra.

Abel: “What exactly are you trying to accomplish with this blatantly obvious rationale? Do you honestly believe there is room to listen to the words of a young child? We hardly have the time to spare.”

Petra: “My apologies, that was roundabout. I just wanted to ask you this. —If he is His Excellency the Emperor's important right-hand man, then Prime Minister-san's residence is in the Imperial Capital right?"

Abel: "…"

Petra was not afraid of that sharp gaze, and Abel remained silent at her question.

Abel's scary gaze should have felt like having a blade pointed at her, but Petra had not wavered in the slightest. That was how strong Petra's resolve was.

That was enough to make her fellow campmate, Emilia, want to proudly puff out her chest.

Abel: "The answer to your question is affirmed. Inevitably, both of the individuals taken by Madelyn Eschart …Rem and Flop O'Connell, should also be under the care of Berstetz in the Imperial Capital."

Abel responded in a low voice, as if he was yielding to Petra's gaze. Emilia was about to praise Petra for her words.

But, Petra's expression was not good; on the contrary, she sighed visibly and,

Petra: "…It's like we are being manipulated, and it's not funny."

Emilia: "Huh? What do you mean by that?"

Unsure of the meaning of Petra's response, Emilia blinked her eyes. In response to Emilia's words, Petra's voice dropped in tone with a sour look on her face.

Petra: "We have nothing to do with the problems unfolding within the Empire. I know that there is going to be a very large battle, and I am worried about Medium-chan and Utakata-chan, but…"

Emilia: "—. Yeah, it's okay. I know exactly what you mean. We came looking for both Subaru and Rem."

Preempting Petra's reluctance to speak, Emilia chose her words gently.

She understood Petra's fears and concerns. After all, Emilia, if nothing else, would like to continue to work with Abel and the others on the sly, as she wanted to help everyone she knew.

However, if they only focused on immediate problems like that, they would never get to Subaru and Rem, which was their original goal—

Emilia: “Huh?”

After thinking that far, Emilia got stuck in her own head.

As she answered Petra, Emilia remembered her group's goal was to bring Subaru and Rem back safely. So even though it was painful, they must pass by the battle going on in Vollachia unnoticed.

At least, she thought so, but.

Petra: “But I think Rem might be in the Imperial Capital now. If that's the case…”

Emilia: “—We have to go to the Imperial Capital, too.”

As Emilia's icy doubts started to melt away, her eyes met Petra's on the other side of the ice.

Petra had a very bitter look on her face because she was the first to realize that fact. To back up Emilia's amazement, Petra glared at Abel.

And then—

Petra: “It's not fair. You were silent until we said it ourselves.”

Abel: “It was a principle that naturally led to one conclusion if you thought it through. It would be arrogant of you to call me despicable, considering your own ignorance of how slow on the uptake you are.”

Petra: “So please tell us. You mentioned that there are two places for Madelyn, the “Flying Dragon General,” to return to the Prime Minister’s residence in the Imperial Capital and another one. But you only talked about the Imperial Capital, so that Emily would not pay attention to the other one.”

Abel: “…”

Petra: “Taking advantage of someone’s ignorance is called shamelessness where I come from.”

Insistently, Petra glared at Abel reproachfully. As Petra spoke, Emilia, who had been deceived by the missing information, lowered her eyebrows.

On Abel’s side, too, Medium, who was peering at the map next to him, looked up to admonish him for his methods “Abel-chin…”.

She reflected on it very much. At the same time, Emilia understood why Petra was angry.

Aside from the concealment of information, Abel was right that Emilia could have noticed it if she had thought it through without being told after the fact.

Of course, Emilia did not intend to rely on others for every single matter.

Emilia: “Abel, you also said you didn’t have time. That’s true for both of us, but you don’t have to be mean about it.”

Abel: “That’s just what your pride makes you say. Why should I go to the trouble of explaining to you in detail why things are the way they are?”

Emilia: “—? If you want our help, you will have to say please.”

Abel: “—. What an aggravating woman.”

Crossing his thin arms, Abel exhaled a long, heavy breath.

However, in response, Emilia asked, “Is that so?” and had a completely different opinion. It was not that they did not mesh well, but that Abel did not want to consort with her at all.

Emilia: “Isn’t that right? After all, if you have to fight an incredibly troublesome battle in Vollachia from now on, you must feel compelled to ask us for help. Since we are reaaally strong.”

Petra: “Emily, it is a little worrisome how you say that.”

Emilia: “We are reaaally reliable!”

Petra: “We are reliable. Especially Emily, and Garf-san.”

Emilia rephrased her statement, and Petra, next to her, also spoke as such and puffed out her chest.

As for Emilia’s group—Garfiel was unquestionably a strong fighter, and Emilia was proud to say she was quite formidable, too; Otto and Petra were very smart, and Frederica had always been a master in being considerate.

Beatrice could not afford to strain herself until she was reunited with Subaru and was currently resting, but the thought of protecting her let strength surge up within Emilia.

That was why—

Emilia: “It would definitely be easier to fulfill Abel’s goals if we were here, right? And yet you are only talking like that because you don’t want us to think you are asking us to help you?”

Abel: “…”

Emilia: “Roswaal is also not very good at saying please…”

Abel, like Roswaal, probably had a personality that did not want to expose weakness to his opponents.

Because of this, they tried to get other people to say something instead of themselves. Perhaps that was how things had always worked out for them, though

Emilia: “I think you should stop before you get smacked reaaally hard like Roswaal by Medium-chan, Yorna, or Zikr-san.”

When he had been involved in a devious scheme involving the mansion and the “Sanctuary”, Roswaal received a slap on the face from everyone, including Emilia.

As someone who took part in it, Emilia described how painful it was, but Roswaal was simply rebuked and got away with a swollen face, so who knows what would happen to Abel?

And that was even without being considerate of Abel’s well-being.

Emilia: “Is what I’m saying totally off the mark? If so, I’m embarrassed, but please say so. Then I’ll apologize and think of something else.”

Abel: “Something else?”

Emilia: “I don’t think of you as someone who can’t think ahead or of anything at all. It’s important to keep thinking about what you might be thinking about.”

Previously, Emilia had been quick to give up on things she did not understand.

She was quick to blame it on something, give up, and naively assume that doing as Puck said was the right thing to do. Lately, she had been enlisting the help from others who were good at thinking, like Ram and Otto.

But she did not want to turn into a person who simply changes the people to rely on.

Petra mentioned that the emperor of Vollachia was very good at utilizing people. But even an emperor who was good at manipulating people still needs to think about what he was going to use them for.

And those in important positions, those who are in the center of everyone else’s lives, must be able to do that.

That was what Emilia had chosen to work towards.

???: "—Oh dear, your encouraging thoughts are so elating, Emily."

A voice from behind complimented Emilia, who was faced sharply toward Abel. The voice was familiar even without turning around, and its owner was the ever-reliable Otto.

He was on a different mission to investigate something, but the City Hall was—No, he probably had some business with Abel.

Emilia: "Otto-kun, did you have business with Abel, too? Are you okay on your own?"

Otto: "Thank you for your concern. But you do not need to worry so much…"

Emilia: "Yeah? But, Otto-kun, there was a time when you were kidnapped while we all weren't keeping an eye on you…"

Otto: "Do not put me on the spot like that! …Well, I was prepared for that, too."

Otto's voice rose at Emilia's concern, and Garfiel appeared right behind him, apparently following Otto's investigations.

Relieved, Emilia patted her chest,

Emilia: "Thanks, Garfiel."

Garfiel: "Ha, I don't need to be thanked for that. What were Emily and Lady Petra talkin' about?"

Emilia: "Well, many things …But thanks to Lady Petra, I wasn't persuaded. I wasn't persuaded, was I?"

Petra: "Yes, everything's fine, Emily. I was very surprised at how reliable you were."

Emilia: "Hehe, isn't that right?"

Emilia and Petra high-fived in front of Otto and the others. In the end, it was a worthwhile effort by her as well as Garfiel to protect Petra as best they could.

As Otto lowered the corners of his eyes at the sight of the two, he turned to face the person donning the oni mask on the other side of the operations desk, and spoke, prefacing with “Abel-san”,

Otto: “I can imagine what you were discussing with Emily and the others. About how Rem was taken by a Divine General, and that we are already in a position to become enemies of the Empire if we head to the Imperial Capital of Lupugana. Isn’t that about it?”

Emilia: “—! Amazing! Otto-kun, did you secretly listen in on us?”

Petra: “Were you eavesdropping?”

Otto: “Not only Emily, but even Lady Petra …there is no way I am eavesdropping!”

Emilia: “I see. Then you are amazing after all.”

Petra: “…Was he really not eavesdropping, Garf-san?”

Otto: “Emily aside, Lady Petra is…”

Emilia was impressed, and Petra confirmed the truth with Garfiel, and while smiling at the two extreme reactions, Otto cleared his throat after guessing the conversation from before.

Then turning his now fading, playful eyes to Abel, he said,

Otto: “I have just been listening to the people who have come to town from the outside. It’s the same with the rebellious voices in many places, but they are gathering here one after the other.”

Abel: “It is no surprise given the circumstances and the fact that The Flying Dragon General has retreated. Yorna Mishigure has brought the residents of the Demon City with her and has made this her new base.”

Otto: “Yes, That is right. —It is excellent handiwork.”

Abel responded to Otto's nodding with a curt response.

The content of the exchange itself was something that Emilia already knew of. Over the past few days, people had been gathering in Guaral, and Emilia had been lending a hand in repairing the damaged housing.

However, Frederica and Petra cautioned her not to do too much heavy lifting, so her role was solely to participate in repairing supports by magically freezing them.

Anyway, there was nothing new in the matter. Still, what Emilia found modestly disconcerting was perhaps Otto's attitude.

As usual, Otto was quiet, smart, and dependable—But what Emilia felt in his soft demeanor seemed to be a hidden, but not fully concealed, anger.

Otto: "How far did you go with the planning?"

Abel: "…"

It was these words that confirmed Emilia's suspicions.

Abel was silent in response to Otto's question. But Emilia took it as a pause; this was not because he was thinking of an answer, but to hurry the other party along.

Because Abel's gaze never wavered and his eyes never changed. The answer was already decided, but he was simply too pompous to let them hear it.

Otto: "I wonder how far you're willing to go to get what you want."

Again, Otto asked the same thing, but in a different way.

It did not seem like a matter of being rushed or being outlasted. While he did not like to talk about victory and defeat, it was already set in stone who would win and lose at this point.

Otto's attitude was meant to ask why he lost, and that his defeat did not come as a surprise to Emilia and the others; it was essentially the same question.

Abel: "—I only learned of your existence when I returned to this city. If you want me to include you in the plan, you need to become apt in reciting the stars."

Otto: "So, you think this is just a coincidence?"

Abel: "I am not going to dismiss it as a coincidence. After all, fortune is ultimately nothing more than one of many factors."

Shaking his head once from side to side, Abel categorically denied Otto's words.

Seeing Otto's cheeks harden at Abel's words, Emilia could not resist pulling on his sleeve. In doing this, she put an end to his feeling of bearing this burden of defeat all alone.

Emilia: "Otto-kun, what does that mean?"

Otto: "…Just now, there was a report about the situation Natsuki-san is in. I thought it was quite the ridiculous development."

Petra: "It's just like Medium-chan; he's smaller, right?"

Hearing Otto's story, Petra glanced at Medium, who was standing next to Abel.

Medium spoke of being attacked by an enemy in the Demon City and being transformed from an adult into a child. She had informed them how Subaru had been put in a situation similar to hers.

Furthermore, in order to protect Subaru in such an uncertain state,

Emilia: "Abel must have spread those rumors that the boy with black hair and black eyes was the child of the emperor. That way, in case Subaru was discovered by people thinking badly of him…"

Otto: "They at least would need to keep him alive to confirm the matter. I thought it was an ingenious idea at the time, as well. No matter what, it would lower the level of danger Natsuki-san was in. However—"

Garfiel: “As it turned out, it ain’t no longer just a matter of safety for the captain.”

Garfiel crossed his arms and spoke up, referring back to Otto’s statement. Emilia turned around with a “Huh?” as Garfiel gnashed his sharp fangs.

Garfiel: “There’s a lotta people comin’ into the city, and they’re all tryin’ to fight the Emperor. My amazin’ self’s got nothin’ to say about that. But if the captain is in danger, that’s somethin’ else.”

Emilia: “Subaru is in danger…”

Petra: “…I see, that’s how it is.”

Emilia’s eyebrows rose, and next to her, Petra muttered as if she had noticed something. Then she sharpened her round eyes and glared at Abel the same way Otto did.

Petra: “A boy with black hair and black eyes …Whether he is the real illegitimate son of the Emperor or not, the soldiers could no longer just leave him be either.”

Emilia: “Yes, yes, I know. So, Subaru is safe and…”

Petra: “But his safety only lasts until they make sure whether the boy is legitimate. This begs the question, where do you need to go to accomplish this?”

Emilia: “Where … ah.”

After listening to Petra as she organized her thoughts, Emilia finally caught on to the main points.

Because of Abel’s rumor and Subaru becoming a child—Boys with black hair and black eyes were being sought out, and any children found were taken into custody to verify their legitimacy.

The place, of course, was—

Emilia: “—The Imperial Capital, where the Emperor is?”

Abel: “By fortune or not, both of the persons you are looking for are in the Imperial Capital. Two birds with one stone, one would say.”

Petra: “Utterly shameless…”

When Emilia arrived at her conclusion, Abel nodded deeply, as if he had been expecting it. Immediately, Petra raised her voice at Abel and strongly denounced his attitude.

But Abel, for his part, shrugged his shoulders at Petra’s anger.

Abel: “I should have told you. Your existence is not something I expected. I merely spread the rumor as a means to an end in order to fan the flames of the rebels’ presence.”

Petra: “—Hk.”

Abel: “Or what else do you expect me to say? After deliberately shrinking Natsuki Subaru and making him disappear, I spread rumors to mislead the entire Empire, and incidentally had one of the “Nine Divine Generals” kidnap an Oni girl with the ability to use healing arts, as well. That I had orchestrated all of it. —I must be quite the busy man.”

Petra’s expression stiffened as he spoke to her as if mocking her.

Of course, neither Otto nor Garfiel were pleased to have Petra treated that way. So Abel should be relieved that it was Emilia who made the first move.

Emilia stepped forward to protect Petra and stared intently at Abel with her arms crossed.

Emilia: “I don’t think of you as someone who knows everything about everything. Don’t bully Lady Petra with your misleading way of putting things. If you do that again…”

Abel: “What if I do it again?”

Emilia: “I’m going to be the first one to make good on what we talked about earlier!”

Emilia said this with her clenched fist out in front of her.

Emilia, too, believed that everything should be ideally resolved through dialogue, but if someone was just unwilling to listen and impossible to get through to with words, a clenched fist becomes your only option.

Especially if someone was not talking badly at Emilia herself, but rather a valued member of her camp.

Abel: "—. A completely open book. Are all of your leaders like that?"

Otto: "Yes, I do often have a hard time getting them to pick the right words. But—"

Garfiel: "That's the kind of guy that makes it all worthwhile. Way better than some asshole who stubbornly follows the same path and removes every obstacle with some stupid ass logic."

Abel's eyes narrowed, and Otto and Garfiel each responded in kind.

Somehow, Emilia felt that the topic that was being discussed was about her, not Petra, who was supposed to be their provisional representative, but Emilia did not press that point too deeply.

Now, they all had to cover for Petra and talk about—

Garfiel: "To cut it short, it's possible that both Rem and the captain could be in the Imperial Capital."

Otto: "And since there is a strong possibility that the decisive battle between the national military and the rebels will be in the Imperial Capital, we have no choice but to find a way past it."

Petra: "No shame whatsoever…"

Subaru and Rem might be in the Imperial Capital of Lupugana.

Theoretically, Rem could also be in a different location and Subaru might be brought together with other black-haired boys to the Imperial Capital, but this might just be wishful thinking.

Even so, it was the most likely scenario just as everyone said.

Emilia: “I’ve decided. Let’s all go to the Imperial Capital. We have to find Subaru and Rem.”

Otto: “Emily, the decision is reserved for Lady Petra.”

Emilia: “Oh, of course! Um, what do you say, Lady Petra? Are you willing to go along with what I’ve decided?”

Petra: “—. Yes, it’s fine, Emily. The truth is, I do not like the fact that it seems like everything is going to play into this guy’s hands.”

With a fixed stare, Petra glared at Abel, yet quickly softened her expression.

She was willing to take the frustration of Abel’s outburst on behalf of Subaru and the others. Petra’s concern was appreciated, and Emilia turned to Abel and said, “Yes, that’s right,”

Emilia: “Hey, Abel, Lady Petra said everything was exactly as you wanted it to be…”

Abel: “I told you. It is impossible for me to control and guide everything. Or do you, like that girl, consider me to be just that extraordinary?”

Emilia: “No, I don’t believe that. I think you are a smart person who wears a funny mask, and …is a bit of a klutz too.”

Putting a finger to her lips, Emilia replied, while tilting her head.

When she mentioned the mask, Abel’s hand gently touched the Oni mask, and right behind him, Otto, Garfiel, and Petra could also be heard laughing quietly.

She was pleased with their reaction, and Abel asked, “What sort of assessment is that?”.

Abel: “I have never heard anything like it. Why are you describing me in such a way?”

Emilia: “About being a klutz? Well, the reason I thought that was… Yeah! I meant Subaru.”

Petra: “It’s Subaru’s? What do you mean?”

For a moment, Petra’s eyes widened as Emilia searched for the path leading to her conclusion.

Petra, who saw Abel as a master of subterfuge, may not have quite understood what Emilia meant; even though Emilia also thought of Abel as a master of subterfuge—

Emilia: “That’s what Abel said, right? That it was pleasantly unexpected for him to have us.”

Abel: “Do not embellish my words.”

Emilia: “It’s true that you would be better off if we were here, right? Abel never once said that it wasn’t. So let’s get back to that, shall we?”

Abel: “…”

Emilia: “Maybe it was unexpected for us to be there, but Abel’s rumor of the black-haired boy for Subaru was planned …And if that makes it more likely for Subaru to be in the Imperial Capital, then that part went according to his plan, right?”

Whether planned or unplanned, Emilia had said it so many times that it nearly jumbled her thoughts, but she chose her words carefully and organized them to try to reflect Abel’s thoughts properly.

Even without Emilia and the others, he had lied about the Emperor’s child cooperating with the rebels. In doing so, there would be less dangerous scenarios for Subaru as a child, and if anyone caught him, he would be brought to the Imperial Capital to find out if the lie was true—

Emilia: “The lie Abel told was a lie in order to make it a little more likely that Subaru would be in the Imperial Capital when we all fight there… am I right?”

Garfiel: “—Hk, that may be so, but why’d that guy have to be the captain?”

Emilia: “That’s obvious. —Because Subaru is reaaally reliable!”

It was difficult for Emilia to decipher all by herself what all these various speculations were all about and for which purpose. But the answer to the question Garfiel mentioned was straightforward.

Abel’s many devious plans were designed to bring Subaru to the scene of the decisive battle.

It would have been really awkward if his preparations were actually made so that he would not be discovered.

But even if they were—

Emilia: “If you had asked for help, I’m sure Subaru would have listened to you.”

It may be that it was more difficult to say the word “please” at times than it was to manipulate someone. Emilia had never thought about manipulating anyone, so she was unsure about that, but there were times when she could not say please.

And by how many could this even reduce the number of situations in which one could not say “please”? How much could one rely on the other party saying “please”?

It was now Emilia’s goal to be able to draw that line properly within herself.

Emilia: “…”

Emilia looked at Abel, waiting for his answer.

While their black and amethyst eyes met each other, Emilia suddenly realized that behind the Oni mask, —Abel never blinked with both of his eyes at the same time.

One of his eyes was constantly open. She wondered if his eyes would become dry.

—She wondered if she could push herself that hard without drying out her mind.

Abel: “Well, what are you waiting for?”

Emilia: “Huh?”

Abel: “Is there any reason why I should ever respond to your incoherent babbling about this and that? Do not expect my whims to last forever.”

Medium: “Abel-chin!”

Abel was about to end the conversation after a long period of silence. Emilia was so astonished by his remark that it was Medium who raised her voice instead.

She watched the conversation in silence, tugging at Abel’s sleeve beside her.

Medium: “That was so uncool just now! Even from my point of view, you lost, Abel-chin!”

Abel: “I do not recall making this a competition to see who will win, or lose. Do not pull on my sleeves. There is no replacement.”

Medium: “When you run out of clothes, dress up as a girl again! It suits you, Abel-chin!”

Brusquely, she firmly tugged his sleeve once more, and then Medium stuck her tongue out at Abel. She quickly walked around the operations desk and approached Emilia and the others.

Medium: “I don’t know anything complicated either. But if Rem-chan is in the capital, I’m sure big bro is there too… I want to see them again, and Subaru-chin too! That’s why, that’s why, that’s why…”

With faltering sincerity, Medium bowed her head with a jerk. Her long golden hair fell over her head as if it was tossed over, and fell at the feet of Emilia and the others.

However, Medium was oblivious to such things.

Medium: “Please! I know Abel-chin is how he is, but Emily-chan and the others can help!”

Medium pleaded so desperately that her voice trembled as she spoke.

At her pleading, Emilia involuntarily narrowed her eyes. Then she looked over to Abel, standing beyond the bowing Medium.

Emilia: “Abel, I think this is what it comes down to.”

At Emilia’s prompting, Abel looked at Medium’s back as she bowed her head. Then, without letting his black eyes show what he was thinking behind the Oni mask,

Abel: “You shall also join the attack on the Imperial Capital. I regard this as a statement of intent.”

Petra: “Shameless!”

Medium: “Abel-chin—!”

And the angry voices of the two young girls scolded Abel, who could not say please.

2

—With that interlude, Emilia’s party had decided to take part in the decisive battle at the Imperial Capital.

Truthfully, they did not know how far Abel had calculated and set up the board.

Perhaps, just like they had told Petra, everything about Subaru and Rem might have been completely according to Abel’s calculations, or everything could have actually been a mere coincidence.

If there was one thing they could say,

Otto: “Without getting too caught up in Abel-san’s utterances and presence, let us carry out our own objectives.”

Petra: “Yes, I also think it’s best to do as Otto-san said… So what about Dudley?”

Otto: “For the time being, he is at a friend’s, a minor target… It seems they were able to join up with High Countess Dracroy, and apparently, the aforementioned High Countess was eager to rebel.”

Petra: “Then, that High Countess and Dudley… Roswaal, too, will be going to the Imperial Capital?”

Otto: “It seems to be the likely outcome. —It keeps getting more and more exhausting.”

It seemed like Roswaal was also torn between successes and problems on his independent mission visiting an acquaintance that was in the Vollachian Empire.

However, it seemed like both Roswaal and Ram would also apparently be heading to the Imperial Capital of Lupugana.

If Subaru and Rem truly were in the Imperial Capital, everyone would end up gathering there at once.

Frederica: “However, what awaits us on our way there is the center of a great rebellion that is engulfing the entire Empire… And to be honest, the situation has completely changed from what we had originally envisioned.”

Garfiel: “Hey, big sis. Don’t tell me you’re scared now?”

Frederica: “I’m not frightened, but I’m a little worried. It’s a problem to interfere in the quarrels of other countries, and when it comes to the battlefield…”

Frederica, her eyes downcast, her expression hardened, and she hesitated to say anything beyond that.

What she was unwilling to put into words, everyone around her could imagine—If their destination were the decisive battle in the Imperial Capital, there would be a lot of damage to both parties.

The inevitable great surge, which should have been an event in a neighboring country.

Petra: “Frederica nee-sama, I am glad you are concerned about me. But…”

Frederica: “Of course I’m worried about Petra, but I’m afraid for myself. I’m sorry for being a scaredy-cat.”

Petra: “Nee-sama…”

Frederica shook her head steadfastly, and Petra hung her head at that compassion-filled voice.

It was likely a battle where many people would be hurt or even lose their lives, and Frederica’s apprehension about taking Petra to such a place was understandable.

That anxiety and reluctance was shared among everyone, not just Frederica.

That was why—

Emilia: “If we weren’t in the Empire, we’d frown at it as something that happened in a neighboring country and just dismissed it. But.”

Garfiel: “But?”

Emilia: “By being here, we’ve gotten to know the people who are going to join the fight, so even if we can get away from here, we can no longer stand idly by and frown on it.”

Even if the lives to be destroyed were the same, the feeling of it happening to a person you know compared to a person you don’t know would be different.

Life is very precious and cannot be compared to anything else. So if life could be compared, it would only be with another life. —This was surely a very self-righteous way to think about it.

However, if they were prepared to follow through with their selfish ideas, then it was already decided.

Emilia: “If we participate, I think we can reduce the number of casualties.”

Otto: “Emily… No, Emilia-sama. That is quite a thorny path.”

In response to Emilia’s words, who had put her hand on her chest, Otto corrected what he called her to say those words.

Otto, who had stubbornly used a pseudonym to avoid misnaming, even in a place where there was no one but friends around, gave them a glimpse of his seriousness.

It would be rude not to respond to that seriousness, so Emilia nodded in a serious way.

Emilia: “Hmm, I know. No, maybe Otto-kun is having a way more difficult time than I thought, but I’ll do something about that too.”

Otto: “Our goal is to bring back Natsuki-san and Rem-san. If only two people die in this decisive battle, and those two people are Natsuki-san and Rem-san, we will have failed. Conversely, if the people of the Empire are annihilated, but those two are safe, we win.”

Garfiel: “Otto-bro, not every end justifies…”

Otto: “I am talking to Emilia-sama now.”

Garfiel was about to interrupt Otto with a quiet string of words. However, Otto cut him off and asked only Emilia for an answer.

Looking back into Otto’s eyes, Emilia’s amethyst eyes shook slightly.

And then—

Emilia: “I’m sorry, Otto-kun. You’ve been working so hard since we came to the Empire… No, since before we came to the Empire, when we had to go help Subaru and Rem.”

Otto: “…Because that is what I am supposed to do. So, I will share my thoughts how I go about it.”

Emilia: “Yeah, I know. —We need to be at our best. And since we need Otto to give it our all, we’re going to ask him to hang in there until we meet Subaru and Rem. Even if Otto-kun collapses, I’ll forcibly carry him on my back. So.”

Otto: “…”

Emilia: “So let’s try reaaally hard to both save Subaru and Rem and keep the people of the Empire from dying as much as possible!”

Emilia was aware that she was saying something very unreasonable, and she knew it was a very selfish request. Even so, Emilia had stopped giving in before she even started trying to do what she wanted to.

For that reason—

3

Emilia: “—Let us blow a new wind into this battle.”

A fierce cold wind blew violently, filling the verdant grasslands of Vollachia with a blanket of white air.

Struggling with the falling temperatures and chilly atmosphere, many people stopped in their tracks.

In the vicinity, ceasing their movements and exhaling white breaths, were the people equipped with one part of their body as an eye-catching feature. Male or female, regardless of age, they all had one thing in common; a weapon had been cultivated on their bodies.

There was one who had swords for arms, and someone else whose entire leg was made out of steel, someone whose head had become a hammer, and also one whose entire back had become a shield.

She had heard Vollachia was home to a wide variety of demi-humans, but as so many people had gathered from so many different parts of the Empire, it was indeed a battlefield that never ceased to amaze her.

However, even if their bodies were weapons, it neither destroyed nor protected them from all the problems in front of them, as evidenced by their wounded and fallen.

So then, taking a big breath in,

Emilia: “Everybody! Get away from here! I’ll reaaally try to do my best here!”

Saying this to the people who had fallen—to the Weaponkin, Emilia hurried forward with long strides.

In order for no further pursuit to be made against them, Emilia tried to draw the opponent’s attention to herself. However, Emilia’s idea was unnecessary.

It was not that it did not work. Enough had already been done, and the other party’s eyes were drawn to Emilia.

The reason was waiting at the bastion of the city walls, where Emilia was headed—

???: “—So it’s friggin’ you again?”

Emilia, astonished at seeing Weaponkin for the first time, felt her strong feelings dampen with the existence that could not be seen even within the melting pot of diverse races that was the Vollachian Empire.

Eyes shining gold, and two black horns dully gleamed on her head. Catching the return of her thrown Flying Winged Blade in her small hands, the little girl was clad in an intimidating air unbefitting of her small stature.

Looking up at her opponent standing there, Emilia pointed a finger at her in a sharp gesture and said,

Emilia: “Yes! It’s me again, Madelyn! A passing Spiritual Arts User, Emily!”

Madelyn: “You’re a friggin’ irritating girl. You couldn’t beat this dragon in battle the other day—”

Gnashing her teeth with strength, Madelyn's expression shifted to a rather bloodcurdling one.

Viewing Emilia as an enemy, in an attempt to make up for the recent battle in Guaral, Madelyn raised her Flying Winged Blade at Emilia below—

Emilia: "—Hiyah!"

In the subsequent instant, similar to the previous time, a block of ice larger than the City Hall crashed into Madelyn like the very falls of the heavens, and together with a thunderous sound, the battle between Emilia and Madelyn broke out.

Chapter 89:
Kafma Irulux

1

—Even in the land of the Empire, where a wide variety of demi-human people lived, there were those who were regarded as heretics.

The “Insect Cage Tribe” was exactly that, and even in an empire where demi-humans of various species were intermingled, the reality was that they weren’t free from being seen as strange and heterodox.

In appearance, the Insect Cage Tribe did not differ significantly from the human race.

Many of them were brown-skinned and they had a custom of tattooing, but did not have any other obvious characteristics like the “Cyclops Tribe” and “Evil Eye Tribe” with their distinctive eyes, or the “Multi-Arm Tribe” and “Long-Leg Tribe” with their distinctive arms and legs, or especially the “Beastman Tribe” and “Halfbeast Tribe” who could not be any more distinctive.

Still, there was a reason why the Insect Cage Tribe were looked at in a peculiar way by other races: their way of living.

That was due to their way of living in symbiosis with “insects” within their bodies, which was a unique characteristic of the Insect Cage Tribe.

As mentioned above, compared to other demi-humans, the Insect Cage Tribe had little difference in appearance from the human race. If they did not have “insects” in their bodies, it would have been possible for them to live as a part of the human race.

However, that was not the case. The tribe had “insects” in their bodies and inherited their characteristics.

It was, so to speak, the acquisition of characteristics of demi-humans after birth, and the forbidden art of transforming the body in which one was born—That was the primary reason they were shunned by other demi-humans.

This distinguished them from the Weaponkin, who were born with a metallized part of their body that they could reforge into a weapon of their choice as they grew up, and from the Glow People, who were believed to take in the souls of the people they killed, thereby increasing the radiance of the pyroxene crystal that grew on their forehead.

The way of life of the Insect Cage Tribe, who did not mingle with others and never left their homeland, was shrouded in mystery.

Since falsified knowledge was often spread with prejudice, some of the rumors would be hard for the Insect Cage Tribe to avoid laughing at if they had the opportunity to hear them.

However, there were few opportunities for the rumors to be corrected, and there were again no opportunities for the misunderstandings to be cleared.

The most common misconceptions were the timing of when the insects were introduced into the body, as well as the connection between the insects's way of living and the Insect Cage Tribe—In other words, it was about the history of the Insect Cage Tribe.

To begin with, it was quite dangerous to implant "insects" into the body.

In the southern region of the Vollachian Empire, deep within the village where the Insect Cage Tribe lived, there was a cave where "insects" lived, and the cave was called the "Abyss" because of the deformed creatures and poisonous air that pervaded it. The "insects" inhabiting the cave had a strange appearance and were fundamentally different from the insects that were commonly thought of.

Just who had come up with the idea of taking in these mysterious creatures, was unknown.

The consensus was that it was probably an extraordinary method discovered by shamans, shinobi, and other aberrants with abnormal principles in order to gain power that could not be obtained through conventional methods.

In any case, given their existence, the existence of the Insect Cage Tribe was merely a byproduct.

The ancestors of the Insect Cage Tribe were the ones who wished to live in symbiosis with their natural powers by implanting mysterious “insects” into their bodies, and this madness had been passed down to the present day.

Returning back to the original topic. —The Insect Cage Tribe waited until they were twelve years old to receive their first “insect”.

Until that age, they trained their bodies and minds to be suitable vessels for the “insects” so they were recognized as an “insects” host during the actual ceremony and the time of hatching could be appropriately arranged.

After that, the symbiotic “insect” would only recognize its obedience towards the host if they had complete mastery over it, thus they were then allowed to call themselves a full-fledged member of the Insect Cage Tribe.

The ritual was forbidden until the age of twelve, because taking in “insects” was a risk to one’s life.

Those who challenged the ritual before they were physically and mentally ready would be eaten alive by the incorporated “insects”. The minimum age to challenge the ritual was twelve, but as long as the vessel was not ready, the age was allowed to be extended to fifteen. If the vessel was not ready by then, they would be deemed unqualified to be considered a member of the Insect Cage Tribe and thrown into the “Abyss” as food for the “insects”.

The suffering associated with the ritual of taking in those essential “insects” was indescribable.

There were different types of blood among the human race, and trying to compensate for a lack of blood via the transfusion of a different blood type could endanger one's life. The suffering of the "insect" ceremony was similar to that.

The feeling that all of the blood flowing through one's body was poison, rotting one's organs and burning one's brain.

The "insect" grew into a chrysalis that tested the host to see if it was worthy of being its vessel, and then spent three days and three nights deciding whether to use it as its vessel or to dissolve and devour it.

When the chrysalis finally hatched, if the human form was still intact, the ritual succeeded and the "insect" became a symbiote.

The first physical change occurred in the Insect Cage Tribe when an "insect" was taken into the body and hatched from out of their chrysalis.

Some acquired antennae and wings, some developed compound eyes, others grew multiple arms and legs, and others covered their fingers and bodies with a shell.

The fact that these characteristics were similar to those of real insects was the reason why the Insect Cage Tribe was called as such, despite the fact that the "insects" they took in were not actually insects at all.

Of course, even in a different shape, their essence remained unchanged.

However, it was also true that there were those who viewed the Insect Cage Tribe as these abnormal people performing rituals to retroactively transform themselves to become vessels for "insects".

This was the prejudice that awaited them at the end of their suffering, and yet the way of the Insect Cage Tribe remained the same.

In order to be recognized as a member of the Insect Cage Tribe, a person must take in a single "insect". However, the more "insects" one took in, the more powerful one became as a warrior.

Therefore, the best warriors of the Insect Cage Tribe had taken in at least three “insects”.

However, with more integrated “insects” the risk of them cannibalizing each other inside the body and endangering the life of the host increases. Therefore, the number of symbiotic “insects” is directly related to the quality of the warrior.

The current chief of the Insect Cage Tribe was known as a warrior among warriors, and was revered and respected as the hero of his tribe for having taken eight “insects” into his body.

—And Kafma Irulux was a monster that had taken in thirty-two “insects”.

The birth of a monster that overshadowed even the feats of heroes, a monster that went against the code of the Insect Cage Tribe from the very beginning.

The ritual of implanting an “insect” was not supposed to be performed until the twelfth birthday for fear of endangering the vessel’s life, but Kafma had taken in his first “insect” when he was only a few days old.

As the elder brother of the Chief, his father turned mad because he remained inferior to his younger, brilliant brother and directed it towards his own child.

Once Kafma gained awareness of his surroundings, he was made to known of his circumstances by his father.

His real father was executed by his younger brother, the Chief, his true intentions remaining unknown. However, his father had declared his son dead soon after his birth, isolating Kafma, and performing the ritual of implanting an “insect” into him every year.

Ironically, when Kafma’s existence was discovered, and he was first taken out of hiding at the age of twelve, the same year his brethren were to undergo the ritual of implanting “insects”, and Kafma was already a monster living in symbiosis with thirteen “insects”.

Even among the Insect Cage Tribe, opinions were divided on how to deal with Kafma, an existence inconceivable to the tribe.

With his father already dying after he was emotionally executed for breaking the law and cursing his child, the reason Kafma had been able to incorporate over a dozen "insects" was completely unknown—Eventually, his uncle, the Chief, declared that he would take responsibility for Kafma's existence and allowed him to live.

This was not a lie, and Kafma Irulux was grateful to the chief.

His blood-related uncle, for better or worse, maintained a certain distance and discretion when dealing with Kafma, and did not direct any excessive blame or apologies towards him because of his father.

His uncle's attitude of not being neither particularly kind nor heartless showed his awareness to not give Kafma special treatment as a member of the Insect Cage Tribe, for which Kafma was grateful.

No matter how my uncle treated me, the fact of the matter is that I am an anomaly among the tribe.

Yet the generation that was still unaware of the pain of implanting "insects" kept Kafma at a distance, while those who already incubated insects feared Kafma for the unimaginable number he took in.

The Insect Cage Tribe was regarded as heretical by other tribes, and Kafma had become even more heretical among them.

Of course, Kafma had no reason to be blamed or persecuted.

Kafma could have ignored the stares he received and continued to live the life he had as an unrelated outsider. However, despite being raised differently from others, Kafma's character was virtuous.

I did not appreciate the environment in which my own people were afraid of me.

To become a member of the Insect Cage Tribe, one was required to implant an "insect" inside one's self.

However, Kafma had passed through that stage before he became self-aware. So he spared no effort in understanding his brethren in different ways.

He actively interacted with others, learned how to be a warrior from his chieftain uncle, and showed that he was not different from them by being tenacious in his interactions with all generations.

In order to be respected as a warrior of the Insect Cage Tribe, he challenged the ritual of implanting a new “insect” into his body.

There was some opposition. Since Kafma was unique in the history of the Insect Cage Tribe, who had already taken in thirteen “insects”, there were high expectations for how much growth he would achieve simply by growing up.

They had said it was a mistake that should not have happened, that he would lose his life before it even hatched.

Kafma knew what those old men were thinking, but he did not think it was a good idea to stop.

Before receiving permission, Kafma took the “insect” and went through with the ritual unsupervised. Kafma later learned that he had inherited this reckless behavior from his father.

But this time, Kafma recklessly took in his fourteenth “insect”, and after three days and three nights of suffering and vomiting blood, he survived.

And so Kafma Irulux had finally hatched as a member of the Insect Cage Tribe.

Kafma, despite his peculiar birth, was possessed of virtuous spirit and won the outstanding respect of his tribe, making him the strongest in the history of the Insect Cage Tribe.

In the Vollachian Empire, it was the strong who were honored and glorified.

Shouldering the hopes and expectations of his entire tribe, Kafma also set out to make his mark as a “General” of Vollachia and make the strength of the Insect Cage Tribe itself known.

Naturally, there were those who liked to gossip everywhere. Sometimes, he received heartless abuse and harassment from those who believed false rumors about the Insect Cage Tribe. But these were trivial matters.

It was trivial for Kafma once he got to the outside world. Yes, it was trivial.

—Kafma Irulux was a “monster” born out of the history of the Insect Cage Tribe.

With a virtuous spirit and a sense of camaraderie with his fellow countrymen, he took the initiative to fight the enemy and protect his tribe.

However, no matter how much effort he put in, his tribesmen continued to draw a line between Kafma and themselves. Because they knew the difficulty of coexisting with insects, they could not see Kafma as one of them.

Therefore, for Kafma Irulux, leaving his homeland was his aspiration.

Only in a place without his tribesmen, the Insect Cage Tribe, could Kafma see the light that he sought.

By all rights, everyone in the Insect Cage Tribe was supposed to undergo the process of hatching as they grew up, to eclose, and to recognize that they are only one, until finally—

2

Garfiel: “—RRRRRRAH!!”

Kafma gnashed his molars hard at the howling, furious, golden tiger that had leapt in front of him.

Kafma did everything in his power to meet the enemy, who explosively enlarged his upper body and raised his sharp animal claws—A warrior who called himself Garfiel Tinzel.

Kafma: “I apologize for underestimating you!”

With a flap of his back-torn wings, Kafma released purple thorns from his outstretched arms.

Although a newcomer among the “insects” that Kafma had adopted, Thorns were used frequently because of their ease of use. However, even with its suppressive power, it could not halt Garfiel’s momentum.

With one fell swoop of his claws, he mowed down the tip of the thorns in every floor of the rampart, and the sensation of the insect screaming within shook Kafma’s brain.

The seemingly endless amount of thorns were part of the “insect” that Kafma had taken in.

Naturally, if they were hurt, there would be a proportionate backlash. They just suppressed it through their sheer vitality to make it seem like there is no reaction at all.

Garfiel: “Gaaaah!!”

Garfiel stepped forward with unstoppable momentum, and out of the corner of his eye, Kafma slid down the ramparts with the acceleration of his wings and slipped past the fierce tiger.

The impact, a thundering roar, echoed just off to the side, and Kafma was horrified by how much the margin for evasion had been narrowed down.

Every attack was even faster and more powerful than the previous one.

Either one grew in battle, or one drew on one’s dormant strength, neither of which was realistic. Almost every change in force that occurred on the battlefield is a reduction in power.

Of course, any perfect condition set up before a battle is lost with every second that passes once the battle commences, until one’s energy reserves are depleted and the optimal results can no longer be achieved.

That was why it was important to unleash the greatest firepower and skill within the first move of a battle.

Of course, Kafma was no stranger to this rule, unleashing maximum firepower and fighting techniques on the enemy.

And Garfiel ought to have been the same, too. —It should have been that way, so it did not make sense.

Such an increase in power and speed over the course of a fight, regardless of the particularities of beastification.

Kafma: “And you, you must be seriously injured—Hk!”

Kafma’s earlier attack, it could have been described as a sneak attack or a poisoned assassination of sorts.

Whether the means were good or bad, Kafma did not abstain from the act itself. If elegance was the difference between life and death in battle, then one should choose the means that suit one’s desired outcome.

If those fixations were related to whether or not a person was capable of performing at their best, then it would be a different story.

Kafma: “…”

Whatever the case, Garfiel’s overall injuries were unusual.

The largest injury he had sustained was head trauma from Kafma’s attack, but the “insects” that had burrowed into him were also quite resounding. However, the same methods would not work again.

Having swallowed the Fire Magic Stones, Garfiel’s body was still burning red-hot.

His whole body was covered in flames, but inside his body must have been in an even more unmanageable state of conflagration.

While the host body was at risk when implanting an “insect”, an “insect” without a host was also extremely vulnerable and could easily die off if in an even slightly harsh environment.

There was no such thing as an “insect” that could live in a continuously burning body.

Kafma: “The thought of it is terrifying.”

Even if one could use healing magic, it could not kill “insects” with it. Instead, the “insect” needed to be removed in order for the magic to heal the wound.

This was the best way to break through that antinomy, but it seemed unlikely that he could think this up on his own.

Rather, it was probably the result of following instinct rather than thinking with one’s head.

If he had thought it through with his head, he would have never been able to swallow the magic stone and burn his body.

Kafma: “—Hk.”

The moment he slid to an unguarded side, red antennae shot out from Kafma’s shoulders like cannonballs.

Garfiel’s body was blasted off the ramparts with a roar as the tips of the “insects’” horns from Kafma’s transformed shoulder bones pierced through his steel-like abdominal muscles.

A crushing blow, but Kafma did not come out unscathed.

Kafma: “Guh.”

Kafma’s cheeks tensed up at the bone-numbing pain of having two of the antennae snapped off at the base. If victory came at the cost of pain, it brought Kafma down to his knees.

But, Kafma was not foolish enough to kneel here.

Because—

Garfiel: “Gaa! Ohaa! Ruuuaahh!”

Garfiel, supposedly blown away, crawled up the ramparts, his claws piercing the walls, and leapt up high before Kafma's eyes.

Red steam erupted on the side of his body where the horns had supposedly pierced, and the wound closed up. Kafma exhaled as the healing magic's pale light violently glowed with phosphorescence, and the wound healed rapidly and unexpectedly.

Kafma: "Ha."

Kafma put a hand over his mouth, realizing it was an impulse to laugh.

Then, as if giving up, he put his hand down and shook his head loosely.

Kafma: "Refreshing."

He admitted it.

Kafma Irulux had enjoyed his battle with Garfiel Tinzel to the fullest.

Garfiel: "Oaaaah!"

The howling Garfiel brought his arms down and they fell as vertically spinning golden discs. Kafma raised both arms and decided he could not stop them, so he pushed forward, and decided to go beneath Garfiel's groin and behind him, aiming for his exposed back, which he could see from the side.

However, Kafma unleashed his winged slash without turning back and was knocked away by a rising stone right between them. Just before Kafma's attack could reach him from beneath his groin, Garfiel placed his outstretched leg on the floor and activated his Divine Protection, blocking the attack.

Moreover, his wings struck against the hard stone and were torn noisily—On the other side, Garfiel's hind legs were violently unleashed.

Kafma: "—Hk?!"

With their backs to each other, Kafma's body went flying after a powerful blow.

His efforts to stay on his feet turned out disastrous, and his outstretched body had failed to dissipate the impact, bouncing off the floor, spitting blood, and sending Kafma's tall body bouncing over the wall.

Once, twice bouncing higher, he saw Garfiel's face as he spun around over his rolling momentum.

To the bottom—

Kafma: "A second time—Hk!"

His chest opened, and his ribs spread apart; his reddish organs stored deep within rumbled, and the shockwave emitted from them surged forward straight into Garfiel.

This, Kafma's trump card, was not the result of introducing a new "insect", but a new organ created by the coexistence and symbiosis of the thirty-two "insects" that had been inserted up to that point.

The functions of multiple "insects" were combined to release a shockwave that engulfed and destroyed everything in its path with a ferociously precise vibration, a destructive blow pulverizing everything into pieces.

The moment any warrior was exposed to it, invisible to the eye, it turned them into a bloody mist.

Kafma: "—Buh."

That conviction remained unshaken as Garfiel's golden hair was now stained with blood.

Any warrior would be turned into a bloody mist. Therefore—

Kafma: "—A monster."

Braking his tumbling body with an arm thrust against the floor, Kafma looked up.

Then, Garfiel, with his blood-stained upper body trembling, mouth wide open, rushed in. Straight towards him, the “monster” struck a blow that would have killed any warrior.

Garfiel: “…”

The swing of that huge fist caught Kafma in the face, and a reflexive counter-punch rocketed upwards to his opponent’s jaw. Like that, a violent brawl ensued, red flowers of blood blooming across the wall.

It was an epic battle that no one could interrupt, a clash between monsters.

Kafma: “Ha.”

Exhaling and looking beyond the pain, Kafma poured all of his energy into it.

He was an extraordinary monster yielded from a peculiar origin, that was the reason for Kafma Irulux to be so distinct from his tribesmen, a fate which he had cursed with his very being.

Leaving his closed-off hometown and stepping forth into the wide world, Kafma had tried to discover.

He had tried to discover evidence, so that he may puff up his chest with pride that he was not a monster.

However, that was not the case in reality.

Even in the outside world, Kafma’s remarkable true strength was beyond the norm and thereby regarded as heretical. Many that he stood shoulder to shoulder with as regular soldiers feared Kafma’s prowess, and they kept away from his abnormality.

That no matter where, he was a monster, that in the end, it was a fate he could not escape, such was as Kafma had thought.

However—

???: “—Rise up, General Third-Class Kafma! Together, let us do everything in our power for the glorious sake of His Excellency! What, don't think too much about it, for just like you, we are all monsters!"

With a loud voice, the words of the large man who gave that masculine laugh had been a heavenly blessing for Kafma.

Wanting to deny that he was a monster, Kafma had tried to ingratiate himself with his tribesmen. Since that wish had not been fulfilled, he had tried to seek it outside, and still he had failed.

However, what if he looked upwards?

Gathered together were monsters that even Kafma Irulux, who was feared as a monster, was no match for.

It was not that Kafma wanted to be told that he was not a monster.

It was just that he did not want to be in a loneliness that could not be shared or understood by anyone.

Even though he was a monster, the world had not left Kafma behind.

Therefore—

Kafma: "—And with my fight against you, yet another."

While Garfiel's entire body was bathed in a four-pronged barrage of antennae fired at an ultra-close range, he endured it with sheer force by healing his wounds as soon as he sustained them.

The uncommon defensive power, vitality, and extreme regenerative abilities that likely included the power of a Divine Protection, were the gimmicks of the "monster" before Kafma's eyes, and the cause of his enthusiasm.

The thorned vines released from his right arm had wound around the fierce tiger's entire body, and the thorns were forcibly shaken off while they were tearing the skin to bits. His fists, covered in carapaces that thrust aside every slash, directly collided with Garfiel's shining silver gauntlets, and the carapaces shattered tremendously.

The “insect” eggs that had been planted with a flick of his left hand burned in the flames, and the shockwave emitted when he was forced down to his knees, which had caused his internal organs to churn, was still unable to overcome that recovery ability, and fell flat.

Refreshing. Ahh, how refreshing.

In the end, he was a military man, and no matter how he may try to pretend, he was a monster, and going along with the “insects” that cheered from within him, before he knew it, a smile had stuck to Kafma’s cheeks and would not come off.

The thirty two “insects”, the beings that had become one with himself and were closer to him than his own family, were delighted that they finally had a chance to show their full heart and soul, and began to rant and rave.

Victory must be wrought.

For the sake of a great cause, for the glorious sake of His Excellency the Emperor who guides the Empire, for the sake of repaying his benefactor who raised him to this domain, and for the sake of his tribesmen who wished to improve the status of the Insect Cage Tribe.

Garfiel: “—Bastard, where th’fuck d’ya think yer lookin’?”

He heard a voice amidst the pain, the suffocation, and the accelerating thoughts that filled his brain.

Even though they were both pounding each other’s vitals with such ferocious vigor and might that it would not have been strange if one of them died, and even though there was no room for a proper exchange of words, he heard it.

A pair of emerald green eyes fixed their gaze onto him from in front, and a bloodshot glint pierced his soul.

The sharp fangs made a noise as to slurped flesh and blood, and the sound of creaking bones made all of his perception feel distant.

So while everything was being put to use for the stage of battle, the monster before his eyes, howled.

Garfiel: “My amazin’ self, is right here.”

Kafma: “…”

Garfiel: “For just this moment, I ain’t gonna let anythin’ get in the way.”

That instant, color faded from the world, the sound of the wind and the ringing in his ears went silent, and that large enemy before his eyes became all that remained in Kafma Irulux’s world.

Kafma was ashamed of his own inadequacy, thinking how tactless he had been.

And then, he quickly tossed that shameful tactlessness aside, and nodded.

Kafma: “—Ahh, it’s just you and me.”

That moment, their fists crossed and slammed into each other’s faces, and time accelerated.

An open palm caught hold of his face, and Kafma’s skull screamed from that extraordinary grip strength. But Kafma also put his hand in his opponent’s mouth, and from there he poured thorns into his opponent’s body.

Since he could not break through from the outside, then he would do it from the inside.

The overflowing thorns rampaged through the inside of his body, and the conclusion of devouring him from the inside was imminent. However, while the thorns were flowing into Garfiel, he swung Kafma’s body up, and then swung his body down, slamming him into the ramparts.

Kafma: “—Hk.”

As his back was buried into the rampart, he was lifted up and dropped again. Lifted, and dropped. Lifted, and dropped. Lifted lifted lifted lifted, dropped dropped dropped dropped, and he was trampled upon.

A crack formed in the rampart where his entire body was buried, and the tip of the bastion of the star-fortress was split in two. His vision was dyed a deep red, and in place of his breaths, blood gushed out.

Nevertheless, the thorns did not lose their power, and they continued to flow into Garfiel's body.

Until Kafma exhausted all of his strength, the "insects" would hunger for victory.

Garfiel: "—Gah."

The open mouth of the large tiger was not able to bite through the bulky bundle of thorns. No matter how much his claws tore into them, the undulating layers of thorns were too thick. No matter what he did, Kafma would not let him go.

The thorns were also finite, there was a limit to how much he could send forth.

If Kafma were to send them all forth at this point, he would be giving up his best chance of defeating the other insurgents who were closing in on the ramparts. However, this victory would be worth it.

—No, the monster known as Garfiel Tinzel, would be worth it.

Kafma: "Ah, ahh, RAAAAAAAAAAAHHH—!!"

Ignoring the pain of the broken bones in his body, Kafma's throat raised a war cry.

The overflowing thorns filled Garfiel's body to the brim, and the pressure of the deadly thorns, having no place to go, would cause a rupture that led to death.

No matter how hard he tried to twist his body, no matter if he completed his beastification, it would not let him escape.

Concentrating the remaining power of all the "insects" in his body, Kafma suppressed Garfiel and pitched forward to wrest victory—and then he bore witness to the unbelievable.

Kafma: "—Wha…"

The large tiger with golden-fur had swelled up to the verge of bursting from thorns that poured into his mouth. Before that body could burst, the pressure in the thorns was rapidly lost.

Why was that? —It was because an escape route had been created for the thorns that entered his body.

Garfiel's sharp claws tore across his own abdomen, and thorns poured out from the wound.

His terrifyingly desperate tactics were acts of barbarism which brought him close to death's door. If thorns rushed into a wound that was created, the wound in the stomach could be opened for the same reason that the mouth could not be closed. Then his body would be split in two, and it would be the conclusion.

Indeed, to merely invite death like that, it was an act of barbarity far too foolish.

However, the instant Kafma witnessed that barbarism, the momentary emptiness in his mind gave Garfiel, who was on the verge of tearing himself apart, a moment to catch his breath.

He closed his jaws. There was a sound of thorns being torn apart, and the large tiger's large mouth closed.

Kafma lost the decisive blow with his thorns, and before he could realize it, Garfiel stepped forth and his fist struck Kafma's face with a hard impact of his silver gauntlets.

Collapsed on the top of the wall, a fist slammed into Kafma's face as he lay sprawled out on the floor, and now, the impact that was deeply hammered into him inflicted decisive damage to the rampart.

A thunderous roar resounded, and the ramparts of the Imperial Capital of Lupugana, extolled to be impregnable, began to crumble.

While he felt the collapse through the sound behind him, Kafma looked straight ahead to Garfiel, who pulled back his fist.

Slowly unraveling his beastification, the boy regained his original human form—the wound in Garfiel's abdomen, from when he had torn himself open, was closed with a plume of blood.

It was a fatal wound, but seeing him forget about it even happening so terrifyingly quickly, Kafma bursted into laughter.

What an absurd sight.

Kafma: "…A monster."

Thus, right after he muttered to himself as if to catch his breath, the collapse was fully realized and the ramparts crumbled.

Falling amongst the crumbling ramparts and rubble, Kafma's consciousness slowly faded away, faded away, and faded away until there was nothing left to hold on to—.

Kafma: "Your Excellency, I apologize…"

Until the very end, while he thought shamefully of himself for putting on airs of a loyal retainer, he fell.

—The voices of the "insects", which he had been hearing since he was born, also seemed to be awfully quiet.

3

Forcefully grabbing the man's body as he fell defenseless, he kicked off on the rubble to escape the scene of the collapse.

Grazing the ground with his heel, he killed his momentum and turned around to see the ramparts crumble with a thunderous roar, opening a large hole in the strong fortress.

Garfiel: “I fuckin’ opened it, a hole for th’new wind.”

The words had been spoken before the start of the battle, remembering Emilia’s order, his cheeks contorted. Feeling pain in the corners of his mouth, which had been torn wide open, Garfiel screamed, “Gah!”

He hurriedly placed his hand on the wound and activated his healing magic.

Garfiel: “Argh… shit… that hurts… but…”

Roughly healing his torn mouth, Garfiel intently stared down at his hands.

The sudden fierce battle, and being put into a condition where, frankly, it would not have been strange if he died—But the horrific wounds all over his body had closed up, and the seeping pain became a lingering sensation.

Even while in his beast form, he thought that he was able to maintain a certain degree of composure while continuing to fight. Thanks to that, he was able to recover from his wounds quickly. —Was that really all there was to it?

Garfiel: “…Has my amazin’ self gotten stronger?”

Clutching his opened hand tightly, Garfiel spilled that out.

He had not been entirely sure. Perhaps it would be better to call it fortunate, but until now, Garfiel had not faced an opponent to whom he had to give his all.

Except for the battle against Kurgan, the Eight-Arms, in the Water Gate City, the battles in which Garfiel was not able to use the entirety of his strength had continued.

With those shackles removed, and the result of once again being able to fight with all his might, he had a definite sensation.

He breached the wall at a level stronger than he was before. That was what he had ascertained during this battle.

That was why—

Garfiel: "—Ya called me a monster, but I'd say the exact same thing about ya."

With that, Garfiel lowered his right arm, dropping Kafma's body to the ground, and snorted his nose.

Kafma's chest was slightly falling and rising, and he was still breathing. This was war, and in order to think of it as true victory, he should not let his opponent live, though he understood this.

Emilia said they should try to reduce the number of people who would die by their hands.

And Otto, likewise, told Garfiel to beat them up until they could no longer stand on their own feet.

Indeed, Emilia had shared these words from the bottom of her heart, and Otto had said them out of concern.

He wanted to fulfill that.

Therefore, in this place—

Garfiel: "—It's my amazin' self's win."

And so, having defeated one of the bastions on the points of the star, Garfiel pumped his fist into the air.

SoupVEVO

Chapter 90:
The Cradle of Hell

1

???: “—No doubt about it! In front, the first bastion is the Second Ranked, Arakiya!!”

???: “It’s presumed to be the Ninth Ranked, Madelyn Eschart, at the second bastion! A herd of flying dragons is circling overhead!”

???: “The guardian of the third bastion, still unidentified!”

???: “Also, no confirmation on the guardian of the fourth bastion! Unable to confirm!”

???: “Fifth bastion, such a flashy attack… Not a General First-Class! It is General Second-Class! Kafma Irulux!”

The battle conditions were coming in one after another in a loud voice, almost like an angry shout or a scream.

The soldiers assigned to the role of long-range observers took up as high of a position as possible, their eyes bloodshot as they tried to obtain as much information as possible by looking at the majesty of the Imperial Capital of Lupugana in front of them.

The decisive battle for the Imperial Capital had finally begun. If one considered the simple difference in the number of soldiers as the difference maker, the military strength of the rebel forces was nearly twice that of the regular army of the Imperial Capital. If all of these troops were to run out onto the plains at once and clash head-on, it would be obvious who would win the battle—.

???: “I never wanted to be on the attacking side of Lupugana, the robust Imperial Capital.”

Shaking his distinctive hairdo from side to side, Zikr Osman wrinkled his brow as he documented the reported battle situation on a map he had spread out in the simple command center.

As a General Second-Class of the Empire, he carried out his duty as a General and still had a high level of loyalty to Vollachia, so it could be said that the Imperial Capital was the armor that protected the heart that he needed to protect.

He would never have considered himself being in a position where he had to capture the Imperial Capital and vanquish the existence of the one who, perversely, called himself the Emperor on the throne.

???: "The situation, however, will not wait for your incessant whining to cease. —No, not only you. Time passes equally for everyone."

Zikr: "Abel-dono…"

Abel: "Return to the battle situation. Obtain the reports from the long-range observers. Priority should be given to the third and fourth bastions… No matter how trivial it is. We will identify the guardians there."

Zikr: "Right away! Strengthen the long-range observations on the third and fourth! Without a doubt, a General First-Class is on the battlefield!"

Zikr nodded and ordered his nearest subordinate, causing the air to fluctuate at a dizzying pace.

Savoring the dry air on his skin, Abel squinted from behind his Oni mask at the Imperial Capital in the distance, outside the cloth-covered command center, where the star-shaped ramparts protected the city.

As noted previously, in terms of military strength, the rebels outnumbered the regular army.

However, the assembled rebels lacked a sense of coordination, a rabble that rushed off in haste likely as to not relinquish glory and military achievement to others.

In addition, the enemy, whom they needed to attack, was confined to the innermost part of the Imperial Capital, which painted a picture of robustness and solidity.

As was discussed when capturing the Fortress City of Guaral, some held the belief that in cases where the attacker was attempting to defeat the defender, if it only boiled down to pure military strength, they would require three times the number of men.

Considering that the defensive measures of the Imperial Capital were far superior to those of Guaral, the difference was all the more pronounced.

Above all—

Abel: "—The existences that disturb the balance of military strength the most are the powerful who are equivalent to a thousand men in strength."

Zikr: "It is a decisive battle in the defense of the Imperial Capital. Although the battle has started earlier than expected, how many of the Nine Divine Generals have been recalled?"

Even though the rebels could be surmised as a rabble, if they were to get hit on the head and doused with water, they would turn tail with their ears ready to listen. If that happened, then they would be able to incorporate them into their tactics and shape them.

That is, if the water was simply a wake-up call and not something that made them close their eyes forever—Which was no easy task when confronted with the "Nine Divine Generals".

Abel: "At minimum, Arakiya, Madelyn Eschart, and Moguro Hagane will be in play. Kafma Irulux is equivalent to a General First-Class on merit alone, and Olbart Dunkelkenn may refuse to participate due to his injured arm, but that is unlikely."

Zikr: "There will be no participation by General First-Class Goz or General First-Class Groovy. Is that what you expect?"

Abel: "Goz Ralfon may or may not be alive, and Groovy Gumlet may or may not have been recalled from the West, it depends, but the latter is difficult to mobilize. The uncertainty concerning the West’s movements is neither orchestrated by this side nor theirs. — But it smells fishy.”

In the first move of the rebellion, Goz had taken up resistance to allow Abel to flee as he was ousted from the Imperial Capital. He was likely to have died, as no further information about his whereabouts was known.

Goz, who possessed the extraordinary support of his soldiers because of his superior command capabilities and personality, would be one of the greatest threats in the war if he were to become an enemy. But then again, knowing the identity of the impostor sitting on the throne, there was practically no chance that Goz would join the other side, making him nothing more than a dead pawn that was hard to deal with.

Abel: “The only possible effective use of a dead pawn is to utilize its death… Something around the lines of taking Goz Ralfon’s death and pinning the blame for it on the rebels to stir up the morale of the soldiers.”

Zikr: “…I do not wish to think about it. If I had remained unaware of the situation over there, I would have also taken up the sword for the sake of General First-Class Goz, even if it meant dying.”

Even Zikr, a “General” in his own right, mourned the supposed death of Goz.

It was a feat of trust and achievement that Goz Ralfon had built up, and in fact, if they were to resort to such a scheme, it would be necessary to re-evaluate the strength of the regular army.

But, if they had intended to do so, the best time would have been before the war had begun.

Abel: “Either he deliberately passed up on the opportunity, or he did not want the uncertainty of any fluctuation in force due to improved morale. Either way, he is going to be pulling the strings.”

Running through his thoughts, Abel put his hand on the edge of his mask and tried to grasp the other party's intentions.

When it came to reading one's intentions, there was no room for being worse at it against most opponents. However, this time, the opponent was outside of the "most" category, and in addition, he was an enemy who knew the hues of his mind better than anyone else so far.

The conditions here were the same; however, different win conditions mean different options. And so, to the place where Abel was staring at the map was—

???: "—Abel-chin, Abel-chin!"

A lively voice sounded through the entrance of the tent, and with a quick movement, a little girl jumped into the room. She took her place at the desk and turned to Abel, her blue eyes shimmering with immense emotion.

Medium: "I want to go, too! Big bro is there, remember? I can't wait anymore!"

Abel: "Nonsense. We do not need more contingencies. How can you be sure that your brother is in the Capital?"

Medium: "There was a girl named Madelyn! She's the one who took big bro and Rem-chan! If she's there, then maybe the two of them are there too! Right?"

Abel: "That hardly sounds like a guarantee. Furthermore, your brother and that girl are of little strategic value in the current situation. Do not confuse our priorities."

Medium: "But there is nothing more important to me than big bro and my friends!"

With a banging on the desk, the girl—Medium snapped at Abel's words.

This was an emotional and implicit opinion. Ultimately, as he said, there was no reason other than emotion to give priority to Flop and Rem, who were both kidnapped under the circumstances of this war, and therefore was a worthless decision for Abel.

There was a liberating alternative for Medium, though.

Abel: "—. Causing needless dissension, hmm?"

Medium: "—? What?"

Lowering her eyebrows, Medium tilted her head unconcerned about her own worth. Or was she encouraged by the rightful appraisal of herself? Abel quickly dismissed it as overthinking.

In any case, he could not afford to devote much time to her.

Abel: "No matter how much you voice your aspirations, you should be aware how lofty your goal is right now. If you cut loose your shackles and head for the battlefield, you needlessly throw away your life."

Medium: "Mm! But that…"

Zikr: "Miss Medium, Abel-dono is concerned about your safety. And I share his opinion; I cannot just let you go."

Looking up and down, Abel and Medium glared at each other respectively, and Zikr, who interrupted them, rebuked them in a calm tone.

Zikr, the General in command, was also aware of the unpredictable situation of the battle. Nevertheless, he must have been quite distressed trying to keep the unreasonable Medium at bay.

Without revealing any of these emotion with his expression, the man called "Womanizer" exchanged glances with Medium and spoke, "And what do we do about that?".

Zikr: "That solid city wall is made up of five bastions. One cannot attack the Imperial Capital without considering these five bastions. At the very least, we need to understand our opponent's intelligence and eliminate any ambiguity before we talk about this again—"

Medium: "That is why! I'm also properly taking this into account! I really want to hear from Madelyn about my big bro, but it’s hard to do that, so from an unguarded spot, I’m going to go inside…”

Abel: “—Wait.”

After Zikr’s attempt at gentle persuasion, Medium emotionally tried to push him away. However, Medium’s statement made Abel think of something so he interrupted them.

Abel grabbed Medium by her slender shoulders and turned her to face him, causing her to widen her eyes.

Abel: “You said, “an unguarded spot”. If you mean one of the bastions, from where did you get that information?”

Medium: “From where, you say? …Oh! That’s right! Sorry, Abel-chin!”

Her complexion changed at the question, and Medium grasped Abel’s hand on her shoulder with both hands. As she continued to hold his hand tightly, her blue eyes again wavered emotionally, and,

Medium: “I should’ve told you this! Well, the third bastion is full of golems, and the fourth bastion is nothing but black shadows… neither of them has a person like Yorna-chan!”

Abel: “…”

Medium: “Abel-chin?”

Abel’s eyes widened slightly at the message from Medium’s mouth. However, this reaction was immediately quashed with a blink of an eye, disappearing in a silent sigh.

These uttered words, there was no need to scrutinize their content. He fully understood their meaning. The question was how the information was obtained—

Abel: “Who made you tell me this?”

Medium: “Huh?”

Abel: “Who?”

Opposite his gripped hand, with his left hand, he held the back of Medium’s head and turned her to face him.

Medium gasped as he looked straight into her blue eyes. Then she moved her pale pink lips to answer Abel’s question.

The answer, to that question was—

2

—Otto Suwen closed his eyes while being engulfed in a vast, raging, whirlwind of information.

Otto: “…”

A storm of voices, voices, voices poured in.

From right to left, from top to bottom, from front to back, an unending assault of voices.

It was the second coming of the cradle of hell, where he once spent for as long as he could, almost like a triumphant return to his nostalgic hometown.

Otto’s Divine Protection of the Soul of Language was said to be one of the “outliers” among the many Divine Protections that existed in this world.

This Divine Protection, which allowed one to understand and communicate in every creature’s language, had too many flaws to be considered a strength obtained at birth.

First of all, a newborn child would have no ego or self-consciousness, and only a vague sense of self.

Since children cannot firmly establish themselves, they have no choice but to rely on their surroundings, but for the owner of the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language, these surroundings would be far too vast.

It would not be about up, down, left, right, or depth, but literally everything.

More specifically, a child with the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language could not even distinguish between human, animal, insect, wind, rain, or the ringing in one's ears.

Such a living creature, bereft of definitive judgment and attention span, could hardly survive.

The only reason Otto was able to last through that period without dying was because of his circumstances.

It was the devotion of his wealthy and loving parents as well as siblings who never dismissed or denied their brother despite not being able to understand each other that kept Otto alive.

But even after establishing oneself as a living being, the suffering of the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language did not end. Rather, it was just about to begin.

Those who possessed the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language were able to communicate with everything around them, but they risked being isolated from everyone in return. This was a major factor in their lacking sense of belonging.

Assuming that talking, touching, and cultivating bonds were the foundations of life, the owner of the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language could establish relationships with any creature.

There was no need to merely bond with human beings.

One could communicate with any animal, insect, and even fish because of a Divine Protection allowing one to connect with all living things, thus making it easy to isolate oneself.

One could be trapped in an eternal prison of doubt as to who one was.

Due to that, all of the previous holders of the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language met an early demise.

Otto did not even want to think about how many of his fellow possessors of the Divine Protection had died without even being able to speak their names, let alone realize the power of their Divine Protection or make it known to their surroundings.

What was the value of living in the midst of unrelenting downpours, uninterrupted storms, and utter helplessness knowing one would never be understood?

In fact, he had never heard of any accomplished possessor of the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language.

And Otto understood that feeling all too well.

Literally, the cradle of hell was a place where one was forced to listen endlessly to lullabies enticing one to death.

Otto: "…"

In this nostalgic hell, Otto consciously narrowed the focus of the voices he had lent an ear to.

It was the same way people picked up only the voices in a crowded place or at a party that talked about topics that were relevant and interesting to them.

It was a domain only a handful of possessors of the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language had been able to enter in which could adjust the effects of the Divine Protection.

It was that kind of constantly active Divine Protection that would lose its impact when its effect were adjusted. Otto, too, usually set his Divine Protection to the lowest setting so that his head was not filled with so many words.

He increased the volume of the weakened Divine Protection and raised its intensity to the maximum.

Otto: "…"

When Subaru pestered him about the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language before, he had called it a "channel". He thought that that did not sound so bad, so he opened a “channel”.

The countless “voices” that popped into Otto’s ears and mind were all related to the battlefield centered around the Imperial Capital. Many of them were accompanied by avoidance, loathing, fear, and anger, and pretty much useless, but he scrutinized them all.

Anyhow—

Otto: “I have asked a lot of Garfiel, too…”

When Emilia made the decision to enter the battle for the Imperial Capital, Otto concluded that it was Garfiel who would have to shoulder the most difficult role in this battle.

Because of their prowess as combatants, Emilia and Garfiel were the ones taking on the dangerous enemies in battle. However, they could not let Emilia fight to the death.

Of course, Emilia’s life took top priority, even before recovering Subaru and Rem.

Therefore, if Emilia was in danger, he would make her back down, no matter what she said.

Everyone in the camp, except Emilia, had been notified of this commonly acknowledged fact. However, it was not an option to come all the way to the Empire and return empty-handed; they must bring Subaru and Rem back home with them.

In order to achieve this goal, Garfiel was responsible for sustaining the most wounds and spilling the most blood.

Otto: “Garfiel may or may not be aware of this.”

Did Garfiel understand how reckless and cruel the instructions were for the role he was entrusted with?

Otto was certainly aware that he had been terribly self-serving and unreasonable in his instructions, and Garfiel probably thought he was being reckless, but did he truly get the gist of it?

Or perhaps Garfiel took it as a sign of trust?

Otto: "I do not like this…"

Muttering a few words, Otto thought of Garfiel's innocent look of trust.

Even if he was giving unreasonable instructions, Garfiel believed that Otto had an idea and that it was his role to see it through. In the same manner, Otto anticipated Garfiel would see his instructions that way and entrusted him with a role only he could fulfill.

At first glance, this was an exchange of mutual trust. However, Otto, as someone involved, believed that this was not a fair balance of what each side had to bear.

Garfiel was the one in harm's way wherever they went. Not Otto.

All I do is sit back in my comfort zone, feeling pain and guilt. And when all is said and done, Garfiel would say, "As I'd expect of Otto-bro!" I am not sure how I feel about that.

You've gotta be kidding.

Otto: "If I can bear it, I should bear it myself. Do not run away from your responsibilities, Otto Suwen."

Otto placed his hand over his mouth as he reminded himself.

When their camp had finally decided on a course of action to take on the Empire's upheaval, Otto warned Emilia, "You're going down a thorny path".

In response to Otto's words, Emilia stoutly held her chest and chose her path.

It was probably a stupid idea, a foolish path. If Otto were alone, he would never have chosen this approach of all danger and little gain.

But there was something important in the little that was gained, and Otto was relieved that Emilia had chosen a path that he never would have chosen on his own.

He was inwardly delighted. Thus, he could not be the odd one out.

Out of several possibilities, it was Otto who had chosen this path.

If blood needed to be spilled for that purpose, he did not want to leave the bloodshed to others.

Therefore—

???: “Otto-san, you can be a real dummy sometimes!”

Suddenly, amidst the flood of meaningless “voices”, he heard a clear “voice” and blinked his eyes.

In an instant, the sound of hellish rain and storms faded away, and before Otto turned around to squeeze through the channel, his eyes met Petra’s, whose eyebrows were lowered with dismay.

She went up to Otto and offered him a white handkerchief saying, “Take this”.

Petra: “Your nose bleed is really gushing. I’m a little scared.”

Otto: “Nose… Ah, I failed to notice it.”

Petra: “So it seems …Please sit down. You don’t have to stand, right?”

Otto looked at the handkerchief offered to him in a daze. Irritably pulling Otto’s hand, Petra made him sit down on the grassy field.

She then put a handkerchief against Otto’s face and wiped off the blood.

Petra: “Is that what happens when you overuse your Divine Protection?”

Otto: “…Yes. If I increase the number I am listening to and the range, this is what happens. I do not really resort to this, but it is an emergency.”

Petra: “So that you don’t lose to Garf-san?”

Otto: “…”

Petra: “As I thought. Otto-san, you really are an idiot.”

As Petra stared at him, Otto scratched his head saying, “Guilty as charged”.

Petra’s point was correct in a broad sense, although subtly different from what she was trying to say. If she had been smart, she might have known what Otto really meant and rephrased it.

Petra, the fastest-growing member of the camp, was getting sharper and more strong-willed by the day.

Petra: “Even if Otto-san has lots of nosebleeds, I don’t think he can ever be like Garf-san.”

Otto: “Certainly, the amount of blood we shed can not be compared with each other. Unlike Garfiel, I bleed to death much more easily. But I should at least be prepared to bleed myself.”

Petra: “Is it because Otto-san told everyone to go?”

Otto: “I truly am no match for Petra-chan.”

Otto laughed as his nose was pinched to flush out the blood that had accumulated.

Considering only the events that had taken place, it was Emilia who had decided that she would participate in this battle, and it was Emilia who had declared that they would do it, so Petra’s point was way off the mark.

But the reality was that Petra was correct, it was Otto who had led her to say that.

—No, those were precisely the words Otto had wanted her to say.

Otto: “In fact, I am not hurting myself for nothing either. I hate to say this, but my Divine Protection is very useful in war. I can not afford not to use it.”

Petra: “…”

Otto: “It is difficult to find someone that can help us because of the circumstances, but it is worth just getting the information. I just entrusted Medium-san with a message. I-If Abel-san can make effective use of it, then the state of battle… Petra-chan?”

Petra: “Haa~”

Otto attempted to at least make amends by explaining the usefulness of his actions, but Petra’s response was one of cold and growing dismay.

Saying “Good grief”, Petra ran her hand through her light brown hair and looked into Otto’s round eyes.

Petra: “I am not the slow-witted child you believe me to be, Otto-san!”

Otto: “No, um, yes. I think Petra is a very quick-witted girl.”

Petra: “In that case, Otto-san, I don’t think you’re as smart as you think you are.”

Otto: “That is… a tough one to respond to.”

I am not so conceited to believe that I am one of these all-seeing schemers no one else can match.

Otto’s self-assessment for why he had been able to make it this far would be the number of rules of thumb and small tricks he had, as well having excellent crisis management skills.

If they started comparing intellect, he would fall far short to the all-seeing schemers.

However, it seemed that this notion of Otto’s had missed the mark here.

Petra: “Right now, that’s not the kind of intellect I’m talking about.

Otto-san, I have no intention of being the kind of helpless child you think I am.”

Otto: “—. That is.”

Petra: “I believe I can be of proper assistance. For instance…”

Saying that, Petra tightly squeezed the hand of the baffled Otto. Then her small hand gave off a white glow, which then permeated through Otto.

At that moment, the ringing in Otto’s head abated slightly.

Otto: “Is this… Yang magic?”

Petra: “It’s part of the magic that I have been learning from the Master. Even though it is just the absolute basics.”

Otto: “…”

Petra: “Otto-san, I also know the time calls for unreasonable actions. But, that doesn’t mean taking on more suffering is an admirable thing to do.”

Otto, who had been determined to put himself in harm’s way earlier, held his breath at Petra’s words.

Petra sighed a little at the sight of Otto,

Petra: “Even though that’s the kind of thing that Otto-san would always say. I won’t tell everyone, Otto-san, but you’ve been fretting all along, haven’t you?”

Otto: “Um.”

Petra: “You have been angry the whole time. I know how you feel, but your voice and attitude are too harsh.”

Hearing that, Otto bowed his head and could not even make a sound.

As Petra had said, Otto had made some uncharacteristic misjudgments as if he got stuck in a vicious cycle of misunderstandings.

Through Petra's small hands, he felt that he could grasp what she was trying to say.

Otto: "The admirable thing to do is not getting a nose bleed, but getting done what you need to."

Petra: "Yes. What would you like to do, Otto-san?"

While holding the hand of the still sighing Otto, Petra lifted hers,

Petra: "If I'm present, you can do your best more efficiently. And yet, you want me to stand back because it's something children are not supposed to see?"

Otto: "That is a bad way to put it!"

Petra: "Would you like me to back off?"

With a smirk on her face, Petra put pressure on Otto. He had succumbed to that pressure. Giving in willingly to it, Otto let out a long sigh.

Otto: "…"

Even now, countless "voices" popped in as soon as he opened a channel. Just when he was about to be washed away in the midst of the furious momentum, Petra's hands held onto Otto into place.

A little more, distantly, many, just so you might listen to them, or so they would have you believe.

Otto: "I will have Frederica scold both of us later."

Petra: "Yes! I'm glad to hear Otto-san say that he would rather have a nosebleed with me than have a nosebleed alone. I don't like nosebleeds, though!"

Otto smiled radiantly and closed his eyes at the sight of Petra, who had decided to help him.

There was no way that this clever girl could not have noticed the slight tremor in his tightly clenched hands.

It was Petra’s first time seeing war, a battlefield where her loved ones were involved, and the safety of her friends who were sent away was in jeopardy, and she wished she could do something about it.

Imagine their thoughts. —Use the hand at my disposal when I can. Be a merchant.

Otto: “Petra-chan, please lend me your hand. —I will control the channels on this battlefield.”

Petra: “We will control them!”

Otto chuckled at Petra’s brisk reply, “Well, then”, he replied, and opened the channels to dive back into the cradle of hell.

—So Otto returned to his nostalgic hometown, with the only difference being that he was no longer as lonely as he once was.

Chapter 91: Racing Across the Battlefield

1

She took off her robe and stretched out her arms and legs that always tried to stay ladylike.

???: “…”

She kicked the ground strongly and sent her supple body flying forward. The feeling of the gallant golden hair cutting through the wind was pleasant, and she cautioned herself in her mind as she ran across the grass.

This was a battlefield, a place where many lives would collide with each other, a terminus for lives that would be scattered.

Even though she knew this in her head, the scent of blood that slipped through her nostrils and the numerous fighting spirits that reached her through the air threatened to embolden Frederica, who had turned into a beast.

Frederica: “It is unpleasant…”

Without looking away from her exuberance, Frederica muttered with an emotion detached from her instincts.

Fortunately or not, Frederica had not suffered any notable disasters despite being a member of the camp and standing beside the great vortex.

Certainly, no disaster had passed that was comparable to when the old Roswaal mansion burned, where she and Garfiel had met for the first time in over a decade, during the fight with Meili and her female partner at that time. In the truest sense, it was such a desperate battleground where she barely escaped with her life.

It was precisely because she had lived those relatively peaceful times, that she realized, whether she liked it or not.

That the blood that flowed within her, the mixture of human and beastly natures, was biased. Without sufficient awareness and consciousness, it would be easy to lose sight of what was important to her.

What troubled Frederica was a kind of fate tied to her half-beast body.

An instinctual appeal that her brother Garfiel could unconsciously control at a high level. Frederica was very annoyed with her own inability to control it.

The source of the blood that shaped her seemed terribly vile and merciless—.

Frederica: "—I do not have time to feel sorry for myself. When Garf and Emilia-sama, as well as Petra and Otto-sama, are doing their best."

Finishing the conversation within herself, Frederica faced forward while snapping her animalized limbs.

Both the exuberance that swayed her and the anxiety about the uncertain future were negative emotions induced by Frederica's own uncertain position within her camp.

—Naturally, Frederica and her comrades were represented by Emilia.

Although each one in the group had their own opinions on their strategy, Emilia would ultimately make the final decision. Moreover, Emilia herself was a powerful Spiritual Arts User and could be relied upon in a fight.

Garfiel was perfectly competent as a military officer, and Otto set the course with his excellent judgment even in a neighboring country that had entered a state of war. Both Garfiel and Otto were a little overwhelmed by Subaru's absence, but the former sought opportunities to vent on the battlefield, while Petra handled the latter well.

Frederica: “If she becomes too dependable, I will feel desolate as well.”

Although she mumbled sulkily, Frederica was proud of the growth of the girl she loved like a little sister. That it was accompanied by a feeling of loneliness was kind of her being softened.

Otto, using his Divine Protection of the Soul of Language and listening to every living thing around the battlefield, had probably gained the most information in this great upheaval.

Petra, standing by his side, was applying her newly learned yang magic—which would improve both physical and mental functions, to herself and Otto, reducing the repercussions of overuse of his Divine Protection while also helping them discern the information he gathered.

Petra, who had been learning as a new maid under herself for the past year, had grown incredibly through her own tireless efforts, in addition to her memory and her ability to complete tasks.

In terms of her level of growth, she probably was the best in the camp, surpassing even Emilia and Subaru.

While still young and forbidden to step onto the battlefield because of her immaturity, she didn’t waste away and instead sought a role, supporting Otto, who was in peril, and fulfilling her unique role.

She was proud. While at the same time, reflecting back on herself.

Unable to fight like Emilia and Garfiel, she had neither the intelligence nor the ability to assist like Otto and Petra.

What could she, one who simply ran across the battlefield as a beast, suppressing her burning instincts, do.

Frederica: “…”

Use your Divine Protection to the fullest and dominate this battlefield.

That is what Otto was prepared to do and, in fact, Frederica believed was happening. Thanks to Otto's efforts, which leaned on Petra's assistance and minimized thinking about the future, the collected information was brought to Abel's headquarters one after another.

The tactics that could be assembled expanded once Abel was able to grasp the currently ongoing events and progression of things, and the battle of the rebel army progressed. —Certainly, to his advantage.

Of course, Abel's instructions did not reach all of the rebel army.

The other rebels, who had begun fighting without waiting for the arrival of his group, which included Emilia and her party from the fortified city, showed no signs of coordination or cooperation.

However, it was Otto's and Abel's opinion that this frustrating situation would not last forever, and signs of that were already beginning to appear.

Carried away by the momentum of the uprising, the ones who met the rebels that had attacked the Imperial Capital in one fell swoop were the elite chosen by the Emperor who ruled the Empire, the "monsters".

The rebels would have been hit head-on with their strength and were shocked and horrified from it.

They're holding the expectation that if they could only get them out of the state where they can only see the enemy in front of them, and the glory that laid ahead, they would listen to their side.

During the frustrating time until that happened, Frederica could only—

Frederica: "—I found you! Taritta-sama!"

Taritta: "—Hk?! What?!"

A moment later, Frederica rushed over to the person she was looking for in the fast-changing battlefield.

Taritta turned around and widened her eyes in shock at the sight of the four-legged beast running furiously, kicking at the grass. However, her agitation was short-lived as she picked up her bow with a terrifyingly cold eye, the tip of the nocked arrow was pointed unhesitantly at Frederica and—

???: “Wait, Taritta. It’s an ally.”

It was Mizelda, holding down her sister’s bow from above, who saved Frederica from being nearly shot through. Seeing Taritta’s eyes widen at her sister’s words, Frederica landed on her feet and apologized in a loud voice, “I am so sorry!”

Frederica: “Please excuse my appearance. I am Frederica.”

Mizelda: “I see, it’s you, huh. —That is a beautiful beast transformation. If I didn’t know it was you, I’d want to skin you and display your fur in the village.”

Frederica: “I-, I should take that as a complement, right? Ahem, I have something to tell you. —This is a message from the head of the main camp, Abel-sama.”

Facing Mizelda, who had crossed her arms, Frederica went straight to the point despite feeling troubled by her praise.

Frederica turned into a beast and ran across the hellfire raining down on the battlefield, to serve as a messenger. She had come to pass along the information that Abel had scrutinized which had been gathered by Petra’s supporter, Otto.

Mizelda: “From Abel… what did he say?”

Wary of the presence of the enemies guarding the star-shaped citadel and its five bastions, and fearing a melee with the rebels who had set out ahead of her, Taritta, who had been on the offensive, leaned forward.

Although the combat power of the “People of Shudraq” was threatening, their true strength lied in their ability to fight in groups, and they could only be truly effective when they were prepared for a situation that could be described as “hunting.”

They could not take full advantage of their strength in the field on open land.

If these girls could climb over the wall, the defenses of the Imperial Capital would be quickly reduced. For that reason, the selection of the wall to attack was considered important.

And that was—

Frederica: "—At the headquarters they have concluded that the third bastion would be one we need to break through the most."

Mizelda: "The third… over there?"

After receiving the message that had been handed down, Mizelda turned her eyes to the rampart in question.

In the distance, a group of rebels had taken the lead to topple the walls, one person after another, and attempted to get over the sturdy rampart that protected the Imperial Capital of Lupugana. However, seemingly slicing through that fervor, blasts and screams mocked these approaches of recklessly leaping in and showed them how mercilessly they would be cut down.

There was no doubt that powerful beings guarding the Imperial Capital were positioned at all five bastions. However, the reason the third bastion could serve as a breakpoint was—

Mizelda: "—. Stone golems seem to be moving there."

Taritta: "Is it the Steelman? However, there should only be one of the Nine Divine Generals."

Frederica: "…"

Frederica was struck speechless at the sisters that conversed nonchalantly as they gazed at the rampart in the distance.

As a half-beast, Frederica currently had better eyesight than usual in her beast form. Even so, she could see nothing other than the cloud of dust that hung over the wall the pair were gazing at.

Even though they were a tribe that hunted to survive, she had once again felt disgusted at her lack of ability.

Mizelda: “Frederica, what did Abel and the others say about the dolls?”

Frederica: “—Ah, yes, well, Abel-sama said that they were the troops of Moguro Hagane, one of the Nine Divine Generals.”

Taritta: “Nine Divine Generals…”

Gazing off into the distance, Taritta’s cheeks stiffened after she heard those words.

Frederica painfully understood the reason for the slight tinge of anxiety in her mutterings.

Naturally, since Taritta was going to participate in the decisive battle for the Imperial Capital, she must have considered the possibility of a clash with a member of the Nine Divine Generals. However, even if one considered the possibility, there was still a certain uneasiness that could not be dispelled.

In the same manner, the fear of the Sword Saint remains even if one knew for a fact he was not there.

Mizelda: “Taritta, don’t worry.”

Taritta: “Sister…”

However, it was Mizelda who chuckled at her sister’s tense appearance. She clapped her sister on the shoulder so firmly, her powerful eyes shining brightly.

Mizelda: “Even if it’s against a Divine General, we’ll never be outdone again. If it’s that Divine General, I’ll get my revenge, and if it’s not that one, then I’ll be mad. Any questions, hm?”

Asking Taritta with a shrug of the shoulders, Mizelda showed her right leg—which had been replaced below the knee by a wooden stick.

Frederica could not decide if these were words of true madness, or if they were meant to encourage her sister—

Taritta: "—No, no questions."

Taritta blinked once, then twice, and nodded, and the next moment, with blinding speed, she drew and nocked an arrow, and shot it right over their heads.

Immediately afterward, Frederica looked up hearing cries of pain high in the sky, and saw a flying dragon spinning and falling to the ground a short distance away from the three of them.

The arrow that hit the flying dragon under its chin pierced all the way through to the top of its head, killing it. While Frederica was amazed by Taritta's overwhelming archery skills, Taritta exhaled and,

Taritta: "When the time is right, we will breach the wall ourselves. If we get past the walls, we win."

Mizelda: "So, as expected of the Chief of the Shudraq. —Frederica, what about you?"

Mizelda turned to Taritta, nodding her head in satisfaction at the determined look on her face. Frederica, who was almost overwhelmed by the pressure of the sisters, came to her senses at the mention of these words.

Frederica: "I will relay this message to the others. If all those who are willing to listen to me will gather in one place."

Mizelda: "One hole breaks the dam."

Frederica: "Yes. —One hole for a new wind."

That was the course of action the Emilia camp and Frederica must take.

Because she knew how her position still teetered on the edge within the camp, she was determined to do the best she could within the scope of the role she had been entrusted with.

Frederica: “Taritta-sama, Mizelda-sama, please have good luck in battle. Do not throw your lives away.”

Taritta: “Yes, Frederica, be careful too.”

Mizelda: “If you die, we Shudraq will pass on your pelt for generations.”

Frederica: “Unfortunately, I have no plans to give it to you!”

Freed from a little bit of tension, Frederica ran off accepting the send-off by the sisters.

Like a gale, she kicked through the grass and ran ahead to relay Abel’s instructions; the collaboration between Petra and Otto could not be in vain.

In turn, this would help Garfiel and Emilia in their struggle, and also Subaru and Rem, who might have been in the Imperial Capital.

Frederica: “But for now, I just have to keep on running.”

2

Leaving a slight trail of swaying grass and lingering shadows, the beastified Frederica disappeared.

She was a golden leopard, a four-footed beast that bore no resemblance to her original tall beautiful looks, yet was so refined that even a hunter would have to admire her beauty.

According to the information provided by Frederica, Taritta and Mizelda were ready to mobilize the Shudraq to challenge the third bastion.

And, just when she had made up her mind to do so—

???: “—Tsk, I can’t cut them down! There’s too many of them in the way!”

With a crude voice, a man with an eye patch holding twin swords dropped from the sky.

Dexterously handling his two long swords, the man slashed away the wings of a flying dragon and then jumped to the side of the other flying dragon that dropped down at the same time, cutting off its head as it tried to bite him.

A brilliant sword strike, and the one who unleashed it and turned around was—

Mizelda: “Jamal, I guess?. Your face isn’t satisfying to look at.”

Jamal: “I don’t know what you’re talking about! I’m so sick of this shit! If we don’t get into the Imperial Capital somehow, I’ll never know if Katya’s safe or not… Todd, you bastard, I hope you’re protecting her.”

Sputtering and swearing, Jamal yelled, scratching his dark brown, curly hair.

As an Imperial Soldier captured in the Fortress City, he was in the rare position of joining forces with Abel after learning of his true identity, but nonetheless he was a man of great ability—Unfortunately, his face was revealing his crude nature and did not meet Mizelda’s approval as someone caringly deeply about looks.

In any case, Taritta could not stay ignorant about how frustrated he was about his family being left behind in the Imperial Capital.

Anyhow—

Mizelda: “Regardless of us, the other rebels will probably take what they can get their hands on.”

Jamal: “I already know that! That’s why I’m going to end this ridiculous charade by chopping off the head of this fake emperor as soon as possible.”

Mizelda: “Since you are so raring to go, I’ve got some good news for you. We’re about to head to the third bastion. Word is that we have a chance to strike there.”

As Jamal stomped his feet, Mizelda revealed Frederica’s earlier message to him. Hearing this, however, Jamal frowned dubiously with a ” ‘ay what?”

Jamal: “A chance? Who told you that…”

Mizelda: “Abel, it seems.”

Jamal: “Tell me about that quickly! Oi! You guys, get ready! We’re going to the third bastion!”

Jamal was quick to switch gears, and he harshly called to the other soldiers to start assembling—those in the same situation as him who joined them in the fortified city.

His voice was loud, his will was clear, and he boasted some genuine strength. Surprisingly, he might have the makings of a “General”.

Seeing Jamal’s back, Taritta moved to catch up.

Taritta: “Sister, we also need to call Kuna and Holly to get ready… ah?”

When they called out, Taritta reflexively held her breath.

Eyes widening, she reached for something that fluttered and fell before her eyes. Just when Taritta gently reached out her hand, something white disappeared from her palm in less than a second.

It was a white light that slowly and furiously danced across the sky of the burning battlefield—No, it was a cold grain of ice, a snowflake.

Taritta: “Why is this happening?”

Mizelda: “—. Right, guess you didn’t see it, Taritta.”

Taritta: “Sister?”

Beside Taritta, who was stunned by seeing the presence of snow for the first time in her life, Mizelda nodded her head.

For some reason, unlike Taritta, Mizelda seemed to know exactly what she was seeing; in fact, she recognized it.

Mizelda: “It’s Emily.”

Taritta: “Emily…”

The name Mizelda gave belonged to a silver-haired girl in the same camp as Frederica.

It was still fresh in Taritta’s mind when she revealed herself as a half-elf, yet somehow she was the one who had caused this snow to fall. For what purpose was she doing it?

Perhaps because she had experienced something outside of her imagination, Taritta felt a slight shiver and softly hugged her own shoulders.

Mizelda: “The world out there is really that big, huh. The Shudraq’s chief and former chief come together too often, and we are left on the bottom. This snow is no different. Besides…”

Mizelda, who was looking up at the sky as snow fell, turned her gaze in the other direction. It was the grass Frederica had stepped on earlier, and the direction in which she had disappeared.

The thought of this outrageous duty to continuously carry the message of the latest information from Abel across this vast battlefield without losing your breath—

Mizelda: “—A beautiful beast keeps us alive. Wherever we go, it is the hunter’s delight.”

And, she extolled that other person, who sold herself short way too much.

Chapter 92: Rekindling Old Ties

1

—The air screamed, and the world slowed little by little.

A heat had dominated the battlefield. —No, it was not the battlefield that was dominated, but the Empire.

The heat had overtaken the entire Empire, and the land was engulfed in an unprecedented upheaval.

Many raised their voices, raised their weapons, proclaimed their ideals, and heated their enthusiasm.

It propagated outward, becoming bigger, wider, faster, stronger, and hotter.

The heat was one that had been smoldering in the hearts and minds of Vollachia's citizens for many years.

It is a heat that has been endlessly pushed into a box, losing its opportunity to dissipate. Nevertheless, the trapped heat continued to grow stronger during that time, and it finally exploded when it found an opportunity.

Things that had started that way, in and of themselves, were not to be denied.

There are many different ways of thinking where many people live. In addition, different countries have different ways of thinking, and different ways of living are rooted in different kinds of soil, water, and air.

No matter how much one meddles in, no one would listen to one's complaints.

Therefore, it was out of place to talk about right and wrong here.

In such a place where so many things were intertwined, if there was only one thing that could be said,

That will be—

???: "—I, reaaally hate this."

The voice murmured literally changed the atmosphere of the battlefield.

The farmlands, grasslands, and the expanse of green surrounding the Imperial Capital of Lupugana were covered with flakes of white snow, a scene that would not have been possible in an Empire known for its warm climate.

???: "What, is this…"

It was the Weaponkin collapsed to the ground, who cried out in confusion in front of the snow they saw for the first time.

They were born with parts of their bodies made of metal, which they reworked into weapons for use on the battlefield. They challenged the Imperial Capital, and were crushed by a powerful enemy.

Just as they regrouped and prepared to take on the enemy once more with those who were still able to fight, the white scene slowly appeared.

Taken aback for a moment, they quickly turned their attention back to the battlefield.

It would have been no surprise if the enemy had taken advantage of that split-second opportunity to take their lives. However, the enemy did not seem to regard the Weaponkin as a threat anymore, and did not take advantage of the opportunity.

They pooled up their humiliation, wielded their anger in their blades, spears, and axes to destroy their enemies for the dignity of their race, and it was at this time, —That they realized that their bodies were numb and unable to move as they intended.

Again, the Vollachian Empire was a country where the climate remained warm throughout the year.

Of course, if one’s hometown was situated high in the mountains, along the border with neighboring countries, or close to the Great Waterfall, one had the opportunity to experience a different climate, but this was not the case for the Weaponkin.

That said, one could hardly blame them.

Who could possibly know to be concerned?

Who could imagine that even now, at midday on the battlefield where blue skies and sunshine were peeking through, a body heated to the point of sweating got cooled down all at once, and a freezing wind blew so hard that it made one’s blood run cold!

???: “Everybody! Get away from here! I’ll reaaally try to do my best here!”

As they forced their numb bodies to move, a voice struck the astonished Weaponkin.

In the cold air, making it difficult to even grasp a weapon, a figure could be seen moving forward with large strides across the meadow, silver hair flowing in the air.

A beautiful girl with fair skin, amethyst eyes, and a tremendously well-defined facial profile stepped forward majestically, taking the spectacle around her as a given.

As they admired the sight, the Weaponkin realized. —They understood by whom this was brought upon them.

???: “—So it’s friggin’ you again?”

The astonishment of the shivering Weaponkin continued.

As the silver-haired girl advanced forward, a voice called down to her—Madelyn Eschart, the small figure standing on top of the city wall, a dragonkin with two black horns on her head.

She was the “monster” who reigned supreme as the Ninth of the Nine Divine Generals and had crushed the Weaponkin’s battle line with a single stroke.

Looking down below in disgust, Madelyn held in her hand her Flying Winged Blade, an armament too large for her stature, yet she was a master at manipulating it, though it was heavier than it looked.

Even in an empire filled with demi-human tribes, the rare species of dragonkin was so intimidating that even a mere confrontation with them would make a weak-minded person cower and kneel.

However—

???: “Yes! It’s me again, Madelyn! A passing Spiritual Arts User, Emily!”

Emily, the girl who met the golden glare of the dragonkin, did not care about that sharp look.

An unfearful exchange, that was all that was needed for the Weaponkin to understand. They understood the disparity between the stage that they, Emily, and Madelyn were standing on, and the disparity in the height of the viewpoints they saw.

Weaponkin: “…”

There was disappointment and frustration at the reality of the situation, but immediately afterward, a welling sense of elation.

It was the anticipation of the battle that was about to unfold before their eyes, a battle that transcended human understanding.

It was about to begin. The battle of the top classes, that could never be reached simply by being born strong.

A warrior’s shiver occurred, irrespective of their blood cooling with the drop in temperature.

And then—

Madelyn: “You’re a friggin’ irritating girl. You couldn’t beat this dragon in battle the other day—”

Madelyn’s face, which could even be described as adorable, turned fiendishly serious.

Raising the Flying Winged Blade in her hand, the angry dragonkin poured all her strength into her slender arms, heedless of the extreme cold that hindered the Weaponkin’s movements.

They intuited. The moment that Flying Winged Blade was wielded, a battle that would be remembered throughout history would begin.

Emilia: “—Hiyah!”

—The next moment, a block of ice as large as a castle crashed to the ground just beyond Emily’s reach, and Madelyn’s figure on the ramparts was swallowed up in the icy shards beyond with a roar.

2

A large block of ice slammed into the rampart, and Emilia thought, “Good” in her spirit.

The battle between the rebels surrounding the Imperial Capital and the regular army trying to defend it had begun, and it left Emilia’s head in quite a mess.

Let’s do the best that we can and reduce the number of people who die by all means.

That was the policy that Emilia had set forth, a goal that her colleagues accepted without opposition, even though they knew that would be difficult.

Yet, when Emilia and the others arrived at their destination, the rebels who arrived earlier had already begun the battle.

???: “From the Imperial Capital’s point of view, they are all the same rebels, but each tribe has its own agendas. It was not a battle that began in an orderly manner, with all the tribes lining up to fight. One can understand that without even thinking about it."

Abel had said rather nasty things to the impatient Emilia, but they themselves, who had entered the battle from the fortified city, took up positions and joined the battle, albeit delayed.

Of Emilia and the others, the two main players in the battle were herself and Garfiel; Beatrice and Petra could not fight, and Otto and Frederica both had other roles to play.

It was very frustrating for Emilia, as she could only fight, but she had learned that the division of roles was very important, so she decided to leave it all up to everyone's specialties.

Abel: "Lupugana, the Imperial Capital, is surrounded by star-shaped ramparts. It is a city that is hard to attack and easy to defend. The only way to conquer the city is to capture the five bastions."

Emilia: "The five bastions?"

Abel: "It is a star-shaped wall. You can command the battlefield in depth and at a distance from these five bastions. Conversely, if we take these points, we can greatly reduce the opponent's strength. For that reason…"

Emilia: "For that reason?"

Abel: "From the rebels who strike first, we will determine the enemy's force distribution. If they can reduce the opponent's strength, even if only slightly, then that would be satisfactory."

Emilia: "Then the people who strike first will be in danger! You absolutely can't do that!"

Even though it was Abel's role to come up with a winning strategy, Emilia could not accept that approach. Hence, she had departed for battle, for the sake of capturing the much-needed bastions at the vertices of the star.

Honestly, though, she was unable to find the decisive factor as to which one she ought to rush to.

Otto: “Emily, I will tell you where to go. —I have a plan.”

As Emilia was about to take off, Otto offered to help her.

Emilia was unsure what to say to Otto, due to him looking so reckless to her that she was not sure what to say to him.

Petra: “Don’t worry, Emily. Leave him to me.”

Because Petra told her so, Emilia could believe her, and she was able to start on her way.

Garfiel: “Emily! My amazin’ self is over here! Let’s blow open a new hole!”

After pledging good luck to the spirited Garfiel and to each other, they all split up on the way to their respective bastions.

Frederica: “Emily… No, Emilia-sama, I will also be racing around for my role. Please be safe, and do not be too reckless for Subaru-sama’s sake!”

Frederica, running alongside her, turned into a beast and ran across the battlefield with blinding speed.

Everyone was scrambling to do their role.

Emilia: “I also have to work reaaally hard.”

With a strong determination in her heart, Emilia arrived at the bastion to do what needed to be done.

Closing her eyes tightly, she laid her left hand on her right hand, which was placed on her own chest. Before the battle began, Beatrice, regretting not being able to participate in the fight, had held her hand and said,

Beatrice: “It is infuriating, but Betty is asking you to take Betty’s place, in fact. After Betty, the next person who can do their best for Subaru is Emilia, I suppose.”

Emilia: “Yes, I truly want to believe that.”

Whether it was because of Beatrice's trust, or because of everyone's cooperation, Emilia's body and mind were in surprisingly good shape.

Her flustered heart and her confused mind had calmed down, and she was very calm.

Very calmly, Emilia balanced her role with what she wanted to do.

Emilia's role was to defeat Madelyn, who was guarding her bastion.

What Emilia wanted to do was to prevent as many people from dying as possible.

Madelyn and her would fight from this point on. In order to keep a lot of people from dying.

Emilia: "…"

Opening her eyes, Emilia concentrated on her gate deep inside her body, releasing all her accumulated mana at once and dropping the temperature of her surroundings at a furious pace.

Vollachia was a warm country, so many people did not like the cold, according to the studious Petra. Otto, an animal lover, also told her that flying dragons in the sky also did not like the cold.

Then again, when it got cold, it made people want to curl up, according to the siblings Garfiel and Frederica.

With everything else and with none-other than her experiences, Emilia realized.

That was—

Emilia: "When it's reaaally cold, people can't be in position to fight."

Once, at the Roswaal mansion, the one before it had burned down, the area around the mansion was completely covered in snow when Puck, before he fell asleep, had a problem releasing his mana.

The problem spread to the nearby Arlam Village and caused quite a commotion, but it remained a strange memory for Emilia, who had never felt cold in her entire life.

The experience and knowledge gained from that time were put to good use.

Emilia: “I know that I can’t easily sway everyone’s opinions or feelings regarding this fight. I wish I could talk to them and understand them better if possible, but I don’t have the time.”

Therefore, Emilia decided.

She would use force—No, she would hold everyone down with coldness.

Everyone’s fingers would get numb, they would be unable to pick up their weapon, they would be unable to use their skills with their knees shaking, their teeth would not stop chattering, their gaze would be unsteady, and their breath would be so white that they would be shocked.

If they came to realize that, then everyone would be incapable of even thinking about fighting.

And yet, if there was an opponent who still raised a strong body and mind to fight—

Emilia: “—I’ll be your opponent!”

Madelyn: “Stop messing around and don’t friggin’ get carried awaaaaaaaaaay!!”

Emilia’s cry of determination was covered over by the roar of the ice blocks that had fallen onto the ramparts.

Emilia was not surprised like others, when she heard an energetic response from Madelyn even after the direct hit by a block of ice larger than a house. It was the same as when she encountered her in Guaral a few days ago.

That time as well, the fight started the same way, with ice blocks striking her opponent.

Madelyn: “You lack skill.”

A high-pitched sound echoed through the air, and the next moment, the huge piece of ice broke in half vertically .

Emerging from behind the scattered pieces of ice was an energetic Madelyn, holding her Flying Winged Blade above her head.

The pupils of her golden eyes narrowed as she watched the shattering ice splinter into shards, particles, then reduce to mana.

Madelyn: “Even after going through an experience that terrible, you haven’t changed your mind, half-devil…”

Emilia: “An experience that terrible… That last one was a surprise, but I think Priscilla and I were about to win that fight. You shouldn’t lie.”

Madelyn: “—Hk, don’t friggin’ underestimate this dragon, half-devil!”

Madelyn bent her knees, preparing to jump off the ramparts, her eyes angry at Emilia’s rebuttal. Emilia’s eyes widened at that action, and after glancing at her surroundings,

Emilia: “Hiyah!”

She waved her arms and made an ice block rain down on Madelyn, as she had done before.

It was not even a diversion for Madelyn as expected, and was repelled and shattered by her weapon, which she raised annoyingly, rendering the attack ineffective.

However—

Emilia: “Hiyah! Hiyaah! There’s still more! Take this!”

Madelyn: “Wha—”

One after another, she created ice blocks in the sky and dropped them repeatedly onto Madelyn on the ramparts.

Since speed was prioritized over power during the process, the size of the ice was much smaller than at first, about the size of a fist at most.

Even so, if they were to hit one's head, they would undoubtedly cause tremendous pain, and Emilia's hands would produce ten, twenty, fifty, or even a hundred of them, which would then rain down on top of the ramparts.

Ice pebbles—Though, it was not as pretty as pebbles; it was an ice storm.

Madelyn: "Don't! Get carried away—!"

Against that downpouring ice storm aimed at her, Madelyn wildly fought back.

Using her whole body, which was unaffected by the cold, she used her Flying Winged Blade not as a throwing weapon, but as a swinging one, swatting down the falling storms of ice chunks.

A chain of concussions and cracking noises repeated and a flood of ice chunks rushed toward Madelyn as she sprinted along the ramparts.

Madelyn dodged, flipped, sidestepped, and spun around with the gait of a dancer, or even a gymnast, as she dodged the icy barrage.

Her mobility was also eye-popping, but it was not Emilia's purpose to hit. It was an attack that was supposed to be avoided, and its purpose was to buy time.

That was to say—

Emilia: "Everyone, get away! The fight between Madelyn and I will be dangerous for everyone around here!"

Emilia called out to the surrounding rebels as she hurled a storm of ice into the air.

The beaten Weaponkin were huddled together, seemed to be looking for a chance to recklessly join in, but they were shivering from the cold, and many of them had lost their weapons.

The difficulty in moving their limbs was extremely egregious because of what Emilia did, but she hoped that they would do their best to move those limbs and withdraw with their allies.

And then—

Emilia: "—Hk, Oh, wait, no!"

Through Emilia's monotonous attack that prioritized quantity, Madelyn's Flying Winged Blade was unleashed, breaking through the finely shattered ice pieces.

Emilia quickly dodged the Flying Winged Blade, which roared furiously as it cut through the wind, but as it circled back the battlefield with its roar, the Flying Winged Blade returned with frightening precision.

The whirlwind of death that reaped everything in its path came to Emilia, mercilessly shredding everything. Therefore, Emilia ran to prevent collateral damage on the slow-moving Weaponkin.

Emilia: "Uhyaa!!"

Emilia intervened in front of the Weaponkin, who were unable to dodge the oncoming whirlwind of death.

With her upraised foot, she kicked up the Flying Winged Blade's edge. The impact made every bone in Emilia's body creak, but she gritted her teeth and endured it without hesitation. Launching it with all her might, the blade went over the heads of Weaponkin and herself, flying toward their backs.

Emilia: "Now you can't…"

Madelyn: "Did you friggin' think it was over?"

Emilia: "—Hk"

Before she had any time to feel relief, a voice spoke from behind her.

Beyond her flowing silver hair, the Flying Winged Blade that Emilia had sent flying was grasped, Madelyn's figure brandishing the blade being reflected in her amethyst eyes.

A downwards slash, to dodge it would put everyone in danger.

Emilia: "Ice Brand Arts!!"

With no other choice except to receive the blow, Emilia immediately formed an ice sword in order to meet the Flying Winged Blade.

A duel with swords locked together, it did not turn out to be. The moment the opponent's blades came into contact, the ice sword abruptly cracked and shattered. But, that was only one of them. With a second one in the other hand, the hand losing the first blade produced a third one; even if they keep on breaking, Emilia's relentless barrage of ice swords keeps roaring out.

With a large turn, she kept on striking the side of the Flying Winged Blade, striking, barely parrying it, falling.

Emilia: "—Kyaah?!"

The Flying Winged Blade that struck down hit the ground, and a moment later, a shock wave impacted Emilia's entire body.

Hit by the same force, the Weaponkin that had failed to escape were blown far away. The Dragonkin's raw strength was absurd, even more so than the already strong Emilia.

Emilia: "Still…"

Jumping up as her body rolled, Emilia slapped her cheeks and looked in front of her.

Pulling the Flying Winged Blade from the ground, Madelyn glared in displeasure at the still lively Emilia, and then looked around.

Madelyn: “So it’s just friggin’ you? What about that woman?”

Emilia: “That woman? …Ah, do you mean Priscilla?”

Madelyn: “Do you think that this dragon would think to memorize a human’s name? I mean that friggin’ crimson woman.”

Emilia: “That’s Priscilla. I’m Emily. Priscilla has, someone she wants to meet.”

While Abel was forming his strategies back at the encampment and Emilia’s team were running across the battlefield, both Prisicilla and Al had also stepped onto the grounds of other battlefields.

However, unlike Emilia’s team who wanted to bring back Subaru and Rem, and Abel’s team who wanted to somehow overthrow the Emperor, Priscilla’s goal was hard to comprehend.

When asked, she never answered properly either.

Emilia: “Even Yorna, wouldn’t tell me what they spoke about…”

Since it was a reunion of mother and daughter, she thought that they must have had a lot to talk about.

Thinking about the day she would reunite with Puck after he eventually awakened from the magical stone around her neck, Emilia wanted to ask them for some advice.

Of course, she also just wanted to simply hear Prisicilla’s joyful tale.

Madelyn: “Would like to meet…”

Emilia: “Er, they’re somewhere on this battlefield I think. She said that it was her problem, and I also prioritized my knight but… Ah! Umm, Lady Petra’s! Knight, maybe!”

Madelyn: “…”

In the Vollachian Empire where she had to disguise her social position, Emilia hurriedly corrected herself, Madelyn looking at her suspiciously.

All the suspicions aside, Emilia was simply not good at lying. When she thought about how trying too hard would just increase the likelihood of being exposed, she just shrugged her shoulders in resignation.

Emilia: “No, that was a lie. Yes, Subaru is my knight. Sorry for tricking you.”

Madelyn: “In the first place, even if you tell me that, he isn’t even friggin’ here!”

Emilia: “Oh, really…?”

Madelyn: “What a little girl like you thinks, is completely irrelevant to this dragon. —It’s friggin’ frustrating that that crimson woman is not here, but even so, it’s friggin’ convenient.”

With these words, Madelyn’s body slowly began releasing steam.

In the cold air, dyed white by her exhaled breath, her body continued to heat up as it radiated her visibly rising fighting spirit.

As this visible fighting spirit began to pour over, Emilia instantly produced a pair of swords in her hands.

Emilia held a vigilant guard, at which Madelyn let out a savage laugh,

Madelyn: “One by one, those who make a mockery of this dragon shall be massacred.”

Her blazing golden eyes shone as she charged forward.

With a step causing the frost-covered earth to explode, the distance between them vanished in a single breath, Madelyn raised her Flying Winged Blade over her head as Emilia prepared herself.

And then—

Emilia: “Even without Priscilla, I’m not alone!”

Madelyn: “What—”

Are you saying, is what Madelyn was about to shout out.

But, an unforeseen figure did not allow her to finish as it halted the strike of the brandishing Flying Winged Blade. Madelyn opened her eyes wide at this, looking at the figure that had jumped on the Flying Winged Blade.

That was, a body that blocked the attack by colliding with it, a Natsuki Subaru made of ice—

Madelyn: “Wha…?!”

Emilia: “Hiyaa!!”

Towards the stock-still Madelyn, Emilia’s twin blades of ice thrusted forwards.

3

Battles began on the bastions of the star-shaped ramparts that surrounded the Imperial Capital, and the nature of the warfare changed.

It was almost comical how many were being eliminated by such a small force, nearly a singular force; it was like a microcosm of the Vollachian Empire, a land where the strong were revered.

No matter how many weak people gathered together, one swing of a strong person easily plucked away their hope.

In fact, even a battle that was enthusiastically labeled the “Decisive Battle of the Imperial Capital”, would result in every single rebel being cut down if left unchecked, and those with smoldering fighting spirits would become docile in a year’s time.

It was possible for that to be weeding out the rebels, but it was doubtful if that was currently the Emperor’s expectation.

Although—

Yorna: “—Even so, that would have also been the story if His Excellency the Emperor Vincent Vollachia hadn’t been ousted from the throne.”

With a kiseru in one hand, Yorna Mishigure looked down upon the battlefield and uttered a few words tinged with purple smoke.

Daring to start that small fire himself, those thoughts that had slacked during times of peace needed to be braced. It was something the Emperor would probably take care of, but it would not be something he would do by giving up the throne himself.

However, if she had not known the truth and had not been invited as one of the Nine Divine Generals who ruled over the Demon City, which side would she have joined?

Yorna: “I don’t have time for such useless sentimentality. —I have a role to play.”

Yorna quietly looked forward, abandoning the implausible alternative.

Vincent Vollachia, the true Emperor, had kept the peace in this Empire. The future under the reign of the false Emperor who ousted him, and where it would lead, was marked in a deep darkness.

Yorna believed that this was the case.

Yorna: “My beloved children and the people who live in the land of His Excellency’s beloved Empire.”

Her beloved children foolishly lost their Demon City and continued to adore her even though she failed to show the might she should have shown.

The people of the Empire loved by a man who she once loved, and who she still continued to love with undiminished affection.

Moreover, she wanted to give none other than her children, with whom she had shared her soul, a world appropriate for them to live in.

That was—

Yorna: “—I would rather have the peace of a true Emperor than a future built by a false one.”

As Yorna said this, she slowly began to swirl the earth around her as she spun her kiseru, drawing a spiral. This was Yorna’s technique of imparting the Soul Marriage Technique to inorganic objects and making them do as she willed.

A technique that others could never imitate due to the capacity of their souls—However, unlike in the Demon City, where she had spent a long and intimate time imbuing her thoughts and feelings, the soil of the Imperial Capital was slow to move.

Perhaps Yorna’s own mixed feelings about the Empire were not unrelated, though.

Yorna: “I’m sorry I am not in the best of shape, but I shall be your partner.”

In front, Yorna’s gaze looked up at the top of the ramparts, and then further above them.

The reason for that was plain and simple, her opponent who she should pierce with her gaze was higher than the ramparts and flying freely in the sky above the battlefield.

Transforming her shins into flames, the Spirit Eater concealed the destruction contained within her slender body—.

???: “—Yorna.”

Yorna: “General First-Class Arakiya, you are still fighting as flamboyantly as ever. Even from a distance, I could recognize you at a glance.”

The brown-skinned dog person with a tree branch in one hand and an eye patch over her left eye—Arakiya.

She casted a wary eye at Yorna, who appeared below her, and while her skin scorched with hostility, Yorna looked around her surroundings, narrowing her eyes at the burnt farmland.

It was at this bastion, Arakiya's, that there was the most flamboyant of interceptions in response to the rebels' attack.

Of course, this was due to the fact that she herself was powerful, but perhaps it was also meant to show off her power to those around her.

Yorna was not the only one who had spotted Arakiya at first glance as the guardian of this bastion.

Even if one of the military men did not know who Arakiya really was, it was easy to recognize that she had tremendous power.

More than just Arakiya's own aims, that was—

???: "Did somebody put that idea in your head, Arakiya?"

Arakiya: "—Hk."

Yorna: "You…"

Behind her, stepping onto the black grassy field that had been burnt to a crisp, the voice of the arrived person shook the battlefield.

Both Arakiya and Yorna gasped, and their eyes widened. Yorna raised her eyebrows at the appearance of a voice that should not have been audible, but was.

And then, walking far enough to Yorna's side so she did not need to turn around,

???: "What is it, Dear Mother? Even after having died once, are you still unable to let go of your child?"

Thus, opening the fan in her hand with a sound, the crimson-eyed Priscilla cruelly laughed.

Yorna was caught off guard at that unexpected appearance and the words that followed, and she spilled out a long sigh.

Yorna: "Prisca, it is natural that you cannot forgive me, but…"

Priscilla: “Unfortunately, the girl who bore that name is dead. If you are concerned about her, it would do you well to visit her grave. Mine name is Priscilla Barielle. Strive not to get it wrong.”

Yorna: “—. Was it not that Abel had said that this place was to be entrusted to me?”

Priscilla: “Was it not that at the same meeting where I said mineself shall not do what Abel tells me to?”

Priscilla, who had a comeback for every remark, responded mercilessly, and Yorna was at a loss at Priscilla’s attitude. However, Priscilla snorted with a “Hmph”, and the smile on her face disappeared.

Immediately after, her crimson gaze shifted towards Arakiya overhead.

Arakiya was one of the strongest Divine Generals, and Yorna was assigned to be her opponent because it was understood by everyone that no one but Yorna would be a match for her.

Nevertheless, the prudent Priscilla came to this place because she had a reason to confront Arakiya regardless of such factors as strength and tactics.

As evidence of that, Arakiya was clearly shaken by Priscilla’s entrance.

Even in front of Yorna, her expression, somewhat detached from the world, did not waver, but as soon as she saw Priscilla, her mask crumbled.

That was unmistakable proof of the special relationship between Priscilla and Arakiya,

Priscilla: “Arakiya, have you made up your mind?”

Priscilla’s profile was sagacious as she asked the question, her gaze so sharp that she looked as if she was about to kill the target of her gaze. However, the words spun by her lips somehow felt gentle and even benevolent.

A harshly embellished gentle question, to which Arakiya caught her breath and nodded.

Arakiya: “I’ll take back the Princess. —I’ll kill His Excellency… the Princess is the real Emperor.”

Priscilla: “You desire a formal resolution of the “Imperial Selection Ceremony”? That shall do fine.”

Hearing Arakiya’s answer, Priscilla closed the fan in her hand. She tucked it into her cleavage, raised her empty hand to the sky, and pulled her treasured sword of crimson out of thin air.

The heat emitted around the blade was such that the air seemed to waver, it was the Yang Sword that only the Emperor of Vollachia was permitted to wield—Unconsciously, Yorna gazed at it in admiration.

It was as if an image of Yorna’s beloved man, who once wielded that treasured sword of deep crimson, came back to her behind her eyelids.

Priscilla: “This is no time to admire, Dear Mother.”

Yorna: “—. All of those selfish ramblings… Although I was not the one who raised you, why did you grow up to be this way?”

Priscilla: “Well, now. There is no particular reason why I am mineself. Additionally, there was one thing I failed to tell you.”

At Priscilla’s sidelong glance as she readied the Yang Sword, Yorna’s whole body tensed up, and she, too, entered a fighting stance. Having adopted that posture, Yorna turned to her daughter with a questioning look in her eyes.

Without meeting her gaze, Priscilla pointed the tip of her Yang Sword at Arakiya, and,

Priscilla: “She is my foster sister. Dear Mother, after your death, she was raised together with mineself as if we were sisters. Now, it seems her goal is to place mineself on the throne.”

Yorna: “Wha…”

Priscilla: “It’s coming.”

Yorna’s eyes widened at the revelation, and the unsympathetic pronouncement was made almost simultaneously.

Swelling flames covered the sky, and in order to turn the already burnt field into grounds of scorched earth, that enormous heat rained down.

Beyond that, painting the world a color of red, Arakiya shouted.

Arakiya: “I will take the Princess back, with my own power!! — That’s what I’ve been told.”

4

Gazing from afar at the flames controlled by Arakiya’s excessively setting the world ablaze, Todd Fang sensed that the atmosphere of the battlefield was changing with the direction of the wind.

Todd: “—There’s no doubt that the first move was effective, but…”

The great firepower broke the fighting spirit of the invading rebels, and the first invaders would always be people who were recognized for their ability.

There was no way that a group could maintain its morale while it was being burned without any way to do anything about it.

Hence, of the five bastions protecting the star-shaped ramparts, he had guessed that the bastion with Arakiya, which he had been assigned to, was the safest, and the place where the enemy’s attack would be weakened.

In fact, Todd’s judgement proved true, and after the Cyclops Tribe that had bravely marched in was wiped out, the attack of the rebels, fearing Arakiya, was in tatters, and the battle was practically won.

The cause for this change of mood was the repelled first group of rebels being joined by a second group that had arrived late.

After being struck on the head and losing their fighting strength, it seemed like the first group had been about to collapse, but they had been absorbed by the second group that had come around later, and they were attempting to restore their fighting strength.

Of course, even if the losers came together, it should not have a significant impact on the outcome, but the ones that came after brought together the group whose morale should have been broken and kept the damage to a minimum.

Thinking that there was likely a very quick-witted commanding officer in the second group, Todd shuddered at that frightening possibility.

Todd: “No way, was arriving late also part of their plan?”

Without keeping an equal pace, with each person fending for themselves, the empty-headed rebel army had charged in. Seeing that painful experience of the first group, and from there the battle was about to end with the regular army’s overwhelming victory.

However, after the first group lost powerful people and grew disheartened, when they had their hot-headedness cooled, the nuisances that did not have the ability to listen to a discussion had been completely lost.

In that case, to snatch a victory in the battle they had undertaken, the group had no choice but to join the ranks of the other party for a better chance of success and frantically perform for the sake of receiving a share of the leftovers.

Todd: “Rather than the vanguard, which was full of idiots, is the second group the true contender?”

Even when it came to taking on Arakiya as an opponent in battle, the true contender was likely to have countermeasures prepared.

It was hard to imagine that Arakiya would be defeated, but Todd did not think an opponent who could calculate to this extent would come without plans in hand for an assault on the Imperial Capital.

There were some sort of preparations for not only Arakiya, but also the guardians of the other bastions as well.

In addition, other than those guarding the bastions, the soldiers of the regular army, whose role should have been only to hunt the survivors, were starting to spend time on the rebel's movements, even if it was not a hard fight.

It felt troublesome, as if eyes and ears that could reach great distances, and even skillful limbs were following the brain of a demonic enemy.

It would be best to leave the strong enemies to Arakiya and the guardians.

However, Todd thought that the truly troublesome enemy in this conflict was something else.

Therefore—

Todd: "—I've got to deal with the guy who is up to no good."

Chapter 93:
The Stone Army

1

An arrow pierced the head that had no eyes, ears, or a nose, and the golem, made of stone, was thrown a great deal backwards.

However, the head, without any human-like parts, could not be a human-like vital point, so the advancing enemy's footsteps were undeterred, whether it was pierced by an arrow or part of its head was missing.

???: "If crushing its head ain't enough… Holly!"

Holly: "Got it~!"

Shuffling, the stone golems rushed towards them with outstretched hands.

The sight of them, no bigger than human beings, coming at them with their inhuman movements evoked a sense of disgust. Channeling that antipathy into her fingers as she drew the bowstring, the strong bow made a sound like a thunderclap.

Three arrows were released at the same time. They struck the stone golem's torso, not piercing it nor hitting a critical point, but smashing it to pieces, stopping the golem's movement.

If its whole body were broken to pieces, even the stone golem would cease to move.

However—

???: "With this amount, you can't take them out one by one!"

Kuna looked up to reach the target rampart, the third bastion, which she had been told was a hole in the enemy's formation, but when she managed to reach it, the number and nature of the enemy soldiers deployed made her feel hopeless.

The third bastion was supposed to be guarded by Moguro Hagane, one of the Nine Divine Generals.

Fortunately, Moguro themself was not visible on the rampart. Was it because they had not reached Moguro yet, or was Moguro themself somewhere else?

Either way—

Holly: “It’s as if they’re ants gathered around a tree’s sap~! I can’t knock them down like this~!”

Kuna: “This is no time for your whining! Shoot, shoot, shoot, shoot! Shoot as many as you can!”

Holly: “Geez~! Kuna, you’re so strict~!”

Raising her voice in a way similar to a shriek, Holly pulled an arrow from the quiver on Kuna’s back and fired them one after another from her powerful bow. Two or three stone golems were destroyed with each shot, but that was not enough to keep up with the number of enemies.

—Because there were hundreds, thousands even, of stone golems, too many to count.

Kuna: “Tsk, what are we supposed to do…!”

Clicking her tongue and distancing herself from the enemy, Kuna cursed Abel for giving her these orders.

She only knew of them from rumors, but Moguro Hagane was a special kind of demi-human called a “Steelfolk”. Unlike the Weaponkin, whose bodies were only partially made of metal, she had heard that they were existences whose bodies were entirely made out of minerals.

In that case, were all the countless stone golems in front of them also Steelfolk.

Holly: “They all look so lifeless~! They really look like dolls~!”

Kuna: “I have the same opinion! What kind of a gimmick do these guys have?”

While maintaining a moderate distance, she glared at her surroundings and looked at the crowd of stone golems. Thanks to their lack of eyes, the stone golems did not seem to have any self-consciousness.

They simply surrounded those who approached them, beating and bludgeoning them to death with their tough limbs and monstrous strength. Those who had been unable to escape were caught up to, and died tragically as they were exposed to the violence of the sheer numbers.

The rebels who challenged the third bastion and were trampled by the hordes of stone golems would have literally had their corpses stepped over, and their remains would not have remained intact outside of the shape of their formation. And this was not an event that Kuna and the others could laugh at as if it were someone else’s problem.

If they continued as they were, they would be trampled by an overwhelming number of enemies, unable to stand a chance against them.

Before that happened—

Kuna: “If things get really bad, we’re going to have to retreat, but…”

Holly: “Hey! Kuna! Look at that~!”

Kuna: “Huh?”

Both of them were forced to stomp the grass of the farmland that had now become a battlefield and shoot while running away. As Kuna turned around at the sound of Holly’s voice, something surprising entered her field of vision.

A figure stood still on the battlefield, and then the stone golem rushed in and slammed their stone arms down on them. It seemed as if the target would be knocked down by the blow and left to die in a puddle of blood—

???: “—Don’t get in my way, you stone golem!!”

It was Mizelda who howled, her ferocious beauty contorted in anger.

As she shouted angrily, she swung her club held in both her hands, crushing the head and upper body of the stone golem that had leapt towards her, effectively beating it at its own game.

—No, she was not the only one who had chosen to attack the stone golems rather than run away from them.

???: “Get out of my way, get out of my way, get the fuck out of my way! You’re all shame of the Empire who don’t understand the authority of His Excellency the Emperor, so don’t fucking get in my way!”

The slash was released with a guttural cry, and it brilliantly separated the stone golem’s neck and torso, and further split the flying head vertically in mid-air. If that was not enough, he slashed the torso diagonally, slashed off the arm from the shoulder, and when he saw that it had stopped moving, he kicked it down and moved on to the next one.

A rough-looking man with an eye patch similarly dove into the stone golems, as Mizelda had.

The relentless attack power of these two attackers in hand-to-hand combat thwarted the stone golem’s ability to launch an attack.

But what truly stunned Kuna and Holly was not either of them.

Kuna & Holly: “…”

A powerful sword roared, and mowing down the stone golems , it blew them away.

It was a rough and violent slash that could hardly be described as brilliant. However, it was the most appropriate swordsmanship to use against the stone golems that needed to be destroyed in order to keep them suppressed.

Swinging that sword and burying the onrushing horde of stone golems was a red-haired swordsman—A man who she only knew as a follower of the proud and haughty Priscilla, Heinkel.

A man who looked somewhat dead inside had joined the war front before anyone could notice, and cut down the stone golems one after another without speaking, the scene lacked a sense of reality, much like a nightmare on a night of poor sleep.

Looking only at the events that were taking place, regardless of whether they were circumstances that Kuna and Holly should welcome, they were unsure of whether they should accept it with delight, and there were negative thoughts swirling around in them.

Surely the reason for this was the expression of Heinkel's face as he wielded his sword.

Holly: "It seems like it's full of pain~."

After witnessing the same thing, Kuna could not help but agree with Holly's mutterings.

She could not understand Holly's thoughts as the latter expressed that, but from Kuna's eyes, it looked more like he wanted to die.

Sometimes, warriors would head to the battlefield in search of a place to die.

Even in Shudraq, there were times when those without much longer to live would choose their final moments by taking a bow and challenging the large creatures hidden deep in the forest.

It was probably not an ending that Kuna would choose, but she could understand such thoughts.

However, those of Heinkel's were different from those of a warrior seeking a place to die.

Wanting death while fearing death, the figure that fiercely fought against death only exacerbated how pathetic it was to look at. Even though she knew his presence was dominantly supporting the warfront, Kuna wished for him to collapse and die right away.

He was a man who swung a sword surrounded in melancholy to the extent that it made those around him think that.

???: “Kuna! Holly!”

With those words, the mood of the battlefield still continued to shift, ignoring that mental image Kuna and the others had.

The one who called their names and overtook them as if she was flying through the grassland was Taritta. Carrying her quiver on her back and having returned to the typical Shudraqian attire, she arrived in front of the two of them,

Taritta: “It’s dangerous to stop moving. This is the path Sister and Jamal have created.”

Kuna: “I understand that even without you telling me, Chieftain. …I was just a little bit distracted.”

Taritta: “Heinkel, was it?”

Looking at her fondly, Taritta perfectly guessed Kuna’s embarrassed, gloomy feelings.

Taritta was Mizelda’s younger sister, and she succeeded her as Chieftain of the People of Shudraq. Previously she was shy and indecisive, a girl that had stood out for being more cowardly than careful.

However, as a condition for taking over as Chieftain, the experience of going along on the journey to the Demon City of Chaosflame seemed to have been significant, quieting that cowardice and leading her to acquire a refined strength.

Her pointing things out now had also probably accompanied that.

Holly: “Chieftain, don’t you find it creepy~?”

Taritta: “I think creepy is too direct, but…If it’s true that he’s desperate, and that he will become our war strength, then I have no objection to fighting alongside him."

Kuna: "What a magnificent answer. …That's fine with me too."

Even though there were things that were unaccounted for, there was no need to account for them at this moment.

Originally, Taritta was good at changing her approach in hunting situations, if not in everyday life. Now, as the Chieftain, she could successfully adjust to any situation.

As Kuna evaluated the situation, Taritta looked at the quiver on her back,

Taritta: "The number of arrows left has decreased a lot. While we have the chance, let's collect the fallen arrows. It'd be best not to use too many arrows on one person."

Kuna: "In theory, yes, but…"

Holly: "I can't seem to kill them in one shot~!"

Taritta: "There is a trick to dropping them in one shot. Aim for the heart. —Like this."

Before the struggling duo, Taritta quickly fired three arrows from her bow. As three stone golems approached Mizelda's back in the distance, the arrows pierced the three bodies through their back, head, and thigh, killing them.

Kuna: "Wait, wait, wait! Why did they die in one shot?! The heart?"

Holly: "They're stone golems, so I don't know where their hearts are~"

Taritta: "Is-Is that so? If you look closely, I think you can see where their vital spots are, but…"

Taritta's brow lowered with a troubled expression as Kuna and Holly pressed her.

Apparently, she really did not do much more than look closely. Taritta was indeed Mizelda's sister, although her personality was so opposite to hers that it was difficult to tell.

As one of the People of Shudraq, Kuna was proud of the high degree of purity in her Chieftain sisters.

Kuna: "Since that consultation wasn't helpful, let's do this our way. Pick up arrows, and if there aren't enough, use a club or whatever. Then, we'll beat the enemy to death."

Holly: "Let's put an end to this doll game~!"

Taritta: "I think that's the spirit. But, at some point, the real Divine General is going to come out of the woodwork. …As was the case with Yorna, the Nine Divine Generals are anything but standard. Be very careful."

Holly: "You should probably tell that to Mizelda~."

At the serious-faced Taritta's opinion, Kuna shrugged her chin at Mizelda, who was already rampaging on the front lines.

The former Chieftain, who had a prosthetic leg, had given up her position to her sister and was now running rampant with her lightweight physique. At this rate, if the Divine General were to appear from the enemy lines, she would be the first to collide with them.

Even without one leg, Mizelda was capable of putting up a good fight against any serious challenger—

Taritta: "Sister, please don't go too far! You will die if you are alone!"

Mizelda: "…"

Taritta shouted, taking a single shot at the head of a stone golem blocking the way ahead of Mizelda. At the sound of Taritta's voice, Mizelda gave a big wave of her hand, communicating that she understood what was happening.

Kuna was genuinely surprised and impressed by Taritta's judgment in her statement.

Taritta had truly stopped hiding behind her sister's back.

Kuna: "I didn't see what happened at that time with Mariuli, but…"

Holly: "Taritta, you're flourishing, so we're also happy for you~."

Taritta: "Is this really the time to say that?! Both of you, please go fight!"

Holly shot the stone golems that surrounded them with her bow, Kuna bashed them with her short hatchet as she gave a remark, and in response, Taritta said that with a sharp voice.

Kuna and Holly nodded to each other and obeyed without hesitation at the direction of their ever-reliable Chieftain.

A Covenant of old, a promise exchanged between a former Emperor of Vollachia and the People of Shudraq, a promise that was now far removed from the present, which Kuna and the others could not be blamed for having forgotten.

This battle began to fulfill that, however, it was now certainly a battle that Kuna and Holly, as People of Shudraq, absolutely must gain victory in.

2

Stone golems charged directly towards him.

Without faces, they had neither hostile intent, nor intent to kill. Swinging his sword at those opponents, while cursing the puppeteer who had inconsiderately chosen those golems, Heinkel Astrea looked out onto the battlefield.

For what reason, was he swinging his sword in the vast lands of the Empire?

For what reason, was he still swinging his sword after exposing so much of his shame?

For what reason, on the lands where the person who must see him being useful was not present, was he there?

Heinkel: “—Hk.”

Slashing upwards from the elbows of those extended arms, the upper body of his opponent was blown away by the aftermath of the attack.

The opponents were stone golems, and above not being able to dampen their fighting strength by merely cutting off their head or limbs, what was required more than a refined swordsmanship was to drive the opponent into a position where they could no longer do anything, an attack akin to that of a barbaric tribe.

Changing his grip on his sword, he spread his legs wide and decided on a stance.

He unleashed the sword he had readied by his waist, and it obliterated the stone golems in its path to an amusing extent. It was not amusing. There was nothing about this that was amusing.

He had no such memories of the sword ever being enjoyable to swing.

For him, the sword had never been anything but a shackle that was heavier than it appeared.

Heinkel: “Fuck.”

While spewing curses, he landed a blow on the enemy that had entered his sword’s range.

Filling his head was nothing but the doubts of “For what reason,” and blowing away all those hindrances in the way of his vision, he swung his sword. He swung it. He swung, swung, swung, and swung it about—.

Heinkel: “Fucking hell.”

Free your mind from all obstructive thoughts, such was how he had been instructed during his training with the sword.

Strengthen your concentration, become free from obstructive thoughts, hone your skills to become one with the sword. —No matter how many times he was told this, he had no idea what the instruction was trying to say.

Heinkel: “Fucking hell.”

He was told to not think, but if he tried to put that into practice, he would end up thinking about “not thinking,” so there was no way his mind could become free from obstructions.

Completely focusing on nothing but the sword, how could humans do such a thing?

If one lived, they would get hungry. They would also breathe. They would probably feel itches in their body, and also get assailed by drowsiness. Their worries would be endless, and their families would always present in the corners of their minds. Anxiety about tomorrow and anxiety about ten seconds later never ceased, and the failures from ten seconds earlier, let alone the failures from yesterday, and failures from even before that were things they eternally worried about. Piling up, on and on, on and on, the thoughts were everlasting.

How could one possibly become free from obstructive thoughts?

Completely cutting off the thoughts that were naturally born from human activity, such a thing was surely unthinkable for a human. In that case, was a swordsman who could free themself of obstructive thoughts not truly human?

Was that why he was not truly a swordsman?

Heinkel: “Fucking hell goddammit!”

That limitless stream of profanity, no matter how much he let out, it could not disappear from his mind.

As if to mow that all down in one go, Heinkel recklessly swung his sword, and proceeded to turn the stone golems blocking his way into a mountain of gravel.

Just how much value was there in these actions?

Failing to do the things he had to do in the place he had to do them, and letting the person he wanted to win favor with clean up his mess, in the end he owed a debt to yet another person who helped him survive.

Doing these kinds of actions over and over, just how much would he be recompensed, and for what?

???: “Sorry Pops, but my amazin’ self ain’t got any idea about what yer dealin’ with.”

In his head, mixed in with his own profanity, he heard the voice of another person.

Still young, the voice that he heard could even be called unripe, and it had been from he was drunk on the lookout platform. Even though he expressed that he did not want to speak with anyone and had secluded himself, it was the voice of the boy who had tactlessly barged in back then.

???: “I ain’t got any idea about if ya failed, nor how badly ya messed up either. But ya know, if it’s an experience of failing, then my amazin’ self has also got that.”

After chasing him away once by saying careless things, the boy started to show up again and again.

Then, even though he himself also had a face which seemed to hold doubts, he tried to interject into Heinkel’s worries and things had become like this.

That was also terribly childish and cheap, those naive and idealistic ideas made him want to laugh scornfully.

???: “There ain’t no one but yerself who can make a distinction of what ya’ve messed up. That’s why I’ve been tellin’ ya Pops, if yer gonna do it—”

Heinkel: “Shut the fuck up, you damn shitty brat!!”

Encouragement or consolement, pity or sympathy, whatever it was, he did not care.

Everything directed towards him was troublesome, and there was absolutely nothing that he desired from them. There was not even a single thing he desired from other people. There was nothing he desired. There was just a person who he wanted to offer this to.

There was value in what he would receive from that person. So, everything other than what he would receive from that person, were merely stone weights which he would drag as he walked.

Heinkel: "—Hk."

The ominous stone golems silently creeped up, and before his eyes, he slashed them with his sword, vertically splitting two of them into two halves each. As if to take advantage of his large swing, another came flying in from the side, so he smashed its face area with the tip of the scabbard, and followed by drawing the beloved sword "Astrea" back, and skewering it for the kill.

Opponents without faces, only using moves they had been taught, if it was that kind of match, then he could cut them down no matter how many there were.

As long as he kept breathing, then he could take on ten or twenty with no problem. However, just what significance did that have?

Scoring these kind of points without even showing it to the person he must show it to, just what—

???: "—Pops, if yer gonna do it, ya gotta restore it through yer own sword."

Heinkel: "Fucking shithead…hk"

It was laughable that he was still clinging to a fading light which may or may not even be there.

On that note, he again collided with the notion of why he was even still living.

Just what did he want to prove through this sword? What did he want to gain? What was it that he desired?

Heinkel: "…"

When it came to the quantity of main threats, everyone in the surroundings would successively launch an attack on that.

Charging in was Heinkel, the woman from the tribe of hunters wielding a club, and also the eyepatched twin sword user who employed elegant sword skills unbefitting of his face. However, with the orders of the hunter tribe's Chieftain, who mainly used a bow, the warfront was resolutely upheaved, and the other rebels who had once stepped aside had each regained their spirit.

A hole in the enemy's line of defense, pointing that out had been worthwhile.

Compared to the other four bastions, it was evident that just this bastion had a weak defense. The fact that Heinkel could cut his way through was proof of that.

One person, indeed, if there was even one person who was truly strong, then it would be impossible for Heinkel to lead the charge like this.

???: "Follow after that back—!"

???: "Don't let the red-haired man get all the achievements! We'll also push forward!"

???: "That swordsmanship isn't too bad. If he shaved his beard, his face would become more visually appealing."

Lagging behind Heinkel, who led the charge, the many people raising their voices were unthinkable.

He did not have the time to be captivated by them as a phony.

Heinkel: "Fucking hell… bring it on, bring it the fuck on! With just this, I won't even be able to…"

Score points, trying to accept the situation before his eyes more severely, more pragmatically, Heinkel lifted his head.

The stone golems standing directly opposite him, their formation was blown away from a sidewards sword slash, and trying to look at the imminent ramparts, he funneled power into his knees as he leaped towards them.

Immediately taking hold of the ramparts, if he eradicated the enemies atop the wall, then the capture of the third bastion—to be clear, it was not that he would slay some enemy General, so would it really be a contribution?

So then, to compensate for his failure in that Fortress City, would Heinkel be the one to connect the spider threads of what Priscilla wished for?

At the very least, even if it was only a little—

???: "—You, killed me, most."

Heinkel: "…"

Indeed, the moment he recklessly took hold of the ramparts, a voice struck Heinkel.

His lungs felt paralyzed, and a hoarse breath leaked out of his throat. It was not that he had suffered an attack, nor had he avoided an attack, it was just that he heard a voice.

With that alone, Heinkel's entire body trembled with fear.

The various thoughts from just before flashed through his head, about being free from obstructive thoughts, about his own desires, about recovering for his failures, they were all painted over with white, and vanished from sight.

What he did understand was what he had happened across. —A threat to which he could not do a single thing about.

That was—

???: “Killed, me, most. Therefore, I also, kill, you.”

An emotionless voice resounded, and before Heinkel’s eyes, the tall and thick wall began to change.

It was not the stone golems lined up atop the wall.

It was not the stone golems deployed to try and protect the ramparts either.

The bastion on the ramparts of the star-fortress, on the thick wall which they called the third bastion, a change arose.

Heinkel: “—ah”

In the vision of Heinkel, who leaked out breaths, countless “lights” were born upon the ramparts which stretched both to his left and right. —No, whether those could be called “lights” was a matter of divided opinion.

The “lights” born upon the ramparts, they were fist-sized orbs which glowed a bright green, and at a glance they seemed like harmless things from which no danger could be felt.

However, those had not originally been on the ramparts.

On the wall where there had been nothing, the countless “lights” from orbs had suddenly sprung up. To Heinkel, they appeared to be just like the eyes of a living thing. It seemed that all at once, he locked eyes with those “lights”.

He became frightened when simultaneously, those “lights” seemed to glare at him.

Heinkel: “Eek…”

That moment, Heinkel’s entire body froze, and his grip on the sword loosened—

???: “Fly away.”

That instant, in contrast to that monotone voice, making an unbelievable thunderous roar and clad in a strong wind, a gigantic stone fist seized the leaping Heinkel, and threw him away.

Heinkel: “Kah…”

Thoroughly beaten from head to toe, Heinkel was blown away to the sky with nothing he could do.

Similar to how he was handling the opponents of stone golems until a moment ago, the expression of being kicked around would be fitting. Heinkel was spraying blood everywhere as he soared, and then he saw it.

Within his revolving vision, the circumstances of the surface had completely changed. That was not the result of the blown away Heinkel’s consciousness being hazy, as there was a definite change that was hard to look away from—

Moguro: “—Eighth of the Nine Divine Generals, Moguro Hagane.”

It was the etiquette of a warrior on a battlefield, a grand estimation in its own introduction—however, that scale was far too abnormal.

Heinkel: “…”

The rampart of the star-fortress, which they should have captured, the third bastion itself moved.

That was unmistakably one of the Nine Divine Generals, the mighty being which introduced itself as Moguro Hagane.

SoupVEVO

Chapter 94:
Determination for the Sake of Whom

1

—A roar, like distant thunder, shook Beatrice's consciousness as she closed her eyelids.

Beatrice: "…Such an unpleasant sound, I suppose."

The little girl's faint whispering brought back memories of hearing similar sounds over and over again in her mind.

Four hundred years ago, in the age of Witches, during a time of constant warfare; it was not uncommon for large numbers of people to clash with each other, exchange blows, and fight for their lives.

Beatrice was not intimately familiar with the battlefield.

She was born and raised in the mansion of her mother, Echidna, a place free from human conflict. Even though the battles were far below her notice, they were still aggravating.

As time passed, she spent four hundred years with the book entrusted to her, during which the world outside was far from the madness of those days, although it could still be turbulent.

Yet, this once far distant madness was now close at hand.

—That being, a struggle for countless lives all around the Imperial Capital.

???: "Umm, I am worried. I am anxious."

???: "I know how you feel, Shuu. I guess Uu and the others should be leaving too?"

???: "Au! Uau! Aa, u!"

???: "Tha, that's no good! Our job is to wait! We are waiting!"

Beatrice, endeavoring to close her eyes and conserve energy, overheard the exchange.

What could be heard were the voices of children she had become quite familiar with over the past few days—Schult, Utakata, and Louis Arneb.

Beatrice and the other children were settled behind the main camp—where they waited in a tent that overlooked the battlefield from a hill, and although it sounded good to say that they protected the rear of the camp, at least Beatrice knew that this was just a pretense not to be expected of them.

Normally, it would be wise to leave non-combatants like children behind in the Fortress City.

Similarly, the non-combatants among the residents who had relocated from the Demon City with Yorna Mishigure and were unable to survive the battle, stayed away from the front lines and focused on cooperative support like logistics instead.

The reason why children did not do the same was because of their guardians.

Priscilla: “A skirmish is one thing; however, it would be pitiable to keep them at a distance when it comes to the big stage. The fringes of the battlefield shall be acceptable to me. Wherever you may be, you shall not mistake my brilliance.”

Mizelda: “Utakata is one of the Shudraq. Cowards who turn their back on the battlefield and the hunting grounds are not fit to be a member of the Shudraqian people. Naturally, they’ll be taken to the battlefield.”

These were the respective statements of Schult and Utakata’s guardians; opinions that could not be dissuaded since Schult and Utakata were both highly determined.

Both may have spoken from different morals and beliefs, but Beatrice had no right to interfere as long as the parties involved were in agreement for the time being.

To be honest, as a Great Spirit, Beatrice had not been pleased with the situation in which she and these children were being treated as a package. Nevertheless, since everyone in the camp had their own role to play, it was only logical that Beatrice was assigned here considering how restrained her actions were.

The role entrusted to her was—

Louis: “Uu, au.”

Like Schult and Utakata, Louis had also been ordered to stay behind in the tent.

Beatrice: “…”

Except her treatment was distinctly different from that of other young children.

Unlike with Schult and Utakata, there was no obvious guardian; however, the main focus was “keep an eye on a certain person”.

Of course, that was the Sin Archbishop. The danger would never diminish, no matter what those who knew her in the Empire said.

So, unlike the other children, Louis was the only one they had no choice, they could not leave her by her lonesome.

Otto: “Currently, she is a bomb with the least inclination to make a move. Beatrice-chan, I do not wish to burden you too much, but please keep an eye on her. We cannot tell Emilia-sama or Garfiel about this, at least we need to remain level-headed.”

Had been Otto’s statement before he decided to participate in the full-scale rebellion.

It may have been a precaution so that Beatrice would not be discouraged by the helplessness of having no role to play and staying in wait to conserve her energy, but it was also an unsettling statement because she started losing the ground under her feet.

The fact that he purposely tried to keep a calm look on his face was unsettling. —Both Petra and Frederica had the same concerns, so perhaps they could have done something about it.

In any case—

Beatrice: “You shouldn’t fidget around so much, in fact. Calm down, I suppose.”

Utakata: “Bae, is awake?”

Beatrice: “Betty has been awake the whole time, in fact… Also, that name you used is unpleasant, I suppose. It kind of makes one feel like they’re being Akanbe’d, in fact.”

There were no beds in the camp tent to lie on, and no lap of Emilia nor Petra to borrow either. Consequently, Utakata’s lips pouted at Beatrice, who had had her eyes closed as she sat on a simple chair.

Opening her eyes thinly at the reaction, she looked at the three restless people in the camp.

Schult was anxious, Utakata couldn’t handle the fighting spirit, and it was hard to tell what was going in Louis’s head as she impatiently bounced her shoulders at each sound of the battle.

Beatrice: “…”

Looking at the behavior alone, there appeared to be nothing suspicious about Louis.

A child who was simply hypersensitive to changes in her surroundings—other carefree people, who were unaware of the threat of Gluttony, would have inadvertently regarded them as a normal child.

But that was not the case for Beatrice.

Beatrice: “Emilia and everyone else are doing their best to help Subaru and the others, I suppose.”

The reason Emilia and her group were willing to intervene in this rebellion and fight for their lives, despite having no obligation to do so, was that they were likely to find their friends, Subaru and Rem, there.

If Beatrice was unable to fight alongside them, she would at least be able to cut down on distractions by keeping a close eye on Louis.

So, Beatrice braced herself through shallow breathing and—

Louis: “Uu?”

Beatrice: “…You, what are you up to, in fact?”

Beatrice’s lips pursed, as a small hand caressed her head. She glanced at Louis, who was looking at her with lowered eyebrows.

For a moment, her body stiffened at the risk of being touched by Louis’s hand, but she did not feel threatened by her, nor did Louis make any gesture to snatch Beatrice’s “name” away.

As far as Beatrice knew, Gluttony required calling out the other person’s “name” and eating it in order to activate the Authority, but Louis’ mouth never even uttered the right sounds to begin with.

Of course, if Louis only required awareness, there was still a possibility for her to activate the Authority; so Beatrice was nervous about Louis moving the hand that touched her head to her mouth.

If Louis ever showed the slightest gesture to eat Beatrice’s “name,” then—.

Utakata: “Bae, your face is scary. Do you still hate Lou?”

Beatrice: “What a way to comment on Betty’s adorable face, I suppose. Besides, Betty does not hate this girl, in fact… Despising would be more fitting, I suppose.”

At the sight of Beatrice glaring at Louis, Utakata pushed up both of her own eyes with her fingers while saying her face isn’t adorable and Beatrice let her true feelings come out in the end.

So yes, I find myself hating Louis.

Not just Louis, but the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony in general. —

Everything that caused Subaru and the others to suffer.

Beatrice: “Regretful, in fact.”

For the Emilia camp, and above all for Subaru, Gluttony’s biggest victim had been none other than Rem. Watching Subaru suffer over the girl who was indefinitely asleep, made Beatrice constantly regret the time wasted before she had been contracted with him; when she was indifferent to the world around her.

Wondering what could have been.

If Beatrice had opened up earlier and shown a willingness to cooperate with Subaru and the others, things might have turned out differently. Not allowing the White Whale, the Witch Cult, and the like to do whatever they wanted; Subaru would not have ended up displaying such a neverending expression of sorrow beside Rem as she continued to sleep.

That was why she decided to never let Subaru suffer like that again, and stay by his side for the rest of his life; yet here she was.

After being separated from Subaru, she could not help Emilia and the other members of the group to the fullest extent because she was forced to conserve energy. —The meaning of her existence was in tatters.

Schult: “Bea, Beatrice-chan, you can’t talk like that to Louis-sama…”

Beatrice: “Betty doesn’t feel sorry for her, I suppose. You’re being imprudent to begin with, in fact. Why do you refer to Betty as “Chan” when the others are called “Sama,” I suppose? You lack respect, in fact.”

Schult: “Ugh… I’m terribly sorry, Beatrice-chan.”

Picking up a sense of danger, Schult interjected as she stared at him.

How did Schult, who did not waver despite being terrified, see Beatrice? Could it be that he thought she was a little girl since she had been asleep all this time?

Beatrice: “In any case, do not fatigue Betty, I suppose. The whole purpose of being left here is to prevent everyone here from doing anything unnecessary, in fact. As much as a pain it is to do exactly that…”

Louis: “Uu.”

Beatrice: “It is much better than letting you run amok, I suppose.”

Beatrice grabbed Louis’s hand resting on her head and made the startled Louis sit down in the chair right next to her.

In the end, she decided to hold on to Louis’s hand and not let go of it.

Beatrice: “You too, in fact. Schult, stop moping around, and Utakata, if you do not have anything to do, just take care of your bow, I suppose. So…”

???: “—It appears that there is no need for me to interject.”

Beatrice: “Wah…?”

As she was dealing with the restless children, she suddenly heard a calm voice enter the camp tent. When she looked, she saw a man with curly hair, Zikr Osman, peeking inside.

Beatrice furrowed her brow at his appearance since he was supposed to be at the main camp, commanding alongside Abel.

Utakata: “Zee! We’ve been busy, but now you’re here! It’s time for Uu and the others!”

Beatrice: “You wish, in fact…! But what business do you have, I suppose?”

Zikr: “My apologies Miss Utakata, but it’s not your time. However, there is a possibility that we may move the camp at a later date, so I thought I would let you know in advance.”

Schult: “Moving the camp, you say?”

Zikr’s intellectual, round eyes made Schult tilt his head. Zikr nodded “yes” in response, as he pointed at the battlefield behind him.

Zikr: “Currently, we are devoting our forces to breaching the city walls, but once a bastion has been opened, we will venture forth to the Crystal Palace in the Imperial Capital. At that time, the commander must also go to the front.”

Beatrice: “Abel does not seem capable of fighting, in fact. He is safer in the rear, concentrating on giving orders, I suppose.”

Zikr: “You are right… however, then the troops will not follow us. In the case of us paving the way for His Excellency the Emperor, then no one would allow him to sit on the throne.”

Beatrice: “—. Such bothersome national ideals, in fact.”

The fundamental principle of the Vollachian Empire, was that the people of the Empire must be strong.

However, this apparently applied even to a leader taking over the nation. If the supreme leader did not possess any strength to boast of, they would be overthrown by their subordinates in the blink of an eye.

Zikr: “Yes, it’s bothersome. But that is what our homeland is about.”

Shaking his head gently, a slightly wry smile appeared on Zikr’s mouth.

It was hard for Beatrice to discern what emotions were being mixed in there. He may not have been entirely comfortable with it, but neither was he negative about it.

Schult: “Zikr-sama, could it be you are heading into battle?”

Utakata: “Zee?”

Suddenly, beside Beatrice, who was watching Zikr’s lips, Schult asked him a question, while Utakata called out to him in a quiet voice.

At the children’s gaze, Zikr raised his eyebrows slightly, then,

Zikr: “As you have guessed, I will also be participating. Even though we outnumber them, we are still at a disadvantage in terms of “generals” below General Second-Class, so we have to change that situation.”

Beatrice: “…Why is that, I suppose?”

Zikr: “—? Pardon?”

Beatrice: “Why do you bother to come here, in fact? In your position, you could have just ordered your men to do it, I suppose. What purpose is there in you showing up in front of Betty and the others, in fact?”

Zikr: “Oh, that’s what you mean.”

If one was about to head into battle, one would want to be even more focused at this point in time.

Nevertheless, Zikr showed up at a camp tent full of children, who could not be left behind on this battlefield.

When he was asked his reason, Zikr put up an embarrassed smile,

Zikr: “There are only men at the main camp since the women of Shudraq are also on the front line. If we are in need of encouragement before going into battle, only women can make you truly exhilarated.”

Beatrice: “Huh?”

Schult: “I see! Certainly, Utakata-sama and Louis-sama are here, as well as Beatrice-chan!”

Hearing his unexpected answer, Beatrice’s eyes widened. In contrast to Beatrice’s reaction, Schult looked convinced, and Utakata nodded with her short arms folded.

Then she turned to the astonished Beatrice and said,

Utakata: “Give it up. Zee, it’s been like this from the start.”

Beatrice: “It, It was a big mistake to think this guy was the only normal one, I suppose…”

The signs were there. For some reason, he was called a “coward,” and instead of trying to argue about it, he was proud of it. However, there was no reason for her to get deeply involved, so she just didn’t say anything.

As a result, Zikr’s eccentricities ended up on display at the last minute, with it resulting in an awkward situation—.

Zikr: “Besides, if you are aware of what is behind you, you have a better chance of not getting lost.”

Beatrice: “—. You, have a family, in fact?”

Zikr: “A mother and numerous sisters. But when I joined this side, their position became much worse. It’s a terrible misfortune for my family.”

Zikr was originally a “General” on the side of the Empire as a General Second-Class. Since he defected, it was only natural that his family would be affected.

Zikr was prepared for that and still considered it worthwhile to choose this side. Beatrice wondered if Abel was worthy of this choice, but no one but the man himself knew the reasons.

She was simply curious.

Beatrice: “What is it you fight for, I suppose?”

Zikr: “…”

Beatrice: “You are not supposed to be like those guys who fight for the sake of fighting, in fact. Why is that, I suppose?”

A simple soldier may have been fine with this, which made the Vollachian Empire such a terrifying place since many of its warriors were of a similar mindset, but that was not the case for a "General," much less Zikr.

At Beatrice's perception, Zikr raised a thick eyebrow in slight contemplation, then,

Zikr: "Of course, it is for the sake of the future of the Vollachian Empire for which I place my faith and to which I owe my loyalty."

With a strong voice, he replied, and then he continued with, "Of course,"

Zikr: "I am a "coward," after all, so I doubt I could resist. So, may I ask you, Miss Beatrice?"

Beatrice: "…What, in fact?"

Zikr: "The obvious. —The blessing of a lovely maiden."

As he said this, Zikr pulled out the sword from his side and presented it to Beatrice.

After narrowing her eyes and looking down at the proffered item, Beatrice sighed and,

Beatrice: "For the record, Betty does not know much about the proper etiquette, I suppose."

Zikr: "In such matters the feelings are what's most important. As long as the giver and the receiver's hearts are in tune with each other, the etiquette is of no significance."

Beatrice: "Since when are our hearts in tune with each other, in fact? Good grief…"

Muttering, Beatrice accepted the sword. In front of Beatrice, Zikr reverently dropped his head and kneeled down.

His seriousness reminded Beatrice of a ceremony she had attended one day when Subaru was knighted by Emilia, and she followed her example.

With the sword she received, she tapped each of the kneeling Zikr's shoulders once.

Beatrice: "To see this through properly, I suppose. For the sake of no one else's but your own wish."

Zikr: "As you command."

At Beatrice's blessing, Zikr looked up in somber acknowledgment. He sheathed the sword returned to him by Beatrice and looked towards Utakata and the others by his side.

Seeing the look in his eyes, Utakata called out, "Zee," Utakata: "Uu is a Shudraqian warrior, so we don't do things like Bae. A send-off in the style of a warrior."

As she said that, Utakata pulled out the knife from her waist. With the knife made from the tusk of a beast she cut a thin slice of skin from her palm to cause a small bleeding.

Beside Schult's pained face, Utakata gently pressed her blood-soaked palm against the armor Zikr wore, marking it with her handprint.

Utakata: "Shudraqian blood, the blood of strong warriors. Make Zee strong, too."

Zikr: "With gratitude."

Schult: "Uh, well, I can't think of anything like Beatrice-chan or Utakata-sama, so I'll cheer for you! Hurray! Hurray! Zikr-sama! I'll be there!"

In response to Utakata's action, Schult also shouted a loud cheer to Zikr. Zikr accepted it with a smile and stood up in place.

And then—

Zikr: "Uh-oh."

Louis: "Au, Uuu"

Louis slipped out of Beatrice's hands and hugged Zikr's waist as he stood up. Zikr was startled by the little girl's embrace, as he patted her on the shoulder with a frown.

In Beatrice's eyes, Louis' behavior was an indication of positive feelings towards Zikr. The fact that she could not control her at a moment's notice was also because there was no sign of unpleasantness.

Zikr: "Zikr Osman, as I depart for battle. —Please, remain in good health."

Schult: "May you have success in battle!"

Breaking free from Louis' embrace, Zikr exited the tent with a cheerful look on his face. Schult waved his hand, while Utakata narrowed her eyes as they watched him go.

As Beatrice watched Zikr's back grow distant, she understood that he headed into battle fully prepared to die. —Just like it was the case four hundred years ago.

When war was happening in faraway places.

However, there were frequent visitors to her mother's mansion, and they all sought the Witch's knowledge and cooperation. All with a strong desire to improve bad situations.

That being noted, it was up to every single person to realize whatever advice one received from the knowledgeable.

After seeing the possibilities within the future of her mother's advice, many turned their backs on the mansion and headed toward their own futures. —Zikr's back appeared to be just like one's from that time.

Beatrice: "You."

Louis: "U?"

Watching Zikr leave, Beatrice addressed Louis.

Turning around, Louis stared back at Beatrice with her already wide eyes becoming more wide upon her childish face. Completely thoughtless—no, that would be a mistake.

Yet, looking at her face, which seemed to be devoid of any plan, she asked,

Beatrice: “Which side are you really on, in fact?”

2

???: “—Hk?!”

With a full swing, the pair of ice swords struck her chest, and Madelyn, her eyes wide open, flew a great deal backwards.

As Emilia chased after her, she called out “Thank you!” to the beings that prevented Madelyn’s movement—to the sculptures of Natsuki Subaru made from ice.

—To fight alongside the seven soldiers of ice was a tactic Emilia had developed as a last resort when she had taken Volcanica’s Trial at Pleiades Watchtower.

On her own, she may have lacked manpower.

Without time to waste on her vague apprehensions, these ice soldiers were the result brought about by her confidence that “I’ve been watching Subaru closely!”.

As for an official name, she intended on asking Subaru to provide one, once she showed them to him.

Emilia: “So for now, just do your best as soldiers!”

There was no direct reply to Emilia’s words, but one by one, the seven ice soldiers pumped their fists up, giving a response to Emilia’s cheers.

While she thought of that reassuringly, Emilia and the ice soldiers drew near Madelyn, who had been blown away. It probably looked just like a scene where eight people were bullying a small girl, but

—.

Madelyn: “GAAAAARR!!”

If one were to see the howling Madelyn swinging her arms, blowing away the upper bodies of two ice soldiers, such a leisurely impression probably would not come to mind.

Even without her Flying Winged Blade, Madelyn’s dragon claws and superhuman strength were exceedingly frightening.

Emilia’s ice had been made hard and firm, and even if it was not to the extent of iron, it was at least as hard as a strong boulder. If one were to carelessly strike it barehanded, it was hard enough to reasonably break their hand instead.

So easily, so easily had it been destroyed by Madelyn’s fingers merely wrapping themselves around it.

Emilia: “I’m sorry.”

The soldiers resembling Subaru were destroyed, and Emilia could hear the screams of Beatrice in her mind.

Apologizing to the Beatrice inside her head, Emilia remained vigilant for Madelyn’s counteroffensive. While she was vigilant, she chose not to back down, but instead to continue stepping forward.

Emilia: “Hiyah! Yah yah! Teryaa~!”

Brandishing a pair of ice swords, she proceeded to rain down attacks on Madelyn, who had not been able to fully halt the momentum of the initial strike. Although, when the pair of swords struck the shoulders of Madelyn, her arms widespread, they shattered into pieces.

The tough skin of the dragonkin remained unyielding to the sword slashes of ice. She needed to use even heavier attacks.

Emilia: “With this…!”

The shattered pair of swords became shards of ice, and what Emilia had made to replace them was a large ice mallet.

As Emilia brandished it, two of the kneeling ice soldiers linked arms to create a foothold before her eyes, then she stepped on that and jumped up high. Gaining speed immediately after, Emilia drove the ice mallet into Madelyn with enough force to make her own body spin vertically.

Madelyn: “—Hk.”

Without any defense, Madelyn received Emilia’s blow directly on her head. Landing before Madelyn, who had turned downwards as of the impact, Emilia used the recoil to put power into a second strike—

Emilia: “Huh.”

As soon as she gripped it tightly, the handle of the ice mallet shattered. —No, it was not just the handle, the entire thing had been destroyed.

The ice mallet that had struck Madelyn’s head was the one unable to bear the opponent’s hardness. Emilia widened her eyes upon seeing that, and simultaneously, the claws below her eyes rose sharply.

The moment the claws moved within the edges of her vision, a small shield of ice intercepted its trajectory.

Emilia: “Oww!”

However, the ice shield was smashed at that instant, and cries of pain erupted.

After having poured energy into her body at an earned moment, the side of her head was slashed by the claw tips, and at the slight impact of her silver hair being grazed, Emilia’s vision greatly and violently shook.

Nevertheless, the attack did not end with that.

Madelyn: “Do not mock this dragon!!”

The howling Madelyn raised her claws overhead. The wind of destruction that followed turned over the surface of the ground.

She promptly flew backwards as to avoid the claws, but the wind that arrived afterward struck her, and Emilia's body was flicked away, having been hit in kind. Engulfed by the ground turning over like waves, Emilia's body bounced, bounced, being blown away.

Emilia: "—Ru-ru-ruuu!!"

With eyes just like those of a dragon or a snake, Madelyn caught up, and raised her Flying Winged Blade overhead. As it swung down, it accelerated with aim for Emilia's lower back.

In an instant, Emilia funneled power into her abdomen to try and withstand the oncoming strike, but she immediately concluded that it was something that she must not be hit by—reaching out her hand, she tightly grasped a cold and solid sensation.

Emilia: "…"

Her arm was jerked up with force, and Emilia's body, now having been pulled up, escaped the trajectory of the Flying Winged Blade.

The one which had done that was an ice soldier who caught up to the blown away Emilia as fast as it could, and pulled her arm while diving into a forward somersault.

The ice soldier forcibly pulled Emilia up, and heaved her away just after. Emilia's body spun around as it was sent flying, and in her field of vision, the ice soldier was overpowered and shattered by the Flying Winged Blade which she had evaded—.

Emilia: "Subaru—!!"

It was not Subaru, but Emilia had called out with the feeling that Subaru had received harm.

Catching up to Emilia, who had again been sent flying, was an ice soldier different to the one which had been destroyed. Without a pause, she was thrown over to the next ice soldier, received, then thrown over, and was escaping from the dragonkin.

Madelyn: “Enough! Quit friggin’ messing around!!”

With an angry bellow and a flash, the solid earth fissured where it had been stepped on by Madelyn, her face red, and with her firm foothold, she threw the Flying Winged Blade with a tremendous and ferocious vigor.

The Flying Winged Blade revolved at a velocity so intense and extreme that to the eye, it did not appear as anything but a disk. It was a disk that cut down anything and everything in its path, and clad in a strong wind, it approached Emilia.

Emilia: “I’m counting on you!”

Before that could reach her, the ice soldiers, receiving Emilia’s voice, rushed out one by one.

They lined up in single-file, and wedged themselves into the gap between the flying Emilia and the disc flying towards her. All of them took an ice weapon in their hands, and used them to fight against the Flying Winged Blade.

—As a result, the sounds of ice shattering at high speed chained together, and the Subaru ice soldiers were completely annihilated.

However, just before each Subaru was shattered, they each landed as much of a hit as they could onto the Flying Winged Blade.

The change in the danger of the Flying Winged Blade was something that ordinary people would not know, but that revolution had very slightly, just a little, a wee bit, weakened. She felt like it had weakened.

Emilia: “Umm! It weakened!!”

She declared it in a loud voice, and it truly appeared like it had become like that.

Using the leeway that the ice Subarus had made for her, Emilia equipped her legs with thick-soled ice boots, placed the two arms of her airborne body on the ground, and met the oncoming Flying Winged Blade with her two legs.

Emilia was well-aware. —That legs were just a little stronger than arms.

Emilia: “Hiyah, yaaah—!”

Firmly clenching her teeth, Emilia extended her knees using all of her might.

The direct impact from the Flying Winged Blade delivered a shock to Emilia’s entire body, and from head to toe, all the bones in her body were creaking. Firmly withstanding that, withstanding it, withstanding, she would withstand it to the end.

Fully extending her legs, which were experiencing resistance, even while crevices started to form in her ice boots, Emilia’s kick shot the Flying Winged Blade up into the sky.

Madelyn: “Wha?!”

It seemed like it was beyond Madelyn’s expectations for it to have been stopped, so she raised her voice in surprise. Facing that, Emilia got up and leaped, reaching her hand out to the Flying Winged Blade which had been kicked up.

She tightly grasped the edge of the Flying Winged Blade, and into that arm, she poured a considerable amount of strength.

Emilia: “This time… I’m returning the favor!”

The Flying Winged Blade was much heavier than it looked, but Emilia was also someone who possessed indomitable power.

It was difficult with a single arm, so she twisted her body in order to change to a two handed grip. From there, with all her might, she resolutely flung the Flying Winged Blade away with a “Hiyah!”.

Madelyn: “—Hk!”

Seeing the Flying Winged Blade flung away, Madelyn widened her eyes.

Receiving the vigor of rapid spinning, the Flying Winged Blade soared. Although it paled in comparison to when Madelyn had thrown it, the dangerous weapon still cut through the wind as it flew.

Flying, flying, flying—towards an incorrect direction, it had flown away amazingly.

Emilia: “Ummm.”

Madelyn: “…You, what the frig’, is your intention.”

Emilia: “I may have messed up…”

She was trying to return the favor and deal damage, but she was completely unable to handle the Flying Winged Blade well, so it had flown away. On the forehead of Madelyn, who had been angered by that, a vein had begun to bulge very quickly.

Immediately after, Madelyn’s cheeks stiffened, and she stepped forward in order to chase after the Flying Winged Blade which had flown away.

However—

Emilia: “That’s a no-no!”

Then, Emilia, her hands outstretched, created a wall of ice ahead of where Madelyn was proceeding.

The wall of ice erected from the ground was thick, and she had also made it fairly long horizontally. Going around it or jumping over it, neither feat would be managed so easily.

She had not been able to utilize the Flying Winged Blade very well, but it would be dangerous if Madelyn were to wield it.

It was not as though that was her aim, but she thought that the current situation of it being at a distance was the most beneficial.

Emilia: “I’m sorry, but I can’t let you retrieve that weapon. If you are to continue, then it shall be without that.”

Madelyn: "…"

Emilia: "If you surrender, I will properly accept that. Actually, if you do that, it would be reaaally helpful. What will you do? Will you continue?"

Emilia posed a question to the back of Madelyn, who cast her eyes downward as she faced the wall of ice.

If Madelyn, who had lost her weapon, were to surrender, that would be the best scenario. In order to get Madelyn to believe she was at a disadvantage, Emilia once again created the Natsuki Subarus of ice, which had once been annihilated, in her surroundings, and she crossed her arms as she stood.

Eight against one, this time, in a state without her weapon, Madelyn was in a much more unfavorable position.

With all this, then…, Emilia was enthusiastically thinking as such.

But alas—

Madelyn: "—Why the frig' do you think that I, the dragon, would give up?"

Muttering, Madelyn gently placed her hand on the wall of ice before her eyes.

Gazing at that gesture, Emilia reflexively caught her breath with an "Ah". —With a crack, the very moment that high-pitched noise reverberated, the entirety of the gigantic ice wall began to fissure with the pattern of a spiderweb.

The origin was naturally Madelyn's palm, so the fissures that extended across the entire ice wall were centered on her.

Emilia had gone all out when creating that ice wall.

The hardness and density of the ice were just as previously mentioned, and even though it was not something that could be destroyed easily.

Emilia: “Madelyn, you…”

Madelyn: “When talking to you humans, this dragon’s head gets friggin’ weird. You, that healer, that senile old fool, all of you are in this dragon’s way…”

Emilia: “…”

Turning her back, without revealing her downcast face, mixed into Madelyn’s trembling voice were complex and intricate emotions. Anger, sorrow, and all sorts of other things.

It seemed just as if Madelyn herself did not understand which of her own emotions was the strongest.

What she had spoken of were those who were in her way.

Of course, Emilia understood that she herself was in a position confronting Madelyn. Outside of Emilia, the ones she called a healer and a senile old fool, did they also happen to be her enemies?

As a dragonkin, as an ally of the Empire, Madelyn opposed Emilia and the others, and went on a rampage.

Emilia: “Madelyn, for what purpose do you fight?”

Madelyn: “…”

At the question, Madelyn swayed her head to a tilt.

Her two black horns at a slant, Madelyn’s golden eyes stared at Emilia from above her shoulders. Though she was getting a horrifying, blood-curdling sensation, Emilia did not avert her gaze.

Going against the instinct to turn away, Emilia fixed her eyes on Madelyn.

Thinking about it now, she should have done it sooner, she should have tried to talk like this from the very start.

Both this time and last time, even though Madelyn, who was blocking in the way, had been brimming with fighting spirit, Emilia had gotten caught up in it, and suddenly begun an attack, but—

Emilia: “If we can talk with each other, then I really think that talking is the best scenario. Madelyn, why do you fight? For the sake of whom?”

Madelyn: “…What about you? Why?”

Emilia: “…”

Wondering if it would really be necessary to say that, Emilia realized that Madelyn was trying to continue.

The fact that she had responded with that, was something very difficult for Emilia. The reason that Madelyn had given Emilia something she must speak of, that unfortunate occurrence was something which Emilia could not be prepared for.

If Emilia were to refuse her dialogue, and if the result of that refusal was claws being swung, Emilia would wield an ice weapon as expected, and would need to oppose Madelyn.

In that manner, upon Emilia’s cheeks stiffening,

Madelyn: “You, why do you resist? There’s no friggin’ chance you’ll come out victorious in resisting this dragon.”

Emilia: “—ah.”

Madelyn: “Why… do you… why do all of you friggin’ resist?”

That was the question posed from Madelyn’s side.

Unknowing of Emilia’s circumstances, she responded as such to words she should have brushed off.

On the contrary, being questioned about that, Emilia cautioned her own slow-mind.

She thought she could not respond with anything. However, it was not like that. Just as Madelyn had said, if Emilia could not get Madelyn to speak, then she herself should be the one to open up her heart first.

After all, this battlefield was harsh, so Emilia prioritized the things she herself wanted to do, and the things she herself wanted to say. But even so, at just this moment, for what reason did she think to try and have good manners?

Why, did she fight? For what reason, was she here?

The answer to all of that was—

Emilia: “I came here to meet my treasured knight… No, everybody’s treasured knight.”

Saying that, Emilia touched the shoulder of one of the ice soldiers—the imitations of Subaru, directly next to her. She thought she had made them well. She had replicated his hairstyle and “tracksuit” quite proficiently.

Though, no matter how well they imitated him, Subaru’s reliability could not be reproduced.

His positive words, his reliable attitude, his kindness which gave her delight, just about everything.

Natsuki Subaru’s Natsuki Subaru-ness, just thinking about it made Emilia’s chest grow pleasantly warm, and it was impossible for anyone except the person in question to possess.

Emilia: “He’s a reaaally treasured person. That person, and the girl who should be with that person, many people are awaiting their return, so that’s why I am here. For that purpose, I’m trying my very best.”

Madelyn: “…”

Emilia: “The reason I fight, that’s it. Madelyn, what about you?”

She probably had someone, or something, which she wanted to protect.

If that was the case, they could make a promise to not hurt the other's treasured thing, and they could probably stop fighting.

Subaru and Rem, it would open the path to reach the two who she wished to bring back.

Those hopes and wishes that Emilia held were—

Madelyn: "—Balleroy Temeglyph."

Emilia: "…That, name is?"

Madelyn: "That… was the name of the man who was to be this dragon's darling. —He is this dragon's entire reason for fighting."

—They were betrayed by Madelyn, who fought for the sake of someone who had already been lost.

Emilia: "…"

Hearing her voice lose all spirit, Emilia caught her breath.

She was unable to find the right words to say at the spur of the moment, and because she was not close enough to reach her hand out, Emilia could not make it in time.

For that reason—

Madelyn: "—Kill the man who killed Balleroy. That is this dragon's long-standing desire."

A violent sound rang out, as Madelyn crushed the ice wall with her grip.

There was no other way to describe it than "crushed it with her grip". She tightened her grip with the hand placed on the wall, and from there, the destruction spread throughout the entire ice wall; it had been shattered in one fell swoop.

Taking the Flying Winged Blade present on the other side, Madelyn looked to the figure facing her once more, and while Emilia digested those bitter feelings, she and the ice soldiers headed towards Madelyn.

Having lost someone dear to her, the dragonkin girl was desperate to fill the empty hole in her chest. Stepping forward to chase her, that was the moment.

Madelyn: “MEZOREIAAAAAAAA—!!”

Facing the sky as she bathed in the fragments of the shattered ice wall, Madelyn cried out.

As though it was ripping apart the sparkling ice shards as they danced down, the loud voice echoed throughout the sky of skies. Hearing that, Emilia’s eyes grew wide, and she looked to the sky.

The sound Madelyn had made, Emilia had heard it once before.

Her lips had previously spun that sound, and at the time when it was spun, at that time.

Emilia: “At that time, there was a reaaally big attack.”

A white corona rained down incessantly, and mowing down the Fortress City in the blink of an eye, the very terrain had been altered.

Since Emilia was together with Priscilla at that time, they were somehow able to defend against it. Supposing the same thing happened here, Emilia wondered if she would be able to stand a chance against it on her own.

That would be very difficult. Above the head of the panicked Emilia, the same thing did not occur.

However, despite the fact that the same thing had not occurred, Emilia could not greatly rejoice.

After all—

???: “—I, am Mezoreia. In accordance with the voice of mine dear child, I shalt become the wind from the heavenly skies.”

Spreading its wings of pure white, a body of colossal scale, clad in the very essence of an overcast sky—The Cloud Dragon Mezoreia, invoked by Madelyn Eschart, swooped down upon the skies of the Imperial Capital.

Vic.ll2o

Chapter 95:
Enemies on All Bastions

1

At that moment, everyone on the battlefield caught sight of a being clad in clouds of pure white, having descended to above the ground.

Excessively magnificent and majestic, the transcendent being that, from the foundations of its existence, was in a completely different dimension from worthless mediocrity—Everyone understood that with just a glance.

???: "—That's, a Dragon."

Widening his emerald green eyes, Garfiel muttered beside the crumbled rampart.

After his fight to the death with Kafma Irulux ended, while taking rough breaths with his shoulders, just as he looked around searching for the battlefield where his next duty would be, that had happened.

In the distance, a colossal presence that made it look like the sky itself had fallen, had appeared on the battlefield where the most fighting spirits were flaring up in this Empire, at the decisive battle on the bastion which had been frozen white.

Garfiel: "Emilia-sama…"

Possessing a gate with absurd capacity, using her mana without needing to be subtle, taking the heat away from the world was undoubtedly the work of Emilia getting serious.

The five bastions of the ramparts, if she was fighting an enemy guarding one of them, their opponent would be a Divine General or a being of equal strength, even at the minimum, that opponent would be on the same level as Kafma.

Even though that alone was enough for them to be an enemy he did not want to make Emilia fight, it had been particularly absurd that the additional fighting force that had appeared there was a mythical being.

Garfiel: “Did th’ Flying Dragon General call ‘em down? Shit, I gotta get her outta there right now…!”

Gnashing his fangs, Garfiel decided in his heart to shift battlefields.

Emilia fighting, and letting Emilia fight, were simply not connected. Emilia herself would probably object, but letting her fight was a distressing decision for the camp.

Originally, Emilia should have been in a position overseeing everything from a place without concern for injury.

Garfiel: “My amazin’ self wouldn’t be able to face Captain.”

It was natural that Emilia would not want to leave the whole situation to someone else.

He thought that narrow-sightedness, in a good sense, and thoughtfulness were desirable traits. But, he could not permit all of that, and could not let her do what she wanted.

It went without saying that Garfiel was a military officer of the Emilia camp, and his role was to repel all the sparks that rained down on the camp, and defeat the enemies standing in their way.

Garfiel: “…”

Closing his eyes, Garfiel quietly ascertained his own condition.

He got severely wounded from his battle with Kafma, his entire body had been mangled, his insides had been spread outwards, he had burned his own body to kill the “insects” that had nested there, and yet Garfiel was still alive and well.

It was a situation where the only thing he had to boast about was that he was alive and well.

Garfiel: “It may be exaggeratin’ to say I’m full of life… but I’ll do it.”

Even now, he was absorbing power through the soles of his feet planted on the earth, and through invoking healing magic with all of his might, Garfiel’s body healed at a furious pace, both inside and out.

Normally, this would be a load on the body that could potentially reduce his life span, but the events in the Watergate City forced Garfiel to break out of his shell, both physically and mentally.

Though it was not visible, Garfiel tore through the shell that was certainly there, and stood tall.

With the steam rising from his many bloody wounds, as if his body were truly blazing hot, Garfiel settled his resolve to face the Dragon in the distance.

Garfiel: “Everyone! My amazin’ self tore down the rampart! Hurry the fuck up and get yer asses in there!!”

Opening his mouth, Garfiel howled at the group of rebels who were watching him from afar.

They were the group that had challenged Kafma before Garfiel, and were mowed down. Although a considerable number of them, including those wounded but supported by their comrades, should still be capable of functioning as a fighting force, but they had all stayed away from Garfiel and Kafma’s battlefield, and remained motionless even after the battle had been concluded.

There were those that might say that this was just because they were overwhelmed by Garfiel and Kafma’s battle.

However, it was not just that.

???: “You’re the one who broke through the rampart! So, you should be the first to go through!”

Garfiel: “…”

???: “Brave warrior, we respect your might! No one, whoever they may be, would dare to desecrate that.”

One of the Centaur People had thus gallantly answered Garfiel’s words.

Having defeated Kafma, Garfiel deserved to be the first to climb over the ramparts. That was why they had stopped, and fixedly waited for him to cross over the rampart.

It seemed that this was not his opinion alone, but the opinion of everyone who saw the duel just prior. Those who started the battle for selfish reasons, hidden within them was the historic warrior’s pride.

It seemed that in their judgment, Garfiel’s way of fighting had been radiant.

Their consideration, in and of itself, was heart-warming, but—

Garfiel: “My bad, but there’s somewhere my fuckin’ amazin’ self has gotta go. This ain’t the “Whipfrock who came back”. —It’s the one over there.”

Garfiel jerked his chin towards the white Dragon reigning over the distant sky.

In both the Pleiades Watchtower and the Fortress City of Guaral, there had been opportunities to meet one. Garfiel had continued to let them get away due to his poor timing, and he was finally in a position to take on a Dragon.

It was not that he wanted to fight it. It was an opponent that must be fought.

Rebels: “…”

After seeing Garfiel’s gesture, the rebels also gasped at the sight of the white Dragon.

It was a matter of course, but they had also become aware of its existence. Fearing that, though it was the unusual spirit of the Imperial citizens to not bend their knees or hang their heads, whether or not they would challenge it was a different matter.

Garfiel would challenge it. Therefore—

Garfiel: “I’ll leave crossin’ the rampart to you guys.”

If the rebels crossed over the collapsed rampart and surged into the Imperial Capital, the situation would change.

If all five bastions were defended by the greatest military powers of the Empire, then there was also the possibility that the defenses were thin in the area around Emperor Vincent Vollachia, who should be in the Crystal Palace.

There was a possibility that a literal decisive blow could be fired through the big hole that he had opened in this rampart.

Garfiel: “That’s why—”

After handing over the vanguard of the attack on the Imperial Capital to the rebels, Garfiel would begin his battle with the white menace.

Then, it had happened when he had been about to embark towards the bastion where the Dragon was.

—Garfiel shuddered as all the hairs on his body stood on end.

Garfiel: “—Hk.”

Free from obstructive thoughts. He was free from obstructive thoughts.

Without hesitation, without question, following the sensation that his brain had brought to his attention, he unleashed a blow using the full force of his body.

The backhand blow of steel that was able to shatter rock, striking the wind dead, about to hit what lay ahead of his instincts—

???: “—Oh, so ya can see through my invisibility. Isn’t that a bit dangerous?”

Such a hoarse voice could be heard from beyond his strong fist.

Garfiel: “Kah.”

That instant, his backhand blow should have hit the shadow behind him.

Undoubtedly, there was a sensation of something touching the surface of his gauntlet. Nevertheless, a bitter sound escaped his own mouth, and Garfiel stared in shock as his thoughts were struck by that impact.

The impact had struck him in the back. Someone’s small foot or toe was perfectly placed on Garfiel’s back. An absurd kick—No, that was wrong.

???: “That was entirely yer own punch. I just let it pass through my body, and returned it to ya.”

A voice answered his doubt, and every bone in Garfiel’s body creaked as his eyes widened.

Whether it was true or a lie, Garfiel’s vision was greatly shaken as his internal organs and brain were jolted by the force equivalent to his blow using the full force of his body. Cuts, bruises, broken bones, and ruptured organs could all be healed immediately.

Even if he could not fully heal, he could bring it to a point where he could move through sheer force.

However, an attack that resonated throughout the core of his body could not be negated.

Garfiel: “—Hk.”

At the numbness of his whole body, he gritted his teeth, and Garfiel’s entire being was on alert for a follow-up attack. He moved his limbs, which were slow to react, and somehow managed to protect the vital points of his neck and head.

However, the follow-up he feared did not come.

Instead, what was done with the time for that follow-up was containment.

???: “Actually, it’d be a pain in the ass if they got past the wall and went inside.”

With a sigh mixed into his words, the pained cries of ten people rang out at once.

Exhorting his collapsed knees, what filled Garfiel’s vision as he raised his head was the group of rebels which had accepted his command and were moving to push their way into the Imperial Capital. Those lined up at the vanguard of their formation had fallen.

Centaur people, and beastmen, had their lives taken away in an instant by having black iron flying blades—throwing blades called kunai, punctured into their foreheads and chests.

Even if he were to rush in and cast a healing spell, he would not make it in time. It was an attack that caused instant death.

As warriors, they must have also had the ability to take on the Imperial Capital. Even if they were not as good as a General like Kafma—

???: “If ya die, you’re a small fry. What does it matter if you’re a warrior?”

Garfiel: “…”

???: “Kakakakka! Yer eyes look like ya aren’t too pleased, youngster. You’re also the one who busted down the rampart, aren’t ya? Ya know, it’s real troublin’ when dangerous guys keep coming out one after the other, isn’t it?”

The small shadow laughed with an open mouth and ran a finger through his long white eyebrows as he spoke.

At last, Garfiel kicked off the ground with his foot, and filling his vision as he moved in, was an old man even shorter than Garfiel, who himself was considered to be short.

However, an old man of small stature was not a very fitting description of this monster.

Garfiel: “Damn you…!”

???: “Oh, wait, wait, I’ll be yer opponent in a bit. Uh, there we go.”

Garfiel: “Huh?”

Garfiel glared at him with hostility, his hair standing on end, but the old man stuck out his arm, his right hand missing from the wrist, to hold him back.

Garfiel raised an eyebrow at the missing arm, and the old man shook his leg at the same time.

A moment later, not knowing what he had done, a horizontal sweeping kick drew a deep line in the earth. It also split the space between Garfiel, the old man, and the rebels behind him.

And then, the old man turned to the rebels on the other side of the line and told them.

???: “Try stepping over that line ta get over here. You’re all gonna die.”

Rebels: “—Hk.”

???: “My my, it’s a relief that ya guys are so attentive. I want the the young peeps of my village to learn from ya. Lately, they’ve been disobeyin’ me every time when I say something. I’m the village chief, aren’t I?”

Shrugging his thin shoulders, the old man chuckled, showing his white teeth.

It was an attitude of not caring at all about the threat he had made to the rebels just prior to this moment. However, everyone here was made to understand instinctively that the threat was neither a lie nor anything else.

Garfiel also understood. —Just who the old man in front of him was.

Garfiel: “The Vicious Old Man… Olbart Dunklekenn, ain’t ya?”

Olbart: “I say this every time someone calls me that, but I really don’t like it. It’s like slander, isn’t it?”

Garfiel: “—. What the fuck do ya think yer doin’ here?”

Towards the old man tilting his head—towards Olbart, Garfiel posed that question.

Olbart appeared carefree and natural, which was why Garfiel could not let his guard down in the slightest. Olbart stood behind Garfiel without any sign of his presence.

Right here, in the middle of this plain with good visibility.

Garfiel: “…”

It would still be understandable if he were out of sight, hiding behind a building, and approaching stealthily.

Even still, that was more than enough of a threat, in that case, he could be satisfied with the events that took place. However, how could he perceive a being that intruded into this space without a hint of a presence?

Though, he was a being that could not be perceived as anything but a threat.

Before the trembling Garfiel, Olbart raised an eyebrow with his unchanging attitude and let out a “Ho?”,

Olbart: “Why am I here, ya ask? Isn’t that how it always was? Even though it’s our job ta keep the rebels out, Kafma had the nerve ta be a failure, and now I hafta clean up his mess.”

Stating that, the old man pointed out Kafma lying on the ground with his arm missing a hand. Then, with an “Oops,” he retracted his right arm and pointed correctly with his left instead.

Olbart: “I drew the short end of the stick, seriously. That’s why I told ‘em that it would be dangerous if they didn’t bring out Chisha or call back Groovy, but sure enough, he had the nerve to lose.”

Garfiel: “Sure enough? Old man, you ain’t got the fuckin’ right to laugh at this guy.”

Olbart: “Ho?”

Olbart closed one eye and looked displeased. In order to obstruct the old man’s gaze, Garfiel wedged his way in between Olbart and Kafma, and exhaled a heated breath.

Kafma was an enemy. That would not change, but no one was qualified to speak about how Kafma fought except Garfiel, who had exchanged fists with him head-on.

Garfiel: “This guy was fuckin’ strong. My amazin’ self was just stronger.”

Olbart: “—? Well, ya I know that from just looking, yeah? I’m not gonna try and deny that, ya know. So just what are ya trying ta say, you?”

Gafiel: “I’m sayin’ I don’t like yer damn attitude! Is that how ya talk to a fellow General on yer own side?! Huh?!”

Opening his mouth wide, Garfiel snapped back with a howl. At the ferocious roar, Olbart frowned, and tilted his head.

Seeming like he was truly doubtful, the old man continued, “Do ya know?”,

Olbart: “I’m a General First-Class, Kafma’s a General Second-Class. We’re not even remotely the same.”

Garfiel: “—Hk.”

Unapologetically, Olbart’s remarks were just conveying the obvious facts. Garfiel's pupils narrowed as he felt an incomprehensible gap.

The moment the carnivorous beast determined his prey, he raised his tail and pounced on the old man.

He felt like he should pay respect to Kafma. However, he did not feel that for the enemy before his eyes.

The old man, too, neither wanted it nor would he give it.

Within battle, the things he placed value in differed to his opponent, and recognizing that—

Garfiel: "I'll fuckin' crush ya!!"

His arms, both raised overhead, closed in on Olbart.

With a strong arm that could not measure by feel, he wondered if it was different from when he smashed the ramparts, and it probably exceeded all the might he had used then; he had put enough destructive power into it so that it was more than enough to destroy that small old body.

Then, without letting him get away, his arms smashed into Olbart's head.

Boom, the impact of the crash shook the earth, and a cloud of dust ascended from the smashed ground as if there had been an explosion. The dust rained down upon the heads of the rebels who had been stopped by Olbart.

Perhaps, Olbart would be smashed to pieces after being struck by so much firepower.

However—

Garfiel: "Wha… Hk."

Garfiel's eyes widened at the sight before his eyes.

Before him, Garfiel's fists slammed into Olbart's head from both sides, as if sandwiching him. There was a definite impact and resistance, which Garfiel felt through the recoil in his arms.

Despite this, the old man, with his head caught between Garfiel's fists, showed his white teeth and laughed, and then,

Olbart: "Incredible, isn't it? I just released the power of yer attack onto the ground."

Garfiel: "—Ah."

Olbart: "Well, the ground exploded 'cause you've got some dangerous arm strength, though."

Immediately after finishing his words, the old man's face, trapped between his fists, slipped out from under. Garfiel followed him with his gaze, but,

Garfiel: "Gugh?!"

As his eyes followed Olbart, who should have slipped below, an impact struck the top of his head.

Even though Olbart should have crouched down, something had hit him from above.

Olbart: "Up when ya think it's down, down when ya think it's up, that's the basics, the basics."

Garfiel: "Ga, AAAAAHH—!!"

At the crouched Olbart's flippant words, Garfiel furiously swung his fists downwards. They thrust into Olbart's head of gray hair.

That moment, a sharp impact pierced the back of Garfiel's head, his back, and his buttocks.

Garfiel's fist, swinging downwards, whiffed, and struck the ground with a tremendous impact.

Instead, the voice of Olbart, who disappeared in an instant, was heard from directly above.

Olbart: “That’s why, if ya think I‘m below ya, I’ll be above. Those who don’t learn’ll be left behind, ya know?”

Exerting his body, he faced the voice and raised his arms overhead. The moment his fingertips caught hold of something, Garfiel swung it down forcefully, trying to smash it into the ground.

Smashing it into the ground, preventing its movement, and then struck it with all his might. He thought that if the feet were separated, then acrobatics like the ones before would not be possible—

Garfiel: “…”

The appeal from his fighting instincts ceased when he realized that it was not Olbart within the grasp of his fingers, but Kafma’s body that the old man had thrown over Garfiel’s head.

Stopping his movement to throw the body to the ground, Garfiel’s lips quivered.

At that instant—

Olbart: “Listen here, you, why do ya think there are fifty Second-Class Generals and only nine First-Class Generals? —It’s ‘cause we’re so stupidly strong.”

The voice and shock bore into Garfiel’s head from both left and right.

2

—As a massive flame descended, that wrath of the sky intended to consume the world in its entirety.

It gave Yorna the illusion that the world was being dyed in red before her eyes.

If one could greatly rouse its wrath, the world would probably take out all of the anger it had saved up to this point on that single individual.

The ground had already been turned to scorched earth, and the rebels and plants were all burned with the same method. That devastating firepower rained down upon them to scorch them down to their entrails the same way the corpses had been.

However, facing that, Yorna made not even the slightest movement, and,

Yorna: "—Yang Sword."

Priscilla: "My my, making your daughter use such a terribly rough thing."

The sound spun by Yorna's lips was the signal for the treasured sword of deep crimson to swing vertically.

It was a beautiful sword that would capture the eyes of those who saw it, burn their hearts, and even captivate their souls. That bewitching nature was only an accessory to the treasured sword, it was not even a sliver of its original purpose.

In other words, when it fulfilled its original reason for existing, the brilliance of the treasured sword would become even stronger.

Yorna: "…"

The Yang Sword, the tip of which was swung vertically upward to intercept the tremendous fire that was raining down upon them.

That instant, the mighty flames that had permeated their vision disappeared. —It was not that they were cut away. Quite literally, they had disappeared as if they had never even existed.

Priscilla: “My Yang Sword burns what I wish to burn and slashes only what I wish to slash.”

That logic was far too violent, far too irrational, and far too absurd of an imposition.

However, that sight had materialized before her eyes, and the inferno that seemed like it could destroy even the world vanished.

Pouring in an appropriate amount of power, she had released that great firepower with the intention to dampen their first move, but at the sight of its erasure with a single swing of a sword, even their opponent was not able to stay calm—

Priscilla: “Do not look down on her, for that is the Spirit Eater.”

Regardless of whether it was an explanation or a warning, it was impolite, and with those words Priscilla’s figure flew to the right.

Similar to Priscilla, flying to the opposing left, was Yorna—In between the two of them, a massive flash flood rushed through.

Yorna: “—Hk.”

It was as if the entire contents of a well had been unleashed, and Yorna, while successfully evading, felt that her enemy—that Arakiya had heightened her capabilities above her previous impression.

This was not the first time Yorna had fought Arakiya.

They had previously crossed paths just once before, during an “uprising” considered to be brought about by Yorna.

At that time, Vollachia’s strongest was looming behind Arakiya, and the stage was set in Chaosflame, where Yorna herself was in a perfect position to face them, so the preconditions were already variously different.

Of course, Yorna was serious about fighting, but her true intentions at the time were not really serious about killing them.

During past uprisings, especially the one which resulted in a clash with Arakiya, Yorna's goal was retribution against those who had meddled with the residents of the Demon City, and to make known the righteousness of doing so.

In other words, her objective was a kind of protest, and Vincent, who faced her across the board, must have been aware of this intention, and it was a clash in which a reconciliation seemed possible.

However, Arakiya was unaware of those circumstances at that time, and probably did not hold back in her fight against Yorna.

Since then, Yorna had assumed that Arakiya's strength completely surpassed those of the other troops, and so she was expected to serve as a stand-alone force comparable to an army.

However, that perception was not only incorrect, but also naive.

Yorna: "So, disregarding Old Man Olbart, is this what it means to be the Second?"

Letting that out together with a long sigh, Yorna glanced behind—through the pressure of the unleashed water, the land itself had been split vertically all the way until the horizon.

She understood the rationale that pressurized water posed a threat.

However, when she saw how extraordinary it was, Yorna rolled up the sleeves of her kimono.

In preparation for the decisive battle, she had worn her favorite kimono.

Even so, she wondered if it would be possible to stop Arakiya's blow.

Yorna: "Before, you only used fire, so you had burned one half of my city to the ground, but…"

In one breath, Arakiya had burned one half of her city, and today, she also burned the rebels to nothing by the ramparts.

Arakiya had assumed that a defensive line of fire, which was well-suited to stone structures, and a battlefield where one did not need to pay attention to one's surroundings, would be convenient for her, and that she had no reason to change her battle strategy now.

Priscilla: "This idea was also planted in your head, though it would have been so much more charming if it had not been directed towards mineself."

After saying so, Priscilla kicked off the ground, and closed in on Arakiya.

With one of the bastions of the star-fortress behind her, as if to protect it, Arakiya flew through the air, her legs ablaze below the knees.

Even just the unrelenting firepower that rained down from high above was enough of a threat.

First, Arakiya needed to be lured down to an approachable position.

Priscilla: "Dear Mother!"

Yorna: "—Hk, got it!"

Priscilla shouted as she rushed through, causing a momentary disturbance within Yorna.

She had yet to obtain a proper sense of the intimacy between her and her now-reunited daughter. Rather, she was doubtful of Priscilla's pompous attitude toward her mother, who had changed appearance.

Since they parted when she was a suckling infant, she had no way of knowing how Priscilla was raised.

Yorna: "Dance."

Taking the Kiseru out of her mouth, Yorna swung the tip of it and struck the ground with her thick-soled shoe.

Then, in front of the advancing Priscilla, the trembling earth slowly peeled up and rose to become a foothold to support Priscilla's path.

Yorna's Soul Marriage Technique also worked on inorganic objects.

However, it was a system in which the strength of its efficacy was proportional to the amount of time and devotion she had put into it. Therefore, she had an apprehension. —How much could she really love the land where she had spent time with the man she loved?

Though, the results were clear.

Priscilla: "Your work was for a great cause."

Leaving her mother with a statement that did not make her feel like a mother, Priscilla hopped to the footholds directly in front of her.

Of course, the footholds did not stop there; they emerged one after another to create a path towards Arakiya. A single straight path would be targeted, so she continued to take the consideration to create multiple paths.

Because of that—

Arakiya: "—Nuisance."

As Arakiya swung her arm holding the branch, the great wind that was released completely uprooted the floating earth and mowed down all the paths.

Rather than a storm, the great wind was powerful enough to be equivalent to being hit by a giant palm, and the force of it was such that even Priscilla could have been completely crushed by it if it hit her directly.

Priscilla: "To drive that into mineself so mercilessly, would you not miss mine beauty?"

Arakiya: "I've made up my mind. Even if you lose your limbs, Princess is still Princess."

Priscilla: “Would it not be more accurate to say your mind has been made up for you?”

Narrowing her eyes, Priscilla hit Arakiya with those words as she descended from high in the sky.

Just before the great wind mowed down the foothold, Priscilla quickly escaped into the sky. She barely managed to avoid being hit by the wind, a feat of sheer perception, but she was still vulnerable to a second blow.

Truly erasing the hesitation from her eyes, Arakiya took aim at Priscilla’s limbs as she was forced to fall, and raised her arm in a merciless attempt to take away her fighting ability.

And then—

Yorna: “I would be troubled if you forgot about me.”

Flying up from directly below, Yorna’s kick was delivered towards Arakiya, who was preoccupied with Priscilla being above her head.

Yorna’s long legs thrust upward, as her meticulously maintained thick soles, which she treasured greatly over time, followed her decisive blow.

Priscilla: “It is unbecoming of someone your age to be more eye-catching than mineself.”

Synchronizing with Yorna’s kick, Priscilla swung the Yang Sword held overhead straight down. Arakiya had been caught in a cross-generational pincer attack of mother and daughter.

In perfect unison, the two enchanting strikes worthy of self-praise struck each other. —Yes, they had struck each other.

Priscilla & Yorna: “—Hk?!”

The strike that should have caught Arakiya was bereft of a hit reaction, rather, the expected impact had been slightly off and produced a solid sound instead.

From the look of it, the thick sole of Yorna's upwards kick collided with nothing other than the blade of the Yang Sword Priscilla had swung down.

Their pincer attack had missed this crucial opponent and they had rather astoundingly struck each other instead.

What was more surprising was that the collision of both Yorna and Priscilla's attacks had been inside Arakiya's seemingly flickering body.

Yorna: "It, passed through her?"

Priscilla: "How impudent."

Immediately after Yorna's astonishment and Priscilla's irritation spilled over simultaneously, Arakiya's body, having seemingly taken in both attacks, glowed white, as a counterattack was unleashed.

It was as if Arakiya's whole body exploded—No, it had, in fact, exploded.

Arakiya's body scattered into rays of white light, dispersing with terrifying force spread in every direction like buckshot, hitting Yorna and Priscilla like a fountain of water.

Yorna: "Kuh…—!"

In an instant, Yorna gathered the fine pieces of whirled up dirt by the previous gale, and clad herself and Priscilla in a cloud of dust.

Rather than "cladding" them in clothing that stuck to the body, it was a delicate technique that circulated around one's figure at high speed to repel attacks.

If Arakiya's buckshot merely had the firepower one would discern at first glance, this would have sufficiently reduced its power.

However—

Yorna: "—Hk!!"

Easily penetrating the cloak of earth, Arakiya's rays had pierced Yorna and Priscilla.

Blown away by the impact, Yorna dropped to the ground while screaming in agony. With all her strength, she instantly burrowed her stretched out feet in the ground to avoid an unsightly fall.

She could not afford to collapse, much less miserably falling on her back.

Yorna: "To lose the ones in love with me…"

The weight of the soul Yorna held was sustained by the presence of those that loved her.

Therefore, Yorna needed to respond to said love with all her might. To respond to love was not something to be done half-heartedly.

She must aspire to be appropriate in her movements, speech, conduct, and even emotions.

Whether it was in everyday life, in the bedroom, or in the middle of a battle, it was all the same.

—With a faint bang, the hairpin that held Yorna's hair in place shattered. Hanging on which were ornaments made of layering scales.

Priscilla: "Was that a gift from someone? Dear Mother."

Yorna: "—. It was a gift from my beloved children."

Shattered; Yorna caught the pieces of dust from the hair ornament with her fingers, and gently gazed upon them.

Most of the items that Yorna wore were gifts. Her kimono, footwear, and even her hair ornaments, be they woven, carved or molded, the inhabitants of the Demon City had gone to great lengths to craft these beautiful items with their own hands, which became imbued with the souls of their creators.

The ones that received Yorna's love received the capability to be crushed on her behalf to protect her in return.

Yorna: “You too?”

Priscilla: “Unfortunately, I do not boast the same fidelity as you, Dear Mother; merely what I have had on hand from the very beginning, the tribute from my already late husband.”

Saying this, Priscilla gently displayed her ear. In this motion, it was revealed that the green jeweled earring that should have been there had disappeared.

She too, had transferred her life force to those she loved, providing her a longer life.

Yorna: “Your husband? Priscilla, you also—”

Priscilla: “What a meek expression to make. These missing earrings, I received them from my fourth husband, I believe.”

Yorna: “Fourth…”

Priscilla: “Eight times I was bestowed a husband. Of course, that does not rival you, Dear Mother.”

At Priscilla, callously stating this unexpected answer, Yorna’s mouth was left agape from the shock. However, this shock was negated by Priscilla’s grasp of the radiant Yang Sword.

That strange phenomenon from earlier was.

Yorna: “Priscilla, if that is the Yang Sword, then it should be able to reach any opponent. Provided, their soul hasn’t been severed by the Life Sword…”

Priscilla: “Even without you telling me, Dear Mother, I am painstakingly aware of that. However, there is something you are mistaken about.”

Yorna: “Mistaken?”

Priscilla: “My Yang Sword burns what I wish to burn and slashes only what I wish to slash.”

Saying that, Priscilla slowly raised the tip of her Yang Sword.

What assembled beyond the tip of the Yang Sword, as Yorna followed it with her gaze, was Arakiya, scattered white light forming her figure little-by-little.

Reflecting the nature of the Spirit they had devoured, the Spirit Eaters were said to be able to house the strength they possessed in their bodies—While the true nature of this rare ability was unknown, the capability for its capabilities to be expanded upon was remarkable.

Just now, the principle behind transforming light into a body—by thinking it through, it became clear.

The Yang Sword that slashed what it wanted to slash, a treasured sword that could reach all things.

Priscilla: “—Is that fire, water, or wind? If that becomes indistinguishable from light or shadow, there is no doubt that it becomes difficult, even if I can still reach you.”

Arakiya: “…”

Priscilla’s crimson eyes narrowed, meeting the gaze of Arakiya whose eyes were the same color.

The owner of the Yang Sword that could reach all things, and the transcendent being, possessing the ability to transform into anything, confronting each other—.

Yorna: “I see, you were raised with quite a troublesome opponent.”

Had this been Chaosflame, Yorna may have been able to properly take down Arakiya.

But, this was not Chaosflame, and Yorna was hardly at full strength.

Therefore, the one to deliver the decisive blow was not Yorna but—

Priscilla: “At any time, it is I who resides at the center of the stage after all.”

The girl blazing red as the sun, who turned any hardships she faced into sustenance for herself, smiled graciously.

That smile was dazzling, even for Yorna who stood alongside her.

Set ablaze by Priscilla’s dazzle, if there was only a single being capable of remaining in her vicinity without being scorched to naught, for that being to be Arakiya, standing in Priscilla’s path, what an ironic twist of fate it was.

3

—Otto Suwen sensed a change in the direction of the wind.

At first it was a hunch, then it changed into an omen to be received, and finally it became a conviction.

The war situation that was gradually and slowly changing, moving, and tilting—As Otto opened the channels that were supposed to be kept closed and immersed himself in the task of picking up all kinds of “voices”, he was fluxing in a sense of omnipotence, as if he himself was at one with the world, and was fleeting.

Things that could only be found in such a situation were submerged in an overwhelming vortex of information. In order to retrieve them, one must dive deeper and deeper—

???: “—Otto-san!”

Otto: “—Hk.”

A voice from outside of his consciousness was heard very close by, and at the same time, a thirsting shock destroyed the whirlpool of “voices”.

It was as if a water tank had been broken and the water inside flowed out, as if grains of sand had been scooped up from a sandbox and spilled out through the cracks between one’s fingers; the “voices” escaped.

Though he felt empty without it, and finding himself regretful,

Otto: “Oh, my… Thank you for saving my life, Petra-chan…”

Petra: “You had a horrible complexion right now… Please wipe up your nosebleed.”

Otto: “Oh, that is a big help… I feel like I am bleeding just as much, though I am not fighting.”

Otto took the offered handkerchief and squeezed it against his nose.

The dripping blood was wetting the grass beneath his feet, and he was acutely aware of the heavy load that using his Divine Protection beyond its limits was putting on him. In fact, the amount of blood that had been spilled was seemingly no joke to him.

As expected, it was not as bad as when his legs were carved in Pristella, though.

Otto: “It comes quite a bit, if I try to dive far and deep…”

Petra: “Am I not being helpful?”

Otto: “No, if it was not for Petra’s support, it would probably be worse. The exhaustion of the interior of my head… I guess I should call it brain fatigue. And that is because it is pretty heavy.”

It was difficult for them to understand each other, even among those who possessed Divine Protections, but the way in which Divine Protections placed a burden on their users varied greatly depending on their effects. For example, the Divine Protection of Wind Evasion possessed by a ground dragon was almost a perfect type of Divine Protection with no flaws, except for the drastic difference in its burden between when it was deployed and when it was not.

Garfiel’s Divine Protection of Earth Spirits also had a positive effect while he was standing on the ground, but at the same time, it placed a high burden on his body in order to maintain his physical well-being.

It just happened that Garfiel was physically strong, so he was not affected by the negative effects, but if a normal human were to possess it, they would need to regularly take breaks and relieve the burden on their body by lifting their legs from the ground.

From that perspective, Otto's Divine Protection of the Soul of Language focused the majority of its burden on his brain.

Since the brain converted the "voices" of living beings that entered through his ears into voices that Otto could understand, it was natural for the burden to be concentrated there.

Otto was trying to pick up the "voices" that were normally kept closed off and grasp all the sounds he could hear.

Therefore, he asked for Petra to use her freshly learned yang magic to physically strengthen Otto's body, focusing particularly on his head.

For a skilled warrior, it was said that physical strengthening through mana was done naturally, but in this case it was being done through external interference.

Of course, even with the functions of one's head being strengthened with yang magic, Emilia's intuition would not suddenly become as sharp as Ram's. The expectation was that Petra's yang magic would improve Otto's endurance, rather than the functions of his brain.

By strengthening the capabilities of his brain, Petra would allow Otto to keep the channels open for longer, much like how improving cardiovascular function would allow someone to stay underwater for longer.

Without Petra's cooperation, the results would have been less than half of what they were then, without a doubt.

Otto: "That said, there are many times when I almost get too greedy and try to go deeper…"

Petra: "If I feel like you're in somewhat danger, I can just give you a slap to the best of my power, right?"

Otto chuckled at Petra, practicing her slap with reassuring readiness.

In fact, if Otto was in danger, it was in his best interest to have Petra pull him back. The fastest and surest way to do this was to forcibly disconnect the channel.

As he followed the sound of a "voice", he would begin to lose track of his own position.

Of course, the "voice" that Otto focused on naturally when he talked to Petra was the correct one, but if he lost sight of that connection, he would probably lose his ability to recognize languages.

If the closest voice became unrecognizable, Otto would have to keep the channel open forever in order to communicate with anyone. —If this were to happen, it would be easy to see a future in which even the mere sound of the wind or the rustling of clothes would be perceived as a "voice" and Otto would lose his sanity.

Otto: "When it becomes so, I too will become a member of the people who have lost their lives because of their Divine Protection like many others who had this same Divine Protection."

Though he was lucky enough to be able to overcome his childhood without dying, now he would lose his established self due to his own decision to open the channel.

Too many pitfalls in the way of life of a bearer of a Divine Protection.

Though it could be said that the more difficult the path was, the more rewarding it was—.

Petra: "So, what happened?"

Otto: "…The first and second bastions are useless. There is no one left that I can listen to. The first was burned to the ground, and the second… that is Emilia-sama's."

Petra: "Ah, Emilia-neesama…"

Petra reacted with a complicated face at Otto who was muttering with a handkerchief on his nose.

The first bastion was guarded by Arakiya, one of the highest-ranking members of the Nine Divine Generals. Her power, wielded through her Spirit, had burnt the entire field, causing the “voices” of all living things that Otto could have heard to be completely destroyed.

If birds, small animals, or insects had not survived, then even if Otto had opened up his channels, there would have been no “voices” for him to pick up in the first place.

Petra: “If the field is burnt, wouldn’t the ground beneath the surface be fine?”

Otto: “Even if they have survived, underground creatures often do not speak. Besides, as I told Petra-chan, the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language is…”

Petra: “It only allows you to understand the speech of audible creatures, it doesn’t make your ears better.”

Otto: “That is right.”

Otto nodded emphatically at Petra’s words, who was leaning in front of him.

As Petra had just said, Otto’s Divine Protection of the Soul of Language was only able to understand the “voices” he heard and allowed him to converse with others who spoke a different language.

In other words, the Divine Protection could not be employed properly unless living beings were in a location where their “voices” could be heard.

Petra’s application of her yang magic to strengthen Otto’s head also played a role here.

By having his hearing and listening abilities enhanced, he was able to pick up “voices” over a wider range than usual.

However—

Otto: “There is no chance for the first and second bastions anymore. They were burnt by Arakiya and frozen by Emilia-sama, respectively.”

Petra: “E-Emilia-neesama isn’t as malicious as to do that!”

Otto: “I know. And even if Emilia-sama had not done anything, the reaction from the others at the second bastion was already quite negative. —Probably because the other creatures were afraid of the dragonkin.”

Petra’s way of saying that malice did not exist in Emilia, rather than Emilia having no malicious intent, had been a perfectly fitting way for Petra to put it.

Since there was no malice present in Emilia, there was no way to display any. Regardless, with such shared views aside, Petra’s advocacy was also deceptively true.

The guardian of the second bastion was Madelyn Eschart, the dragonkin who had almost plunged the Fortress City into a state of total destruction—and was part of a demi-human race so exceedingly rare, people questioned its very existence.

Since the dragonkin were related to the Dragons, which reigned at the pinnacle of all existence, they were feared by animals, no matter how large or small, leaving them no choice but to flee.

Emilia lowering the temperatures in the area to extremely cold degrees conveyed the impression of a last-ditch effort.

Anyway—

Otto: “—As for the fifth bastion, Garfiel should handle it well. The fourth bastion is under constant attack by a group of Glow People. As instructed, the Weaponkin and Cyclops Tribe survivors will join them there.”

Petra: “And at the third, the Shudraqian people joined the other groups fighting the stone golems. What about the other way around the bastions you wanted to explore?”

Otto: “It looks like there is a direct path from the first bastion to the castle that had been filled up ahead of time somehow. I am unexpectedly getting sick of Abel-san guessing correctly.”

Petra: “But since someone doesn’t have to go and check it out, we can make the next move faster.”

After bringing the mental image of the “voice” distribution in order, he compared it with the map Petra spread out in front of him. Otto added the information he had just obtained to the map, which already had a number of characters drawn on it, and Petra assigned arrows and other markers to it.

With brain fatigue and even a strange feeling of heaviness, as if warm water was accumulating within his head, Petra’s presence was critical in pulling together these visually unshareable images.

For the Emilia camp, Petra’s inclusion might have been the most significant. At the very least, Otto took it as Subaru’s greatest achievement that Petra was here now.

Otto: “Since Natsuki-san is the reason we are doing this, it balances out to zero, but…”

With a deep, bloody breath forced out of his nose, Otto checked to see if his nasal passages were still open. Petra’s handkerchief was already stained with Otto’s blood.

Assuming he would buy a new handkerchief later and give it to her, Otto slowly got to the point of switching to a different channel.

There was—

???: “—Otto-chin! Petra-chan!”

Otto: “Ah, Medium-chan.”

A small figure ran to them in the meadow, waving her hands in a wide arc.

Her long blonde hair danced in the air as she ran restless across the battlefield. She ran in a straight line to Otto and Petra.

Medium: “You’ve been very helpful, Otto-chin! Abel-chin wants the next report!”

Otto: “I am absolutely sure that you did not mean to say that in a cute way; however, I appreciate it… if it helps you. There is nothing to be gained by giving something to someone who does not understand its value.”

Petra: “Why so sharp-tongued, Otto-san. Although it is understandable.”

Otto and Petra smiled slightly at Medium’s report, who had a twinkle in her eye.

Unintentionally, Medium had been acting as a soft intermediary in the chain of command—focusing on gathering information was reassuring for Otto since he could easily leave the management of that information to Abel and his group.

This was another scheme that would not have been possible without Medium.

Medium: “It might have been doable, but also more awkward, for sure.”

Otto: “Probably. Especially since Petra-cha… Lady Petra and I are the ones who have to take a hard stand against Abel-san.”

Medium: “—? Am I getting praised? Hooray!”

Otto and Petra’s exchange was met with great delight by Medium, who raised both hands in the air.

Slightly behind her were four soldiers who were sent to Otto and Petra to make contact with the main camp. This was probably a result of the importance Abel attached to the value of the information Otto brought.

Normally, it would be easier for Abel if Otto were also in the main camp.

Medium: “Otto-chin, you have to wander around to hear the “voices”, right?”

Petra: “It’s because Otto-san’s ears are not that big, you know.”

Otto: “Both are different ways of saying the same thing!”

In contrast to Medium’s ingenuous remark, Petra responded with banter, yet both were tricky in their own regard. Although, it was generally true, so there was no denying it.

At any rate, they handed over the map they had just drawn to the messengers and received a new map in return that reflected the ongoing changes in the state of the battle.

Otto: “Please use this well. There are a few typographical errors, but the arrows and other symbols that the Lady added should be understandable.”

Messenger: “Understood. Be cautious for scouts, Analyst-dono.”

Otto: “Analyst…”

Otto looked bitter at the title given to him, along with the map they exchanged.

First a peddler, then an Internal Affairs Minister, then a Warrior-Grade Head Internal Affairs Minister, and now an Analyst. How many positions would he have to hold before the Royal Selection was concluded?

Or would these troubles continue to haunt him even after the Royal Selection was concluded?

Otto: “I guess I should put such blissful worries off to the side.”

At the very least, the tomorrow Otto envisioned would not come to pass unless he completed what was in front of him.

Tomorrow was something Otto had no choice but to face on his own.

That was why—

Petra: “Otto-san, let’s move.”

Otto: “Dear me, how about a minute’s rest, my Lady?”

Petra: “Says the person who usually doesn’t rest even when someone tells him to. You can drink until you pass out when everything is done, so try to do your best.”

Otto: “That makes me sound like the biggest drunkard in the world!”

When Otto raised his voice about the reputational repercussions, Petra stuck out her tongue to gloss over it.

In such a way, he was feeling cared for without becoming too serious; Otto slapped himself on the cheek free from blood stains to regain his focus.

He was not sure whether he wanted to ask Petra or Garfiel how frightened he looked or if he could even afford it.

All of those things were normally the responsibility of Subaru, who was not there.

Otto: “I might as well get the victory benefits. That is why—”

Immediately after Otto opened up the channel to gather more information.

A loud noise shook Otto’s mind.

Otto: “…”

Petra: “—Otto-san?”

Seeing Otto’s stiffened face, Petra called his name.

However, Petra’s voice did not reach Otto’s ears. It was because they were covered with deafening screams filling up the world.

Otto: “Ugh, ah…?!”

In an instant, Otto’s mind felt like it was boiling over, and he held his head in shock. However, just before his consciousness was blown away, Otto managed to just barely hold out.

Terrible screams still engulfed the world.

The reason was—

Otto: “—Ah.”

As Otto was struck by the sudden shock, the two girls, Petra and Medium, looked at the sky and dropped their jaws.

Before the sight of those girls, as it fell straight from the sky to the ground, majestically spreading its wings just before it crashed—was a presence that, even from a distance, conveyed a palpable sense of why the world screamed.

It was no wonder why every living thing in the world screamed.

???: “A Dragon…”

It was not clear whether it was Petra, Medium, or one of the messenger soldiers who said this.

Otto could say for certain that it wasn’t himself.

Why was it that—

Otto: “—!”

At the moment when everyone on the battlefield was captivated by the white Dragon that had appeared, there were only two people whose consciousness were not stolen by its presence—one of them, Otto, pulled Petra with one hand, while pushing Medium’s shoulder with the other.

Petra: “—Kyaa!”

Petra let out a scream and collapsed onto Otto’s chest, who had fallen backwards forcefully. In the lower part of his vision, the pushed back Medium had fallen onto her rear.

Those were the minimum evasive actions Otto could do at that moment.

—A mass of red-hot flames scorched the air as it passed over the heads of the grounded Otto and Petra as well as Medium sitting on her butt.

Petra: “AAAAAHHHH!!”

After being pulled down, Petra’s slender throat let out a scream.

But being able to scream was a kind of safety signal. If the situation had been more horrendous than that, there would not even have been time to scream.

In fact, just like the messenger soldiers who were out of Otto’s reach.

Otto: “…”

A mass of flame flew over the heads of Otto and the girls, while hitting the messenger soldier holding the map.

In the next moment, the entire body of that soldier clad in a red and black military uniform was instantly burnt to a crisp. Due to the map in hand, there was no chance to prevent it.

And, upon catching sight of such devastation, they were not even permitted to raise their voices in astonishment.

???: “—! Watch out!”

Immediately after the girl’s high-pitched scream came the sound of steel striking steel echoing through the air.

The one who spoke up was Medium despite being pushed by Otto. She straightened her long childlike legs from her sitting position and pulled out a barbarian sword from behind her waist in a low posture.

Yet, she still managed to bounce back the deadly blade descending upon Otto with all her might.

Petra: “Stand up, Otto-san!”

Otto stumbled forward as Petra pulled him up by the arm.

When he stepped back and looked behind him, he saw Medium, with both of her hands gripping a barbaric sword too large for her petite frame, as she stared down the assailant head-on.

Then—

???: “—My bad, my bad, and here I was going to get them all at once.”

Saying that, the grumbling man who faced Medium—was the only one apart from Otto who consciously ignored the presence of the white Dragon creating this abnormal situation on the battlefield.

It was an Imperial Soldier with a bandana wrapped around his head. He held a long-handled one-handed axe and judging from his armband, he was not a high-ranking opponent.

A common soldier. The question was, why was that man here?

While his channel was focused, he had remained vigilant.

So how had this man managed to avoid Otto’s monitoring of “voices”?

With the utmost caution possible, Otto protected Petra behind him with his arm and glared at the man facing Medium.

Otto: “No mercy for women and children? That’s pretty barbaric, don’t you think?”

Todd: “It’s easy to just answer “There are no women or children in the battlefield”, but that would fit the residents of the Imperial Capital perfectly. Besides, wouldn’t that be a bit too convenient?”

Otto: “Convenient?”

Todd: “If you were non-combatants who’d just been left behind on the battlefield, your current logic might’ve held. But I don’t recognize a man who serves on the battlefield as a non-combatant.”

He was the type of person who would mercilessly ambush with full intent to kill them.

It was unlikely that a reasonable negotiation would have worked from the beginning, but in the face of his thoroughness, it could be said that hope was completely dashed.

But still, it did not make sense.

Otto: “Me and these kids are here for work? And what kind of work, so far away from the camp…?”

Todd: “Who knows. But my gut is telling me. You’re the root of all evil in this war. And my gut also tells me this.”

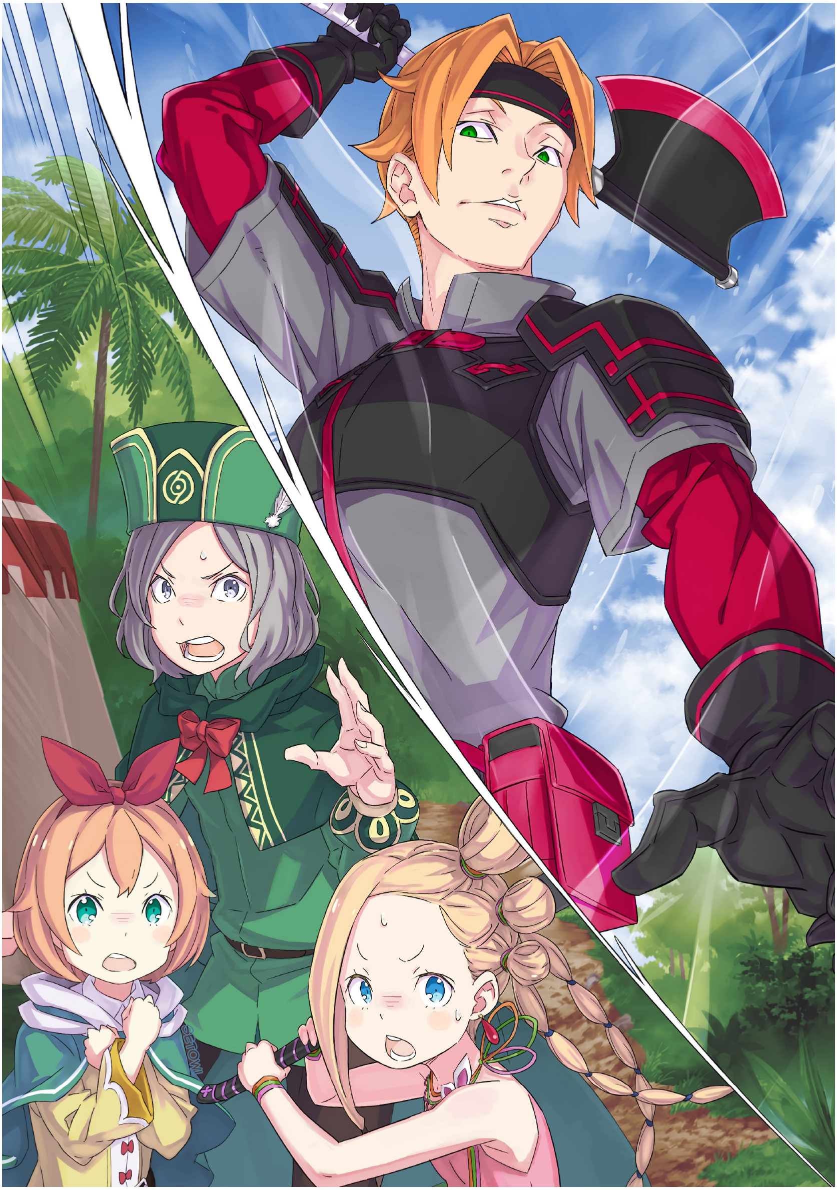
Otto: “…Such as?”

The man who looked at Otto and the others in a nonchalant, dismissive manner cut off his words there at once.

When Otto urged him onward, the man looked at the three of them in turn and,

Todd: “—It’s better not to waste time with you guys either.”

His axe swung with that pronouncement, gleaming as it mercilessly aimed to take the lives of Otto, Petra, and Medium.



Chapter 96:
Painting with Deep Love

1

—One of the Nine Divine Generals, the Steelman, Moguro Hagane.

That fact that they were not truly a Steelfolk was known to only a select few even within the Vollachian Empire.

Originally, the bodies of the Steelfolk were composed of inorganic substances like minerals and metals, and they were born as beings in the space between people and objects. It was conceivable that the Weaponkin, whose bodies possessed one part made out of metal, were a race that branched out from the Steelfolk, and there were many parts of their abnormal ecology that were obscure.

Although they were not as rare as the dragonkin, the Steelfolk were distinguished from human tribes not only in appearance, but also in mentality, so in the sense that they were more difficult to communicate with, they overwhelmed the dragonkin.

Existences more difficult to make contact with than spirits, which could be conversed with if one had certain training, those were the Steelfolk.

Henceforth, climbing to the top of the Empire at the seat of a General First-Class, and also being said to be easier to contact than the other problem-riddled Divine Generals, Moguro was recognized as a heretic from within the Steelfolk.

However, that was not the case in reality, and Moguro took advantage of their own outward appearance, as well as the special trait of lacking involvement with others from the Steelfolk tribe, and was an existence who merely self-proclaimed themself as the Steelman.

So then, regarding the true identity of Moguro Hagane, Abel considered this as an absolute truth.

—It was certain that within this decisive battle to capture the Imperial Capital, Moguro would be the greatest obstacle.

2

???: "…"

Launched up by an impact that seized his whole body, he met eyes with an excessively mighty being.

Immediately after, he received another blow; he could not avoid the future of his life being scattered, and he was convinced that he had finally reached the final destination of his fate.

—That was what should have happened.

???: "Cough—Hk."

His lungs, deflated to the utmost limits, expanded, and that pain reawakened Heinkel's consciousness.

His interrupted consciousness returned, and the first thing he felt was the firm and large sensation of his back being supported—it was the ground. Launched up to the sky, his body which should have been flying through the sky was on top of the ground.

Recognizing that fact, bewilderment occupied the insides of his head. For what reason? How? What had happened?

Only, at the same time as his brain had comprehended that he was still alive—

Heinkel: "My sword is…"

In the empty hand of his body, besieged with pain, there was no feeling of a sword's hilt. Even when his other hand immediately reached out to his waist, there was no weight in the scabbard that hung there.

Turning his head, within his vision that was being vigorously shaken along with his brain by the loud ringing in his ears, in a place some ways away from him, Heinkel saw his sword thrust into the earth at a slant, and leaked out a breath.

That it had vanished, or it had been lost, he felt his entire body bouncing around as if his heart had become those unthinkable feelings of unease—

Heinkel: "—Fuck."

Since he had gone through all those things, he began to hate himself for worrying over losing the sword.

The fluctuation of his heart in that moment seemed like a representation of his half-assed self.

Heinkel: "Just what…"

As the causes for him to hate himself increased, Heinkel broke away from his loathsome sentimentality.

He was not dead. He still lived. However, that in itself was a strange thing.

At that moment, Heinkel had met eyes with an existence which introduced itself as a Divine General, and a definite intent to kill had been directed towards him. —It had clearly declared that it would kill him.

In truth, having been launched up to the sky, then from there, being scattered by another attack with nothing he could do, Heinkel's life should have been lost.

For what reason had that not come to fruition? Seeking that answer, he looked around—

Heinkel: "—Ah?"

Unconsciously, an astonished voice slipped out.

However, that was a matter of course. What Heinkel saw was absurd enough to warrant that. It was far, far too detached from reality.

—The world itself was divided in two from where Heinkel was, and separate hells were unfolding.

On the right sky, the massive clouds formed from the bright red flames engulfed the scorching world.

On the left sky, the majestic figure of a colossal scale, clad in clouds of pure white, spread its wings as it lorded over the frozen lands.

Heinkel: “A burning sky, and a white Dragon…”

Gazing at the sight which should not have been there, Heinkel muttered in blank amazement.

It was possible that he had been mistaken when he felt he had not died. This sight made it seem like Heinkel was already dead, and that was why he was seeing this kind of world.

Heinkel: “—Hk.”

At the world which went beyond what he could take in, thoughts of wishing to escape reality threw him into disorder.

That which had done so to Heinkel, causing his whole body to straighten up after lying down on the ground, was the black shadow which suddenly came over him.

No way, he did not want to think that there was a second Dragon passing right above him, but—

Heinkel: “Woaaaaaah—!”

Looking up to the sky, Heinkel’s throat screamed as he saw the origin of the shadow.

Passing over him with a tremendous force, flying through the sky as it spun, was an enormous boulder that could be mistaken for a house—Even then, it was not just one or two.

One after another, the throwing stones of an abnormal scale passed over his head, clad in an extremely strong wind, they flew from above Heinkel’s head towards where his feet were pointed.

And then, at the end of where they were headed—

Heinkel: "…"

The impact of the crash quaked the world, and it shook Heinkel's buttocks, giving him the impression that the ground was coughing violently.

As those were continuously fired out, reverberating upon their crash, Heinkel got up from that place in a panic.

The one who was continuously being targeted by those boulders, suffering direct hits one after the other, was the figure who was also on an abnormal scale—standing up, it was the rampart itself.

Heinkel: "…Moguro Hagane."

That was one of the nine most feared people within this Empire, and from what he could see, Heinkel felt that with his whole body and soul.

What he saw just before his consciousness was blown away, he thought that it might have been an optical illusion, or a hallucination he saw when paralyzed by fear, but it had been neither.

—With a large body that probably exceeded tens of meters, quite literally as the third bastion that Heinkel and the others originally were supposed to capture, Moguro blocked their way.

Literally, yes, quite literally.

Perhaps this very situation was an existence in this world most suitable for the word "literally".

In that place, the rampart had gotten up on its knees and taken the shape of a golem, and using the pavements from the upheaved farmland as its own arms and torso, it carried out an unbelievable defensive measure.

Swarming at the feet of that massive body were the stone golems, which Heinkel had cut down when he had gotten desperate, and the giant fist struck downwards from above their heads was just like a town crashing down.

Heinkel: "…"

Aiming for that massive body, were the large boulders which had been fired countless times just a bit before.

Those were from both the stone pits along the way to the site of the decisive battle, the Imperial Capital, as well as the rocks prepared from the crumbled cliffs of the steep mountains to be used in the siege.

So then, continuing to throw those towards the large Moguro, were those who were awaiting an opportunity to attack from back at the stronghold—

Heinkel: "—The subordinates of Yorna Mishigure."

To be precise, they were the citizens of the Demon City of Chaosflame who Yorna directed.

Races with horns and lizardmen, beastmen and those from the Multi-Leg Tribe, they were a mixed force without a sense of unity, and there was only one thing in common which tied them together into an assembled formation.

—Each one of them housed a red flame in one of their eyes, and housed within was their high morale, that could be said to be what they had in common.

This was also quite literally, a group whose fighting spirit burned within their eyes, and several of them were able to lift up the unbelievably big boulders, and were able to throw them across an outrageous distance.

However, even if one said that Moguro suffered a direct hit from those large boulders, Heinkel's judgement was somewhat doubtful.

Of course, through the direct hits of those large boulders, Moguro's construction of the rampart and farmland crumbled, and was broken. However, in order to repair those broken parts, Moguro made the boulders crashing against him into the next materials which formed its massive body, and was certainly offsetting the attacks.

Even when looking from afar, the meaninglessness of those attacks was deeply communicated.

Even so, the reason why they still did not cease to throw them was plain and simple. —While their attacks were keeping Moguro's large body at bay, the other rebels were fiercely attacking.

Heinkel: "…Foolish."

Heinkel had also heard it. That this third bastion had the weakest defense compared to the other bastions.

However, that would have been before Moguro had erected like that, and began to use its entire massive body to block their way. Despite that, the strategy had not been updated, and the rebels who had chosen to withdraw from the other battlefields were converging, and even now they continued to swell up their military strength here.

In the midst of that, the People of Shudraq, who Heinkel had fought alongside with, were also present.

Heinkel: "Foolish."

Heinkel's deep feelings had leaked out with a sound more clear than before.

Foolish. It could not be called anything but foolish. What else was there to say? Looking right or looking left, looking up or looking down, looking forward or looking back, there was nothing to see but hell.

Just what else could Heinkel have possibly said?

Heinkel: "You-you're all out of your fucking minds… You guys! Everyone! What the hell is wrong with all of you!!"

Before he realized it, Heinkel had jumped towards his sword, thrust into the ground, in order to cling on to it.

Putting his weight onto the hilt of the sword thrust into the ground, he grit his teeth as he exhorted his trembling knees. What was wrong with everybody? He was unable to understand their mentality.

Like he thought, he could not do it. He could not do it, he could not do it, he could not do it, there was nothing he could do.

Heinkel: "What the hell, is wrong with all of you…"

While powerlessly leaning against his sword, Heinkel's throat feebly trembled.

In the surroundings of Heinkel, who had limply lowered his head, the world was shaken by the flames, by the Dragon, and by the huge army. Was it really such a sin for him to not fight against all that?

In that case—

Heinkel: "I…"

It was directly after Heinkel had let that leak out.

The sound of nimble hooves resounded, and the chestnut-colored Galewind Horse passed by Heinkel's side as it stomped on the ground. As his red-hair swayed in the wind produced by that Galewind Horse, Heinkel looked up.

And then—

Heinkel: "…"

For but a moment, Heinkel exchanged gazes with the man with a spherical hairstyle, who sat atop the Galewind Horse.

It was Zikr Osman. Working as the right-hand man of Abel, giving orders to the rebels from the stronghold, while he was also a General of the Vollachian Empire, he was a part of the rebellion against the country.

He himself had declared that his fighting skill with his sword was poor, and from Heinkel's point of view, his individual war potential was really difficult to count, but he had overtaken Heinkel.

—The moment Zikr passed him, he left a scornful gaze upon Heinkel, who had bent his knees here.

Heinkel: "I really…"

Going past Heinkel, who had bent his knees, the Galewind Horse ran towards the battlefield.

As if to follow the majestic figure of Zikr, the rebels who had gathered from various warfronts headed forwards. Towards Moguro Hagane's rampart, they charged forth.

As he watched them, Heinkel still continued to lean on his sword, unable to move.

And as he was unable to move—

Heinkel: "…It's just like I thought, I really can't do it, Louanna."

3

When he overtook the red-haired swordsman, who bent his knee on the battlefield and hung his head as if his fighting spirit was disheartened, what flashed through the mind of Zikr Osman was sympathy for following the natural course of life.

The brave woman of crimson who introduced herself as Priscilla Barielle had boldly taken part in this rebellion. The swordsman, participating in the war as her follower, was probably not even a person of the Vollachian Empire.

It was far too cruel to impose the Empire's way of being that the people of the Empire must be strong on a guy like him.

Zikr: "I can hardly say that I myself follow that way of being."

Sword in hand, Zikr self-deprecated as he shook atop the back of his beloved horse, Leidy.

He was currently feigning bravery like this, but it had been largely due to the power that the previous generations of House Osman had accumulated that Zikr had taken up the seat of General.

If Zikr was not part of a lineage of military men, and he had to work his way from the ranks of private like the other soldiers, then he, without any skill in the sword, would probably not have been able to find any success in life.

It was not that he lamented that. Of course, Zikr was a man of the Empire.

Due to that, he swung his sword on the front lines, and the first time he swung it, his heart yearned for him to exist in a way reminiscent of the Nine Divine Generals, who would be able to alter the war situation.

However, to make sure that nobody would be able to take up Zikr's position, Zikr was once again unable to feign reality by turning that yearning into his personal matter.

Therefore—

Zikr: "—I am a Second Class-General of the Empire, the Coward, Zikr Osman!!"

Raising his voice to a loud volume, his beloved horse galloped across the battlefield where a tremendous change had been accomplished.

In most cases, Leidy was used to light sprints for the purposes of both strolls and military campaigns, however, this time she could guess what Zikr was feeling, so she displayed the best sprint of her life.

At seeing his beloved horse put on a brave sprint, completely irrelevant from her fear and anxiety, Zikr could only fall in love again.

Leidy's excessively beautiful sprint ignored Zikr's unaccustomed war speech, and sparked a flame in the hearts of many rebels as she continued to dash.

Zikr: “Glow People on the right wing! Weaponkin on the left wing! Everyone, move in accordance with the orders! Everyone else, follow me! We shall defeat the Steelman, Moguro Hagane!”

Everyone: “YEAHHHHHHH—!!”

Hearing Zikr’s orders, the assembled military strength roared as they charged towards Moguro. The boulders which flew overhead were thrown by the volunteer soldiers who Yorna loved dearly, as a means of providing cover.

If those drew Moguro’s attention, and a disturbance was yielded in the command of the stone golems, and above all else, if the charge of Zikr and the others reached its feet, their aim would be successfully accomplished.

???: “Fire—!!”

A valiant shout could be heard in the distance, and the fired arrows rained down on the stone golems blocking the way, sewing them to the ground.

Commencing from far away, having opened up a distance on Zikr’s orders, was the overwhelming display of offensive ability by means of the People of Shudraq’s archery, and the archery of the rebels skilled in the bow.

He accepted the cover from the beautiful and high spirited women, and pushed forward. Including the battle formation that those women had reasonably lowered, it seemed too good to be true, so Zikr clenched his molars.

Zikr: “No, if anything is too good to be true, it would be that blessing.”

Gripping his sword tight, looking towards its drawn blade, Zikr slightly loosened the corners of his lips.

Right before he departed for battle, the one to bestow Zikr with a blessing as he visited the camp enclosure, was the sweet girl whose eyes somewhat inspired a sense of reverence—Just as if it was a gaze that had lived an amount of time unimaginable to Zikr, it graciously met his entreaty.

It was not that the Coward had been blown away.

Only, thinking about the duty he must accomplish himself, Zikr wished for a blessing. Even if there was only a slight chance, he had wanted to rely on his superstitions.

???: “General Second-Class Zikr! Please fall back! We can handle things here!!”

Zikr: “Do not speak nonsense! There is no path of retreat! Nor is there room to fall back! I shall also move forward!!”

???: “—Hk.”

Straddling his Galewind Horse, he shook his head at the appeal of the soldier riding next to him; Zikr would not abandon his duty.

For a moment, the subordinate attempted to say something, but he did not get in the way of Zikr’s determination any further. Grateful for that consideration, he tightly, tightly gripped the reins.

???: “Hah! To think that General Second-Class Zikr Osman, the Womanizer, would proceed to the front lines!”

Then, opposite of the subordinate riding next to him, a figure sprinting at the same speed as a Galewind Horse caught up to them. Looking at him, he was wearing an eyepatch, a soldier wielding twin swords—Jamal Aurélie.

He became a prisoner of war during the fall of the Fortress City, and after that, since he displayed strong loyalty towards His Excellency the Emperor Vincent Vollachia, he was taken under the command of Zikr as a swordsman.

Zikr: “Private First-Class Jamal, how is their response?”

Jamal: “The fucking best! Whether I look left or right or directly in front, there’s a fuck ton of enemies! I’m having an absolute blast!”

Zikr: “Ahh, it is indeed quite magnificent. It is the honor of an Imperial soldier. From here, I intend on removing General First-Class Moguro from the seat of Eighth, so will you follow me?!"

Jamal: "Only if you order me! If you want, I can head over there and open up the path!"

An uncouth yet charming smile emerged on his face, and Jamal accelerated after saying that. He easily overtook Leidy's speed, and charged right into the group of stone golems directly in front of them.

While chasing after his back, on the other side of Zikr thinking his bravery was reliable, he felt guilty for taking him along. — However, he immediately discarded that hesitation.

He would fulfill what he needed to do in the place that he needed to do it.

That had been requested of him, so it was none other than Zikr himself who desired to meet those requests.

What remained was—

Zikr: "—Your Excellency, you are free to do as you wish."

Indeed, it had been practically at the same time as when Zikr offered up a prayer.

—The Crystal Palace of the Imperial Capital Lupugana, the Magic Crystals upon its summit began to glow.

4

—In this decisive battle for the Imperial Capital, there were several people painting over the picture Abel had painted.

One of them was the existence of Priscilla, who joined the battle of the first bastion which Yorna Mishigure faced.

One of them was Otto, who through use of his Divine Protection, demonstrated his ability to gather information on the details of the war situation.

One of them was Garfiel, who instead of being in a deadlock with Kafma Irulux, was able to crush him.

One of them was Emilia, who angered Madelyn Eschart more than had been assumed, and caused her to invoke the Cloud Dragon.

And yet, even if that added some change in the coloration of the picture Abel had painted, they were not incidents that greatly changed its final form.

If one of the five bastions on the points of the star-shaped ramparts that defended the Imperial Capital were to be broken through, then there were means to seize victory even if the other bastions were locked in stalemate.

For those who painted over the picture, the main reason why it could not be swayed, no matter what they did, was Moguro Hagane —No, it was the Meteor which governed the Crystal Palace, the heart of the Vollachian Empire.

The Crystal Palace which boasted beauty of preeminent status within the world, the magic crystals that formed the crystal portion of the palace were especially pure even among magic stones, and it made the palace itself into a weapon to attack outside enemies.

The mana stored within the palace could be passed through the magic crystals located everywhere in the building to amplify it, and then be released through the Magic Crystal Cannon installed on the highest layer of the Crystal Palace.

That power was able to bring about enough destruction to wipe out the entirety of a large city, and in the past, when it had been used hundreds of years prior—Legends say that its target had been a Great Disaster.

Henceforth, the Magic Crystal Cannon of the Crystal Palace remained only a thing of legends, but since the existence of the real thing had been known, it had been serviced to be made possible to use, so the threat was restored.

As irony would have it, that Magic Crystal Cannon had become a fang pointed towards Abel himself, but as long as it was present, there was a high probability that the war situation of the decisive battle of the Imperial Capital could be easily overturned.

Therefore, no matter what, there was a need for this Magic Crystal Cannon to be fired.

That too, was not a decisive blow in order to change the war situation, but part of the damages taken into his consideration.

For that purpose—

Abel: "—Will you desert and run away, Zikr Osman?"

That was what Abel had asked Zikr, who mounted his Galewind Horse, and headed towards the battlefield of the third bastion.

Zikr had a choice. Managing the rebels who had chosen to move away from the battles of the other bastions, and converge on the third bastion, raising their morale, facing the massive body of Moguro, who blocked the way, he had the choice to desert that warfront.

However, Abel had a hunch that he would likely not choose that.

Was it because of Zikr's prudence as the Coward, who feared even the slightest possibility that his goal would not be fulfilled, or was it perhaps because he was one of the brave and righteous members of the Imperial Army?

Whichever it was, Abel, who was not Zikr, could not surmise.

However, whatever the reason for his determination may be, Abel would not discourage it.

The life or death of Zikr was a position which held no final impact on the picture that Abel had painted.

Speaking on the grand-scale of things, ultimately, within his picture, even the life or death of Abel himself—.

???: "—Reporting from the lookout! The Magic Crystal Cannon of the Crystal Palace is beginning to operate!”

Abel: “…”

???: “Its target, the third bastion!!”

The resoundement of the bellowing voice throughout the stronghold was proof of Abel’s aim being fulfilled.

The Magic Crystal Cannon was fired upon it. Upon the third bastion—that is to say, mowing down the battlefield of Moguro, who had turned into the rampart itself, it would likely wipe out the rebels in one fell swoop.

Even if that happened, as long as Moguro’s true body of the Crystal Palace was going strong, then neither would the Steelman, Moguro Hagane, be defeated, nor would the third bastion be overcome.

However, the Imperial Capital would forfeit the firepower of the Magic Crystal Cannon, which had the ability to overturn any war situation.

Everything was for that purpose, after all, it had been painted on that illustration.

Therefore—

???: “—There is something unusual in the line of fire of the Magic Crystal Cannon!!”

Abel: “…What?”

—Upon the moment his plan had succeeded, that report was an incident completely outside Abel’s hypothesis.

5

—In this decisive battle for the Imperial Capital, there were several people painting over the picture Abel had painted.

One of them was the existence of Priscilla, who joined the battle of the first bastion which Yorna Mishigure faced.

One of them was Otto, who through use of his Divine Protection, demonstrated his ability to gather information on the details of the war situation.

One of them was Garfiel, who instead of being in a deadlock with Kafma Irulux, was able to crush him.

One of them was Emilia, who angered Madelyn Eschart more than had been assumed, and caused her to invoke the Cloud Dragon.

And then—

???: "—Impossible."

In the distance, beyond the hulking, writhing city walls of Moguro Hagane, lay the Crystal Palace, the very heart of the beloved Imperial Capital and the symbol of the Vollachian Empire's authority.

At the top of that beautiful palace, only a few people even knew of that weapon, and in fact, even the General did not know of the existence of the Magic Crystal Cannon until he had heard about it from Abel.

Zikr Osman risked his life to make them misfire that single, precious shot of this decisive weapon that, if fired, would cleave the horizon and completely disrupt the tide of battle.

Riding his beloved horse across the front lines, he appealed loudly that they had the chance to win the battle, and while rallying up the rebels, he appealed for their support in order to get the Magic Crystal Cannon to focus on them.

All this in order to mislead them into believing that this was the best opportunity to make a decisive change in the battle.

Hence, the moment the pinnacle of the Crystal Palace glowed, Zikr was convinced that he had accomplished the task.

His mind was filled with images of his mother, of his elder sisters, and of his younger sisters, those women so crucial to the formation of his own self, and he even smiled at how much like him that was.

A prayer far too beautiful to let die in one's embrace, a demise that was supposed to come peacefully, but was replaced with astonishment before the wide-eyed Zikr.

Because of—

Zikr: "—Miss Beatrice?"

6

Beatrice: "Figured this is what it would be, in fact."

Beatrice muttered to herself while in free fall, her dress and long curly hair fluttering in the air.

When confronted by Zikr, who had come to Beatrice and the others' camp tent to ask for her blessing as a warrior, Beatrice had a gut feeling that he intended to die.

Four hundred years ago, in that time of constant warfare, there were many with the same look in their eyes.

Back then, Beatrice was not able to reach out to them. Some did not want to be reached out to, and some did not know how to reach out.

Perhaps even if Beatrice were to repeat that time again, it would be hard to imagine that she could have approached it better.

Surely she would experience the same helplessness again, watching them go to their deaths.

But that is—

Beatrice: "—No reason to do the same here today, I suppose."

???: "Aa, u!"

With their characteristic pattern, Beatrice's eyes faced forward, and there was a little girl holding Beatrice's thin shoulders from behind as if she were holding her tightly.

Beatrice did not forgive the little girl with golden hair and blue eyes.

It was true that her actions, unknown to her, had made many people miserable.

But still, for this one moment, she thought.

For this one moment, she believed in some other feeling other than the “naïveté” of Natsuki Subaru.

Beatrice: “…”

Beatrice and the little girl—Louis were high up in the sky, even higher than the city walls.

After a series of short range “teleports”, as if with no other means, Louis brought Beatrice to this place as if to prove her worthiness.

Just now, Louis demonstrated her worth.

In which case, Beatrice was next to respond to those deeds.

Beatrice: “Betty can just see everyone’s angry faces, in fact.”

Angry, or perhaps concerned, but in the end, still angry.

Beatrice’s lips suddenly relaxed as the loving faces of her companions came to her.

But, there was no choice not to do it. Because Beatrice was—

Beatrice: “Betty is Subaru’s partner, I suppose.”

At the moment she muttered those words, the entirety of the beautiful Palace, visible from a distance, glowed with a dazzling light so bright that it was able to transform the shape of the world, aiming at the rebels who were pushing forward on the ground in a straight line.

Zikr and his men, who were leading the charge, would be engulfed by the shot that would be far too destructive for them. Interrupting the line of fire with Louis, Beatrice clasped her hands together in front of her chest.

And then—

Beatrice: “—Al Shamak.”

—Then, the hole into another world that swallowed even the light that would change the world, opened then closed.

SETOWI

7

How many were there that could have properly grasped the events of that instant?

In truth, if things had come to pass as Abel had painted them, the damage would have been enormous, even if it had been within the range of what had been expected, the impact it would have provoked on those fighting at the other bastions would be immeasurable.

However, the Magic Crystal Cannon did not deliver the damage it was intended to unleash, and Zikr Osman, having been ready to sacrifice himself, continued on with that same vigor and began to fight the horde of stone golems.

The descent of the Cloud Dragon Mezoreia and Emilia's battle with Madelyn who had brought it along continued, and the aged skill of The Vicious Old Man Olbart was cornering Garfiel.

Yorna, The Flamboyant, and Priscilla, a mother and daughter, were forced into a fierce battle by The Spirit Eater Arakiya, who had decided to shake off everything to achieve her own ends. Otto and Petra, who had planned to establish control of the battlefield and, in fact, accomplished it partly, confronted the malice along with Medium.

There was no significant impact on the state of those battles.

Merely, the possibility that the state of those battles would substantially lean unfavorably was now lost.

In exchange for this tremendous achievement—

Louis: "Ua! Ahu! Auu!"

The presence of the little girl in Louis's arms faded as she fluttered through the air in a tight embrace.

It was, quite literally, the sight of the little girl's figure gradually fading away. As if to deny it, Louis embraced the girl, Beatrice, but it served no purpose.

As if scattering into the air, Beatrice's body was about to turn into light.

Louis: "Aa! Aa, AaAa!"

Screaming, Louis tried hard to deny the situation before her eyes.

But no amount of lamenting and screaming could stop the crumbling of Beatrice's existence.

In order to save the lives of many, she blew into the beyond the light of destruction that was released.

As compensation for that overwhelming power, Beatrice's existence had become disperse. Even if one reached out their fingers to the light waning from as if it were being peeled off, those fingers would not be blocked, instead passing through.

Louis: "Aa…!!"

With tears welling up in her ragged, wide blue eyes, Louis screamed.

Screaming, screaming, even though screaming did not help, she screamed desperately .

There was nothing else she could do, and she could not find anything more she could do, so she screamed.

And so she frantically screamed and ranted and raved—.

Louis: "—a?"

With a plop, her large tears scattered freely into the air, and then Louis turned her face away from her face, and out into the distance.

Embracing Beatrice in her arms, she looked not at the little girl about to disappear, not at the sky that had turned white, not at the sky that had turned red, not at the ground where many people were shouting in anger, but at this moment, forgetting everything that formed the battlefield, she looked out into the distance.

And then, she leaped toward that distance.

Louis: “U—”

Midair, the distance that she could leap at a time was about ten meters; using it over and over again in a sequence placed a strain on her organs, like they were being squeezed, but she did not care.

Taking on all of the burdens that would be placed on Beatrice, Louis leaped.

She leaped, leaped, leaped, leaped, leaped, leaped, leaped, and then finally—

Louis: “…”

Upon reaching the ground, Louis fell forward as if crouching. Ignoring the general lethargy of her body, Louis held up the incredibly light little girl in her arms in front of her.

Beatrice, whose very presence was becoming thinner and thinner, was put in front of her.

And then—

Louis: “Uau…”

???: “—I know. The two of you, you’re both being too reckless.”

Then, suddenly, there was a sigh that sounded like a bitter laugh, and the little girl was snatched away from her outstretched arms. — No, she was not taken from her. She was gently held up.

Then, Beatrice’s body was embraced in front of the kneeling Louis’s eyes.

It was there, in the arms of the black-haired boy who was there, that he gently, cherishingly, tightly held her.

Receiving this embrace, visibly so full of love, the girl who had accomplished a great task, her eyelids framed by long eyelashes trembled, and her eyes slowly opened.

Then her eyes, with their distinctive pattern, flickered—

Beatrice: "—You left me so worried, in fact."

???: "Yeah, I love you too."

To that whispered deep affection, he responded with proud deep love, and the hands that should have been joined became joined.

The boy laughed in front of Louis, who was watching it from the front row and letting out a small exhale.

He laughed and said,

???: "Well, shall we begin? —Bring it on, oh inevitable fate."

Bonus Short Stories

The Land of Wolves: Death unto the Weak, No Mercy VII

1

“You said you lost your memories, but exactly how much is missing?”

The one asking the question was Katya, who sat across the table, after having had meals brought to her room for them to eat. With a mouth full of potato, Rem’s eyes widened as she placed a hand over her mouth.

It was in the Imperial Capital of Lupugana—in the mansion of Berstetz Fondalfon, the Imperial Prime Minister—where Rem had been taken to and placed under house arrest. Here she had been given the role of Flop’s caretaker—an injured person also under confinement. But outside of healing Flop’s wounds with magic, Rem did whatever she wanted with her time, and in the past few days had grown quite close to Katya, who sat opposite her now.

Katya had also been placed under house arrest for reasons unknown—she was a captive just like Rem—and Rem’s nature was such that she couldn’t leave her alone; they had gotten closer to the extent that they shared meals like this, but…

“…What is it?” questioned Katya. “I won’t get annoyed even if you make me wait until you swallow that.”

“…Okay, I’ve swallowed it,” replied Rem. “No, I wasn’t thinking about making you wait and all.”

“Then what is it?”

“Surprisingly, I’ve never really been asked anything regarding my memories before.” It wasn’t hesitation or discomfort on her part, but genuine surprise. In fact, thinking about it, Rem felt that all the people she had met until now had tiptoed around the subject of her lost memories. Of course, she wasn’t going to accuse Katya of having a lack of consideration, but…

"…A-Are you implying that I lack consideration? That I should think about others before I speak? Are you badmouthing me?!"

Even if Rem said nothing, Katya would end up saying it herself. That was the difficulty with her personality.

Katya glared at Rem and resentfully bit her lip. Part of the reason why she has such an aggressive—or rather demeaning—attitude, is because of her bad legs, thought Rem. Supporting her body weight is something called a wheelchair. Unable to use her legs freely, she depends on a tool to move about—something she belittles herself for.

"Though I can't make it the sole reason since I'm also using a cane…"

"D-Don't…act like it isn't just a decoration. Mine is…it's not…the same. You're…more proper than I am…"

"I don't get the feeling that I'm being praised."

"I'm not praising you! This is like… W-We're just licking each other's wounds."

Lowering her gaze, Katya returned her knife and fork to her plate. As far as Rem knew, Katya tended to only eat small amounts, but more than half the food had been left on the plate. There's no way she's full, she thought.

"Miss Katya, you've left far too much food…"

"What's wrong? Am I not being considerate enough to the chef? Are you going to blame me for that, too?"

"No, I was thinking you might get hungry in the middle of the night. Would you like to save some bread for later?"

"S-Stop talking like some poor peasant!" she shouted, shoving the breadbasket back at Rem. If she were to persist, Katya, with her stubborn nature, would only get angrier. Rem was aware that giving up was crucial, and so secured the bread herself so she could give it to her later.

“We got off track a little, but I believe we were talking about my memories.”

“…W-Were you actually going to tell me? I thought you were evading the question since you didn’t want to talk about it.”

“I already told you—I was just surprised; it’s not that I didn’t want to be asked. Even if I had something I didn’t want to be asked, I wouldn’t remember it.”

Of course, Rem probably did have a secret or two, but, unfortunately, with her memories completely gone, she couldn’t recall what they were and thus had nothing to hide or be shy about. In all honesty, I’m not sure I’ll be able to give Katya the answers she’s looking for, she thought.

“You really don’t remember anything? For example… For example, about your family?”

“A person who insisted they knew me before I lost my memories told me that I have a twin sister. We look like two peas in a pod according to him, but…”

“A twin… Did the person who insisted this seem trustworthy?”

“No… No, nevermind… Wait… Maybe not?”

“Which one is it! Why can’t you make up your mind?”

Unable to make a decision, Rem was caught between hesitation and distress, and Katya glared at her. Rem wasn’t entirely sure why she was finding it so difficult to answer that. If she were to be forced to give a reason, however, she would say it was just like bad-tasting medicine.

“If I don’t take it, my body will get worse, but it’s bitter and difficult to take…or something like that.”

“Are you…talking about a person? Not a food you don’t like?”

“It’s not that I dislike him… But I don’t like him either.”

The first words that she’d said had been entirely reflexive, but she immediately altered them with more conscious thought. At Rem’s response, Katya’s lips trembled, and she let her eyes wander. She knew exactly how the flustered Rem felt—and she was struck by a sudden feeling of guilt that she might have said something mean.

“I think that’s enough about me? Let’s talk about you instead.”

“M-Me…?”

“Yes. Go ahead.”

“That’s an absurd way to begin a conversation…” Her lips trembling, Katya’s face reddened. But due to the guilt she felt from before, she sincerely searched for a topic of conversation. “You just mentioned you had a twin… I had an older brother.”

“Katya… You don’t…” Her cheeks tensing, she tried to stop Katya from talking about it.

She knew of Katya’s brother, as it had been mentioned here and there. He was an imperial soldier who lost his life during the rebellion here in the fortified city of Guaral.

It was her who had pursued the topic in the first place, but she did not want to hurt Katya, nor open old wounds. However…

“It’s okay.”

“But…”

“No buts! Y-You’re the one who started this conversation. So… So listen to me! I’m not trying to make my brother into a painful memory.”

“…”

“He wasn’t the type of person who deserved admirable treatment… hic.” Biting her nails, Katya forced the words out of her mouth.

To Katya’s sincere appeal from the heart, Rem suddenly felt the same guilt at bringing up such a topic as Katya had moments before. In other words, I’m the one who’s actually lacking in consideration.

Rem had mistakenly considered it a kindness to avert her eyes and try to avoid opening up old wounds. “What sort of older brother was he?” she asked, having accepted that it was rude of her to have thought that way.

Katya looked around aimlessly at Rem’s query, then started stammering some words about her dead older brother. “He was a thug, and selfish, and his voice was too…it was too loud… I hated him.”

2

“My household had three children in it… I was the youngest, and the older two were my brothers. My oldest brother died in a rockfall accident, which left just me—who wasn’t very good at anything—and my brother.”

“Both your brothers…”

“…Well, the brother I want to talk about was the second son. My eldest brother didn’t like him very much… But they’re both dead now.”

Seeing that Katya had started talking, Rem was careful not to interrupt her story, and could guess how she felt as she told it. Since it was no easy task to say that talking about it would make her feel better.

“But he was good to you, right, Katya?”

“H-He didn’t have a lot of consideration for others, so there were a lot of times where he did unnecessary things. For example… If you didn’t already know, I’m the daughter of a lowly count…a part of the Empire’s nobility.”

“I…didn’t know that.”

As Katya explained while touching her shoulder, Rem's eyes flickered to her wheelchair. She didn't have a particularly vast knowledge of it, but she knew that the chair she sat in had been specially made.

In the beginning, Subaru had made a chair that he strapped to his back to carry Rem, whose legs were bad. Even so, merchants like Flop had tried to purchase it because of its rarity, so she understood the precious value of such a wheelchair.

"By any chance, did your brother also make that wheelchair…"

"Not my brother, but someone my brother brought along… Well, that's a different story. Anyway, I am the child of a nobleman and it was a school where people like me were enrolled."

"Schools nobles attend…"

If she were to be honest, Rem did not understand the differences between nobility and other people. Roughly, Katya was a noble, Flop was a merchant, Mizelda was a Shudrak, and Priscilla was someone who made their own path… I guess that's one way to look at it?

"Are you saying that that school is what made you who you are today?"

"…No. Have you been listening? This is a story about my brother. This has nothing to do with me, but that isn't the main topic."

"Haa."

"Anyway! Ch-Children of nobles all have high self-esteem, do nothing but boast, and are incredibly dislikable. I was a good outlet for them." Katya gently pointed to herself with both hands as she spoke of such terrible things, but for some reason she did not speak of it sadly, but with a hint of excitement.

"If you were harassed by those around you, aren't they bad memories?"

"See…seeing my brother, beat them up was rather, refreshing."

"Beat them up… was that okay?"

Rem also wanted those who had done bad things to Katya to receive punishment, but was he really fine with being outnumbered, or rather acting violently in a public place?

"O-Of course not. Both me and my brother were kicked out immediately," Katya affirmed to Rem's question with vigor.

Sure enough, Katya and her brother were expelled from school, and most likely stripped of their noble qualifications.

"Actually, no. W-We just had very little value living as lowly counts who had not been educated. My brother was fine, actually, as he was talented in swordplay and such."

"What did you do? If you couldn't go to school…"

"Our eldest brother was alive at that point, so it wasn't too serious. Normally, we'd be able to depend upon a tutor at home, but…"

"But?"

"When no one was around, even that tutor…" Gripping her arm, Katya's face twisted in pain.

The rage and hatred that collected on her face made it obvious that she'd been harassed by the tutor too. Even ignoring the wheelchair, the impression you got from Katya in one glance screamed 'frail'. Such a disposition was unfortunately the kind that inspired sadism in others.

And guessing from where the story is going that tutor…

"When my brother realized I was acting strange, it was a bloodbath…"

"A bloodbath…"

"I-It served them right, but…it was the final nail in the coffin. My brother and I became outcasts in the family, and then our eldest brother had his accident."

"…How is your family now?"

"My mother…disappeared. My father…destroyed his body with heavy drinking." Katya's family's situation worsened, as though tumbling down a hill. It was as though they were cursed, she thought, and Rem wanted to complain to fate for not having any mercy. Katya, however, seemed to be taking it very differently.

"My brother says we must be lucky or something."

"…Even though you went through all that?"

"…He's always said that it's our enemies who get the worst end of the stick. S-So, no matter what we have to deal with, it's always for our benefit." Placing a hand over her chest, Katya divulged the words she had received from her brother in days gone by.

The absurdity and—to a certain extent—arrogance of such a thing shocked Rem so much that her jaw dropped. If only taking into account the particulars of the story, it's true that everyone has encountered misfortune—the students in the school, her tutor, her eldest brother whom she and her brother didn't like, and even her parents. But laughing it off like that while being in the middle of such misfortunes is…

"You think it's foolish too, don't you?"

"Umm… I'm not sure how to answer that."

"That's the same as just saying it is foolish…but that's right."

As Rem averted her eyes at the difficult question, Katya glared at her with her gloomy eyes. Katya had voiced the derogatory remark that Rem hadn't, but she didn't seem to be feeling negative about it. There were some violent and unsettling parts to the story, but even so, the unforgettable memories she's sharing are important to her and her brother. And it…

"…If we're talking about my brother's foolishness, we've not even scratched the surface."

…is obvious from her timid appeal that she isn't done yet.

"O-Of course, it's fine if you're tired of listening, or think it's pointless…"

"…If I'm being honest, then I think it will be difficult for me to have a good impression of your brother."

"That's a bit too honest…"

"But I believe, as we talk, we're getting closer to your objective… I'm of the thought that you don't want the memories of your dead brother to only be sad ones."

Having forgotten so many things, Rem's past was lost to her. Whether or not she should regain her lost memories, or how to face her lost past, Rem hadn't found a clear answer yet. But the way of thinking that Katya had chosen was one answer to the question. I don't think that it's fine not to know. But acting like you know something when you don't is not just arrogant but cruel, she thought.

Rem had always ignored Subaru. It was partly because she found his scent difficult to bear, but also that he clearly knew of her past, which she actively refused to let him tell her about. If she'd let him, he would have clung to her—probably not with any bad intentions, but not with particularly good intentions either.

"But even so, I do think there is a minimum amount of consideration that is necessary…" As she pointed out her understanding, and also posed a challenge, Rem looked at Katya in front of her. Her cheeks hardened at that look. "Katya," she called out. "Please tell me your brother's story, until you're satisfied to your heart's content."

"…Hearing that makes me not want to say anything at all."

"Don't make this difficult. Please stop complaining. Now, go ahead."

"I really dislike the way you worded that! Umm… Where should I begin…" As her lips trembled, Katya's eyes wandered, and then she started talking about her next memory.

As Rem listened to Katya's unsteady words, she furrowed her brows and gave it some deep thought. If it were right here and now, I wouldn't mind hearing Subaru's story either—or even all about my past and my lost memories. It used to be uneasiness and impatience that dominated my thoughts, but I'm sure my feelings will be different moving forward. I'm incredibly grateful for the fact I was able to meet Katya—a troubled girl who helped me to feel such things.

As Rem examined her feelings, she also came to one other conclusion:

Katya's brother is good-for-nothing, though I'll never let her hear that herself.

END

Provisional Rem's Paranoia: Like Holding the Oni by the Neck

"You need to listen when you're spoken to."

Pushing the back of a wheelchair, Rem was talking while walking about the grounds she was captive in, when the words of Katya, the owner of that wheelchair, made her eyes go wide.

In the Imperial Capital Lupugana, is the estate of Prime Minister Berstetz Vondarfon—That was where Rem was held captive. Being burdened with the roles of healer and hostage, it was where she had been put under house arrest.

While the position of a hostage might have a dangerous ring to it, she had not been as forcefully restricted, and aside from not being allowed to exit the mansion, she had no restrictions to her roaming within its grounds. While on one part, there were some rooms she was forbidden from entering, it was still exceptional treatment.

And while under that exceptional environment, Rem was still not so sweet so as to remain a slavish captive.

She thought about finding some way to acquire even a single method of certain escape as soon as possible, and to get away from this life of house arrest.

Perhaps having seen through that mentality, Katya's gaze was particularly severe. With that intense look, Katya bit her own hand's nail and said、

"I-It's not something you said. But even then, it has me on edge… Th-There's limits to how rude you can be. Are you trying to ridicule me?"

"No, I never…"

"Someone like me! A woman who can't even go out for a walk without needing help, all you need to do is give me whatever random… Yeah, whatever random half-hearted reply you need to, that's what you're thinking. Right? Just fuck off…"

Lending no ears to Rem's protests, Katya lowered her frizzy olive-haired head and began a slew of self-deprecation.

An exchange that happened quite often, or rather, an exchange she could say she was quite used to: Katya's outbursts. This woman she had met at the mansion had a rather difficult-to-approach aspect to her.

However—

"F-Fine. Leave me alone, do as you please…"

"—Katya-san!"

"—Wh-Wh-Whuh."

"Please listen to me. And, I would have you stop speaking ill of yourself. You can do both, right? One, two—"

"—Hic."

Wrapping around the wheelchair, Rem asserted so strongly while meeting Katya's eyes. Being told so, Katya blinked her eyes and drooped her head with a red face, silent.

She was a cute one, honest and obedient; her blood simply rose to her head a little too fast.

Who do you think Rem had spent all this time with before being dragged here? If you compared Katya to Priscilla, she was like a newborn puppy.

That aside—

"I apologize for making you worried. It is not that I was not listening to you. I simply wanted to look at the surroundings a little bit."

"The surroundings, you say…this isn't just a garden. Doesn't have even a single interesting thing to it.”

“Quite right. This does not seem to be a garden meant to entertain people.”

Katya did just have an outburst, but it was Rem’s behavior that had made her do so. When she apologized for that, Katya, though still red in the face, properly humored her conversation.

It was just like Katya said: their surroundings—the courtyard, which was where they carried their feet under the pretense of a stroll, Rem looked at it with her light blue eyes narrowed. Reflecting its master’s nature, inside the estate, the buildings and furnishings, while all opulent, were so utilitarian so as to be dry.

The courtyard gave the most extreme impression of this since, while it made up for all the greenery lacking in the mansion’s scenery, the real purpose of it was in the landing platforms for the flying dragons that occasionally came by. There was a reasonable amount of wind produced by the flying dragons when landing and taking off, so it was clean of the decoration of even a single flower that could scatter petals.

There’s no fun in watching, was only a natural thing for Katya to say.

“And yet, what are you trying to get from gazing at a garden like this…”

“Well, I did not come here in search of amusement. I wondered if I could find even a single thread of some kind to escape from here.”

“Hey you, you just apologized for making me worry, didn’t you? In that case, don’t make these kinds of jokes!!”

“Jokes…?”

“Stop! Dumbass! That’s the scariest response you could give…It’s scary! Dumbass!”

Looking at the behavior of Rem who was tilting her neck, Katya opened her eyes wide and panicked.

It actually was not a joke; however, she had to pretend it was a joke, or else who knows how long Katya's heart might remain disturbed.

As such, Rem poked her tongue out and said, "It's a joke."

"Gazing at the garden is… That's right, it is because there is really no other place to experience the outside; let us leave it at that."

"I-I'm a bit concerned about how you phrased that, but it feels like it'd be nothing good if I dug deeper, so I won't ask."

Rem's words, overflowing with consideration, were somewhat lacking in effectiveness it seemed.

While Rem slumped her shoulders at the misfire, Katya breathed a sigh while looking at her and said,

"Don't feel down… I, really don't understand you."

"That is no wonder indeed. As I, do not really understand myself either…"

"And how am I supposed to react to that response! How am I to know what's appropriate to say, and what isn't appropriate to say! I-It's a liability! A liability in fact, that amnesia!"

Rolling the wheels, she grabbed onto by herself, Katya turned around and screamed in anger at Rem.

A result of that statement with no ill will: if Rem had to say it was in fact meant in consideration of her, as such, Katya's reaction was terribly upsetting, though she had purposefully spoken of her own amnesia in an attempt to make her think she was not too bothered by it.

"Haaa, Haaa, being with you makes me tired…Does this happen to everyone else?"

"I do not make much of an attempt to change my behavior to the tune of others, but Katya would be the only one to raise their voice to such an extent like this."

“Y-You picking a fight just because I can’t move my legs…!”

Once again, Rem strained a smile as something was received in a different way to what she had meant. Somehow or other, Katya remained in a stance which did not allow for her to push her wheelchair, and so Rem took the cane held under her arm, and firmly stretched herself up.

Once so done, Katya, who saw Rem’s actions and cane said,

“…Hey, for what reason are your legs not working?”

“Unfortunately, many things happened to my body that I have no knowledge of…”

“What the hell is with your body, it’s terrifying…! Well, I guess I’m also on the same boat of not knowing my body that well. I don’t know why it is that I’m so sickly and the like.”

Katya reflexively raised her voice, and quickly reflected on herself. Looking at her hair whorl as she held her head down, Rem looked down at the cane that propped her own body up.

This cane was something that was made for her by the People of Shudraq at their settlement for her impaired legs. She suffered to get used to it, so it was likely that the original Rem had not used a cane.

“Somehow there are some things my body is used to, because it seems a cane was not one of them.”

“…S-So, it’s not like you forgot how to walk along with the rest of your memories then.”

“I am not that dumb-…Ah, was that perhaps a joke?”

“Take notice! Just move on, dumbass!”

Once so said, Rem reflected on the fact that she had made a waste of Katya’s joke. As soon as she said it, her face quickly turned red, so Katya must have mustered quite a bit of courage as well.

With her face still red, Katya clicked her tongue and said, “Aah, c’mon.”

“Whatever I say is hilarious… then how about the opposite, what do you remember?”

“Eh?”

“I’m asking, what is it you remember? It’ll be fine once I hear that.”

Implicitly, since Katya still planned to talk to Rem, she was trying to find a way to not fail in conversation with Rem in the future.

Her thoughtfulness made her happy, but also troubled Rem could not remember anything about herself. She wanted to respond to Katya’s expectations, but she could not.

She racked her head, as she simply did not want to stay quiet forever and trouble Katya—

“—Now that you mention it, it seems that I have a twin sister.”

“…I feel like you’ve mentioned that, yes. Do you remember her?”

“No. What I remember is just that she looked very much like me, and was a very reliable person, or so I have heard…”

While speaking, what she remembered was the voice of Subaru who wanted to talk when he showed his face during unnoteworthy times as they were traveling from the settlement to town, and the content of his talks.

Though she thought it was done with good intentions, Subaru’s talks about Rem before she lost her memories were incessant.

She did not believe those were fabrications of his, and no small number of them were convincing as well. Particularly the ones related to the existence of her twin sister were verified to be true by a twinge deep in her bosom.

However, being told about things she did not remember was a half-and-half bitter and sweet feeling. Though it was after she honestly told him that, that Subaru reigned it in.

Once she had heard Rem's answer, Katya narrowed her eyes with a "Hmmm" and said:

"What kind of person is that?"

"…I heard she's someone who looks well at her surroundings, and is very attentive to details. And that while her slightly mean side is her one flaw, that was still the way she expressed her sisterly love."

She had no way to confirm it, but nevertheless, Rem half-believed and half-doubted that high praise.

Even though he had prefaced it by saying she was reliable, that was still way too reliable. Perhaps one could say Subaru only saw the good parts of that Sister.

Or maybe, perhaps for the sake of Rem who was missing her memories, he was avoiding referencing any of her bad parts.

"Whatever the case, it appears he's giving her quite the special treatment. …If she really is that splendid of a sister, I would wish she could come help me any time soon."

"Th-That phrasing felt kinda thorny there. Even if you might not be conscious of it, she's your sister, right?"

"Even though I am not conscious of it, she is my sister. Though I did not particularly mean that in a harsh manner."

Hearing the words of Katya, whose cheeks had slightly stiffened, Rem leisurely shook her head side to side.

She was aware of the fact that it was an unreasonable protest herself, but she did not intend to be harsh to her yet unseen sister. If forced to say, perhaps her antipathy towards the one who let her know had slipped onto her tongue.

On Rem's self-awareness, Katya followed her words with a "Be that as it may"

“When I hear about your twin, I really can’t believe that you’d have such an outstanding sister.”

“What… Do you mean by that?”

“W-Well, you have so many personality flaws, don’t you?”

“What?”

“—Hic, I-It’s nothing to get angry about.”

At that statement that made her doubt her ears, Rem asked her to repeat it, and Katya, seeing that, spoke in falsetto. But, that Rem had gotten angry was just unthinkable.

She had merely just asked her to repeat the libel she had no clue about.

“I am not angry. Don’t talk such nonsense.”

“Well, you made that face, and no matter how you look at it…”

“Did I not say, that I’m not angry…?!”

“~~, See, you’re angry…”

Hanging her head in despondency, Katya looked at Rem reproachfully while biting her nails. Putting a hand to her forehead, Rem gave a deep sigh at that gaze, and sat her inner-self down.

She really was not angry, but if she was being perceived as angry, then that must be revised.

“I-In the first place, we’re getting off topic! I didn’t ask you about your twin, I asked you about, about the person that told you about her.”

“The person that told me about her? Why are you interested in that person?”

“Well…That’s because, when you talk about that person, your face kind of…”

"My face?"

Tilting her head, Rem had genuine doubts about the fact Katya held an interest. However, when being questioned, Katya let out a small "Ah" and sighed, and then her eyes swam.

Then, after a moment of hesitation,

"N-Not gonna say it after all. You seem like you'd get angry."

"Why? I will get angry."

"Look, just like I thought! Yo-You're angry!"

"I was saying in advance that I will be angry, I am not angry now though…"

At Katya's half-hearted attitude, Rem tapered her lips as if expressing her displeasure.

When she hesitated strangely, she was made extremely curious about it somehow. And what's more, when the topic involved Subaru, it was like a little fishbone clearly asserted its presence inside of Rem.

Meaning that she needed to extract it, this dangerous foreign object that would not disappear no matter how much time passed.

"As such, please speak at once. That is for your sake, Katya-san."

"A- a threat…! That's pretty much just a threat!!"

"This is also, for Katya-san's sake."

"You're absolutely lying! Don't lie with a nonchalant face!"

Katya, who put up quite an intense resistance, moved the wheels of her wheelchair and attempted to escape. It was quite a risk for Katya, but unfortunately for Rem, her speed was slower than a jog.

Once she put her body weight strongly on her cane, Rem began chasing after the escaping Katya. Also, a guard, who was looking after the pathway, turned his gaze to the two's game of tag. Waving a hand to indicate there was no need to worry, Rem hurriedly chased after the escaping Katya, cornered her, and caught her.

"Ugh, urk, fucking shit…"

"You talked of being a lady of nobility, yet is it fine for you to mouth such foul words?"

"I also said both school and house tutors were useless, didn't I?! S-So persistent…"

Rem held on tightly to a wheel with one hand, and even though Katya tried to fight against it with both hands, the wheel would not move. The fight ending from her complete lack of force in a contest of strength, Katya went limp.

At that loser Katya, the winner, Rem, called out "Now" to her,

"I have caught you, so please calmly speak. What were you about to say?"

"…But it's not like it was that important."

"If it was not that important, then can you not say it?"

"What are you, a torturer that won't listen…?! I'll say it, I just need to say it right!"

Meeting Rem's demands, Katya finally spoke.

Somehow, Rem had turned excessively obstinate too, but having this exchange with Katya was fun, so she hoped she would forgive this as an extended category of their friendship as well.

In contrast to that pleasant thought from Rem, Katya's side was putting on a face like she had made her pathetic peace with things, even if Rem said she would accept it placidly no matter what she told her.

To Rem thinking that, Katya heaved a very deep sigh and said, "It's just, when you talk about that someone, your face, relaxes or something…"

"What?"

"Look at that, you're angry, aren't you!"

At Rem questioning her with a grave voice, Katya raised a shriek like she was about to cry.

The reason being Katya had wonderfully poked at the "If you tell me that" bit of Rem who had thought "no matter what you tell me."

"My face was relaxed? That does not seem logical; it is displeasing."

"Man, I'm done talking with you…Hic."

"Please wait. Let us talk this out. This misunderstanding is a misunderstanding needing clearing."

Katya attempted to escape, but circling around behind her hastily, Rem grabbed onto the handles of her wheelchair, and once again put the cane back under her arm.

That concluded the walk, and she would correct the previous wrong impression on the way to returning Katya to her room.

"S- save me! You people, come save me!"

Having her wheelchair irreparably pushed by Rem, Katya sought help from the guards on patrol.

The guards turned towards that appeal, but with a wave of Rem's hand, they assented, and Katya's complaints could be assumed to be ignored.

Though it was difficult whether that should be called a neglect of their duties, or a high crisis awareness.

"In the first place, if we are to talk about my face, then, Katya-san, you as well, when you talk about your fiancé, you make a face you don't show to others."

“~~Hic, d-don’t just say whatever! Dumbass! Let go! I’m breaking things off with you! Break off!”

Flapping her legs desperately, Katya gave a meager resistance. While hearing her voice, Rem did not slow the speed of her legs with the intention of discussing with her till the end.

While Rem had forgotten many things, there was one thing that she had clearly confirmed.

—Her self, before losing her memories, surely was also thoroughly jerked around by that boy.

END

The Dragon Kingdom: Meili's Witchbeast Observation Record

1

How did it come to this?

"There's no need to be so nervous… Well, even if I say that, it probably won't convince you, will it?" As he spoke, the red-headed youth standing before her gave a faint wry smile. With hair like fire, and eyes like a clear sky, his well-defined face and neat appearance would dazzle anyone reflected within those captivating eyes.

This youth was undoubtedly breathtakingly beautiful, but Meili's shaking, at least, was not due to any kind of surprise at his appearance. The feelings she harbored towards him came more from a primitive instinct than anywhere else. In other words, it was fear that stemmed from coming face to face with him—a person whose existence was totally different and on a completely different level than hers.

And what had pushed Meili's heart into further chaos, was—

"I don't mean to frighten you. I only want to ask you a question, first of all," he said, looking down at Meili, who had gone stiff, his eyes wandering down towards her shoulders.

Her braid rested over one shoulder, but the blue-eyed youth seemed to see straight through it.

Something was concealed behind the braid.

Thus he spoke…

"…How did you tame that witchbeast?"

"…"

The way he spoke as though it was a completely normal day-to-day question made her blood run cold more than any angry voice ever could. Her shoulders shifted involuntarily, and she felt the faintest tickle at the nape of her neck. By the time she realized, she was too late.

Escaping through Meili's hair, it leapt up onto the girl's head and raised its stinger, swinging its small pincers in an attempt to intimidate them.

"Whoa," the young man said, raising his eyebrows slightly. But the surprise that spread around him was not quite as tame. Seeing what had jumped so suddenly onto the girl's head, those in the meeting room were a mixture of surprised, cautious, dumbfounded, and openly hostile.

There was quite a commotion, and in the middle of that, Meili Portroute covered her face with her small hand while listening to the pincers snapping on her head and thought again: How did it come to this?

2

Meili was frequently suspicious that her life might very well be a dream.

"Even if it is a dream, it's difficult to decide whether it's a good or a bad one," she muttered, plopping down on a step and placing her arms on her knees before resting her chin in her hands.

Her original profession was a job that frequently involved taking the lives of others. She had evoked people's resentments, and there was such a thing as karmic retribution in the world.

Meili had the awareness to question illogical stories. When she was arrested and locked away in a confinement room at Roswaal Manor, she recalled playing with Subaru's handmade dolls and stuffed toys by herself—items she had never asked him to bring.

A monster kidnaps the princess, and the prince takes along his friends to go and rescue her.

Meili also had the awareness to conjure up common stories such as this.

"If that's the case than me being safe and sound would be an illogical story."

If she were to allocate the roles in a puppet show, Meili would be the villain. She was either a monster, or the evil sorcerer who cooperated with the monster. The villain had to exit the story once they stirred up enough trouble.

But in this puppet show, the prince and princess had held a hand out to the villain.

"It's weeeird," she grumbled to herself, pouting her pink lips.

The sorcerer understood that it was weird and wrong, so they had the option to reject the outstretched hand. But they already knew that if they did that, it would make the prince and princess terribly sad.

"…That's a very serious face."

Meili was reflecting upon her complicated situation before someone called out to her from across the garden. Glancing up, she saw a small girl walking her way—a girl she identified as Annerose.

Examining the state of Roswaal Manor's gardens, Annerose carefully looked over the red petals of the flowers that lined the flowerbed. "If you're going to make such a glum face, how about you admire these flowers? Getting these Agares flowers to bloom in such a beautiful way is a rare sight."

"I think they're pretty, buut staring at flowers won't improve my mood. Are you sure it's okay though, Annerose?"

"Is what okay?"

"To be relaaxing in a place like this," she answered. Against the background of flowers in full bloom, the girl turning around and tilting her head made for an incredibly picturesque scene.

However, this serene ambiance and the situation she had been placed in did not go together. Emilia's group—which also included the lord of the mansion, Roswaal—had set out to the southern empire in order to search for their missing companions. In reality, though, they had set out in order to search for a way to get there.

In the meantime, Annerose was left in charge of the house, and Meili was also given things to do. Everyone is surely soo busy now, and yet—

"For us to be so relaxed is…"

"Things are in motion whether or not you fret like this. Besides, I am inspecting the routine work of the servants. I told you this already, didn't I? Agres flowers are difficult to take care of."

"…Petra takes care of the flowers."

"Yes, what a talented child. Both Frederica and Clind also praised her a lot."

She didn't mind that Annerose was complementing Petra, but the point she had made before that wasn't very funny. Meili wasn't fretting or anything like that—she was just a little anxious.

"Uncle is always rushing through life. Although, since he has a responsibility towards Emily, it's obvious he'd be working so hard."

"You seem to be quite ruthless towards the margrave, Annerose… Or rather, everyone is."

"If you think about the mess he made, it's only natural. If anything, if it weren't for Emily and the others pleading on his behalf, I'd have sent Uncle into retirement and taken over for him in the royal selection." Unable to hold back her anger, Annerose narrowed her slanted eyes even further, and her lips twitched as she spoke of Roswaal.

Although, her complaints were completely justified.

In reality, Meili didn't really understand why Emilia and the others had forgiven Roswaal, either. She didn't understand, but—

"It's because they're like that that I'm here right now…" she muttered to the empty sky. The right or wrong of such a thing was unknown to Meili, who seemed to be somewhat ignorant in the ways of the world.

"…My lady, Miss Meili. You've both waited long enough. Complete."

"Eeeeek!" A voice unexpectedly called out from behind, and Meili inadvertently let out a scream.

In contrast to her scream, however, Annerose was rather unaffected. "Oh, Clind. Don't play such pranks—it's a bad habit of yours. Where are Lady Anastasia and the others?"

"They were sent away safely. Success. As for the shock, it was quite by chance that I happened to return here and so was an unfortunate accident. False accusation."

"What a shameless thing to say. Are you okay, Meili?"

As they spoke over her head, Meili eagerly climbed to her feet and took a step back.

The one who had appeared behind her as she sat upon the steps of the entrance to the mansion was Clind. "I'm sorry," he said, bowing his head modestly with an unreadable wire-like face.

"…It's just like Petra and Annerose said, I need to be caareful."

"My lady and Petra were talking…about me? Delight."

"How about you actually listen to what's being said?! It was a stern talk about that attitude of yours… Jeez." With drooping shoulders, Annerose shook her head. Then, sighing as she regained her composure, she looked over at both Meili and Clind. "If Lady Anastasia and the knight Julius have no problem with it, it's fine. I've completed my preparations. What about you, Meili?"

"I'm fine. But is it okay?"

"…? Is what okay?"

"It's not that I don't trust you, Annerose, as a noble, but won't it be difficult to get them to listen to you in the castle?"

The capital of the kingdom of Lugunica and its castle were where they had to go to make a certain report and have a negotiation. This was the reason why Meili was here with Annerose and the others. Of course, there would naturally have been some sort of report made to the castle already, but the people from their side were just the two girls and a steward.

To the anxious Meili, Annerose nodded. "Ah, no need to worry. Of course, the people in the castle will probably be busy, but circumstances are circumstances. Besides, I also have a plan that Uncle has created."

"That the margrave created… That's worrying."

"Well, I do understand what you mean… Clind." After putting her hand to her mouth in mock surprise, Annerose called for Clind. As a response to the call, the slim face of the butler obediently stepped forward. Then Annerose stood alongside Meili, with Clind behind them. "Do you have sufficient compensation? It takes far too much time by dragon carriage, after all."

"Certainly from the master. I consider the degree to be within the scope of my payment. Extenuate."

"Then that's fine. Please go ahead."

Meili had no idea what the conversation was about, but once it was completed Clind placed a hand gently on each of the girl's shoulders. Meili had no time to prepare herself, for it was finished in an instant.

"…What a truly strange poweer," Meili drew in a breath in astonishment.

The scene before her had changed within a blink of an eye.

Meili and the others had jumped from the garden of Roswaal Manor that they had just been in, to another garden entirely. Petra spent every day keeping the mansion garden in beautiful order, but this garden also seemed absolutely wonderful.

Clind's teleportation—the principles of which were not understood—was, as far as she'd heard, the unique ability that allowed him to jump anywhere within the kingdom. Making use of that ability, he'd taken Meili and Annerose to this garden.

"Soo, whose garden is this in the royal capitaal?"

"You'll find it out soon enough. See—here they come," Annerose jerked her chin in answer, and Meili turned round to look. Seeing the figures rushing towards the three of them in the garden, her eyes widened.

They were soldiers who wore a cloak over their white clothes, and a beautiful decorative sword that hung from their waist. Or rather, they were not soldiers, but knights. At their apparent strong sense of duty and vigilance, Meili's breath caught in her throat.

Staring at them, the leader of the group, with a face like a rock, stepped forward. "Exactly where have you come from? Did you commit this atrocity while being aware that this is Lugunica Castle?" he asked in a low voice, and Meili—who had wondered whose garden they were standing in—was suddenly enlightened.

The perpetrator Clind had a rather unruffled air about him, and his mistress Annerose took the lead. "Yes, we know. We also know how terribly rude it is. However, Uncle told me things would be settled more quickly this way."

"…Uncle?"

"Yes, Roswaal L. Mathers, the western margrave," she replied boldly, leaving the knights with a bitter face.

3

"Even so, to think you were related to Margrave Mathers. Well, the margrave does often surprise. It seems it runs in the family, too."

"Oh, as someone who knows exactly how Uncle behaves, I certainly can't take that as a compliment," Annerose replied with a smile to the old man, who was nodding again and again as he stroked his extremely long beard.

Her posture was dignified, and Meili was dumbstruck to such an extent that it turned into admiration. It seemed almost as though she'd been invited here—a situation that was highly irregular for an outlaw who had just entered the castle without permission.

The three of them had been caught by the captain of the knights, and not just knights, but the Royal Guard, in the garden, and—after disclosing her lineage—were immediately taken to a conference room within the castle. There, the ones who welcomed them were the prominent figures of the kingdom and they were in the middle of a talk, the old man with the white beard seemed like their representative.

"…I received word from Margrave Mathers regarding the urgent matter. However, he did not come himself to explain, and the representative he sends in his stead seems to be a small child," replied a bald man who stared at Annerose with thick eyebrows and crossed arms in the seat next to the old man.

Although he looked down at her in disdain, Annerose didn't seem intimidated in the slightest. On the contrary, she seemed to be aware of how to deal with those who look down on her because of her age, and laughed. "Is my age a problem? I'm afraid if that's the case, I could make a similar comment to all of you, no? Everyone in the Council of Wise Men seems to be pretty old."

"I—"

"Ho-Ho-ho. Well, well. She has you there, Bordeaux."

At Annerose's warlike response, full of impoliteness and disrespect, the man who'd spoken fell silent. Only the old man with white hair seemed to find enjoyment in their exchange.

At his laughter, the one called Bordeaux drew in a deep breath. "I don't think this is a time for laughter, Miklotov. It's a grave situation, this. If we take the message Margrave Mathers sent by carrier bird as truth, then…"

“Yes, I understand the gravity of the situation… Young lady.”

The old man Bordeaux had named as Miklotov looked over at Meili. “…Oh, are you referring to mee?”

Thinking that her time to speak had not yet arrived, Meili had let her mind wander, and suddenly straightened her back under the weight of his intellectual gaze.

To Meili, Miklotov gave a deep nod of his head. “I have a rough idea of the circumstances, but is it true? Can you drive away the witchbeasts and clear a path through the Augria Sand Dunes?”

“Umm, well I don’t really understand the difficulty of clearing a path, but if you grandpas are scared of those witchbeasts in the sand dunes, then I can make them go away.”

“To actually be able to manipulate witchbeasts…” At Meili’s careful reply, they looked at each other, and then a commotion spread amongst the people in the room.

Even during all the hubbub, Miklotov never lowered his gaze, continuing to stare into Meili’s eyes. Meili was somewhat overwhelmed by the old man’s gaze, which seemed to almost peer directly into her heart, but—

“Hold it together. We’re with you on this,” Annerose announced from her side, which helped to drown out her feelings of timidness.

She didn’t know Annerose enough to call her reassuring, but her words allowed her to remember. She could recall the kind words of Subaru and Emilia, who had pointed her in the right direction.

“…Those are good eyes,” Miklotov appraised, his gaze softening slightly.

At those words, Meili felt a weight lift from her shoulders and was suddenly overcome with exhaustion. The exhaustion brought on by a mere exchange of glances was immense. This old man is definitely not an ordinary person.

“Then, do you believe us now?” questioned Annerose.

“Hmm, that’s the problem,” Miklotov replied. “I didn’t sense any lies in that young lady’s eyes, but we still need to do some fact checking… And actually, I have the perfect person for it.”

“Perfect person?” Annerose asked, furrowing her well-defined eyebrows at Miklotov’s words.

Meili’s eyes widened too, puzzled at a sentence she didn’t understand the meaning of. At the two girl’s response, Miklotov narrowed his eyes as he caressed his beard. “…Bring the knight Reinhard here. He knows the sand dunes, so we should listen to his detailed explanation.”

Upon hearing the demand for the attendance of the Sword Saint who resided in the capital, Meili’s cheeks stiffened.

Although it may be obvious, the discussion in the castle to decide Meili’s fate from here on out seemed unlikely to be settled particularly easily.

END

Volume 33

Chapters 97-110

Chapter 97:
Arriving From Beyond the West

1

—Battles unfolded with the Imperial Capital of Lupugana as their stage, and in every single one of those locations, the climax approacheth.

A Dragon, clad in the very clouds themselves, swooped down to the sky where white snow was falling, and vermilion flames scorched the sky into a turbulent cloud. Stone golems were colliding against soldiers donning desperate expressions, a beast's powerful arms clashed against crafty elder malice clashing against malice riddled with craftiness arisen from age afront a collapsed rampart; the status of the conflict seesawed back and forth unending.

However, at this moment, at this very instant, the greatest focal point of this battlefield laid with the innermost part of the Imperial Capital—the most beautiful castle in the world, known as the Crystal Palace, a white light had been emitted.

Utilized throughout the entire construction of the castle were Magic Crystals—Mana crystals purer than most Magic Stones. By amplifying the Mana stockpiled therein, the Magic Crystal Cannon was a strategic weapon able to lay devastation upon its target.

To be precise, it was the Crystal Palace's trump card, the artillery of the highest firepower within the possession of the Vollachian Empire. The ultimate attack, which could quite possibly decide the outcome of a battle with only a single shot, even in this battlefield.

In the first place, only a limited number of people possessed knowledge of the existence of this Magic Crystal Cannon.

It went without saying that Abel, who had been on the seat of the Emperor, and Zikr Osman, to whom the outline of the operation had been conveyed to, would be aware of it. In addition, there was also Priscilla Barielle, whose possible prior awareness of this information would not strike as odd were she to actually possess it, alongside a very limited number of personnel on the side of the rebel army.

Probably, things would be more or less similar on the Imperial Capital's side, amounting to the fake Emperor Vincent Vollachia, who led the insurrection, and his accomplice, the Prime Minister, Berstetz Fondalfon. Along with Moguro Hagane, who was the Crystal Palace itself—it was a secret weapon that even the other Divine Generals had not known about.

And then—

???: "—The power of the Magic Crystal Cannon is limited to just three uses, but it shall not be used more than once on this battlefield."

That was Abel's judgement, and therefore, an awareness Vincent shared as well.

For a variety of reasons, the Magic Crystal Cannon was the trump card of national defense in every sense. The reckless act of using up all its remaining ammo was not something that could be done with the future in mind.

Of course, if Vincent intended to deplete it on this battlefield without any consideration for the future, then that was another matter.

Abel: "You could not possibly engage in such desperate behavior."

Abel did not especially think about what to call that conviction.

However, conviction was conviction, and without discarding what had budded within him, Abel had prepared the battlefield. Hence, he chose to give rise to the certainty that the Magic Crystal Cannon, which could only be fired once, would fire a fruitless shot.

That expectation had been lured out of them by the "decoys"; Zikr, a valuable asset when it came to warring potential, the high-morale soldiers under his banner, and the other various tribes, had all been put together.

Abel: “—Use the elite as decoys. The enemy shan’t be able to turn a blind eye to them.”

Then, having seen the unfortunate turn of events at the third bastion, the Magic Crystal Cannon was directed to the battlefield protected by Moguro.

The flaw of the Magic Crystal Cannon was that it may cause tremendous damage even to allies, but on Moguro’s battlefield, those worries were unnecessary. Because the stone golems scattered across the battlefield were nothing but forces that had split from the Divine General, and even the titanic Moguro, who had become one with the rampart, was not the Seven’s main body.

Therefore, the expectations of both sides overlapped, and the Magic Crystal Cannon would wipe out one group of rebels upon being fired, however, it would also eliminate the possibility of the rebels being defeated with nothing they could do about it. —Or so it was to have passed.

Abel: “…”

That instant, a large number of people on the battlefield bore witness to a black light engulfing the shot of white light.

Just what had brought that about? Where had the tremendous shot disappeared to without doing a sliver of damage? Was that an action belonging to friend or foe?

Countless thoughts zipped past in the emptiness of mind birthed, everyone left dumbfounded as they ceased their movements.

At the rebel command post, Abel was no exception. That had been an incident outside of what he had hypothesized.

He, too, had had his mind enraptured by the unexpected phenomenon, and a brief emptiness was yielded in his thoughts. —What was different about him was that he recovered faster than anyone else from that state.

Who, how, where, he did not know any of it, but—

Abel: “—Fire it up, just as planned!”

If one was met with a situation better than expected, there was nothing greater.

In many cases, what was utmost necessary on the battlefield was a quick decision, rather than a correct decision. Then, by updating the decision based on the events that had occurred due to that very choice, it could be transformed into the correct one.

Removing his gaze from the battlefield that the white light had been expected to lay wreck to, Abel gave the order. At that voice of Abel’s, the stiff soldiers of the command post widened their eyes, and lowered their gazes.

To the several gazes which could not conceal their trembling, Abel responded with his own black eyes through his oni mask.

Abel: “Fire it up immediately! Give the order! Any delay shall lead to the death of Zikr Osman!”

Soldiers: “—Hk!”

Abel: “Hurry, move!”

Soldiers: “Yes sir—!!”

The soldiers around and within the command center were all Zikr’s good subordinates.

Originally, the plan had included Zikr’s life in the equation. It was hypocritical of him to refer to Zikr’s life, however, the soldiers grasped that, quickly beginning to move.

Rather than Abel’s decisiveness, it was the trust that Zikr had built which had allowed for that.

Abel: “You have fulfilled your duty as suicide corps. Nevertheless, do not slacken your hands, Zikr Osman. If you have survived, it means that you still possess a role to fulfill.”

In the distance, at the third bastion of the city walls that protected the Imperial Capital, a clash that would supposedly never have happened, had occurred. A battle headed by Zikr, with the People of Shudraq and many other tribes accompanying him.

The battlefield had become a true contest of strength to see who would be able to break past Moguro and into the Imperial Capital.

Watching the unforeseen hard-fought battle from afar, Abel touched his own oni mask, and muttered.

Abel: “—Inevitably, the role I must play is also close at hand.”

Behind Abel as he muttered that, the soldiers fired a Magic Stone Cannon into the sky as they had been ordered.

That was an indication of the situation having developed, a retaliation against the Imperial Capital’s faction, who had used up their trump card, the Magic Crystal Cannon—a sign that the rebel army’s side had also played their own trump card.

Beholding the cannon’s light with his eyes, Abel shifted his gaze to the side opposite to the third bastion—

Abel: “—The one who seems to have entered the board from the west, who are you?”

2

???: “—That surely cannot be.”

As he cast his eyes toward the distant battlefield from the top level of the Crystal Palace, the aged throat of Berstetz Fondalfon quivered a smidgen.

The Imperial Prime Minister, an individual who was usually unflappable, was bewildered, shaken to an extent such that it had taken the guards by his side by surprise.

Berstetz: “…”

Once he sensed the gazes of the soldiers to his side, Berstetz instantly tightened his cheeks.

Displaying any sort of indolence would make light of the Empire. Even if those around him did not believe likewise, as long as he himself did, he would not stand for it. That was the way of the Vollachian Empire.

This was exactly how Berstetz himself envisioned an ideal Vollachia.

Berstetz: “Naturally, since the Imperial Capital is being advanced on, figuring out some sort of countermeasure is a must, but…”

Getting a hold of himself, Berstetz tackled the events that transpired head-on.

What had spilled from his lips was a reflection of the events that had taken place just before—a reflection on fact that the first blow of the Magic Crystal Cannon, the trump card of the Crystal Palace, had failed to hit its mark.

The existence of the Magic Crystal Cannon was considered to be top secret, known only to very few people in the Empire.

However, since they had to take on the true Emperor, Vincent Vollachia, the secrecy of the Magic Crystal Cannon’s existence was completely meaningless. However, even with its existence known, it was a fact that there was no way to thwart the Magic Crystal Cannon’s extraordinary firepower, the value of its very existence, in the first place.

Therefore, Berstetz had surmised that Vincent would either avoid a decisive battle in the Imperial Capital or not deploy his army in a situation where the Magic Crystal Cannon would be used.

However, Vincent had entered the battlefield; moreover, amidst the battle, he had taken command of the rebels who had gone ahead before him. This way, he began handling the state of affairs. Presumably, pushing expendable fighters all the way into the line of fire of the Magic Crystal Cannon had been a last resort of his.

Then, seeking maximum efficiency, Berstetz had pointed the Magic Crystal Cannon at the third bastion.

Even if Vincent's plan had been to have them shoot at the area of the battlefield with the highest concentration of rebel troops, as to minimize the overall damage to his allies—the fact remained that the opponents would still suffer.

Putting down the sacrificial lambs, they would then utilize the power of the Nine Divine Generals to crush the enemy's plans. —With this in mind, he had beseeched the other Vincent on the throne for forgiveness.

And then—

Vincent: "Once each side's chicanery is gone, only the sheer difference in troop strength shall remain. —Do it."

Seeing that Vincent and he were in agreement, Berstetz had fired the Magic Crystal Cannon.

Once homed in on a target, the burst of enormous destructive power, having been unleashed, would rush into the battlefield in a flash, vaporizing many heroes in the process, supposedly sending them to the great beyond.

Therefore, with victory and defeat decided after the Magic Crystal Cannon had mowed down the rebels, he would give thought on the steps that would follow the redefinition of the battle's status, however—

Berstetz: "The damage done by the Magic Crystal Cannon is nonexistent?"

Considering the achievements of the restored Magic Crystal Cannon sealed in the Crystal Palace, it had not occurred to him that Vincent could possibly possess some means of offsetting it.

Keeping cards well-hidden until the last possible moment was indubitably a habit of Vincent's. Berstetz lamented over the fact he had been completely outwitted, but at the same time, he felt a rush of excitement in his heart.

More than anything else, he thought. —What a shame it was.

Berstetz: “Your Excellency, I am regretful from the bottom of my heart.”

Since it was the way of the Vollachian Empire to revere the strong, Vincent’s approach to rule the Empire with wits rather than violence as the one at its pinnacle was a combination of boredom and horror.

To possess the political skills to avoid any major war was something that he himself esteemed and, at the same time, shunned. Still, he had no complaints about serving Vincent.

So long as he fulfilled his duties as Emperor and protected the glory of the Vollachian Empire.

Berstetz: “What shall you do upon your return, Your Excellency…?”

What would he do with the Empire after returning to the throne and executing all those who had rebelled against him? Would he leave the Empire as it was before, and once again relinquish his duties as Emperor?

Even the most outstanding Emperor had no right to remain on the throne if he was content with letting that happen.

Berstetz: “—Prepare the Magic Crystal Cannon for the next shot.”

Since the number of charges for the Magic Crystal Cannon was fixed, depleting them was unacceptable.

Nevertheless, if the situation needed to be changed, Berstetz would utilize the plenitude of his jurisdiction. However, if the opponents did possess two trump cards with which to counteract the Magic Crystal Cannon, he could not make the same mistake again.

Until he figured that out, he could not see it through.

Soldier: “—! Prime Minister Berstetz! Look at that!”

Suddenly, one of the soldiers standing by Berstetz raised his voice.

Following the soldier’s gaze, the light of the Magic Stones emanating in the sky far behind the battlefield could be seen—probably at the place where the rebel main camp had been positioned.

It was some kind of signal.

A terribly unreliable one, as the sky above the battlefield was dyed white and red, but it would be effective enough for anyone waiting for the signal to come.

Berstetz: “A signal…”

Behind his narrowed eyes, Berstetz surmised his opponent’s intentions.

After the Magic Cannon had fired, they would have thought the situation had supposedly changed as well. If so, was that signal an instruction to the soldiers on the front line? However, if the intention was to inform the soldiers fighting on the front lines, that signal was way too unreliable.

Therefore, it was not for informing the soldiers on the front lines—

Berstetz: “—Reinforcements.”

But simultaneously, Berstetz gave it careful rumination.

With the majority of the rebels who had gathered from all over the country already wrecking havoc on the battlefield, with that group having already been crushed by the power of the Nine Divine Generals, what kind of forces could function as reinforcements?

Reinforcements were not pieces one would simply withhold.

They ought to be a trump card in the proper sense, deployed to change the war situation in decisive fashion. Of course, they were meaningless lest they packed a sufficient punch.

Just what kind of forces could they possibly be? —With those thoughts, Berstetz widened his slit-like eyes and turned them to the distant west.

Berstetz: “It cannot be.”

Slowly reflected in Berstetz’s vision as he muttered faintly, were shadows arriving from the western sky—spread across a vast expanse of those skies, were the supreme rulers of the sky making their calm approach. A flock of flying dragons.

A large number of flying dragons resided in the Vollachian Empire, however, taming a flying dragon required treasured techniques and masterful skills—and the one who had gathered many of those under their banner was a leading noble, who possessed preeminent power within the Empire.

A High Countess who had refused to participate in the decisive battle for the Imperial Capital, on the grounds of maintaining order within her own territory, the one in command of the Empire’s strongest Flying Dragon Squadron—

Berstetz: “—High Countess Serena Dracroy, is it?”

Spotting a dragon ship sporting flaming red sails among the Flying Dragon Squadron approaching from beyond the sky, Berstetz understood the threat of the reinforcements that the rebels had prepared.

When it came to controlling flying dragons, his faction also possessed one of the Nine Divine Generals, Madelyn Eschart. In front of said dragonkin, all flying dragons were slaves to her will. —However, the only exceptions to that were the flying dragons who had forged bonds with a tamer, through the technique of flying dragon taming.

Berstetz: “Even so, it would merely be a struggle for air supremacy. No, if she has summoned the Cloud Dragon, then that presumption must also change.”

Despite the shock of the Magic Crystal Cannon’s nullification, Berstetz had not neglected his grasp of the battlefield.

During the fierce battles that had unfolded at the five bastions, even the colors of the heavens and the earth had experienced erratic changes due to various battlefields. And in one of those battles, the descent of the mighty Dragon had been spotted.

As a dragonkin, Madelyn was able to summon the Dragon which was connected to her ancestors.

Up until now, she had never called the Cloud Dragon Mezoreia to the ground—her summoning it would change the flow of the battle, drastically.

Of course, the circumstances under which Madelyn would summon Mezoreia were impossible to intuit, meaning it was possible that simply driving her into a corner could suffice.

Berstetz: "Be that as it may, in the case that flying dragons fight each other for air supremacy…"

In both quantity and quality, Berstetz believed that they held the advantage.

The determined decision of High Countess Serena Dracroy to side with the rebels must have been a rage-inducing mistake for the men of Vollachia, yet—

Berstetz: "—?"

Thinking this, Berstetz was staring towards the western sky as he realized something.

He had been completely fixated on the slowly approaching Flying Dragon Squadron, but that had not been the sole change that had occurred in the west.

—A closer look to the hills to the west revealed the shape of a group deploying anew.

For a moment, they appeared to be the forces of High Countess Dracroy, but Berstetz quickly changed his mind as it became evident that this was not the case.

The reason for that was simple. The flag that group was hosting.

It sported neither the crest of High Countess Dracroy, that of a flying dragon with a scar on its cheek, nor the national emblem of the Vollachian Empire, the wolf pierced by swords, but an entirely different flag.

Slightly troubled by what was portrayed on it, Berstetz said,

Berstetz: "—Is that, a star?"

3

???: "Oi bro, what're ya doin'?! We're completely late already?!"

???: "Stop with the fussin' lizard bastard… Schwartz's in the middle of somethin'…!"

???: "Sure, he's in the middle of something, but Hiain has a point. What are we going to do? Should we join the ranks of the rebel army like this?"

???: "Wow, do you see that, Boss? The right and left are all over the place, it truly is a great, decisive battle! Where should we go, I can't stop my chest from throbbing!"

Subaru: "AHHHH, SHUT UP!! Can't you see that I'm in a very moving scene right now?!"

As a group of familiar voices barged in, making a huge ruckus, Natsuki Subaru rebuked them. He was reminded how dangerously accustomed he had become to being Natsuki Schwartz these days.

Although Natsuki Schwartz was ultimately just an alias, he felt strongly about his real name, the one he ought to be called by, being Natsuki Subaru.

Rather—

Subaru: "It's fine to take that as you calling my name, right?"

Louis: "Uau! Uau, uau, uauuu~!"

Subaru: "I get it! I get it already so don't spill your snot all over me!

Yuck!”

So Subaru responded, and with force he pushed away the face of the blonde-haired girl clinging to him—Louis, as she drenched him in her tears and snot.

But he was unable to shake Louis off with full resolve, since he was also greatly indebted to her for the far too valuable contributions she had amassed.

Subaru had already asked too many things of Louis he could not make amends for.

Although he could exculpate himself for having no other recourse.

Subaru: “If I do that, I don’t deserve to face you. So I’ll do it right.”

Louis: “Uuu~…”

As she rested her forehead while clinging on to Subaru’s back, Louis groaned.

Whether that was her way of forgiving him, or whether she was just happy to be reunited with him, Subaru sighed, accepting that she did not seem to harbor any negative feelings.

Not only did he have to apologize to Louis, but he also owed her many thanks.

But the one he was most thankful for—

Subaru: “—Beatrice.”

Tightly, he hugged her and invoked her name, stroking her ample hair. The one true reason why the owner of such a sheer volume of curly hair and a gorgeous dress, a little girl ill-fitted to the battlefield, was present on it was, no matter how one looked at it, Subaru.

She had certainly done something incredibly reckless, for her to come near to disappearing as she had.

That was why—

Beatrice: "—Subaru."

As those lips uttered his name indeed, Subaru breathed a sigh of relief.

His name was truly "Natsuki Subaru", once again—.

???: "—Excuse me, Schwartz-sama?"

Subaru: "Uwah!"

Feeling relieved, Subaru's shoulders jumped upon hearing an unexpected whisper close to his ear. He turned around by reflex, and present there was a lovely, familiar face—Tanza's.

The deergirl clad in a kimono stared at Subaru with her usual expressionless face, while the latter sat on his butt holding Beatrice in his arms, and with Louis clung to his back.

Tanza: "I apologize for interrupting your amusement. But Hiain-sama and the others are correct. We do not have enough time to spare for leisure activities."

Subaru: "Leisure activities? Isn't that a bit harsh…"

Tanza: "We do not have enough time to spare for leisure activities."

Subaru: "Sorrysorry, my bad…! I understand your feelings, Tanza. Yorna-san will probably also be somewhere on this battlefield."

Rushed by a cold, firm voice, Subaru admitted his wrongdoing, displaying his understanding. Thereupon, Tanza slightly lowered her round eyebrows and muttered, "Yes".

Tanza, who had ended up accompanying Subaru following a series of events, was a girl who had originally been a servant to Yorna Mishigure, the ruler of the Demon City of Chaosflame.

While suppressing her desire to meet up with Yorna as soon as possible, Tanza had joined Subaru on his journey, and finally, their reunion was close at hand.

Being in such a restless state of mind, it was fairly understandable of her to feel the urge to interrupt Subaru who was getting a head start on his own joyful reunion.

However—

Beatrice: "…Subaru, what is the deal with this… this impertinent deergirl?"

Writhing in Subaru's arms, Beatrice looked up at Tanza, declaring thus in a somewhat dissatisfied voice. Promptly, Tanza gazed towards Beatrice,

Tanza: "My name is Tanza. Due to a series of events, I have been serving as Schwartz-sama's attendant."

Beatrice: "Hmph, I understand, in fact. Thank you for your hard work, I suppose. From now on, Betty and the others will take care of Subaru, so you can consider yourself dismissed, in fact."

Tanza: "You will take care of him? In that state? It appears like you cannot even move properly without Schwartz-sama holding you in his arms…"

Beatrice: "Subaru's purpose in life is to hold onto Betty, so this is fine, I suppose."

Subaru: "Waitwaitwaitwait, why are we fighting?! As fellow little girls, shouldn't you get along?!"

For some reason, a perilous atmosphere had broken out all of a sudden between the two girls; caught in the middle, Subaru's voice involuntarily cracked.

For Tanza, typically composed as she was, this attitude was both unbefitting and unendearing, but in a good way. Not that Subaru was unaware that he should not tell a young girl how immature she was being.

Subaru: "Tanza, Beatrice, don't fight, you two. You're allies, both of you. Come on."

Tanza: "Beatrice-sama was poking her nose first. Also, Yorna-sama told me to respond in kind to contemptible people who act heedlessly."

Subaru: "She really told such a Code of Hammurabi-type of thing? I didn't know that… Then, you should be sorry… Beatrice?"

Subaru attempted to mediate between them as Beatrice's round eyes stared at him motionlessly. Enthralled by the characteristic pattern of her pupils, Subaru tilted his neck, asking "What's wrong?".

Then, Beatrice's lips trembled and quivered, and she spoke,

Beatrice: "Just now, you called that girl's name before Betty's, in fact. What's the meaning of this, I suppose."

Subaru: "Huh? Did I?"

Beatrice: "You did, in fact! How utterly infuriating, I suppose! I won't stand for this no matter what, in fact!"

Her eyes flaring up in anger, Beatrice grabbed his collar and shook her head back and forth. Upon hearing this unexpected ruling, Subaru also became dizzy.

And then, getting fed up with this back and forth going absolutely nowhere,

???: "—Schwartz, even I, as the official, have limits to my patience. You should be aware of this, correct?"

Beatrice: "Mya!"

Subaru: "Oh."

A baritone, oppressive voice fell upon them; Beatrice screamed even before Subaru. Tracing Beatrice's baffled gaze, Subaru understood her surprise.

Standing there, in a black overcoat with four folded arms, was a stern-faced Gustav Morello staring down at them.

Being the Governor of the Gladiator Island, his position would normally be that of keeping Subaru and his men captive, yet he now was a collaborator of those who were now brazenly travelling outside of the island—No, he was a comrade of theirs.

This was not limited to just him. Gathered at that very place was not only the large number of people accompanying Subaru from the Gladiator Island, but also companions who had joined them in the meantime as comrades.

Beatrice: “S-Subaru, this man…”

Subaru: “That’s Gustav-san. He looks scary, but at his core he’s frighteningly diligent. Gustav-san, the one on my back is Louis, and this girl is Beatrice. She’s my…”

Gustav: “…Your?”

Subaru: “Um… I mean, you know, that.”

Stroking Beatrice’s back as she curled up, Subaru was at a loss for words coming up with an explanation for Gustav. Witnessing that, Gustav, Tanza and Beatrice all frowned.

At the numerous stares directed towards him, Subaru awkwardly scratched his head and,

Subaru: “…I’ll fill you in on the details later.”

Gustav: “Hey now.”

Beactrice: “Wait, I suppose! Subaru, could it be that not only your appearance, but also your mind has been… slightly…”

Gustav accepted Subaru’s overly sloppy misdirection in his overly serious way of being. But, as Beatrice was about to hit the nail too straight on the head, Subaru covered her mouth.

And then, he whispered to Beatrice’s ear, who was struggling noisily.

Subaru: “Explaining that I’ve shrunken is going to be complicated. So I’m going to keep it to myself for now.”

Beatrice: “…Do you really remember Betty, in fact?”

Subaru: “I really do love you, that’s why I have to do this.”

Seeing Beatrice’s questioning look, Subaru replied then squeezed her hand, intertwining the fingers of his small hand with those of Beatrice’s also small hand.

As soon as he did so, Subaru was momentarily assaulted by a dizzying sense of emptiness. But it did not last forever; only the initial pang had been large.

Subaru: “I couldn’t go on living without you. Isn’t that so?”

Beatrice: “…Betty gets the feeling you’re quite skilled at pulling the wool over her eyes, I suppose. Besides…”

Subaru: “Besides?”

Beatrice: “—. Subaru, something is off, in fact.”

Warmth flowed from within Subaru to Beatrice as they held each other’s hands in front of one another. Instinctively, Subaru was aware that this was not a bad thing, but rather a reassurance.

His memory of Beatrice had become slightly hazy in some parts, as only some details had become blurry, but he was somewhat optimistic it would all be alright once his body was returned to normal.

In any case, close to Subaru as he viewed the situation in such a positive view, Beatrice furrowed her shapely brow, apparently pondering something.

Subaru: “As adorable as your thinking expression is, what exactly feels off?”

Beatrice: “…Subaru, while you were separated from Betty, you had no method of expelling Mana, I suppose. So it’s natural that Mana would pile up, but this amount is…”

Subaru: “—?”

Beatrice’s long eyelashes trembled as she tightened her fingers as if to confirm. Before Subaru, whose head was tilted, her lips spilled a voice bereft of sound.

Certainly, she had muttered something of this sort. —That it was “too much”.

But before the truth of the situation could be ascertained—

Hiain: “—Ah, bro, bad news! That Cecilus guy went ahead!”

Subaru: “Whaaa?!”

Hiain’s shrill voice rose like a scream, and Subaru hurriedly turned his head. Hiain pointed in the direction his own gaze was being cast, to a battlefield where fierce relentless clashes ensued unending, a cloud of dust raging on towards it without stopping.

It was the evidence of an impatient, unruly boy rushing down the hillside.

Weitz: “What now? Should I bring him back or…?”

Subaru: “No, as much as I appreciate your thoughts, that’d be too much for you, Weitz. To begin with, it’s impossible for anyone to stop Ceci… Flag.”

Idra: “Got you, Schwartz.”

While harboring annoyed thoughts at the distant cloud of dust, Subaru took into consideration the positive aspects of the boy’s rampage, since he knew full well from his journey so far that would be unable to rein him in.

Having regained his composure, Subaru made his next request, and it was Idra who moved keenly. Alongside Weitz, they slowly raised the flag right there.

And this action was followed by a massive number of their comrades in arms surrounding them.

Flag after flag was raised; to those in their environs, the appearance would be that the group upon the hillside was firmly united.

Subaru: “Louis, could you get off my back.”

Louis: “Ahh, uh!”

Subaru: “I’m not going to disappear out of the blue again, I assure you. I’ve made peace with what caused me to get whisked away.”

Subaru persuaded Louis, who was still traumatized by his disappearance and reluctant to leave Subaru’s back. She was still skeptical, but in the end, she left Subaru’s back by her own will.

Still, her reluctance was evident of a certain lack of trust.

Beatrice: “—. Betty has no intention of ever leaving, in fact.”

Subaru: “Yeah, you stay with me. —Tanza, is everything ready?”

Tanza: “Yes. —The Pleiades Battalion is ready to go at any time.”

Behind the bowing Tanza, Subaru smiled to himself as he watched his comrades raise their flags, their weapons, and their fighting spirits.

Their morale was high, their motivation filled to the brim, their objective was in sight. All that was left was to seize it.

Subaru: “Since Ceci probably knows my plan without me telling him each and every detail, that’s just his usual amusement… Well, let’s get started, everyone!”

Everyone: “YEAHHHHHHH—!!”

Beatrice: “—Hk.”

There was a tremendous response to Subaru’s call, as Beatrice’s breath got caught in her throat.

If one were to hear it for the first time, this would come as a guaranteed surprise. However, Subaru's ears had already grown accustomed to it, and it was a very important pre-fight ritual.

Louis: "Uau?"

Beatrice: "Subaru, just what do you intend on doing, I suppose?"

Louis and Beatrice, who had just joined Subaru, looked up at him, not knowing the details of the situation.

Closing a single eye as to meet their gaze, Subaru took a step forward, excitement welling up from deep within his body, which he firmly contained in his slender legs.

And then, he declared.

Subaru: "Isn't it obvious? —We're gonna ruin this stupid war that my shitty father started."

Chapter 98:
The Pleiades Battalion

1

—The Kingdom of Lugunica. The Vollachian Empire. The Holy Kingdom of Gusteko. The Kararagi City-States.

Each of these nations, commonly referred to as the Four Great Countries, had developed its own culture, which was tailored to its land; Most notable amongst them, were the pro-dragon mentality of the Kingdom of Lugunica and the Spirit-focused creed of the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko. The Four Great Countries had taken different paths, as if by design.

This was true not only in terms of national customs and culture, but also in terms of the quality of their "warriors".

In the Vollachian Empire, "magic" had hardly developed at all.

Whether people were within its borders or not mattered naught, as the Gates that people possessed, and other prerequisites of that ilk, differed in nothing from those possessed by those of another countries. But compared to Lugunica and Kararagi, the Empire lagged far behind the others in this area.

The Empire, however, did not take that fact to heart.

Of course, falling behind other countries in any field was not welcome, but the fact that the field of magic was not developed meant that other fields had been developed instead.

Compared to the technological prowess of the Kararagi City-States, the Spiritual Arts and Curse Arts of the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko, and the magical disciplines of the Kingdom of Lugunica, the Vollachian Empire excelled in the martial arts.

???: "Sometimes it's faster to just swoop in and hit them than to use magic, right?"

And, while this not-Spiritual Arts User-like statement was one that ought not be espoused by one such person, the gist of the general attitude towards magic in the Vollachian Empire was more-or-less that.

Though it was a highly misunderstood fact, the kind that had gone unwritten in any books at that, the use of Mana in the human body was not only limited to casting magic.

No small number of martial arts techniques had their foundation in the use of Mana, in the same way it was used in Spirit Arts, Curse Arts, and in the activation of some Meteors.

It was perfectly natural for an elite warrior, especially, to use Mana to strengthen his own body.

Supposing an occasion where one possessing unnatural physical abilities were to be compared to an ordinary person, the trick would lay in the handling of the Mana that circulated within the body—a technique called the Flow Method, which was done consciously.

However—

???: “Cha-cha-cha-cha!”

With a thump, only one foot touched the ground, and in an instant the distance closed by a dozen meters.

Tracking the figure, from the perspective of a bystander, would seem as if time had been stolen, given its extraordinary body movements. But that was no optical illusion, nor was there present an anomaly in said bystander’s eyes.

The anomaly was none other than the blue-haired boy running through the battlefield.

Following the explanation given immediately before, the boy’s sprinting, which effortlessly transcended human limitations, was without a doubt brought about by the Flow Method. However, there was no caveat to the boy’s young age and sharp good looks; no record of the days spent learning such techniques was present, apparently.

In the world, beings of the sort were seldom seen. —Beings who were born unknowingly exercising the Flow Method, which was even said to be the pinnacle of martial arts, beings that left those shackled by the natural order in the dust.

Running down the hillside in a single breath, the boy plunged into the battlefield in search of the honor of being the vanguard.

Although—

Blue-Haired Boy: “If the battle’s already begun, the honor of being the vanguard isn’t there, but let’s not fret about the details!”

Intruding upon the battlefield hailing from the western lands, he gazed at the great army surrounding the star-shaped ramparts in the distance. The long, slit eyes of the boy were blazing, moist with excitement unthinkable in a battlefield where grief and joy alternated.

A being that went into battle without proper footwear, without armor or a helmet, without a cause of any kind—a barbaric act that could be seen as hostile by those inside and by those outside the walls both; by those who wished to protect the current Empire, and by those who wanted to destroy it.

However—

Blue-Haired Boy: “The high level of ambition is a point worthy of note. With or without it, the appeal of your speech that flows from your mouth changes. It’s just—”

???: “Who the?!”

Small groups dressed in red gear and crude armor, each composed of dozens of people clearly hostile to one another, were engaged in skirmishes. The young boy, unconnected to either, intruded; a soldier wielding a sword cried out.

‘Twas an admirably clear tone of voice, holding a mixture of anger, frustration, excitement, but fighting spirit prevailed. It was a clever move, one which incited caution towards someone who had intruded on the battlefield.

Blue-Haired Boy: “—But it’s fatally slow!”

???: “Kah!”

Shouting had been the right choice, but stopping and asking their identity had been a misstep.

The right choice would be to assume any being who appeared on the battlefield without revealing his or her allegiance to be an enemy. The soldier should not have stopped at only alerting his surroundings, he ought to have attacked with his sword upon hearing that voice.

Still, the enemy was faster, and if needed, ten or twenty other faults could be pointed out.

Blue-Haired Boy: “Oh, and if what you just said was a line that came out because you didn’t ask my affiliation, but because you had no idea who I was, then, sorry for being too lightning-fast, I’d say.”

Behind the boy babbling nonstop, a soldier opening his eyes wide collapsed onto the ground. As they passed each other, the former had driven his hand akin to a sharp blade into the other’s neck. The boy had expected himself to be capable of chopping the soldier’s head off, but the blow had not been powerful enough.

Shaking and swinging his arms around, he twisted his head as he felt that something was off after all.

Blue-Haired Boy: “It’s so frustrating when you feel able to do something, but actually aren’t. Not that I have any plans to mix up my ideals and wishes with what’s realistically feasible. Well, if I accidentally let him die, I’m going to sink in the Boss’s estimation, so let’s call that a good result!”

Immediately after shaking off his uncertainty so brusquely, the laughing boy’s figure turned into a blur.

A moment later, he avoided a sword strike descending on his position, and the back of the boy’s zori hit the soldier’s face from the side, launching him in the opposite direction. Furthermore, the boy leapt off the soldier as he kicked him, and landing amidst the group who was tailing the soldier, he delivered a single blow to a vital point of each one of them before disengaging—Rather, taking the opportunity as he withdrew, he slipped right into a group nearby, cutting off the consciousness of another five or so. All had happened in the blink of an eye.

Both the follow-up and the main objective were a criminal act to bereave the surrounding soldiers of their time.

In other words, the mastery of this boy over his own body was beyond human comprehension and could not be pursued with raw strength—one could call it the ultimate lineage of martial arts developed in the Vollachian Empire.

Of course, it was not so easy for anyone to analyze such a situation on the battlefield, or to swallow the fact that a child twelve or thirteen years of age could be capable of such a thing.

Above anything else—

Blue-Haired Boy: "—Tactless."

???: "…"

Blue-Haired Boy: "It's tactless to try to undermine the skill and good looks of a star actor during his performance. On stage, nothing more is needed than to be admired, to enthrall and captivate. Of course, if I were to ascend to the stage in the same way, I'd have to assert a more flamboyant appearance by means of an opponent… worthy of it."

The group gasped at the boy frowning down upon his surroundings, as he stood in the middle of the Imperial Soldiers slowly becoming discouraged.

The soldiers on both sides were supposed to be clashing weapons and fighting for their lives, yet were overwhelmed by the boy's presence, bereaved not only of their time, but their very lives.

Blue-Haired Boy: "Hmmm, the blessing of an actor…"

Was to bereave others of their lives. The boy got a certain satisfaction from that realization.

As the boy was savoring this sense of accomplishment, among the numerous defeated soldiers bereft of their time that were opposing the Imperial Soldiers, was one poorly-armed warrior who opened his mouth with a “You”,

Soldier: “Where’s this guy from? Is he one of ours?”

Blue-Haired Boy: “Hmm, hmmhmm, whose side am I on? That’s quite a good question from you. What do you think I am? Friend or foe?”

Soldier: “…”

The warrior clammed up once he had his question returned with another question delivered in such a “I can’t be bothered” fashion. The boy’s smile deepened at this, shaking his head, letting out “No, no”,

Blue-Haired Boy: “I wasn’t teasing you. I was just thinking about it seriously, too. I’m constantly thinking about that stuff. I didn’t really listen to the Boss, so I don’t really know who’s on my side.”

Soldier: “Huh?”

Blue-Haired Boy: “So for now, I’m just going to act as the herald of justice for both sides.”

The warrior widened his eyes with amazement, then his startled face became a horizontal blur, and in the moment subsequent to that, he was flipped over onto the ground.

The smirking boy’s figure vanished into thin air, and this time he sneakily intruded into a group of warriors who had been fighting the Imperial Soldiers he had just defeated, and vigorously he beat them all down.

As the blue hair danced, as the sound of sharp strikes seemingly echoed through the air, the consciousnesses of the warriors were erased without as much as a bitter cry. This violence, was just like a storm—No, it was like,

???: “A Blue Thunderbolt…”

Blue-Haired Boy: “Oh, marvelous. That’s precisely the alias I was thinking of calling myself, too.”

The warrior, who spilled a breath snatched in shock, was rendered unconscious after the end of that sentence.

It was the Vollachian way to respond to both friendly and hostile attitudes with equal violence—yet, this savagery would probably even make the Emperor of this country raise his eyebrows.

But no one was capable of stopping the boy.

Yet it remained absolutely the correct thing to do according to the way of the Empire.

???: “OOOOOOOOOOOOOHH—!”

Belayed did the warriors respond to the threat posed by that small whirlwind of a boy.

No longer were there any distinctions between Imperial Soldiers and rebels, but everyone was united in the thought of stopping that boy. It was, in a sense, the scene of a great achievement, that of stopping a civil war single-handedly, if only in this small space.

However, the steeled resolve of these heroes was not met with a peaceful answer.

Lean back to avoid the blade. Dance backwards to avoid fist strikes. Slip between the legs to avoid axe blows. Dodge arrows, dodge spears, dodge fangs, dodge shields, avoid, avoid, avoid, avoid, duck, duck, duck, duck, evade, evade, evade, evade, dodge, dodge, dodge, dodge—.

???: “Without any weapon…”

Blue-Haired Boy: “Yeah, that’s quite a predicament. I’d like to embellish my highlight poses by showing off my skills with a weapon rather than with my bare hands, but I don’t want to use something half-baked either. After all, the best only know the best.

Ah, look at me sounding like the Boss.”

???: “Bosu…?”

Blue-Haired Boy: “Right. —He’s our, the Pleiades Battalion’s, leader!”

The boy’s smile grew deeper as he boasted, effortlessly dodging the killing intent and hostility being hurled at him. The unfamiliar words uttered by the boy’s mouth filled the warriors with a sense of inexplicable fear.

Any of them were supposed to have been willing to risk their own lives in the battle to decide the course of this Empire.

Nevertheless, they did not know the affiliation of the boy toying with them, the limit to his strength, the true meaning of his words and deeds, or anything else.

Even though they did not know what was going on, everything seemed to be going as per the boy’s wishes—.

—The next moment, a tremendous war cry was heard, hailing from the direction of some hills in the far distance.

Who could blame the warriors for shuddering with a “Hk—”? Similar turmoil and confusion spread to the other warriors as well.

Hence, the smile on the boy’s mouth became larger, not because he was mocking the frightened state of the warriors, but due to something more straightforward.

Blue-Haired Boy: “Well, thus concludes the first climax, Boss. —Make sure to finish it off flamboyantly.”

2

At this point, it is necessary to mention a very unfortunate fact about “magic”.

It would be an issue different from the one described previously, that of the Vollachian Empire having only developed physical martial arts and the Flow Method, rather than having developed magical techniques.

Amidst the six magic attributes in which the magic system of the world was divided, Yin Magic and Yang Magic had only a few wielders, but the neglect they suffered was justified by reasons other than their study being difficult.

Manipulating temperature, the Fire attribute produced flames and even ice.

Interfering with an organism's life force, the Water attribute facilitated the healing of wounds and illnesses, saving lives.

Arranging the environment by interfering with the atmosphere, the Wind attribute was able to even secure habitable areas in inhospitable regions.

Manipulating the earth's power, the Earth attribute could fertilize as well as starve out the land.

Compared to each of those attributes, the usage of which could be clearly envisioned, the Yin and Yang attributes were basically thought of as effects that either enhanced or hampered the performance of one's body.

While technically a misconception, the fact that such an image had taken hold was a major factor as to why the development of magic of the Yin and Yang attributes was so lacking.

And albeit surprising, the one that still possessed a reputation for being especially out of place and useless was the Yang attribute—which held the power to enhance people's capabilities.

Knowing the primary effects of Yang Magic, many may be tempted to question the assessment it received.

However, the more one attempted to take advantage of the features of Yang Magic, the bigger and more unavoidable its problems became.

For example, when it came down to performance on the battlefield, those who enhanced their physical abilities via Yang Magic would suffer complete defeat by the enemy, in most cases.

The reason was simple. They could not handle their own enhanced bodies at all, they were unable to demonstrate their strength whatsoever; it was as if they were in control of someone else's body.

Enhancing one's abilities could perhaps be summed up as strengthening the five senses, such as eyesight and hearing; enhancing physical abilities, such as arm and leg strength; and strengthening defenses, such as increasing bone and muscle density.

However, warriors would always train their own bodies, would always take to the battlefield with a complete grasp on their own skills.

As for those targeted by Yang Magic, they would discard their normal selves and head to the battlefield in a new body donning enhanced specs. As a result, many of them would perish without achieving anything.

The problem went even further, as the efficacy of Yang Magic was greatly affected by the skill of the caster themselves, as well as their physical and mental condition that day.

Even if a warrior who had been subjected to Yang Magic were able to adapt to his enhanced body, there was no guarantee that the same enhancement being performed by the same caster on the very next day would be as effective.

Yang Magic was not expected to improve one's ability to fight consistently; on the contrary, it was recognized as a flaw that prevented one from demonstrating one's usual abilities in adequate fashion. —This, was the reason why Yang Magic had been neglected.

In the past, the Vollachian Empire had also focused its attention on the power of magic, and it'd had an Emperor who had intended to amass the most powerful army. The Thirty-First Emperor of the Vollachian Empire, Murkia Vollachia, had planned to utilize Yang

Magic to turn a powerful army into an even more powerful one.

Taking into account the aforementioned shortcomings, he had enlisted Yang Magic users into his powerful army, training them so that their enhanced state would become their natural state, and then went into actual battle.

However, the results that had unfolded had been disastrous; the powerful army became dependent on the enhancements, being defeated before any Yang Magic could be applied. The skills of the casters, so essential they were, varied; and being unable to function in a cohesive fashion, the army had been sent packing by forces superior in numbers. Even the Emperor's life had been in jeopardy.

The war finally concluded when Viva the Dissector, a close ally of the then-Emperor of Vollachia, ended the enemy leader. But because of this colossal defeat, Murkia Vollachia was engraved into history with an ignominious alias, "The Emperor of the Great Defeat".

Because of this precedent, the value of Yang Magic, and thus the value of magic as a whole, was reduced in Vollachia, leading to the spread of the idea that mastery of martial arts was the mark of a strong soldier.

This had not changed to this day, and Vincent Vollachia, with all his wisdom, had dismissed the use of Yang Magic in group battles as something that dispensed consideration.

In fact, given a user of Yang Magic was only capable of enhancing one target at a time, the deployment of an army that required a plurality of soldiers working in unison was a pipe dream.

Therefore, Yin Magic had remained as a means of harassment, in the sense that it inflicted unusual physical effects on the enemy, but magic had declined in the Vollachian Empire—even in other countries, Yang Magic was considered a cursed practice that was seldom used barring for self-enhancement.

—However, as with everything, there were exceptions.

???: “Let’s do it, you guys—!!”

With a large inhale, the boy’s voice, still shrill, was raised in the hills off to the distant west of the battlefield.

With the boy at their heart, the warriors who spread out atop the hill—a band of no fewer than several thousand people raised their flag, one after the other, for the sake of expressing the unity and will of the group.

A symbol of a will to fight that must never subside, one of the large flags was also held aloft beside the boy by a man whose body was covered in tattoos, accompanied by a gray lizardman, and a man with a dull appearance that yet contained a dignified look in his eyes.

Depicted on the hoisted flag, recognizable even from a distance, was an emblem with the shape of a star.

It was not the crest of one’s family nor the national emblem, but merely the proof of where their hearts lay; a declaration of war of that kind, and naught else.

The group assembled was a diverse one—without exaggeration, it was composed of many races.

Even within Vollachia, where a gargantuan number of species lived and coexisted, there were few relationships consisting of cooperation across racial boundaries. One of the few exceptions which had been able to function as a city was the Demon City of Chaosflame, and even during the siege of the Imperial Capital, there had been no semblance of cooperation among the rebels.

And yet, this group was different.

One could look at it as if they were merely working together for the sake of the same goal. However, that alone would not be able to gather them under a flag to demonstrate their collective will.

It was not that they possessed the same goals, rather, they possessed a shared will.

Hence why this group—Nay, why the Pleiades Battalion, was capable of serving as a trump card.

Spearheading those banners and the comrades he had gathered, a boy of black hair—Natsuki Subaru, exclaimed.

Subaru: "—WE, ARE THE STRONGEST!!"

Pleiades: "STRONGEST! STRONGEST!! STRONGEST—!!!"

A war cry was raised in unison, thundering throughout the sky, as tremendous fighting spirit spread through the battlefield like tongues of flame.

Beatrice, embraced within Subaru's arms as he yelled, covered her ears, staring bewildered. Likewise, Louis also jumped onto Subaru, though only those two young girls were surprised.

Subaru: "—WE, ARE INVINCIBLE!!"

Pleiades: "INVINCIBLE! INVINCIBLE!! INVINCIBLE—!!!"

Hiain, Weitz, Idra, Gustav, Orson's group, Old Man Null, Rex, Milzac, Kashew, Moizo, Deeroy, Creegkin, Codroe, Phenmelle, Jawsrough, Tanza; each one of them roared loudly.

The ground quaked as they stamped their feet upon the soil, the quaking beckoning further quaking, as they roused their fighting spirit.

The recesses of his chest were burning.

That burning, burning, oh so burning, promising, irresistible something, coursed through the entirety of his body.

Letting that burning, promising, irresistible something ride off his tongue—

Subaru: "—OHHHHHHHHHHH INEVITABLE FAAAAAAAATE!!"

Pleiades: "BRING IT ON! BRING IT ON!! BRING IT ONNNNNNN—!!!"

The group bellowed in unison, and all of their eyes turned to the fore, to the battlefield at the foot of the hill.

And then—

Subaru: "—Here we go."

3

The sensation of the sky, of the ground, of the world shaking was felt by everyone on the battlefield at that moment.

Among those who could not treat it as somebody else's problem, were those on the western ramparts who would come to meet the flag-bearing groups running down the hillside from head-on—in other words, the Imperial Soldiers that had been ordered to defend the fourth bastion, which was closest to said posse.

???: "But—"

Not giving in to their fighting spirit, Imperial General Second-Class Gudda Dialmo, the Tiger Hunter, held his ground.

For a moment, they had been overwhelmed by the sudden appearance and high morale of the opposition, but the Imperial Soldiers subordinate to the Tiger Hunter, were not so wet behind the ears as to be overwhelmed by loose cannons of the sort, however.

Above all, the wear and tear on Gudda and his men was almost minimal as far as this battlefield was concerned.

A tremendous siege had been laid against the Imperial Capital, but the harsh attacks made against the other bastions had brought on almost no effects on this fourth bastion.

Without a doubt, that was Olbart Dunkelkenn's achievement, who reigned as the guardian of the fourth bastion. It could be called a demonstration of the Vicious Old Man's capabilities.

???: "In the first place, it's a good idea ta cut off the opponent's legs before they even make it here. Basic rule of warfare's ta sever everythin’ ya can’t fight without, be it water or weapons.”

The Vicious Old Man described the reason why the enemy’s offensive was overwhelmingly weak compared to other bastions with cruelty such that it sent chills down the spines of the troops imagining the horror of not being on the same side as him.

However, even Olbart had been forced to rush to another bastion to fulfil his role of protecting the Imperial Capital, as it was about to be broken through.

Therefore, the fourth bastion was currently lacking the power of the Divine Generals, the greatest strength of the Empire.

Olbart’s legacy, his trained superhuman shinobi, were needed to deal with the Flying Dragon Squadron that had appeared from the sky in the same direction the approaching army hailed from, the west.

Since they did not possess any ranged weapons, the shinobi’s techniques were their only means of defending themselves against the Flying Dragon Squadron.

And in regards to the group fiercely rushing in—

Gudda: “—I’ll deal with you with all my soul!”

With these words, Gudda Dialmo stared at the enemy in front of him, carrying the signature armament of the Tiger Hunter—two metal clubs, each weighing nearly a hundred kilograms.

Gudda’s alias was attributed to the fact that, back when he was still a General Third-Class, he had decimated a group of tigerpeople who were tyrannizing the country, taking the head of the enemy leader who had killed the General Second-Class previously in command.

As a result of that heroic fight to the death, the muscular body of the over two-meter-tall Gudda was scarred from head to belly with white marks left by tiger claws, so he came to be known as the “Tiger Hunter” after word of that fierce battle had spread.

Gudda’s will to fight had remained unshaken even as his army was on the verge of collapse after its General had been killed.

Henceforth, why should he be afraid of being outnumbered, with the heavy burden that laid at his back?

Gudda: “We’ll take you on!”

With a yell like a cannon firing, Gudda’s huge body kicked off the ground and closed in on the enemy horde.

Following Gudda’s lead, his subordinates, each carrying their weapons of choice, rushed toward the star-bearing flag looming from the west.

Gudda: “—That one.”

As his own feet brought him closer to the moment of the groups’ clash, Gudda strained his eyes, focusing ont the vanguard of the enemy—in front of the group that was causing the ground to rumble, was present a red Galewind Horse charging in.

What had caught his attention was the man pulling the reins of the Galewind Horse—Nay, that was false. The man was merely a reinsman, rather, what had warranted his attention was the small figure the man riding on the Galewind Horse carried.

A black-haired boy holding a girl in his arms was looking straight at them with his dark eyes.

In that moment, the only thought passing through Gudda’s mind was that the boy was neither running ahead nor deviating from his position, but was charging forward as if it were natural for him to be in that position.

A boy of black hair and black eyes, just like the black-haired Crown Prince in the rumor that had been spread since before the start of the war.

Gudda: “—Hk!”

Gudda killed off the thought by clenching his molars, focusing on what he must do.

Taking advantage of a ridiculous rumor, the rebels had prepared a large number of black-haired Crown Princes and challenged the Imperial Capital to a decisive battle, foolishly so. Therefore, the Generals who had been tasked with defending the Capital—or rather, all the troops, Privates and Generals alike, had made up their minds.

The authenticity of the black-haired child is of no concern. —There is but one Emperor we ought to look up to.

Gudda: "—You damned traitors, stabbing our Emperor Vincent Vollachia in the back!!"

Dual-wielding his two heavy metal clubs, Gudda roared like a tiger, symbol of what he hunted as per his name, and drew nearer to the boy charging at the front of the pack.

At the front, was a boy riding a red Galewind Horse whom the rebels were following.

Being a General himself, Gudda wished to crush the enemy's fighting spirit with a single blow by mowing them all down, so he did. The impact of the strike was so tremendous that it would cause fragile eardrums to explode.

Gudda's thick arms also felt a satisfying feedback, but his eyes widened.

The black-haired boy was supposed to have been crushed together with the Galewind Horse, but what the metal clubs had perceived was neither the boy, nor the Galewind Horse he was riding—

???: "I have to protect Schwartz, as it is now my duty as the official."

With a body larger than his Gudda's own, with four thick, strong arms, he held a large shield in his hand, which he used to directly block the blow—or rather, both blows from Gudda's metal clubs.

Gudda's throat choked up at the sight, one that was astonishing even taking into account the physical capabilities of the Multi-Arm Tribe.

Slipping into that momentary delay—

???: “And… it’s my job to beat up Schwartz’s enemies…!”

Gudda: “—Hk!”

The voice, hushed yet courageous, and filled with a strong sense of pride and honor, had its owner pummel Gudda in the torso, launching the latter’s massive body into the sky.

The man who Gudda had seen strike him as he let out a “Gah” donned tattoos all over his body and wielded a large two-handed hammer.

He was well-trained. But with his physique and amateurish movements, how could he have—No, the correct thing to question was not merely what had happened to his own body.

Rebels: “OOORAAAAHH—!!!”

Gudda, who had taken the lead, was blown away, and the clashes between the rebels and Imperial Soldiers continued afterwards.

Even if Gudda’s head were to be chopped off, he had trained his men well enough so that they would not lose their will to fight. It was precisely because of this pride that they could hardly believe their own eyes.

All at once, before they could even mount a decent resistance, the Imperial Soldiers were utterly crushed and pulverized by the offense of the oncoming rebel horde.

The sight was so shocking that Gudda’s entire body was filled with an indignation greater than the one he had felt back when he had witnessed the head of his General crushed to bits right before his eyes—

Gudda: “—This is absurd.”

And so, the battle-hardened General let out a hoarse breath at an utterly incomprehensible sight.

4

—As with everything, there were exceptions.

The sole exception was the Pleiades Battalion, a threatening group of amateurs that had crushed the mighty General that was Gudda Dialmo, and the strong warriors he had trained.

They possessed not techniques they had practiced, they possessed not fine armaments, they possessed not even a firm cause.

All they possessed was a really, really strong will to unite, and a vow to themselves that they would not back down no matter what.

And that was precisely the kind of thing that made the Pleiades Battalion an extraordinary group of people.

Recall the lengthy lecture on the shortcomings of Yang Magic.

Its use, which depended on the skill of the caster and the number of people, would often disrupt people's coordination, being labelled as foolish as it had earned the former Emperor the stigmatic moniker of "The Emperor of the Great Defeat". Even Vincent Vollachia, who was proclaimed as a wise Emperor, had quickly abandoned the idea of utilizing it at the consideration stage.

But what if, hypothetically, something like it was possible?

Hundreds, or even thousands of troops, in their entirety, being given a uniform enhancement of the same effectiveness? And yet, none of them suffering from the gap between their original fighting ability and the skill level of their strengthened selves?

And the key to that being the lack of a need to have the number of Yang Magic users being the same as the number of troops? —If such dreamlike or miraculous conditions were met, would it not be feasible?

It was a pipe dream that Vincent Vollachia would laugh at and discard, were he to hear of it.

A group of incidental coincidences that would even be said to be possible only in this time of war, in this situation, in this circumstance.

Only those who accepted Natsuki Subaru—or rather, “Natsuki Schwartz”, as the center of themselves, those who sincerely thought of him as their comrade, those who sincerely believed in him as their companion, would be able to achieve a miracle.

—The strengthening effect of the Yang Magic would be applied to each of the individuals Subaru shared the effect of Cor Leonis with; that was, all of the allies who worked alongside him.

The power of the Little King, originally intended to share wounds and burdens, would now be abused; the power which the King alone could not handle fully, would now be handled together with the comrades that supported him.

Hence, the Pleiades Battalion—

Subaru: “—I love you, all of you!!”

The thousands of “non-combatants” who traveled with Natsuki Subaru were transformed into an army of warriors, beginning to lay waste to every battlefield in this battle for the Imperial Capital.

Chapter 99:
Those Who Rule the Sky

1

—The word “war cry” was appropriate.

Quite simply, it was just a yell.

An exclamation raised to inspire oneself, one’s allies, and a troop’s morale in the face of a match, contest, or any kind of bout; it provided courage and strength to move forward.

Forming a circle before a fight and raising a battle cry before charging onto the battlefield, magic words for coming together as one—in this world, this could truly be called “magic”.

???: “…Unbelievable, I suppose.”

Beatrice was speechless at the destructive power of the Pleiades Battalion led by Natsuki Subaru, a group of amateurs who furiously charged into the enemy forces, crushing the well-prepared and well-armed Imperial Soldiers.

As the red Galewind Horse moved vigorously, causing the ground to rumble, a man with a shoddy beard named Idra held the reins, as Beatrice and Subaru rode at his front in an awkward position. The group advancing under this banner were all under the influence of powerful Yang Magic.

The method through which this had been achieved could only have been—

Beatrice: “—Magical Shroud Excitation.”

The scant words Beatrice muttered were a term referring to a fleeting technique that had existed hundreds of years prior, yet had never been considered valuable, far from being put to practical use.

Even the Witch Echidna, who systematized all of magic, had given it a provisional name, leaving it as an ancient “fantasy”. A technique that could not be reproduced by an individual.

Magical Shroud Excitation was a way of forcibly manifesting the Flow Method, utilizing the Mana circulating within the body to strengthen it, and inducing an effect similar to that of Yang Magic, despite the different approach.

Superhuman force was a term sometimes used to describe the breaking of one’s own physical limits when facing a dangerous situation, producing strength incomparable with one’s original condition.

That was acknowledged as a thing that actually existed, in this world.

In a situation of mental or physical urgency, Gates present in one’s body, which would normally go unused, could be opened, resulting in the person entering the same state as those able to execute the Flow Method.

It was possible that those with superior abilities had been able to teach themselves how to use the Flow Method through an experience of the sort; but for now, further explanation will be omitted as it is beside the main point.

Most important was the fact that Magical Shroud Excitation was a method of forcibly bypassing human limitations, and that it was being used on the entire Pleiades Battalion, which numbered in the several thousands.

Originally, Echidna had witnessed what could be called Magical Shroud Excitation on the battlefield, being used by a small tribe of warriors raising a battle cry which had triggered a similar effect.

They continued to raise their voices before, during, and after the battle, as that was their custom on the battlefield.

Their morale-inspiring roars were accompanied by a Yang Magic-esque effect which raised the strength of the tribe as a whole, and as a result, they had stood out in battle despite their reduced numbers.

However, even they were unable to resist their numerical disadvantage, thus vanishing during the war. Afterwards, similar groups cropped up and were destroyed, and no proper remnants of that custom remained.

A group gathered at random would not produce the effect, overabundant numbers would not produce the effect, and a single competent person would not be able to reproduce the effect. Therefore, Magical Shroud Excitation had died out without ever seeing the light of day.

In modern times, only individuals of exceptional ability mastered the Flow Method, and shouting on the battlefield was something that only boosted courage.

However—

???: “STRONGEST! STRONGEST! STRONGEST—!!!”

What had been shining through all the members of the Pleiades Battalion who were advancing along with Subaru as they shouted this, was the radiance of the Magical Shroud Excitation that was thought to have been lost.

It was truly an ideal environment, they were united with strong trust built around Subaru, becoming a force that equaled an army, devoid of people powerful enough that they would disrupt their flow with incautious Yang Magic.

The effects of the Magical Shroud Excitation that had been triggered were, in Yang Magic terms: enhancement of the five senses, a significant increase in physical capacity, a surge in physical toughness, as well as a bewildering increase in cognitive ability, in addition to reaction time, in what could only be seen as an irregular state of multiple enhancements.

Faced with the Pleiades Battalion, with each and every one of its members having become a warrior worth a thousand warriors in the literal sense—confronting them without any prior information, the Imperial Soldiers were overwhelmed by their momentum, and the battle lines were patently “melted”.

Like ice struck by a hot iron, the formation the enemy had assembled melted starting with the front, as the group of amateurs made headway through the middle of the enemy line with frightening momentum.

Even more astonishing than that was,

Subaru: “—Overwhelm them, but don’t kill them! Make them think they stand no chance in a fight!”

???: “OHHH—!”

???: “Got’cha, Boss!”

???: “In the same way we were saved by you!”

In a battlefield full of people risking their lives in battle, the leader of the advancing battalion declared that no casualties would occur.

It was an idea that would be laughed off as ridiculous and childish nonsense by anyone familiar with the battlefield, but this group of wet-behind-the-ears amateurs now broke through with destructive force.

Blow after blow struck the body of one Imperial Soldier after the other and blew them away, but what was left behind was not a pile of corpses, but a mountain of physically and mentally incapacitated people bearing wounds.

Keeping the enemy soldiers alive so they would be able to rescue their fallen comrades had been no tactical decision. Rather, Natsuki Subaru simply did not have the courage to have people die.

Instead of this courage, Subaru harbored a wish that was being granted by this overwhelming force.

Beatrice: “Subaru, how far have you thought this through, in fact?!”

Subaru: “Eh? Oh, sorry everyone is being so loud! But if we are all shouting emphatically “Let’s do this! Let’s do this! Let’s do this!”, it gets us all hyped up!”

Beatrice: “Eh~~, that’s ludicrous, I suppose!”

Coincidentally, Beatrice had ended up voicing the shared conclusion of everyone witnessing this bizarre battlefield aloud.

But there was no reason to blame them. It was a completely natural thing to say.

Beatrice immediately understood Subaru’s answer. —Subaru, and all the people around him, knew nothing about Magical Shroud Excitation, so there was no way that they could understand it.

While simply believing that fighting while shouting wholeheartedly made them stronger, they had actually perfectly recreated and weaponized an impossible theory even a Witch had given up on.

And even Beatrice was completely oblivious to the fact that Natsuki Subaru was the only one in the whole world who could turn this theory into practice with his Authority of the Little King.

Beatrice: “That’s precisely why…”

Subaru: “Hm?”

Beatrice: “That’s precisely why you’re Betty’s partner, in fact!”

In the arms of Natsuki Subaru, who could do what nobody else could, Beatrice affirmed her situation as her depleted Mana was resupplied during their long-awaited reunion.

Within the Pleiades Battalion, a group full of amateurs, no one needed to understand the current situation, nor did anyone actually understand it, so Beatrice contemplated on behalf of her partner Subaru.

How could she involve herself in this historical moment that might never be reproduced again?

Beatrice: “If you intend to take the wind out of the opponent’s sails, I could prevent them from reorganizing, I suppose.”

With a slight movement, Beatrice directed her small palm towards the large number of Imperial Soldiers that had been blown away.

Taking into account Subaru’s wishes, the bloody battles between the warring parties, as well as the way of the Empire which took hold of the battlefield, what Beatrice performed was,

Beatrice: “—El Shamak.”

As a member of the Pleiades Battalion, Beatrice wielded her own exceedingly enhanced power.

A black haze descended upon the heads of the Imperial Soldiers defending the fourth bastion one after another, robbing them of their thoughts, stifling their will to fight, depriving them of the opportunity to counterattack.

—Within minutes of the Pleiades Battalion joining the battle, the fourth bastion, which had thus far suffered minimal damage during the siege of the Imperial Capital, was completely and utterly collapsed.

2

The onslaught of the Pleiades Battalion’s ravenous rush reached Abel’s ears in the main camp, instantly.

At that point, however, the name of the Pleiades Battalion did not reach him, hence it was only reported that a group had appeared from the west and clashed with the Imperial Soldiers with overpowering might, collapsing the defensive line there.

In any case—

???: “—Good grief, they showed up just as we were about to play our trump card, and completely stole the spotlight. How exhilarating.”

A gallant voice echoed through the main camp as a beautiful figure arrived with coolness, taking that fact in with grace.

The one making their entrance was an imposing-looking woman, her wavy hair swinging from side to side, on her face a white scar produced by a sword. She was dressed in a garb a ruffian would favor, one unbefitting of her noble status; the name of the woman of character stepping into the main camp was Serena Dracroy.

She was one of the most distinguished High Countesses in the Vollachian Empire, but rather than being currently on the side of the Empire, she was instead a rebel against the ruling power—and one of Abel's original trump cards.

Upon Serena's visit, Abel folded his arms as he gazed out at the battlefield beyond.

Abel: "I was under the impression that your reinforcements would comprise of the Flying Dragon Squadron."

Serena: "Rest assured. I have no intention of changing the fact that the utmost elite of my forces are the Flying Dragon Squadron. The ones currently captivating the battlefield are an unexpected matter."

Abel: "Is it not by your own doing?"

Serena: "I would put them under my wing if they approached me, but unfortunately, it seems like they're only looking up to one person. They wouldn't even bat an eye at me."

As she answered, Serena's long-legged figure walked up to Abel's side.

Peering into Abel's face with her almond-shaped eyes, she narrowed her eyes at the face covered by the oni mask.

Abel: "Surely you cannot work with someone who hides his face from you?"

Serena: "Why would I say something so dull? There's no difference between those who hide their true intentions behind makeup and those who hide their true faces behind masks. If your reason is hiding a scar, I'd say you're not as bad as I am."

Abel: “I shall not state my reason, but it is not because of a scar. I wear this out of necessity.”

Serena: “I figured you would. I could gather from your words that you don’t do anything unnecessary. And now that we’ve actually exchanged words like this, that impression has deepened even more.”

As Serena ascertained this from Abel, she smiled fiercely with her hands on her hips.

Of course, as he was the actual Emperor, Abel and Serena were acquainted with each other. The cognitive disruption effect of the oni mask could slightly alter such malaises, but it did not change Abel’s evaluation of Serena.

She was a fierce, progressive, and courageous general who was willing to snap at the Emperor when necessary—exactly what her moniker, the Scorching Lady, suggested.

However, if it were not for such a temperament, he would have never counted her as one of the cards in his hand to assist him in this rebellion.

Serena: “Is your assessment that no one else fancies things as I do?”

Abel: “It was necessary to think about how to prepare the grounds to win you over. But my main reason for choosing you, was so that the odds of winning the battle would increase.”

Serena: “To think that my Flying Dragon Squadron would be valued to that extent, when the Imperial Capital’s given me the cold shoulder.”

Shrugging her shoulders, Serena gave that sarcastic remark; but despite the content of her words and the expression on her face, her reaction showed that her blood was boiling due to that very fact.

The existence of the Flying Dragon Squadron in the hands of High Countess Dracroy was the core reason why the Dracroy Domain was revered and respected throughout the Vollachian Empire, where the strong were held in high esteem. In other words, for Serena Dracroy, it was a source of pride that ought not be wounded.

Even if someone from the Dracroy territory were to commit an evil act—in other words, even if they were to act against the Emperor himself, no doubt ought to be brought forth against their capabilities.

That was why—

Abel: “You have accepted the invitation on this occasion. The flying dragons that rule over the skies of the battlefield… those who obey the dragonkin, Madelyn Eschart. Force them out of the way, and claim supremacy over the air.”

Serena: “As a matter of fact, your enticing proposal is not the only reason I accepted your invitation… but fulfilling it is also an important role for me at the moment. May you have your wish. —My Flying Dragon Squadron.”

Abel: “…”

Serena: “No longer will those sudden reinforcements annoy me and steal the spotlight.”

Having assumed the role expected of her, Serena once again directed Abel’s attention to the western battlefield. Her words guided his gaze again, and his black eyes narrowed behind the oni mask.

As Serena had stated indeed, that group had come as an absolute surprise to everyone. —If he were to be honest, any deviation from the path he had laid out was not welcome, no matter how favorable it could possibly be to the progress of battle.

Serena: “So that’s the battalion that turned the west of the Imperial Capital on its head. You have probably heard of them, haven’t you?”

Abel: “I have. However, I was unable to decipher what their purpose was, and from the reports of their position, I judged they would not have made it in time for the decisive battle either. Therefore, I did not include their fighting strength in my estimations.”

Serena: “In that case, they’ve clearly defied your expectations. From what I’ve heard, they’ve been ceaselessly running through day and night to arrive on this battlefield in time.”

Abel: “—. Even though such conduct makes sense in theory, it is completely nonsensical in reality. One can only imagine the amount of running a day to make it in time. And even if they made it in time after all of that, they would have way too many deserters to even put up a fight.”

This might be self-evident, but the more one increased the size of a group, the greater the amount of effort that was required to even get to it to move.

On top of the logistics, supplies, and fighting required to maintain a large army, over time they would become more frantic and accumulate more and more fatigue, more easily would they lose the will to fight, and their hearts would drift away from the banner they raised.

Even bringing someone under these conditions to a battlefield was no small feat, let alone waging war on the battlefield with them.

But—

Serena: “So, Oni-Masked Grand General, does this look like a battle waged by people with low morale to you?”

Were Serena to have asked him this, Abel would have had to deny what he was seeing with his own eyes.

Barely visible in the distance, the fighting of the battalion charging right into enemy lines within a whirled-up dust cloud defied all expectations. Even though their war cry could not be fully heard, its aftereffects had reached the main camp, noticeably so.

Only a disillusioned fool in complete denial of reality would point at that scene and feign that the troops were low in morale.

Serena: “Their leader seemed to be one of the black-haired Crown

Princes who was on everyone's lips. I thought this whole story about His Excellency Vincent's illegitimate offspring being present here and there across the entire Empire was laughable, but that surprisingly stands out like he could be the real deal."

Abel: "—. So that is how it is."

Serena: "Hm?"

Squinting at the dust cloud lingering in the distance, Abel's thoughts clicked into place.

Being related a story he himself seemed aware of, Abel remarked on it, prompting Serena to tilt her head. But, Abel did not respond to her question, instead simply closing one eye at the conviction growing within him.

A group with exceptionally high morale and unity that traversed an inconceivable distance and remained on its feet just to fiercely step into this battlefield—finally, he could perceive its true nature.

Namely—

Abel: "—Are you able to make proper use of your own power at last, I wonder."

If that was indeed the case, then the unforeseen presence of the invading group from the west would make complete sense. And it would be even more unexpected for the false Emperor sitting on the throne of the Imperial Capital.

This black-haired Crown Prince possessed an ability that truly lived up to the rumors—or at least, that person was supposed to be capable of performing to that level.

Abel: "It is unnecessary for our side to make any moves on the western battlefield. However, the third bastion is still the most crucial spot to break open. And I harbor no intention to relent. — High Countess Dracroy."

Upon her name being called, Serena nodded her head and spoke,"I know".

Looking at what laid beyond Abel's line of sight, she directed her gaze at the fluttering flying dragons dominating the sky.

Serena: "Let's show His Excellency the Emperor, who appointed that crude and impudent dragonkin, the difference between wild flying dragons and the disciplined Flying Dragon Squadron."

Indeed, while being completely ignorant of the fact that the true Emperor stood right next to her, she undertook this mission with a frenzied smile on her face.

3

—Overlooking the entire battlefield from the rear, the main camp allowed them to keep a watchful eye on any anomalies all-around.

Having arrived there as a reinforcement, Serena Dracroy held a grudge against the flying dragons that obeyed one of the Nine Divine Generals, the dragonkin, Madelyn Eschart.

These ferocious flying dragons would never get along with humans without a special secret technique, yet they rampaged here, in the battle for the Imperial Capital, wielding their natural ferocity and peril on full display, posing a great threat to people.

Albeit Madelyn had only explained it in rough terms, she had seemingly made arrangements so that the flying dragons, who could not distinguish between enemies and allies, would not cause damage to allied Imperial Soldiers. For that reason, casualties were not as indiscriminate as had happened on the attack on the Fortress City of Guaral.

Nevertheless, they would swoop down on the rebels, reminding them of the threat posed by the claws and fangs dancing in the sky; plus, the damage from the occasional stone bombardment making ground could hardly be ignored.

However, flying dragons could only make such attacks against warriors who attached more importance to the group rather than the individual, and could not interfere in a battle between beings with overwhelming strength.

The Nine Divine Generals who defended each bastion, and the elite of the rebels who clashed head-on with them—there was no way for the dragons to barge into their battle, a battle on an entirely higher level.

Therefore—

Mezoreia: "—I, am Mezoreia. In accordance with the voice of mine dear child, I shalt become the wind from the heavenly skies."

Emilia: "—Icicle Line!!"

Waving both hands, Emilia jumped, redrawing a line of white ice on the world she traced.

Immediately after, a tail cleaved the snowy ground where Emilia had been just moments before with tremendous speed, instantly rupturing the ground and evaporating the snow.

The one to perform such a deed, was a mighty being with a huge body of white scales, clad in clouds flowing in the sky—called by the dragonkin, Madelyn, a threat to the world had descended upon its surface.

Emilia: "Mezoreia…!"

Thinking in the corner of her mind that there was a city bearing the exact same name in the Vollachian Empire were she not mistaken, Emilia clenched her molars at the powerful attack she had avoided by the skin of her teeth, and encouraged her own heart.

Along the line of frost redrawn by Icicle Line, a wall of ice rose up from the ground with a sound. It was not as high as the walls surrounding the Imperial Capital, but it was high enough to keep the airborne Mezoreia from escaping the battlefield.

Emilia: "I can't let you go where everyone else is."

Amidst the battlefield as it grew colder and colder—No, rather, it was becoming colder of her own volition, Emilia exhaled white breath while expressing her determination.

Indeed, Emilia had been in quite a lot of trouble when Madelyn had summoned Mezoreia.

Taking on Madelyn alone had already been a Herculean task, but it was obvious that adding Mezoreia to the equation would make things even more troublesome.

But Emilia's intuition told her that it would be quite difficult to get anyone to help her.

Emilia: "It'd be nice to fight alongside someone like Priscilla though…"

It was not Emilia's forte to fight in sync with those around her. That was because she had trouble thinking while fighting. That was why she respected people who could think while fighting, and believed she could join forces with such a person.

But even that would be difficult in this fight with Madelyn and Mezoreia.

Emilia: "Because it's getting colder and colder."

The ice barrier created by Icicle Line did not only prevent Mezoreia from getting out, but also limited the space in which Emilia could lower the temperature.

It had been a suggestion from Petra, but most ground dragons were vulnerable to cold. If flying dragons and water dragons shared the same roots as ground dragons, they probably had similar vulnerabilities to cold.

In fact, unlike earth dragons, both flying dragons, who flew high up in the skies within cooler temperatures, and water dragons, who swam through cold water, had varying tolerance levels against cold, but this misconception was irrelevant in face of overwhelming cold.

Because at the current moment, Emilia was bringing forth extreme cold that far exceeded that limit.

Emilia: "—Just like Puck's Magic Release Period."

Before Roswaal’s mansion burned down, there had been an episode where Puck had almost turned it completely to ice on accident because he had not let out Mana in due time. The battlefield’s cold temperature, at this moment, rivaled that instance.

Any normal person would have found their hands numb, having been made unable to hold a weapon, having been made it so that moving their body was incredibly difficulty. Even a strong person would be affected by no small amount.

Precisely because Emilia had chosen this fighting style, she could only fight on her own.

At the very least, this time.

Mezoreia: “—I, am Mezoreia. In accordance with the voice of mine dear child, I shalt become the wind from the heavenly skies.”

The sky was covered with low, thick clouds, and Emilia’s amethyst eyes twinkled as she heard a voice from overhead that sounded so heavy that she wondered if the sky itself had spoken.

There was a declaration of its supernatural presence, and in the very subsequent moment, a blow beyond human understanding was unleashed.

The mere flick of its tail could rip the earth apart, the swing of its claws could rend space in two, its great breath was powerful enough to blow away nearly half a city. It truly was extraordinary.

It was unmistakably a Dragon, a legend which Emilia had now encountered twice in just a short period of time.

Emilia: “…”

There was a jerk from its unfurled wings, and the wall of ice Emilia had erected was effortlessly torn apart. Although not quite as solid as iron, she had done her best to harden it. And yet, it had been easily broken, and before Emilia could feel any disappointment or surprise, she was hurriedly dodging bullets of ice hurtling towards her.

Having been minced and sent flying by the Dragon’s wings, countless chunks of ice, large and small, rained down as scattered lumps. If one were to clash against these pieces of ice, some as large as one’s head, taking no care, they would end up being rendered immobile, completely, against their Dragon opponent.

That, would be a lethal injury to a diminutive being fighting a mighty Dragon.

Emilia: “Hiyah! Yah! Huff! Yikes!!”

And thus, Emilia avoided the chunks of ice as if she were dancing, sweeping away and enduring with a sword and shield of ice she had created for the ones she could not completely dodge.

The fact that she never broke eye contact with her opponent during all of that was due to her recent firsthand experience of fighting the Divine Dragon Volcanica at Pleiades Watchtower.

The Dragons’ power was so far beyond the imaginations of Emilia and her comrades, that even the slightest movement, even one that did not look like an attack, could be incredibly dangerous.

Emilia: “When fighting Volcanica, I nearly got blown away by a puff of its nose.”

Remembering that time, she again felt glad that she was the one present at this place.

If one did not know how to fight Dragons, they could inadvertently trip up on the first something or another, resulting in their doom. But that was not the only thing Emilia recalled during her fight with Mezoreia.

Following Madelyn’s call, the Cloud Dragon Mezoreia had pushed the sky aside, descending unto the battlefield—of course, it was very difficult to contend with the ridiculous way of fighting that was unique to Dragons.

Emilia: “Mezoreia! Please, just listen to me! I don’t want to fight with Madelyn…”

Mezoreia: “—I, am Mezoreia. In accordance with the voice of mine dear child, I shalt become the wind from the heavenly skies.”

Emilia: “Ah, just as I thought…”

Emilia appealed loudly, but brushing those words aside, Mezoreia shook its long whiskers without listening and looked down at the tiny Emilia on the ground with its eyes.

Bearing its direct gaze, Emilia firmly gritted her teeth, becoming keenly aware of something as every nerve in her slender body was filled with energy.

Namely—

Mezoreia: ”—I, am Mezoreia. In accordance with the voice of mine dear child, I shalt become the wind from the heavenly skies.”

Emilia: “You’re just like Volcanica, you’ve grown too old and forgot everything!”

For the second time in her life, she had encountered a Dragon, a supernatural being—Mezoreia, the Cloud Dragon, the one who ruled the sky, had grown senile, just like the Divine Dragon she had encountered at the Tower.

Chapter 100:
A Myriad of Changes at the Bastions

1

—The Cloud Dragon Mezoreia’s senility.

The startling revelation of the truth drove Emilia into a tremendously difficult corner.

Emilia: “I didn’t have to beat Volcanica at the time, all I had to do was do my best and complete the Trial, but…”

Her encounter with the Divine Dragon Volcanica on the highest floor of Pleiades Watchtower had concluded once she touched a stone monument at a peak even further above the Tower’s peak.

As for Emilia, she was still unsure as to whether she had properly resolved Volcanica’s Trial; however, the ancient Dragon had presented one of its claws as proof of the denouement to Emilia.

So, for now she considered this a symbol of approval.

However, her fight with Volcanica had fundamentally been a defensive one, as she’d had no intention of beating him, so it had been no battle at all.

And this situation was the same, even if the opponent had changed from the Divine Dragon to the Cloud Dragon.

If anything—

Emilia: “I’ve got no other choice but to beat it, but Mezoreia has lost—Ah!”

As she was saying this, Emilia sprung from her spot and closed in on the Dragon that was airborne.

Shaking its long whiskers, without anything being displayed, reflected in its eyes, the Dragon mercilessly slashed its claws at the puny existence flying towards it.

It was a simple attack, but just one strike would be more than enough to kill someone were it to connect.

The Dragon’s claws were much sharper than any run-of-the-mill sword, able to cleave Emilia’s body in twain with ease.

Emilia: “Soldiers!”

However, Emilia was able to avoid this attack by jumping even further into the sky.

The midair foothold that Emilia had made use of had been provided by an Ice Soldier who’d leaped alongside her, then putting up both of its arms for Emilia to bounce off.

Naturally, the Ice Soldier had been incapable of escaping in time, thus falling prey to the Dragon’s claws, which smashed it to pieces.

Emilia: “Eiya!!”

Keeping this sacrifice in her heart, Emilia’s long legs kicked Mezoreia in the face.

The leg Emilia had utilized to deliver this kick had been equipped with footwear made of ice, donning an enlarged spike with extreme sharpness, making it an awfully lethal weapon.

Since Emilia had used her foot, she did not pull any punches with this merciless kick—so an absurdly brutal blow slammed into the side of Mezoreia’s defenseless head.

However—

Emilia: “It’s not working at all!”

Mezoreia’s huge body did not budge an inch from getting kicked in the face.

However, it appeared to be irritated. Feeling hostility on her skin, Emilia greatly swung her upper body to do a midair flip, using another Ice Soldier to dodge the incoming thrust from the Dragon.

Lagging behind the one that had been shattered, another Ice Soldier had leapt even further up and stretched out both of its legs from above. Aligning both their soles, Emilia launched herself off of them towards the ground below.

While the sound of shattering ice resounded in her eardrums, Emilia landed atop the white ground on her hands, then looked up towards the majestic cloud-wreathed Dragon calmly floating in the air.

Mezoreia: "—I, am Mezoreia. In accordance with the voice of mine dear child, I shalt become the wind from the heavenly skies."

Emilia: "Geez… Even after all of that…!"

Even after being kicked in the face and smashing apart two Ice Soldiers with its claws, Mezoreia's words and demeanor did not change at all compared to when it had first descended upon the battlefield.

Emilia: "…"

It certainly did consider Emilia an enemy.

It was precisely for this reason that it was brandishing its claws towards Emilia as she made her approach, all the while it flapped its wings and turned its unfocused white eyes towards her.

But she just could not initiate a conversation. Just like with Volcanica, it was incredibly difficult to find common ground.

The only potential clue was, possibly—

Emilia: "—Madelyn! Just listen to me!"

Madelyn: "Shut the frig' up! Don't friggin' address this dragon so casually!!"

Emilia's last ray of hope faded into the distance as her outstretched hand was violently shaken off.

Even though Madelyn had lost the Flying Winged Blade she was able to wield with remarkable skill, Emilia's silver hair was still disheveled as she leapt away in evasion. A small shadow followed right behind her—that of Madelyn Eschart, who let out a white exhale as her golden eyes were set ablaze, the ground cracking with every step she took as she brandished her arms that wrought destruction.

Narrowly avoiding it, Emilia bit down on her molars.

The tactic of rapidly lowering the temperature had served its purpose of keeping the rampaging Madelyn and Mezoreia away from the others on the battlefield, but it was difficult to push it any further.

Madelyn: "Human, human, human…!!"

A wicked glint in her eyes, Madelyn's petite body was cloaked in white steam. It felt like she was matching the cloud-wreathed Mezoreia, but there was a difference.

Madelyn's body temperature was so absurdly high that every single snowflake evaporated upon coming into contact with her—no, that happened before they could even reach her.

The same thing was also happening around Mezoreia, the "Puck Copycat" tactic was not really effective on these two.

That being the case—

Emilia: "Icicle Line—!"

With the ice wall separating the battlefields still in place, Emilia changed the flow of cold air. Aborting an ineffective strategy to preserve her strength, was not what she was doing.

As she had covered too large of an area, it had not had the desired effect on Mezoreia and Madelyn, and so.

Emilia: "How about all this cold!"

Drawing invisible white lines around Madelyn approaching her directly, Emilia concentrated the cold air permeating the battlefield around the second bastion into a single spot.

Wrapping around Madelyn's small body was not just any ordinary cold, it was a truly extreme cold, one that changed steam into snow, causing the dragonkin's body temperature to plummet below freezing temperature instantly.

Madelyn: "—Guh?!"

Even Madelyn had her whole body frozen still by this unforeseeably extreme cold.

Madelyn's eyes widened as her vision whited out; however, Emilia threw away her last bit of pity and focused on pouring all her power into temporarily freezing her solid.

Emilia: "Please…!"

Directing all of her power towards freezing Madelyn, Emilia seemed to harbor prayers in regards to Mezoreia's actions.

The participation of the cloud-wreathed Cloud Dragon in the melee would force Emilia to halt her attack prematurely. However, in the corner of her field of view, she saw Mezoreia floating in the sky with an empty expression and no indication of wanting to interfere with Madelyn's predicament.

Emilia: "Weird, but—"

In this situation, Mezoreia staying still helped her out a lot.

When Mezoreia had made its appearance from the sky, being summoned by Madelyn's voice, Emilia's realization had been that she had been cornered into an even more hopeless situation.

However, by the looks of it, Madelyn and Mezoreia were not cooperating at all, continuously switching between one of them attacking on their own and the other standing idly by.

From Emilia's perspective, it was pretty much a one-on-one in which the opponents would tag-in and tag-out.

Of course, Emilia’s stamina was still slowly being whittled away, and she could not think of Madelyn, nor of Mezoreia, as opponents that she could easily take down in a one-on-one fight.

Nevertheless—

Madelyn: “Y… ou…!”

Emilia: “Sorry, Madelyn. I think it would’ve been better if I could’ve had a proper chat with you. But, since you refuse to listen, I’m going to need you to be obedient now!”

Madelyn: “Guh—!”

Madelyn’s whole body violently creaked, and she flashed her sharp fangs as her eyes blazed.

However, once the inner part of her body had been chilled to the very core of its core, even the extremely stout and vigorous dragonkin was unable to avoid having her freedom snatched away.

Madelyn: “…”

Her blood and flesh, her bones and skin, all of it was frozen white, and Madelyn was imprisoned in ice by Emilia.

It had concluded just before Madelyn’s hand, which she had suddenly stretched out, could reach Emilia’s chest. With her hands still pointed at Madelyn, Emilia looked at the immobile girl and let out a long exhale.

Emilia: “That… was a close one…”

Patting her chest in relief, Emilia lowered her eyebrows at the young girl that had been colored white.

She did not feel delighted nor regretful for having won or lost. Above all else, this did not mark the end quite yet.

Emilia: “Mezoreia! You may not understand what I’m saying, but you need to stop fighting! If you really can’t communicate no matter what, then go home for today!”

Emilia had considered the possibility that Mezoreia would become incredibly angry the moment she defeated Madelyn, so she was slightly relieved to see that Mezoreia had not made any movement. However, unable to let that relief slip through to her expression, Emilia glared at Mezoreia with a sharp look on her face.

She was trying to act like she still had plenty of strength left in her.

However, the truth was that Emilia did not have much strength remaining, in actual fact.

Although she had succeeded in freezing Madelyn in ice, she would need to keep Madelyn chilled in order to maintain her in that frozen state. That, too, required the continued use of energy.

Hence, even though she had stopped Madelyn, it would be very difficult to fight Mezoreia.

If possible, the best thing Mezoreia could do would be to turn back from here.

That was why—

Emilia: "In the case that you still want to keep going, then I also have a plan."

With a sharp glare in her eyes, Emilia declared such to Mezoreia. —A lie, it was.

Even though she had stated it with immense confidence, her glare set on Mezoreia, it was an outright lie that Emilia had any kind of plan. She thought that if she insisted, perhaps Mezoreia would think Emilia was dangerous and run away.

It was a bluff, something that seldom came from Emilia, and one that followed Subaru's and Otto's examples.

Mezoreia: "—I, am Mezoreia. In accordance with the voice of mine dear child, I shalt become the wind from the heavenly skies."

A bluff to which, a deep, low voice from Mezoreia's mouth replied so.

Emilia became disheartened by Mezoreia's undecipherable behavior, as it was unclear whether or not it could see what was before its eyes, but she was determined not to be defeated and did not decrease the severity of her gaze.

And then—

Mezoreia: "—I, am Mezoreia. In accordance with the voice of mine…"

Emilia: "…Huh?"

Mezoreia: "In accordance… with the voice… the voice of… mine dear child…"

Mezoreia's words, which it had repeated over and over and over again no matter what she herself spoke, were cut off halfway through, immediately began to falter, and did not continue after.

It was not just that. Mezoreia, who had been staying peacefully within the snowy sky, frowned somewhat painfully, its large head starting to sway from side-to-side.

Emilia: "What's wrong all of a sudden? Does your head hurt?"

Seeing the changes born in Mezoreia, Emilia's amethyst eyes widened in surprise.

It would only be natural that Mezoreia would lash out in anger after Madelyn had been encased in ice. It would be very troubling were it to do just that, but that would be easier to accept than this kind of weird reaction.

Overhead, with those worries in Emilia's mind, Mezoreia's movements came to an abrupt halt.

Mezoreia: "…"

The Dragon, which had been shaking its head in pain, suddenly looked down with a serene expression. Met with the gaze of those white eyes, on a face that had grown out a long beard, Emilia let out a short "Ah".

Now, for the first time, she felt as if she had been “seen” by Mezoreia’s eyes.

In other words, it was a sign of will and intelligence dwelling within Mezoreia’s eyes—

Emilia: “Finally, we can talk—”

Mezoreia: “I do believe I told you, human.”

Emilia: “Huh?”

With a low voice, resounding as if the sky had roared, the Dragon turned its head to face Emilia. She was pierced by its gaze, however, Emilia’s body stiffened because of a different shock.

She had been gazed upon by something mightier than herself; that was not what had surprised her.

The reason was because the violent emotion in its voice was just like the one that had just been directed at her just a few moments before—No, because it was exactly the same.

Indeed, as if to confirm the stiffened Emilia’s surprise, the Dragon continued.

Mezoreia: “This dragon doesn’t friggin’ have anything to say to you.”

Emilia: “Madel—”

Upon seeing something unbelievable, Emilia involuntarily ceased her movement.

Turning towards Emilia, the Dragon opened its mouth. Then, it simply exhaled. —That breath became a white light, and the true essence of the Cloud Dragon filled the world.

The dreadfulness of when a definite will dwelled within the Dragon’s power rained mercilessly down upon Emilia.

The influence of the battalion intervening from the west had spread across every corner of the battlefield.

Of course, the ones most affected by this battalion were those of the garrison at the fourth bastion, which was brought to the brink of collapse after suffering unparalleled damage in one fell swoop.

However, even if it had not been affected directly, it could be said that the third bastion was influenced the most by the changes the Pleiades Battalion had had on the state of the battle.

Originally, the soldiers sent to the third bastion with the purpose of nullifying one of the trump cards of the Imperial Capital Lupugana, the Magic Crystal Cannon, had supposedly been forsaken.

Zikr, having been told of the plan by Abel, had been prepared to sacrifice himself. Thanks to his maneuvering, some of his forces—the People of Shudraq, had escaped the Magic Crystal Cannon's line of fire, a minor deviation when compared to the damage that was supposed to have been dealt to the third bastion.

In any case, at this point in time, the expectation was that the forces at the third bastion would have been lost.

Once they had not been lost, remaining in the field, Abel's initial calculations, which had been based on the premise that the rebels would suffer a painful defeat, had been thwarted. However, there should be nothing wrong with those forces surviving. Immediately correcting the miscalculation, Abel adjusted the original strategy to the current situation.

As a result—

Zikr: "—That is High Countess Serena Dracroy's Flying Dragon Squadron."

Amidst the battle with the stone golems, the sword-wielding Zikr whispered this while on his beloved horse, Leidy.

His round eyes turned towards the azure sky, half-deprived of its color to tonalities of white and red—flying above the various battlefields, winged brethren clashed, turning their fangs onto each other.

On one side was a flock of natural-born flying dragons rampaging as per the orders of the Flying Dragon General, Madelyn Eschart, their untamed ferocity unleashed.

Pitted against them was a squadron of flying dragons carrying their partners, the flying dragon riders, on their winged backs, their blades of ferocity in their trusty sheaths.

The wild, unmanned flying dragons clearly outnumbered the flying dragon riders, but anyone would agree that the latter were far more skillful in aerial combat.

While the wild flying dragons were overflowing with ferocity, swinging their claws and fangs with violence, the skills of the flying dragon riders were far more splendid and refined in comparison. Avoiding the fangs with dexterous moves that completely disregarded their airborne state, the flying dragon riders employed their weapons to pierce the wings of the wild flying dragons, felling them one after another.

Zikr: “What a staggering difference…”

Only Zikr, who was acquainted with the flying dragon riders’ General as a General Second-Class of the Empire, could tell which of them was hopelessly outclassed. The wild flock of flying dragons being led by Madelyn.

Nonetheless, the violence of numbers was difficult to handle, and the fact that the fortified city had been completely overwhelmed by their sheer numbers was a deep thorn in his heart. This perception was about to be overturned once again.

For better or worse, he was about to witness the true strength of Flying Dragon Taming, a tradition of the Empire, with his own eyes.

Zikr: “I must push onward, to inform His Excellency about the success of his plan.”

As Abel played his card, the Flying Dragon Squadron of High Countess Dracroy, the air supremacy of the flying dragon flock was diminished, allowing Zikr to ascertain his surroundings.

Although he had charged at the front for the sake of the troop morale, Zikr was by no means competent as a fighter during live combat. He would instead order timely formation instructions and advance further into the heart of the enemy lines.

He would advance further towards General First-Class Moguro Hagane, who had assimilated with the castle wall, a threat which had all but abated thus far.

Zikr: “I pray Miss Beatrice is safe…”

And so, as Zikr raised his sword, a corner of his mind was occupied with the girl with pale-colored hair wearing a gorgeous dress—the all-but-certain savior of his life, Beatrice.

The moment the Magic Crystal Cannon had been unleashed, as Zikr was prepared to face death, he saw the figure of a girl throwing herself in front of the incoming light to repel it somehow.

Beatrice was small to begin with, but high up in the sky she appeared to be the size of a pebble. Still, Zikr was convinced that that had indubitably been Beatrice.

To never mistake a woman he had once beheld with his eyes, that was Zikr’s special skill.

Therefore, Zikr was able to say with definite certainty that the one who had been able to deal with the Magic Crystal Cannon’s shot had been Beatrice.

The problem was, that he too was certain that no one could accomplish such a feat without a cost.

Zikr: “Please, be unharmed—!!”

He would wholeheartedly raise his voice for Beatrice to be awarded with the greatest medal of honor for rewriting this predicament, but above anything else, he wished for her to be safe and secure.

But Zikr, who had avoided certain death in the middle of the battle, had a role to play as a General.

So all Zikr could do was pray.

—That the entirety of his remaining fortune may fall to that girl.

Meanwhile, much like Zikr, who was praying for the safety of the one who had just contributed so much on the front line, Taritta had witnessed the moment the Magic Crystal Cannon had unnaturally vanished, and just who had accomplished it.

Taritta: "I was told to back off, but luckily I had a clear view of the battlefield…"

The rebels had been hit hard, but had managed to get back on their feet. Zikr, who had been about to launch an assault with them, had ordered the People of Shudraq to provide cover from the rear.

The decision to not include the Shudraq in the general strike, to which Mizelda had obviously raised a complaint, had been accepted by Taritta, since Zikr of all people would have thought this order through.

As for that, however, there was no way—

???: "There's no way that only we are unable to help in any way. We Shudraq are being looked down upon."

Taritta: "Sister…"

Looking back on what had happened, Mizelda had every right to voice her anger.

The Crystal Palace in the Imperial Capital was originally the castle where Abel lived. It was hard to believe that Abel did not know about the Magic Crystal Cannon, and Zikr's unnatural instructions were also difficult to take in.

Perhaps it had been Zikr's own judgement to have the Shudraqians stand down.

Zikr had been ready to become a sacrificial pawn, and the Shudraqians had been prevented from following suit—Mizelda had stated they were being looked down upon, but that probably was not entirely true.

It had been Zikr's decision, born of compassion.

However—

Taritta: "—I too, feel the same way as you, Sister. I'm not happy with Zikr's concern."

Taritta came to the same conclusion as the belligerent Mizelda.

Known as the Womanizer, Zikr knew how to treat women with more than just a certain amount of respect, and neither Taritta nor anyone else had any right to say anything about how he should behave.

However, neither Taritta nor anyone else from the People of Shudraq had any obligation to let anyone dictate their ways.

So, Taritta gripped her bow with force, then declaring,

Taritta: "Let's take that complaint directly to Zikr."

Mizelda: "Hm, a good response. At this rate, Zikr and Jamal will take all the good stuff from us. —You hear that, brethren!!"

Mizelda, dexterously thrusting her prosthetic leg into the earth and raising a large machete, called out to her compatriots.

All of the arrayed Shudraq responded to Mizelda's words and Taritta's readiness with their eyes, faces, and voices, as if they were of the same mind.

Then, with great enthusiasm, they headed towards the front line of the third bastion protected by Moguro Hagane. Just as the Shudraq's group was about to march on—

???: "—Seems like there's quite the motivated group here."

Hearing a cold, dry voice, Taritta and Mizelda turned around.

Taritta instantly grabbed an arrow from her quiver, nocking her bow, and lowered herself to a ready stance. The appearance of the other party had been so abrupt that it made the People of Shudraq raise their vigilance.

However, the caution of Taritta and the others quickly melted at the sight of the other person's appearance.

Slowly stepping on the grass, approaching from the rear of the People of Shudraq's party, was a girl with pink-colored hair swaying in the wind—and above all else, a girl with a familiar face.

—No, that was not accurate either, the reason being that the girl before them was a person different from the one bearing the face that Taritta and the others knew.

???: "—? For some reason, you people are staring at me with complete wonder. Is it because I appeared out of thin air? In that case, the answer to that mystery is, I jumped off of a flying dragon."

Taritta: "N-no. That's not what we're surprised about."

???: "If so, then out with it."

Mizelda: "—Your face looks exactly like that of a girl we know."

The pink-haired girl tilted her head at the Shudraq's gaze. Once Mizelda answered the girl's question, she took a light glance at the girl's light-crimson eyes.

Then, with a short breath the girl let out an "Is that so",

???: "Did you get along well with that girl bearing the same face as I?"

Mizelda: "At least, we were rather fond of her."

With a stern nod, Mizelda answered the question of the girl with light-crimson eyes.

It was perhaps a statement made on behalf of all of them, but Taritta had no objection to it. And all of Shudraqians had an inkling of the identity of the girl in front of them.

Natsuki Subaru had once mentioned it. —He had stated that the girl had a twin sister.

The twin sister donning a face identical to that of the girl Taritta and her group were acquainted muttered an “Is that so” once more, and then,

???: “In that case, Ram is sure she and you guys will get along just fine.”

While stating that, the girl—Ram stepped forward as if the way had been cleared for her, standing before Taritta and Mizelda like it was a matter of course.

As she gazed into those light-crimson eyes, Taritta nodded.

Taritta: “Yes, I hope so. What’s the situation?”

Ram: “Ram has gotten the gist of it. I assume that there aren’t any cowardly women here right now, am I correct?”

Looking around at the faces of the Shudraq, Ram quietly spoke.

She was able to see through the reason why the People of Shudraq were positioning themselves so far away from the battle for the third bastion occurring right in front of them.

After seeing through it, and acknowledging the thoughtfulness of the matter, she spoke,

Ram: “Men say things like “I’m worried about yooou~” and “You’d better stay baaack~”, but Ram would rather prove them wrong. —And tell them to mind their own business.”

Taritta: “I agree.”

Stating that, standing beside Ram, who was holding a wand, Taritta repeatedly nodded silently.

Compassion, care, and concern on the battlefield were not welcomed by the Shudraq. Rather, these ways they had once discarded had to be taught to them.

With Ram feeling a certain realization, she faced forward with Taritta following suit. Then Mizelda lined up across from Ram, bearing a wild smile on her face.

And—

Taritta: “I’ve never met you before, but I’m convinced. —You, just like Rem, are a warrior.”

3

With a thud, there came a shock that resonated to his very core, as if his internal organs had taken a hit from a heavy weight.

Those out-of-the-ordinary sensations continued once, twice, thrice, four times, while the strain seemingly increased.

As the feeling of shackles around his hands and feet impeded his movements, one after another, he gave in to his violent urges to shake them off and step over them.

However—

???: “Your approach’s too straightforward. Kafma might let’cha get away with this, but I ain’t gonna head into a fight with an opponent all haphazardly from the outset.”

???: “Kah.”

With five fingers of his outstretched, the old man’s face sank into the ground and disappeared, leaving behind his ridicule.

Immediately after looking him in the eye, he recalled the signs happening behind himself, and launched a backhand, splendidly so. From the tremendous response he felt, his opponent’s spine had been shattered, but the rebound he had sensed told him that he had hit something that was not the old man.

Looking at it, it appeared to be one of the corpses on the battlefield, which the old man had flung out from the sunken ground. By the time he realized that he had been successfully duped, it was already too late.

???: “Lookie here, you’re gettin’ caught again.”

The body flung over the backhand, and his shoulder was struck from behind. In other words, the Vicious Old Man—Olbart had not moved from the ground he had dived into, but simply leapt to another location.

The small old man, having only casually touched his shoulder, escaped backwards while showing off his fine set of teeth.

He had merely touched him. He had neither struck nor slashed him. Was he just playing around? Or was he insulting him? —No, Olbart never did things without meaning. There was always a meaning, a meaning, a meaning—.

???: "—Huuh?!"

The moment his thoughts turned red-hot, an even greater heat arose on his right shoulder, where he had been touched.

Taking a glance, Olbart's handprint stood out, having been stamped in red upon his shoulder. From the handprint blood seeped and smoke was emitted, as it attempted to burn skin, flesh, and bone.

Immediately after determining it to be poison, there was no hesitation.

Garfiel opened his mouth wide to bite off the shoulder on which the red handprint had been imprinted, tearing off the poison eating away at him. The taste of his own poisoned flesh and blood was terrible, as the bones his fangs grazed brought him unbearable pain.

However, the pain was only momentary. The deep gouge that was the shoulder wound emitted steam originating from blood, as the wound was restored by a tremendous surge of flesh—.

Olbart: "That might be the best move, but ya sure are a reckless'un."

Garfiel, breathing heavily, was then struck square on the nose by a kick from Olbart.

His head snapped back from the astonishingly powerful kick of the puny-looking old man, his nose was broken, and Garfiel was blown off his feet. With that, he tumbled and flipped across the rough ground, then coming to lie with his whole body stretched out, spread-eagled.

Were it not for Garfiel's sturdy neck, the kick would have detached his head and sent it flying.

However, his head and torso had remained connected. Slowly lifting his hand, he placed it on his broken nose, and with one breath, he put it back in place. A harsh sound echoed, and the flow of his nosebleed ameliorated.

Olbart: "…Geez, bein' hard ta kill's a weapon in its own right. Not in the sentimental sense, but in the physical sense. You're too much trouble, y'know?"

Looking at the painful sight, Olbart sighed in exasperation.

Just how many times had this Vicious Old Man, who was waving his left hand in the air, attacked Garfiel with such relentlessness?

At the very least, the Vicious Old Man could not count them with the fingers on his only remaining arm.

Garfiel: "—Shut the fuck up, old man. This ain't over!"

With blood-colored mist emanating from his shoulder with intensity, Garfiel slowly rose to his feet.

Bearing countless scars on his bare upper body, with the aftermath of his fierce battle with Kafma Irulux still fresh in his mind, he clashed with one of the strongest in the Empire, yet his fighting spirit still remained unwavering.

Even by the standards of the Empire, many soldiers would recognize his bravery as impressive and admirable, but unfortunately, he was facing a monstruous old man, a person who cared not for the values of a warrior in the slightest.

Shrugging, Olbart looked at him with an expression devoid of any admiration whatsoever.

Olbart: "I can't hassle myself too much with'cha alone, can I? For some reason, the walls I've been slippin' thro've got more of a weird smell ta them. There are some troublesome people out there, so things might get problematic if I don't head back, y'know?"

Garfiel: "Some troublesome people…?"

Olbart: "Ya can probably hear 'em if ya prick up yer ears. Don't tell me ya can't hear better than an old geezer like me?"

As Olbart cupped his hand to his ear, Garfiel realized it himself as he narrowed his vision. Vexing as it was, once he did take a careful listen, he understood what Olbart was talking about.

Indeed, he was able to feel the sound of many, many extraordinarily powerful footsteps were shaking the earth, sensing the very atmosphere of this battlefield in his eardrums and on the soles of his feet as well.

Olbart: "Nah, ya can't be for real. How brave do ya gotta be ta leave yerself defenseless in front of me?"

A moment later, explosives thrown by Olbart during this gap in attention exploded to the left and to the right of Garfiel's head.

A thunderous boom and red light spread alongside searing heat, exhibiting power that would easily reduce a human being to dust, and Garfiel's figure disappeared in the resulting blast of flame.

Olbart: "Well, that's a tad—"

And, right after Olbart focused his eyes into the flames raging on.

Garfiel: "GAHHHHHHHH!!"

The moment Garfiel had been swallowed by the explosion, he had rushed towards Olbart shouting, using the flames as a distraction.

He had supposed that Olbart would make a move were he to show an opening. He did not know what exactly he had been plotting, but he gambled successfully.

Garfiel's arms closed in on Olbart, who had been blinded by his own attack, and—

Olbart: “So green ya are, young fella.”

His outstretched arms were crushed, and opening his eyes in surprise, Garfiel took an upwards punt to the jaw. As his face rose in height, Olbart leaped, stamping a foot of his on Garfiel’s face.

On one leg, Olbart stood on Garfiel’s face on one leg as the latter looked upwards, and in that position, the evil old man looked off into the distance, as if to tease the boy.

Olbart: “The troops Kafma pulled back’ll be enough ta defend this place… No one’s gonna get outta here without’cha.”

With this deliberate statement, Olbart declared his intent to no longer continue this battle.

With bloodshot eyes, Garfiel raised his arms despite his elbows being broken, attempting to crush Olbart’s miniscule frame atop his face. But Olbart jumped just in time to avoid both arms; during his flip, the right sleeve of the monstruous elder fluttered in the wind.

Olbart: “I do suppose you’ll die if yer head’s blown off, won’t’cha?”

Following this cold death sentence, Garfiel felt the sensation of a drawn blade running down his spine, so he put all his strength into his neck muscles, and attempted to leap away from his spot—

???: “—The chest.”

The next moment, guided by the voice he heard, he unconsciously brought his fists together in front of his chest.

“Ugh”, a hoarse voice faintly groaned, followed by a series of violent noises ringing out, noises of steel being shattered.

What his fists had shattered, having been knocked against each other in front of his chest, was a blade that had been thrust—in front of Garfiel, was Olbart, having lunged as to pierce his opponent’s heart with a concealed blade that took the place of the right arm he had lost.

With the tip of the blade shallowly buried in his chest, Garfiel's body stepped towards the back.

Had he been even slightly slower to react, Garfiel's heart would have been carved open, undoubtedly taking his life. No matter how powerful his regenerative ability was, even he could not replace a missing heart.

Had he disobeyed that advice, and stayed vigilant about his neck, he would have perished.

Even though he knew that—

Garfiel: "…Fuck off."

???: "Oh, that rudeness is so disheaaartening~ to hear. I thought I'd at least get to hear some words of thanks."

As Garfiel clicked his tongue, his back was being supported by someone standing behind him.

Even more, once his body weight had pressed on the one to his back, he could just feel a hint of a wry smile coming from the one supporting him. Feeling even more annoyed from this, Garfiel's nose wrinkled up.

In general, Garfiel was not good at hating people, but amongst the types of people he hated was the one in front of him, Olbart. However, the person he unmistakably despised the most was standing right behind him.

Being caught in between two hated people, this was the worst possible situation for Garfiel.

Garfiel: "After my amazin' self crushes that old man, you're next…"

???: "Your habit of taking things out on me finally reaches its peak, huh? In a way, isn't me being the one who has come here a stroke of luck? You wouldn't want Ram to see you in this state, would you?"

Garfiel: "Gah…!"

Garfiel's throat growled frailly as a nerve was struck.

The one behind Garfiel chuckled at the latter's reaction. Olbart, whose concealed blade had been shattered, watched this back and forth from a short distance away, speaking,

Olbart: "I did say those who pass that line on the ground over there are pretty much gonna die, aight?"

???: "Pardon me, old man. I didn't quite hear anything about that. After all, I just came down from the sky."

Olbart: "From the sky, ya say?"

Glancing skyward, Olbart closed one eye.

Even his seemingly lethargic appearance was just part of the trickery employed by this old man to lead his opponents around by the nose. Garfiel exhaled as he restrained himself from inadvertently leaping forward.

He pulled the tip of the blade out of his chest, filling in the wound as he did so, and,

Garfiel: "If you're here…"

???: "Ram is on a different battlefield. I told her to back off, but she didn't listen."

Garfiel: "…To no one's surprise. And ya went outta yer way to come here."

???: "Of course, I also intend to be somewhat useful. I wonder if I should I dub you fortunate, though."

As he said this, the duo set their gaze upon the troublesome Vicious Old Man, and the man no longer stood behind Garfiel, but next to him. Not wearing his usual makeup, instead exposing his unfamiliar real face, the man—Roswaal L. Mathers, closed his one blue eye as to hide his identity.

Roswaal: "—After all, I've fought to the death with shinobi, in the past.”

With a deeply vicious smile, one that rivalled his enemy’s, he stated thus.

4

—The moment the light was released, its power imbued with will, Emilia had a vision of her own Death.

Her competitive spirit was strong, she never lost hope under any circumstances.

For Emilia, who had strengthened her guts with that attitude, it had been a devastating thing.

Emilia: “—Ah.”

In her head, a small Emilia was screaming that she needed to move immediately.

However, her body would not respond with which way she should move, right or left. Even though she would usually move without thinking, she was unable to do so.

The reason for that was that her heart, rather than her head, had immediately sensed that there was no place to escape, be it right or left, be it forward or backward.

Emilia: “Icicle Line.”

So, instead of running away, Emilia had chosen to guard against it —No, to deflect it.

She created a thick wall of ice in front of herself, which would make the light slide over its slanted surface. Whether she would indeed be able to pull it off or not, she would do it with the conviction that she had to do it.

When the Dragon’s breath had been loosened from Guaral’s skies, Emilia had immediately chosen the same manner of defense. However, Priscilla had been present at the time, and she had managed to cut through and disperse the light that Emilia had weakened, even if a little, with the red treasured sword in her possession.

This time, Priscilla was not there. Emilia was alone.

She did not know if she would be able to do the same thing. However, she had to accomplish the same thing.

Emilia: “Me, and the people behind me—”

At a glance, Emilia knew that there was no chance that the power of the light that had been released would blow away her and her alone.

Earlier, a light of a similar kind had been fired in the distance, but it only resembled this one. This light would assuredly sweep the battlefield whole, and destroy everything.

So—

Emilia: “—Do your best, me.”

She braced her legs, created a wall of ice in front of her body, and tightly squeezed the sword of frost in her hand.

She had created the ice sword because Priscilla had used her treasured sword to cut through the breath. This ice sword did not hold power similar to the power the treasured sword held, but she had created it to give her good luck.

That, and Emilia’s bracing, where she put forth her all, was—

Mezoreia: “Friggin’ disappear, human—”

The breath was released, and white light poured down, closing in on Emilia.

The fact that the voice had come forth from Mezoreia’s throat, the origin of the anger dwelling in its eyes, in that moment, she forgot all of it. She forgot, and braced herself.

And then, the moment when that breath obliterated the wall of ice, swallowing even Emilia—

Emilia: "—Eh?"

After trying to align her ice sword with the light, Emilia's eyes widened in surprise.

The light that had been emitted would have reached Emilia—but instead, it had just slightly veered off to the side. Even so, an enormous shockwave was produced, almost tearing off Emilia's silver hair and clothes.

While bracing herself and enduring it, Emilia looked at Mezoreia to see what had happened.

Mezoreia had released a breath, but its head was turned upwards and to the side.

It was not that it had changed its mind right before it happened. The orientation of its neck had been forcibly changed. —Due to an impact from a deadly weapon that had struck it in the face from the side, the Flying Winged Blade.

Emilia: "That's got to be what I threw over there…"

It was Madelyn's weapon of choice, the Flying Winged Blade, which Emilia had accidentally hurled far away when trying to cast it right back at the former.

It had slammed into Mezoreia's face. "No way", Emilia said, her eyes widening.

Emilia: "Could it be that it now came back after I threw it?"

???: "Hahahahaha! That's a really dreamy and wonderful thing to imagine! But, unfortunately, no! It was stuck over yonder, so I just kicked it off!"

Emilia: "Kyaa?!"

Having imagined a miraculous coincidence, Emilia was greatly surprised by the voice of a smooth-talking companion.

Once Emilia turned around flustered, she came to see the owner of the voice crouching down right beside her, staring fixedly at the ice sword in her hand.

???: “This is wonderful, quite the beautiful craftsmanship. I’ve been thinking that a legendary sword is what’s appropriate for me to carry around, but were I to carry things just for looks, I’d want to put this on my list of candidates.”

Emilia: “Uhhh, thanks?”

???: “No, no, if anyone should be saying thank you, it should be me.”

The person to whom that voice belonged—was a boy with blue hair tied back, smiling cheerfully at Emilia, who had not expected to be praised in such a situation; hence, she thanked him out of reflex.

He straightened his bent knees and stood up, then,

Blue-Haired Boy: “The blue sky, split and shared by lights white and red! I was wondering which way to go, but once I came rushing in, I found a big Dragon and a beautiful woman waiting for me! As expected of me! Don’t you think my pull is too strong?!”

Emilia: “Uhh?”

Blue-Haired Boy: “Don’t you think it’s too strong?!”

After being asked once more with those sparkling eyes, Emilia felt compelled to answer, replying “I think it’s reaaally strong”.

At Emilia’s response, the boy’s smile deepened into a satisfied smirk, and,

Blue-Haired Boy: “Right!”

Saying that, he took a step forward from beside Emilia, into the gaze of the Cloud Dragon.

Emilia hesitated in saying “That’s dangerous” in an attempt to stop him. There was a sense of pressure. But it was not caused by the gigantic Dragon, but by the small back in front of her.

Because of what that out-of-place, cheerful boy had caused—

Blue-Haired Boy: “The grand stage has come around! Everyone, come and witness! Don’t blink, don’t miss out on the big moment of the Blue Lightning, of Cecilus Segmunt, or you’ll regret it for the rest of your life!”

Not taking even a single step back in the face of the transcendent Dragon, the boy—Cecilus Segmunt, thus loudly and majestically proclaimed.

Chapter 101:
Love is a Flame

1

—Among the battlefields that painted the struggle for the Imperial Capital, two places had transformed into scenes that stood out in particular.

One of those places was the second bastion, where the Cloud Dragon that had arrived from beyond the skies majestically spread its wings, the scene having been dyed white in order to prevent damage from spreading to the surroundings.

The other place was the first bastion, where the scorching hot sky had been colored red—at the center of it all was the power of a young woman, having made the environment so harsh that the survival of any living organism present was in peril.

???: "…"

Flickering much like a shimmer of hot air, Arakiya cast her bodies onto the vermilion heavens.

Making an ample display of her capability as a Spirit Eater, Arakiya had transformed the world; it was already a hellscape that ate away at the lives of those who lacked power that transcended the realm of rationality.

Arakiya: "I, will definitely—"

—Take back the Princess.

That was the primary reason, the single reason that Arakiya had taken to the battlefield like this.

It had not been out of loyalty or patriotism as a General First-Class of the Empire, it had not been for pride or dignity in being one of the strongest existences that were the Nine Divine Generals, it had not been out of anger for her kind, it had not been for any malicious thoughts such as own ambitions whatsoever.

The other Divine Generals each possessed their own motivations and reasons for fighting.

She possessed not any such noble basis on which to support such strength, nevertheless, serving as the strongest force on the side of the Imperial Capital, Arakiya, the Second, reigned supreme over the battlefield.

However, considering her origin—considering the fact that she was a Spirit Eater, that was a matter of course.

Having strength being demanded from them, and employing it not for themselves but for the sake of others, was the way of being of the Spirit Eaters, and Arakiya was no exception to that.

In the first place, Spirit Eaters were extraordinary creatures that could only have such a nature.

Spirits were beings present everywhere throughout the lands far and wide, in addition to the skies.

By eating those Spirits, taking in their power, the Spirit Eaters would become one with them—it was an outlandish action equivalent to taking nature itself into one's own body, so inevitably, there would be a wide variety of effects, both large and small.

If one took in a Fire Spirit, their body temperature would rise; if one took in a Wind Spirit, there was the danger that the inside of their bodies would be torn apart. If one took in a Water Spirit, it could put the circulation of one's blood at risk; if one took in an Earth Spirit, it was possible that they would become one with the earth, and the possibility of even losing their human form existed.

In fact, because of those side effects, many aspiring Spirit Eaters had ceased to be human.

Created in ancient times to oppose a lone Witch who charmed all, whom even the wordless Great Spirit obeyed, they were beings devised for the purpose of fighting, much like the Oni Clan that could sense Miasma.

After the death of that Witch, the Spirit Eaters of the present day had lost their original purpose, but zeroing in on that power and utility, a faction within the Vollachian Empire sought to restore them.

Arakiya too, was nothing more than a single person recognized for her rare abilities within that endeavor.

Her rare talents were the two foundations required for a Spirit Eater—That was to say, she possessed a body that could withstand taking in a Spirit, and a soul that could remain human even after subsuming a Spirit.

In the first place, the method by which the Spirit Eaters extracted power from Spirits was an unconventional technique, and the method of bypassing various conditions to extract nothing but their power was accompanied by a great many risks. That was the big difference between them and the Spiritual Arts Users who borrowed the power of Spirits, and also the Acolyte Knights from the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko who gained their power through a system of vassalage.

For the latter two, effort was required to establish a relationship with the target Spirit, but if a Contract had been established, there was no danger in using their power as long as the relationship with the Spirit did not break down.

On the other hand, even just to maintain their power, Spirit Eaters needed to constantly replenish themselves with new Spirits, and they would be constantly terrified by the possibility of losing their physical and mental selves with each replenishment.

If their mind and body succumbed to the Spirit even once, their body would permanently lose its original form, and their mind would assimilate with the Spirit, dragged into a dimension that was not that of humans.

On the other hand, an overly strong ego would greatly hinder one’s affinity with Spirits, making it impossible to achieve the full potential of a Spirit Eater in the first place.

Therefore, in order to be in harmony with the power of the Spirit they had taken in, a Spirit Eater would be required to have an almost diluted sense of self and ego. However, as mentioned above, an ego that was too weak would invite an easy assimilation with the captured Spirit, and there was a high chance that they would lose their humanity.

To prevent that from happening, Spirit Eaters were bestowed with a pillar—that was to say, a "core", one which took the place of their weak ego and sense of self and kept them from losing sight of themselves.

The function of imprinting, akin to when a newly-hatched bird would think of the first one it gazed upon as its parent bird, was deeply rooted into the instincts of the Spirit Eaters, forming their foundation, just like a pillar.

The tremendous power of a Spirit Eater would be wielded for the sake of that pillar, and the naïve mind of a Spirit Eater would then be occupied by that pillar.

Doubtlessly, a Spirit Eater's precise reason for existence was their pillar.

—Devoid of any ambition for betrayal, a Spirit Eater would continue to selflessly pledge service to their pillar.

After many sacrifices, so numerous as to make one feel depressed if they were counted, the Spirit Eaters of ancient times had been resurrected in the present day. Even the people of the Empire could not possibly justify this success considering the number of lives that had been paid.

Therefore, the girl who had become the sole instance of completion, as an existence with invaluable abilities, was presented to the Emperor of the time, Drizen Vollachia, and Drizen had bestowed her as a foster sister to one of the daughters that had inherited his own blood.

It was unknown what impression the Emperor Drizen Vollachia had harbored for the girl that had been presented to him, or for what reason he had bestowed her to his own daughter.

If there was one thing that could be said, it was that the girl functioned exactly as the faction that had planned to revive the power of the Spirit Eaters had desired, so Drizen had decided on the pillar for the girl who was presented to him.

And above all else—

—As a Spirit Eater, Arakiya had been perfected as an existence that was more obstreperously powerful than any of her predecessors who had once been called upon to fight against the Witch.

2

After the world had begun to overheat in a complete mockery of common sense, the mere act of breathing would sear one's lungs, the blood vessels running through one's body would swell due to the heat, even the teardrops with which parched eyes were moistened would evaporate.

In that environment where life was being consumed moment by moment, any half-hearted approach would not permit someone to do as much as to draw near enough to make them able to ascertain the color of Arakiya's eyes. No matter their nature, they would be left behind, thirsting, withering away and dying, unable to keep up with the world transfigured.

For that reason, with the exception of Arakiya, the one at the center of this alteration of the world, only two people stood on that vast land overlooked by a red sky, Yorna and Priscilla.

Even Yorna and Priscilla were unable to escape the feeling that their lives were being slowly eaten away.

Yorna: "—Hk."

With a noise ringing out a fourth hairpin broke apart, and Yorna's cheeks stiffened at the sense of loss.

Due to the effect of the Soul Marriage Technique, the many offerings made to Yorna would be granted the ability to stand in for her life. Thanks to this, Yorna had not suffered physical injuries, and her movements were unhindered, even when fighting the literal monster that was Arakiya.

However—

Yorna: “If only I could get rid of this pain in my chest.”

Standing in for Yorna’s life was, in and of itself, proof of the love that had been put into these gifts.

The hairpins were by no means outstandingly designed, nor were they expensive. They were merely various things that had been offered by the residents of the city under Yorna’s protection, using their own horns, scales, and body parts.

There was only love, respect, and trust. Therefore, no price could be put on them.

Priscilla: “The hairpin shattered? Just like the other hair ornament a moment ago, they are slowly being whittled away, Dear Mother.”

Then, as the shattered pieces of the plain ornament trickled through Yorna’s fingers, Priscilla landed next to her with the train of her red dress fluttering.

Wielding the dizzyingly radiant Yang Sword, Priscilla’s beautiful profile revealed her fearless expression. —At her remark, Yorna slightly narrowed her eyes, and spoke,

Yorna: “Needless to say, to treat the gifts of my beloved children as a mere number of substitutes for my life is utterly loathsome.”

Priscilla: “What an adorable thing for someone extending their life by transferring it for nigh an eternity to say, Dear Mother. Are you hesitant to call me, who has never presented a single gift to you, your beloved child?”

Yorna: “…”

Priscilla: “Incapable of playing along, are we? —Then I shall speak pragmatically, just as you wish.”

Shrugging her exposed, pale shoulders, Priscilla turned her gaze forwards. To this attitude and tone Yorna retorted “Pragmatically, you say?”.

In response to this, Priscilla slightly raised her chin.

Priscilla: “How much longer can we fight with that thing, I wonder?”

Priscilla turned her crimson eyes up towards the sky. —Immediately following, a torrent of water spears rained down upon Priscilla and Yorna.

Yorna: “—Hk.”

Gritting her teeth, Yorna braced herself for the fierce downpour of rods of water by lying face-down.

While the beams of water had each been compressed to be as thick as a single finger, it would be better if the power employed to achieve were not belittled as the strength of a single finger.

The densely compressed torrent, piercing through everything standing in its path, felling any potential threats without mercy, was capable of tearing someone limb-from-limb in a single fatal blow.

To wield such a delicately difficult technique that required an enormous amount of water to crudely split the ground open so effortlessly; except for the inherent danger, none of it seemed consistent.

Yorna: “—Hk, Priscilla!”

Laying face-down and pouring all her efforts into evading the downpour of water beams, Yorna called out the name of Priscilla, who was utilizing the Yang Sword to deflect the torrent of water.

As she brandished this radiant treasured sword, Priscilla successively cut down streams of water, rendering them completely ineffective, even though double the number of water spears had been aimed at her in comparison to Yorna.

Between Yorna and Priscilla, it was easy to guess which one Arakiya attached more importance to based off the sheer volume of water.

Yorna: "…"

The dance-like swordsmanship of Priscilla whirling the crimson blade through the air was a mesmerizing sight of gracefulness.

However, one could hardly say that she had fully repelled Arakiya's assault.

Just like how she had alluded to the remaining ornaments on Yorna's body a moment ago, Priscilla had also had much of the jewelry adorning her beauty shattered over the course of the battle.

It was not only Yorna who had a limited time remaining.

Priscilla: "Even if you blow off my limbs, was it? —What a macabre hope to be entranced in."

As Priscilla received a piercing attack to her ample bosom, a jewel of her necklace exploded.

Priscilla's crimson eyes did not bat at the fate of the jewel standing in for her life, but instead they were fixated solely on Arakiya's figure in the sky.

However, seeing Priscilla's profile looking at Arakiya, Yorna could not believe her eyes. For a moment, it was hard to believe what flickered across those crimson eyes.

It was—

Yorna: "Do you regret it, Priscilla, the way Arakiya is?"

Priscilla: "Nonsense. —Everything in this world is made for my convenience."

Snorting in response to Yorna's question, Priscilla leaned forward to run.

The way she had left her mother behind to rush to her estranged foster sibling made it seem like she was hiding her feelings for both of them, in order not to look into their eyes.

Yorna: "I'm full of regrets as well."

Yorna did not know what kind of encounters and partings there had been between Priscilla and Arakiya.

Albeit she had been in a position to know, the opportunity to learn about it had been snatched away alongside her life. In her previous incarnation, Yorna had lost her life while delivering Priscilla, a difficult childbirth it had been.

After that, the Imperial Selection Ceremony had taken place, and the daughter of Vollachia's Imperial Family—Prisca Benedict, had also been defeated in battle, losing her life.

That was supposedly the entirety of the life belonging to the daughter Yorna's previous incarnation was aware of, Sandra Benedict.

And yet—

Yorna: "…"

For some reason, time had passed, and circumstances had unfolded in such an implausible way, and thus Yorna had been able to reunite with Priscilla.

They had met each other once more not as Sandra and Prisca, but as Yorna and Priscilla, and through a miracle that should never have been possible originally, mother and child were going through this red hell together.

—Yes, they would go together.

Arakiya: "Princess."

Muttering this word briefly, Arakiya's entire body literally overflowed with power.

Whether it was fire or water, wind or earth, light or shadow, the being of infinite transformations that used the entire composition of the world, poured all of her energy towards Priscilla coming in hot.

Priscilla charged in with a shout as if to make her stance apparent, about to take on the streams of water and flashes of lightning rushing toward her with nothing but her body and sword—

Yorna: "—Love me."

A moment later, Priscilla's Yang Sword was held aloft, and the attacks of water and lightning right before her both disappeared into thin air as they were about to clash. —No, they had not vanished as if smoke.

Undoubtedly, they had been cut away by a slash of the Yang Sword.

However, the sword flash drawn by the treasured sword of crimson was even more refined and blindingly fast than before.

Priscilla: "This is…"

With a slight, surprised exhalation in her voice, Priscilla's well-shaped brow furrowed.

Winds of reddish flame approached her from all directions. But, Priscilla did not hesitate to slash away the scorching winds with a strike, easily cleaving them away.

As if to reaffirm it, Priscilla then adjusted her grip on the treasured sword, and came to gently touch her own face. Her fingertips gently caressed her eyes, but she likely did not sense anything unusual.

Yorna already knew. That it was something entirely different from a tangible effect accompanying the flame.

—It was the bond Yorna shared with her beloved child, taking form as the flame that burned in their eyes.

Priscilla: "…"

Priscilla stood straight, with the treasured sword of crimson in hand, and her left eye ablaze.

This was the proof of Yorna's protection, which had been bestowed to the inhabitants of the Demon City of Chaosflame. By conferring the Soul Marriage Technique upon them, a portion of Yorna's power could be shared with the target she sought to protect.

Originally, it was a secret technique Yorna would bestow as to protect those children of hers that lacked the strength and skills needed to fight by themselves, as they shared a bond no warrior could be endowed with.

But an exception to that rule arose here and now.

A being equipped with the power and technique to fight, which held a treasured sword no one outside the Imperial Family of Vollachia was allowed to wield, had fulfilled the requirements of a beloved child Yorna wished to protect, regardless of her power.

Yorna: "Priscilla—"

Priscilla: "At last, you are willing to recognize mineself as your own child, Dear Mother."

Yorna: "How impudent. —I won't be a foolish mother who just looks as you walk off into the distance. If you're going, then I'll be going to the same hellscape as well."

She did not intend to let Priscilla go any further by herself.

Priscilla sniffed at Yorna's answer and permitted her resolve as she stood beside her. As proof of that, Yorna felt something strange on her face causing her to gently move her hand there.

The cause of that discomfort was in her eye—Most likely, there was a flame harbored there, the same as Priscilla.

The two users of the Soul Marriage Technique, which could not be performed without qualifications, fulfilled each other's conditions, and complemented each other’s souls. —A phenomenon that truly could never happen, had happened.

And then, having witnessed that,

Arakiya: “…Why?”

A faint voice escaped, and a gaze fell to the ground, as if a curse.

Staring at Yorna and Priscilla side-by-side was Arakiya, placed in the sky. She ran her hand over her face and the eyepatch covering her left eye.

Then, she tore it off as if wrenching it away, and,

Arakiya: “Why! Why, why, why, do you have, the Princess’s…!”

Laying her anger bare, Arakiya displayed the red eye bereft of all light under her eyepatch. Reflected in that eye incapable of sight was Yorna; and so, with that pair of red eyes on her, Arakiya called out.

Called out to Yorna, whose eye harboured a flame, having received the blessing of the Soul Marriage Technique from Priscilla.

And doing so was Arakiya, whose eyes harboured no flame, unable to receive any blessing from Priscilla.

Arakiya: “The Princess… is mine… Hk!”

Priscilla: “Make no mistake, Arakiya. Even supposing your wishes were to be tolerated, and even supposing I were to concede, you would still be mine, and I would never become yours.”

Arakiya: “—Hk.”

Priscilla: “And, mineself would never concede to anyone.”

At Priscilla’s decisive gaze, Arakiya gasped slightly.

However, after that stern declaration by Priscilla, a small sound of protest had interjected.

That was—

Priscilla: “Dear Mother, for what reason did you strike mineself on the head?”

Yorna: “You should not speak in such a manner. I don’t remember raising my children to be so high and mighty.”

PRISCILLA'S SERVANT

Priscilla: “Dear Mother, I do not recall being raised by you in the first place.”

Yorna: “In that case, it seems that chance has finally come around.”

Saying that, Yorna lowered the kiseru that had struck Priscilla’s head with a clunk, and slowly shook her head before looking up at Arakiya.

In her eyes, there was an invariant anger, and a slight discomposure at what had just occurred.

Staring fixedly there, Yorna put the kiseru in her mouth and inhaled the purple smoke as she stood among the hellscape.

And then, giving a somewhat cheerful smile that did not fit the situation,

Yorna: “Finally, you’ve set your eyes on me, General First-Class Arakiya. —The chance has come for me to atone for my lack of virtue in failing to discipline you, together with Priscilla, as I should have.”

Arakiya: “What do you…”

Yorna: “To put it simply—”

Yorna exhaled purple smoke as she took in the bewilderment that was carried in those words.

Wrapped in the smoke overflowing from her lips, her eye burning with her daughter’s trust, Yorna Mishigure, the mother that was once Sandra Benedict,

Yorna: “—I am not a parent who cuts corners in disciplining her children. Prepare yourselves, little girls.”

Thus, she harshly declared.

Chapter 102:
Wall of Resolve

1

—Todd Fang did not consider himself to be particularly cautious or meticulous.

The result of him single-mindedly probing things as if were “a matter of course” was to close every conceivable loophole, to cover all potential outcomes, and to assume the worst in order to reduce missteps to the extent of one’s capabilities.

Even if all of this were to be executed, the opponent could still have prepared a strategy, action, or trump card which rendered one completely helpless with no recourse.

He was aware that this was the extent of his innate abilities, a reality he had to come to terms with.

Fortunately, I’ve never encountered such beings and even if I did, I’ve been able to avoid any decisive conflict, which has allowed me to survive to this day.

However—

Todd: “—At any rate, I’ve been quite unlucky as of late.”

Looking back over the past month or two, a rather short period of time, Todd lamented to himself.

The woes had begun upon being incorporated into a group of troops deployed from the Imperial Capital to the east. Just as he had been reminiscing about his separation from his fiancée Katya, he had made the worst possible discovery.

A man and a woman had been swept down the river near their encampment—setting aside the woman, the man had set off all the bad luck that had befallen Todd thereafter.

As previously mentioned, Todd did not consider himself special, yet he could not make heads or tails of that man whatsoever. —He was ordinary, yet extraordinary.

Few words had been exchanged, and their interactions had been short-lived, but the person in question had been completely unaware of that.

Before and since then, Todd had seen several of those so-called heroic beings.

While everyone was aware of the fact that their own existence was outside the norm and that they had no choice but to walk their own unique path, that man was the only exception to the rule.

It was terrifying. So, the only thing he could think about afterwards was to kill that man at any cost whenever the opportunity arose.

However, once it had become clear that said goal was unobtainable, Todd immediately abandoned his plan to exterminate him, instead choosing to stay away from that pest. It was best not to get involved.

It had been likewise necessary to sacrifice Jamal, the umbrella that protected him from the rain, as his only desperate recourse to rescue the captive Arakiya. He had thought that by winning the favor of the more powerful and influential Arakiya, he would be able to escape from the unwanted position he had been placed in. —But his plan had backfired completely.

As to chase vengeance for Jamal, vengeance that he did not desire, Katya had ultimately been left behind in the Imperial Capital, while he had to somehow make use of the empty-headed and utterly selfless Arakiya, finding himself in the middle of a major rebellion against the Emperor raging throughout the entire Empire.

Absolutely nothing, truly nothing, was going smoothly.

It seemed like the beginning of all this misery had been brought onto him by that pest. So he was hoping that, at the very least, his calculations here would work out—.

Todd: “—My bad, my bad, and here I was going to get them all at once.”

Sneaking deep into enemy territory, he had launched a preemptive surprise attack.

Todd grumbled to himself as he looked at the remaining enemies after the first round of armed troops had been disposed of.

There were three opponents—two girls and one delicate-looking guy. Even though he had finished off the entire contingent of soldiers present from the get-go, Todd did not consider it to be the best outcome.

Rather, he accepted that the military gain had been minimal.

Originally, the reason why Todd had left his post and ventured into the enemy camp was to take out an opponent who was demonstrating extraordinary capabilities in information warfare—who would be a nuisance in this battle for the Imperial Capital.

In a large-scale battle of this magnitude, the accurate dissemination of information was a critical factor which could be the difference between life and death.

Frankly, Todd believed that this was the main reason why the rebels could keep up with the Imperial Army’s solid defenses and one-man armies, being the Nine Divine Generals, despite their only boast being strength in numbers.

Speaking in terms of a human body, the commander of a group would correlate to either the head or to the heart. The crushing of both of those would be fatal, and since this was common knowledge, they were naturally protected. However, no matter how hard the head or the heart were to work, if the vessels which allowed blood to circulate did not function, the body would not be able to last.

In that sense, the “blood vessels” were the most crucial enemies to eliminate on a battlefield, since they fulfilled the most vital role in deciding the course of the battle.

Todd: “It’s easy to just answer “There are no women or children in the battlefield”, but that would fit the residents of the Imperial Capital perfectly. Besides, wouldn’t that be a bit too convenient?”

Todd appraised his opponents, exchanging words that should not be exchanged.

The three opponents appeared to be as described above, but there was no definitive proof as to which of them was the “blood vessel” Todd was wary of.

The two young girls hardly seemed appropriate for the battlefield.

They appeared to be in their early teens, much like the Flying Dragon General Madelyn Eschart, but while she was instantly recognizable as a being on a higher level, both these girls were likely human.

However, the very fact that they had no right to be here raised suspicion that the girls were meant to be here as they were.

Todd: “If you were non-combatants who’d just been left behind on the battlefield, your current logic might’ve held. But I don’t recognize a man who serves on the battlefield as a non-combatant.”

On the other hand, the delicate-looking man openly confronting Todd was not a warrior, but he came the closest to his impression of a “blood vessel.”

In terms of powerlessness, he was not much different from the girls, but there was something off about the look in his eyes. A shrewd look, the kind that turned one’s own life into a tool with impunity, hiding behind a thin facade.

He could not let his eyes be drawn to the delicate-looking man, nor could he let his guard down against the two girls.

One of the girls had a strangely determined look in her eyes, and the other unmistakably had the readiness and posture of a warrior. Even though this was not uncommon in Vollachia, the latter had probably already taken a life or two.

If one had experience in killing, even if they were a young girl, they had overcome the wall of resolve.

In other words, he could not afford to let his guard down.

Todd: “Who knows. But my gut is telling me. You’re the root of all evil in this war. And my gut also tells me this.”

Three opponents, each of whom caused Todd to be wary in their own way.

It was also unacceptable that he was also trying to look for openings, or plotting to create one, while Todd was conversing with them—Although he still had trouble picking out who to prioritize as a target.

Todd: “—It’s better not to waste time with you guys either.”

They were all targets that must be killed, that was Todd’s irrevocable conclusion.

2

—Otto Suwen often cursed his own carelessness.

Although he had wound up in the stickiest of situations in coming to the Vollachian Empire as a result of both Natsuki Subaru and Rem disappearing, there were also many other factors to consider.

Petra had just rebuked him for was one such matter on which he needed to reflect deeply.

Using the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language, he ruled over the battlefield of the siege of the Imperial Capital.

This plan, which he had declared with confidence, which had been carried out with Petra’s assistance, had changed the arrangement of the battlefield without prejudice or conceit.

The power of the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language, combined with Petra’s Yang Magic magnifying Otto’s hearing—kept track of the ever-changing battlefield formations and positions, providing ongoing information.

Of course, the information gathered would be a wasted effort if it could not be used accordingly, but personality aside, Abel had met Otto's expectations in terms of his abilities, utilizing it splendidly.

Too few people knew how much Otto's work contributed to this battlefield, but Otto was not concerned with his evaluation.

In any case, nothing that had occurred in the Vollachian Empire could be divulged to the outside world.

It would be worth publicizing were they in the Kingdom of Lugunica, but an evaluation of his work in the Empire would be nothing more than a useless risk. So, evaluation was of secondary importance.

Otto: "All we need is an outcome that brings back Natsuki-san and Rem-san… And, without sacrifice."

Sacrificing themselves for the sake of bringing back Subaru and Rem would be getting their priorities mixed.

Those were the minimum objectives of this journey, and simultaneously the greatest achievements. —Rather, it was not that there were more important goals, but that there were no other goals to begin with.

Therefore, he had been prepared to employ all the cards held by his hand on the battlefield, and had thus been admonished by Petra for his recklessness.

He had reflected a lot on that—and yet, it had not been enough still.

And the result of failing to compensate for his carelessness, was the Imperial Soldier with an axe in his hand standing before him.

Todd: "—My bad, my bad, and here I was going to get them all at once."

An Imperial Soldier with a bandana wrapped around his head looked at them while gripping a long-handled axe.

Otto, with Petra behind his back as to defend her, cursed his own carelessness greatly in the face of an opponent demonstrating a thoroughly ruthless and pragmatic judgment.

How the gathered information was handled had been left to Abel, the one able to utilize it best.

But the crux of information in warfare lay in how to obtain the information to handle in the first place. Most of the time, people would overlook that part and be tempted to target the main body that handled the information instead.

However, the man in front of him was different.

Todd: “It’s easy to just answer “There are no women or children in the battlefield”, but that would fit the residents of the Imperial Capital perfectly. Besides, wouldn’t that be a bit too convenient?”

The man who thus appeared before Otto and his comrades had clear intentions—to target Otto and his comrades who gathered the information, rather than the main camp where Abel utilized the gathered information.

Regardless of their status as people with little vigilance and few guards, the outcome would be the same if they were decapitated. The less information there was to handle, the less precise Abel’s command would be. There was no reason for him not to do it.

Otto himself would have done it if he were in the same position as his opponent.

That was why—

Todd: “If you were non-combatants who’d just been left behind on the battlefield, your current logic might’ve held. But I don’t recognize a man who serves on the battlefield as a non-combatant.”

He observed the man in detail, while feeling that his statement was reasonable.

There were two main questions, however; how had he shown up at this place without being detected by Otto's channel, and how had he located Otto and his team?

It was safe to assume that the two questions could probably be answered with the same reason.

That this man's peculiarities of some kind had allowed him to bypass the channel and locate the source of the transmission.

Todd: "Who knows. But my gut is telling me. You're the root of all evil in this war. And my gut also tells me this."

He had wished to find clues to this from the conversation, but the man was thorough, as per his initial analysis.

The man understood that not saying much would allow him to defend himself. Unlike the kind typical of the Empire, who used overwhelming force to subdue their opponents, the man had a cunning attitude.

These enemies, were formidable. —An opponent who assessed himself as weak was a threat.

Because of that—

Todd: "—It's better not to waste time with you guys either."

The man leapt straight at him, swinging his long-handled axe.

In response, Otto gritted his teeth whilst pouring all his energy into avoiding the first blow. He poured it in, then braced himself. —He wondered how far he could get against the man, with the minimal preparation he had.

3

—Petra Leyte regretted her lack of discipline whenever she was put through adversity.

Due to her young age, Petra was often spoiled by her peers in the Camp, but she had decided that it would be a different matter to resign herself to her position as a child and accept her own immaturity.

If this were because of a mistake she had made in her daily life at the mansion, in the course of her duties as a maid, she might not have had to take it so seriously.

However, complacency of the sort, complacency that depended on the situation, would eventually lead to a serious mistake.

There was no need to go as far as saying that she ought to be tense all the time.

However, she must, at all times, achieve what was expected of her. That was Petra's approach to thinking about things, or at least that was the immature ideal she aspired to.

That was why—

Todd: "—It's better not to waste time with you guys either."

Resisting her own trembling from head-to-toe, she looked up at the Imperial Soldier swooping in with an axe in his hand.

At the edge of her vision, which was soaked with welled-up tears, she could see the charred corpse of the messenger who had been burned by the raging flames.

If Otto had not frantically pulled her out of the way, she too would have lost her life. That fact left a crack in Petra's spirit, and at the same time—

Otto: "Petra-chan!"

As he called out her name, Petra was moved by the great faith Otto had in her.

Abandoning his attitude towards the role of a "young lady" that Petra had provisionally played, Otto's voice jolted the actual Petra and broke her free from the fear and regret petrifying her.

Thereupon—

Otto: “—Number seven!”

At Otto’s signal, Petra reflexively lifted her arm.

A moment later, Petra’s mind was filled with anxiety. She had been entrusted with this role after proclaiming that she could do it, but there was no denying that it had been a spur-of-the-moment course of action.

She had practiced the whole time. So she was aware of her own strength to fight when it came time to perform.

And then there was—

Petra: “—Subaru.”

Calling out the name of the one she loved to scatter the surplus of anxiety, she simply gritted her teeth.

Petra: “—Jiwald!”

With that chant, a ray of white light shot out of Petra’s fingertips.

It was one of the few offensive spells Yang Magic boasted, a spear of light that pierced anything in its path—but only when wielded by a first-rate master, and Petra, inexperienced as she was, did not meet that standard.

Petra’s Jiwald would inflict a burn at best, rather than killing a living target.

Nethertheless, that was fine.

Petra: “…”

The white light emitted from her fingertips was directed at the man who had leaped at her—that was false, it was directed at the ground diagonally behind him. It was their rehearsed move “number seven”, disguised as to not look unnatural.

Its purpose was not to burn the man. —The aim was to ignite what had been prepared.

Todd: “Wha—”

Otto’s specialty, a ground trap using Fire Magic Stones.

Ten traps had been prepared in case Otto, who searched for enemies using open “channels”, and Petra, who assisted him, were targeted.

Because of the number of Magic Stones he could carry and the fact that he had to move around while searching for enemies, he could hardly be perfectly prepared. Even so, Otto had indeed stated “You never know what might be useful”, his almost insidiously meticulous preparation now coming to fruition as the ground behind the man exploded.

Todd: “—Hk.”

Instantly, the man’s vigilance shifted slightly towards his back.

As Petra had been instructed, the explosion did not blow up under the man’s feet or even close to him, so the shock and heat of the explosion did not reach him. Merely, it drew his attention backwards ever so slightly.

That was enough for the girl looking for an opening on which to pounce.

???: “Oyraaa—!”

Swinging the barbarian sword in her hands, Medium dove into her opponent’s chest.

The blonde girl was not much taller than Petra, however, with bravery entirely different in nature to Petra’s she rushed in, slashing away at the axe-wielder’s arm.

Todd: “Tch.”

The man, distracted and clicking his tongue, twisted his wrist and quickly returned Medium’s blow with his axe. They both shrugged off each other’s initial blows, and returned to square one—

Medium: “Another! Another! Anotheeerrr!”

Despite the initial expectations, Medium was not that weak-willed at all.

Even with her barbarian sword having been parried by her opponent’s strike, she made use of the momentum of the parry to revolve and unleash a sword strike empowered by that same momentum. If her opponent did dodge that strike, she would use the momentum to spin around again for yet another sword strike.

Her sword dance, was akin to an unstoppable flow of water from a rising river—

Otto: “Number four!”

Petra: “Yes!”

Tapping the captivated Petra on the shoulder, Otto’s next instruction came flying in.

Once the signal was given, she would shoot magic at the designated spot without thinking. —At the time she agreed to accompany Otto on his travels around the battlefield, she had been told that this was the most important condition.

Therefore, Petra was determined to follow those instructions, forgetting all fears and anything else.

Petra: “Jiwald!”

Magic was fired once again, but this time the ground exploded at a much closer spot than before.

Perhaps the man may have thought they would avoid embroiling Medium since they were in the middle of crossing swords. But that was a naïve thought.

Otto: “If necessary, we will involve Medium-san.”

Petra: “I’ll cast a healing spell on you later, okay?”

Medium: “Uoooh! I don’t really get it, but I can’t stop now!”

The explosion detonated a few meters away and struck them in a way betraying such naiveté.

Ruthless as it may have been, Petra agreed with Otto’s way of thinking. Them surviving having suffered some wounds was more important than the ideal scenario of all three getting through unscathed.

Despite her skin being scorched by the heat of the explosion, Medium’s momentum did not stop.

With a sense of gratitude and guilt, Petra, alongside Otto, devoted all their energy as to repel this assassin—

Todd: “Oioi, give me a break.”

The moment they looked closer, the man asserted thus within the sound of the explosion.

It had sounded awfully clear, and present there was not even a sliver of anger or impatience from having suffered any setback. It was more like a strange, out-of-place sentiment.

Rather, the man’s voice was filled with exasperation.

Todd: “Are we thinking the same thing?”

The moment Petra heard that, goosebumps ran all over her body.

Even without understanding these words, the intent behind them felt clear as day.

Otto: “Number two!”

Just when Petra was about to realize the true nature of the shiver in a little more detail, at Otto’s scream she promptly abandoned all thought and immediately obeyed.

The Jiwald she fired off transferred heat to the magic stone hidden in the ground, just as before. —However, Petra’s finger was now pointing beneath their own feet.

Petra: “…”

A white light flashed under their feet, turning red and causing a shockwave.

After doing it, Petra realized that it was the emergency escape plan, something that Otto had prefaced with, “I would rather not use it, because it will hurt”.

And in fact, Petra’s small body was launched into the air as her soles bounced off the overflowing light. However, she did not ascend unprotected.

Gripped by an arm that reached out with a “Guh”, Petra’s body was embraced by Otto’s slender frame.

Of course, Otto’s body had also been sent flying by the same impact, but Otto had chosen to avoid making the mistake of flying away in a direction where they would be separated and unable to support each other, and to at least to minimize the damage Petra’s body would suffer.

Otto’s decision had allowed Petra not to complain nor stiffen, but to use Yang Magic as quickly and strongly as possible, to make Otto’s body ever-so-slightly resistant to the impact.

And she had managed that. Their bodies bounced off the ground. And immediately after that—

Petra: “…”

With a bang, a powerful detonation occurred at the same spot Petra had made one happen before—that was, where Petra and Otto had been until just before.

Catching a glimpse of the identity behind the explosion’s sound, Petra’s eyes witnessed a flame which seemed to be the same thing that had immolated the two messengers.

Said flame had aimed to scorch Petra and the others from behind.

Petra: “That axe…”

He had made Petra and Otto think that he was going to cut them down, but his real goal had been the Fire Magic Stones planted behind them.

The man’s favorite approach was the refusal to engage in a head-on confrontation, and the fact that it overlapped with Otto’s preparedness was probably the true explanation behind the man’s grumblings.

Petra: “Ugh!”

Petra arrived at the same thought as Otto did, who was tumbling to the ground while holding Petra in his arms, almost simultaneously.

Grunting in pain as he rolled on the hard ground, Otto gritted his teeth while being bombarded by shockwaves. However, Otto immediately got to his knees on the spot, turning to face the man while lifting Petra’s body up.

Propped up by Otto’s body, Petra also glared at the man who was some distance away.

However, contrary to the concerns held by Petra and Otto, the man did not immediately give chase.

They understood right away why that was, as well as his intention behind it.

Todd: “I don’t really want to do that though.”

While spilling that out, the man turned his head to check, an axe pointed at them.

Ascertaining the feeling of the ground beneath his feet, where the explosion had occurred, the man sniffed the black smoke rising from the burnt grass, and spoke,

Todd: “There, and there. And then, over there.”

Petra widened her eyes at what followed, after the man had quietly muttered something.

The man had turned his head, and the ground had exploded in his line of sight. It was number six. Then number nine and number one, followed by number five and number eight, and so on.

Petra: “B-But how…”

Otto: “…No way, a Spirit?”

It was a surprise that he had seen through the traps’ hiding places, but they could not comprehend how he had blown them up.

Otto’s words had made Petra gasp at the mysterious method of the man, who had displayed no signs of using magic the same way as Petra had in inducing the explosion.

If he truly was a Spiritual Arts User, that would make him the same as Subaru and Emilia.

As for Petra, she was severely reluctant to admit the man in front of her as being a person similar to two people whom she loved so dearly in many ways—

Petra: “But, there’s no Spirit to be seen here…”

Todd: “There’s more than one way to get them to comply. If they don’t want to be eaten, that is.”

Petra: “Eh?”

Otto: “I am not just saying this out of spite, but it is probably for the best if we do not listen to him.”

Petra, unable to understand his reply, froze with wide eyes. And then, with a tap on her shoulders, Otto immediately brought her back to her senses.

It was impossible to tell whether the man’s reply had been intended to create an opening, or whether he was partly telling them the truth.

However, one thing could be said for certain.

Petra: “I despise you.”

Medium: “I feel the same!”

In response to Petra, a small shadow flew, clenching her fists tightly whilst shouting.

It was Medium, who had been wary of the mysterious man’s peculiar skill, hence she had chosen an opportune moment to strike. Slipping into the smoke created by the series of explosions the man had set off, she aimed at his back by lunging her barbarian sword all the way from the other side of the smoke.

After enduring for a long time, patiently so, her bold blow went straight for the man’s back—

Todd: “Of the three of you, you’re the easiest one to read.”

Medium: “—Ah.”

Leaning his body to the side, the man escaped the downward trajectory of the barbarian sword.

And following on, the man turned himself around and thrust his axe towards Medium behind him.

Todd: “You’re the only one who does things according to the way of the Empire. It’s absolutely sickening.”

Petra: “Medium-chan!”

The sight of the man’s relentless axe was absorbed by Petra’s trailing shriek, looming towards Medium’s wide-eyed face.

4

—Medium O’Connell did not put too much thought into things.

Strictly speaking, Medium had a lot to think about on her own.

She was always worried about her brother, Flop O’Connell, and at the same time, she trusted him. Upon hearing that he had been taken away from the Fortress City, the surprise and worry were to an extent such that her chest had been about to burst. But her brother would have probably panicked, had he found out that her body had been shrunk while on her lonesome.

So she thought that they were about even in terms of worry and trust.

Flop: “Dear sister! We arrive at way better solutions when we think with our hearts, rather than racking our brains. That seems especially the case for you, so keep that in mind!”

Those words that her brother had said a long time ago had served as an important guiding light within Medium, irrespective of her chest being shrunk or not.

Since thinking about things with one’s heart tended to be linked to completely nonsensical, outrageous statements, it was also detested by some. Abel in particular seemed to find it quite disagreeable.

But what her brother had stated was great. In fact, that approach had worked out great for Medium.

Medium: “As expected, big bro’s awesome!”

Of course, if that made everything go well, she would not have become smaller, her brother would not have been taken to the Capital, Rem would not have disappeared, Natsumi would not have been flung away, Chaosflame would not have been destroyed, and Emily and the others would not have been all over the place, probably.

There was no way everything would go well.

However, as far as Medium’s actions were concerned, it was the best way to achieve the optimal outcome.

For that reason, the moment an axe had swung violently towards her defenseless face after her surprise attack from behind had failed, Medium did not panic, even as she thought “Ah, I’m gonna die”.

It was similar to feeling no regret after taking the best possible action and fulfilling one's role to the end, but one would still end up losing because the outcome was inevitable.

Of course, she hated the thought of dying here, since being unable to reunite with her brother would leave her heartbroken, and she was full of regret for not being able to help her new friends like Rem and Natsumi.

However, after thinking through things with her heart, Medium had executed the best possible option she had come up with.

The results came down, for want of a better word, to luck—were it to not work out her life would be forfeit, as per the way of Vollachia.

However—

Medium: "…"

Just before it slashed into her face, sparks flew off the thick blade of the axe, and it was repelled.

While just barely feeling the scent of steel in her nose, Medium exhaled slightly,

Medium: "As expected, big bro's awesome. I haven't died even once doing things this way."

???: "—Oh, I'm jealous of that. I've completely lost count."

Medium, expressing how the method taught to her by her brother had saved her once again, attained an answer from the person who had bounced away the axe that should have taken her life.

What had been swung, was the Blue Dragon Sword, as thick as the axe that had been repelled—the person gripping it was quite strange, with his appearance earning high marks from Medium's perspective.

Todd: "You're…"

Todd turned his gaze to the person that had stepped in, the man who had protected Medium when it had been all but certain that she would have been killed, and moved his lips in displeasure.

The man who had interrupted him—a one-armed wanderer with a jet-black helmet hiding his face let out a “Sorry to interrupt your good mood”, then continued,

One-Armed Man: “I was wondering where things looked worst, but as people say, “It’s darkest right below the lamp post”. But man, is it seriously troubling when the future’s this dark.”

Todd: “…”

The man who had quietly come to kill the non-combatants assumed a cautious stance.

However, it was not the stance of a lion cutting corners against a rabbit, but that of a hunter wary of the possibility of the rabbit having disguised itself as something else, and seeing that, the wanderer—Al, shrugged.

And then—

Al: “That dark future’s out of my hands. After all, I can’t even see the stars.”

Thus, he declared his participation in the battle.

Chapter 103:
Countdown of the Stars

1

—As tremors shook the world, as the sky split into white and red, as the clashing of lives brought forth an event of calamitous proportions, Rem had made a decision.

Rem: “If I’m going to make a move, it’s now or never.”

In the Imperial Capital, where a battle of unimaginable scale was seemingly taking place, Rem remained imprisoned in Berstetz’s mansion, her freedom having been greatly restricted.

Even as she felt a burning smell getting stronger and stronger day-by-day, Rem had been unable to do anything of use. Feeling deeply ashamed of that, the choice of staying silently in place for a second more was no longer acceptable to her.

In the end, Rem had not once come face-to-face with Berstetz, the owner of the mansion and the perpetrator behind her confinement, ever since their first chance meeting. For that reason, there had been no way for her to examine what that old man, who had been concerned about the future of the Empire because of his own philosophy, having thus deposed the then-Emperor Abel, would think of all that having led to the great battle engulfing the entire Empire.

However, even supposing there had been an opportunity, he and Rem would not have understood each other, most likely.

Rem: “After all, Berstetz-san and I stand on entirely different sides.”

Even if it sounded cold, that was the conclusion Rem had ultimately come up with.

Only the strong, or those with the leeway to do so, could sympathize with and take into account the circumstances of those in a different position. Since Rem was neither, she had been forced to make a decision.

Who would she turn into an enemy, and who would she regard as an ally?

Leaving that aside, Rem bore no hostility towards Berstetz or Madelyn. That, in particular, made Abel's inability to explain things properly, alongside Priscilla's unreasonable requests, much more difficult to deal with.

Therefore, what Rem would be trying to do from now on originated not from hostility or rebellious intent towards them, but from nothing more than the result of having chosen where she would stand.

Rem: "…"

With the battle for the Imperial Capital having begun, even though Berstetz's mansion had surely been constructed quite deep within the city, the effects of the fierce battle could be felt there nonetheless.

Naturally, the mansion had also been placed on high alert, and being more or less a prisoner of war, Rem too had been ordered to wait in the room provisioned for her. Hence, her freedom was even more restricted than usual.

However, from the perspective of the mansion's security, Rem was nothing more than a hobbling girl anyway, and the security system in place had not been set up so that a guard would be left as a sentry in front of her room day and night.

—Taking advantage of this negligence in security, Rem had silently slipped out of the room.

Holding her breath, Rem crawled from the skylight of her room to the roof of the mansion.

Since she had been careful not to make a sound, the security had not noticed Rem's stealthy maneuvers. It would be harsh to blame this on their negligence—they probably would never have even thought that a girl with a cane would sneak out from a room in this kind of way.

That would be the case, if Rem truly were a girl unable to walk as she wished without a cane.

Rem: “I expected to prepare for the worst, but…”

Of course, it was not a lie that Rem had complained of her handicap and used a cane up until this point in time.

However, with her incomplete Memories troubling those around her, she could not let her impaired leg stay as-is forever, and because of that she had been constantly practicing walking.

As her efforts bore fruit, and she began being able to stand on her feet somewhat, it struck her. —Were she to lead them to believe she had a limp, it would perhaps come in handy.

In fact, she had not yet thought as far as to how exactly it would come in handy.

On the contrary, if her secret devoid of use were to be discovered, she might have put everyone on alert inadvertently. However, since her troubles actually proved useful, she could probably say that she taken a gamble, and successfully so.

However, she absolutely could not let down her guard. Since she could only say that winning the gamble had paid off once these actions started leading to some kind of results.

Going out of one’s way to gamble would become meaningless unless it turned into a win.

In the first place, Rem had been trying not to think about just whose influence had made her take a risk as she was doing.

In any case—

Rem: “—If only I could stay undetected until I get away.”

Rem’s goal in getting on the roof, had not been for escaping the mansion.

That had been an option difficult to discard as well, but other than Rem, Flop too was being held captive in the mansion. There was no way he could have gotten out alone, and the mansion was surrounded by a high wall to begin with. Climbing over it would have been difficult, unlike the roof, so there appeared to be no point in even considering it.

Therefore, Rem had escaped from her room to make contact with those in a building separate from the mansion, located within this same plot of land—the Crown Princes, which had been captured all over the country and gathered at this place.

The black-haired Crown Prince had been hailed as the leader behind the rebellion, according to what she had heard. Despite the doubts about whether this person was truly Abel's legitimate child, he probably had one or two things in his mind about the current state of the Empire.

If Rem could make contact with them, a sliver of hope to get her out of the situation she had been put in might emerge.

Rem: "I need to ensure that I, Flop-san, and Katya-san as well, are safe."

Rem felt that she was in need of allies that could cooperate with each other.

She had been carefully making her way along the roof towards the edge, taking great care not to make a sound. Despite her effort to step softly, there was no guarantee that the guards would not find her, or that she would be able to get away successfully.

In order to not let this opportunity go to waste, she was fully prepared to risk her life in case she were spotted. This was also the reason she could not stand idly by.

That was—

Rem: "—Hk."

Suddenly, strange occurrences popping up in the distant sky caused Rem to jump out of her skin.

Witnessing the battle taking place all throughout the walls of the Imperial Capital at the edge of her vision, as the looming sky changed into a peculiar spectacle, Rem gasped.

Being so distant from the event, Rem had no way of knowing the details, but at the very moment the Cloud Dragon Mezoreia had descended upon the top of the star-shaped walls protecting the Imperial Capital, the Spirit Eater Arakiya turned the clouds into flames, and Moguro Hagane rose up as the very rampart itself.

Without knowing the actual reality of the situation, Rem stiffened as she sensed those dangers by instinct. At the very same moment, she lost the strength to remain standing on the roof.

Simultaneous with a hoarse “Ah” escaping from Rem’s mouth, her body slid down the slope of the roof. She almost tumbled all the way down, but, instead, she quickly grabbed the edge of the roof with all her might.

Rem: “That, was close…”

She would have had no good excuse, were she to have screamed or fallen down below.

Barely hanging on from the edge of the roof, Rem exhaled a sigh of relief. Slowly, she tried to get herself back on the roof and then—

Rem: “—? This is…?”

With her objective still far away, her dangling from the roof had only been a mishap on her way there. As Rem held onto the edge, however, a door set up at the very end of the large building caught her eyes.

Even though Rem had been allowed some relative freedom in going to and fro’ within the mansion, and thus having looked around everywhere, this was the first time she had spotted a door to a section that was off-limits just like the detached building. By going around the mansion along the roof, she had wandered onto a section that would normally be inaccessible.

Rem: “A hidden door…? What in the world?”

As questions about her discovery arose within her mind, Rem was briefly arrested by hesitation.

Her preliminary goal had been to make contact with the “Crown Princes” at the other building in the mansion ground. This would have given her a clearer picture of the situation, as well as a better chance of finding a way out of it.

On the other hand, the unexpected hidden door could just ultimately turn out to be a mere liquor cellar. Was it really worth taking the risk to get in?

Rem: “…”

She did not even need to think to know what the rational option was. —And yet, Rem chose the irrational option.

Releasing her grip from the edge of the roof, she descended to the passageway with the hidden door. She took care in her attempt to be as quiet as possible, yet her footsteps could still be heard. However, the sky that had startled her earlier remained unusual, so the mansion’s guards should be quite distracted.

Risking it and relying on that, Rem put her hand on the hidden door and threw it open.

Rem: “Stairs leading to a basement…”

The door had not been locked, probably due to it being unnecessary, rather than due to carelessness.

It hardly seemed like a place uninvited guests were supposed to go into. Since Rem, who had more-or-less arrived at the mansion with an invitation, was the one entering it, she had no reason to complain.

Greeted by stairs which emanated cold air, and a dim space with no light, Rem inhaled lightly as she headed downstairs with her hands tracing the wall.

There was the possibility that something of unbelievable dread waited for her.

It was also possible that Berstetz had trapped something outrageous and horrifying.

However—

Rem: "—Is, someone there?"

With some kind of mysterious conviction, Rem asked a question within the darkness of the basement she had reached.

It was poorly lit, in darkness, but one could sense that the basement was not that spacious. There was also a large presence in the back of the room which could only be vaguely discerned.

Although large, it was by no means monstrous.

It was a human bearing quite a large physique; such a presence had been chained and held captive against the wall on the other side of the basement.

And finally, that person, upon hearing Rem's question, spoke—

???: "I must… His Excellency…"

Rem: "…You're?"

???: "I must, protect… His Excellency the Emperor Vincent Vollachia…"

A low, passionate voice caused the stale air within the basement to shake, pitifully so.

The echoes of sincerity contained within the voice were strong and powerful, filled with selfless loyalty.

Rem: "…"

With those words, Rem decided to take one step after another, and closed the gap between her and the other person.

In doing so, the figure of a bulky man all chained-up vaguely emerged in the darkness. His body was truly huge, white scars etched all across his face—

Man: “…Goz, Ralfon.”

A beat later, Rem realized that what he had mumbled was probably a name.

In fact, it did sound familiar.

If she recalled correctly, that was one of the Nine Divine Generals, one of the most powerful and renowned beings in the Vollachian Empire—.

Goz: “I must protect His Excellency from the Great Disaster—”

The man was like a lion, roaring heroically as his scar-ridden face contorted.

2

???: “—Abel, you did say this, right? That you’re the one who spread the rumor about the Crown Prince?”

Serena Dracroy, a woman of character who was overlooking the state of the siege of the Imperial Capital from the main rebel camp, standing there with her arms crossed, asked this of Abel. Slowly, he raised his face covered by the oni mask.

Serena’s Flying Dragon Squadron had appeared from the far west as reinforcements. With the participation of first-class flying dragon riders who possessed the ability to tame flying dragons, air superiority had suddenly tilted towards their side.

Of course, there were some battlefields in which the flying dragon riders were at a disadvantage due to the presence of the Cloud Dragon and the Spirit Eater, but having the entire battlefield under their control was unnecessary.

All it would take was a single breach and even the walls of the Imperial Capital, renowned for their solidity, would begin collapsing starting from there.

There were measures in place to achieve this; at least, Abel thought so. Hence, knowing that there were places on the battlefield in which they were at a disadvantage, and others they had arrived at a stalemate, he would issue orders on and off.

Abel: “Does it look like I have time for your idle chit-chat now? If anything, should you not be keeping an eye on the movements of your subordinates?”

Serena: “Yes, of course. But it’s disheartening that you dismiss this as chit-chat. I took a stance because of your letter and swiftly joined your side. Since me coming was so vital to your strategy, treating me with a little more care wouldn’t make you lose your face.”

Abel: “Spoken like a good-for-nothing commoner.”

Serena: “Even if I spoke like a philistine, I’d rather not act like one. I’m just too curious about that reaction from before.”

Shrugging her shoulders, Serena took her gaze away from the sky, directing it towards Abel.

The reaction she had referred to was likely his reaction to the reinforcements from the west—to the arrival of the military forces that were not Serena’s Flying Dragon Squadron.

Although she had an idea about the unforeseen reinforcements and who was leading them, she found the carelessness of his earlier words and actions vexing.

Hence, it had led to the words Serena had kicked off her idle chit-chat with.

Serena: “You’re the one who spread the matter of the black-haired Crown Prince. And isn’t this Crown Prince the one leading the group right in the middle of that glorious rampage?”

Abel: “In short, you believe that this racket spreading across on the battlefield was orchestrated by the illegitimate offspring of the Emperor?"

Serena: "No, my apologies. It was just a figure of speech. I don't believe that the black-haired Crown Prince is truly His Excellency's son. In all likelihood, His Excellency has no children."

Shaking her head at Abel's words, Serena replied with a rather confident tone. When Abel raised an eyebrow at her confident answer, she continued, "In any case",

Serena: "His Excellency never took a consort, and there's been talk of him never having gotten intimate with a woman. I've tried to seduce him before, but he completely ignored me. This should serve as strong evidence."

Abel: "—. Are you sane?"

Serena: "Of course, I'm entirely serious."

Abel: "I did not ask if you were serious, I asked if you were sane."

Being presented with a rather unconvincing reason to base her argument on, Abel's gaze grew stern.

Serena was one of the more prominent High Counts in Vollachia, and because Abel held her abilities and ambition in such a high regard, he counted her as one of the forces necessary for this decisive battle. However, if Abel were to judge matters using criteria that could not be understood, that in itself meant there was room for consideration.

Serena, who was trying to see matters through Abel's eyes, let out a "Wait" as she uncrossed her arms and raised one hand, then continued,

Serena: "I'm not kidding, that's just the most significant reason. That I couldn't seduce His Excellency is frustrating, but that also hints at something at the same time."

Abel: "…"

Serena: “His Excellency has no interest in women. To put it more bluntly, he has no intention to bring forth an offspring.”

Abel looked on at Serena without speaking a word, and the latter continued with, “That’s got to be it, right?”,

Serena: “I’m not saying he is a philanderer, but His Excellency hasn’t sired a child. At the very least, not at this point in time. But even supposing His Excellency swings the other way, he could still have children provided he so wishes. There are two possibilities then, either he’s sterile, or…”

Abel: “He is intentionally not procreating.”

Serena: “Exactly. In any case, I don’t think there’s anything like a Crown Prince. That’s why this talk about an illegitimate child feels questionable in the first place. But if mere doubtful tales can spark a civil war such as this, our country splendidly lives up to its name.”

With a small twist of her cheeks, Serena’s smile was genuine and joyful.

Abel went without mentioning her attitude nor the speculation she had offered. Notably, Serena did not need Abel’s opinion either.

People like her were capable of confirming their own ideas without affirmation from others.

In other words, what she sought from Abel was not affirmation—

Serena: “For what purpose have you made up the existence of the Crown Prince? After our side is victorious in this battle, who will sit on the vacant throne, and what will you do with your Empire?”

—She asked if they were going to leave the future of the Vollachian Empire in the hands of the Crown Prince.

Abel: “…”

At Serena’s quiet question, Abel softly closed one eye.

Some would perhaps wonder if this was the right time to be exchanging questions and answers of the sort, as the battle was just about to reach its climax. But it would be too foolish not to think about what would happen after they won, during the melee.

Naturally, since they were fighting with the intention of winning, they needed to plan for the aftermath of the war as well.

Abel: “Why do you inquire this of me?”

Serena: “I don’t mean that the Crown Prince is the… illegitimate son of His Excellency, but I believe that he’s your truest representative to lead this great civil war. If you and the Crown Prince are going to join forces after the war, isn’t it obvious who we should ask regarding the future of the Empire?”

Abel: “—Ha.”

As Serena continued her thoughts, a breath escaped Abel’s mouth upon hearing them.

Simultaneously, he himself was impressed by the effectiveness of the cognitive disruption effect of the mask covering his face.

It was impressive how well it could conceal his identity and true feelings.

Serena: “What’s wrong? Did I say something wrong?”

Abel: “I am not laughing at you. Rather, I admire your discernment. It is just that, when the conclusion is mistaken, the process to reach it is even more off. Not unreasonable, is it?”

Serena: “Hmph…”

Serena’s lips curled in frustration at Abel’s comment.

But exactly as he had stated, her abilities to discern things were impressive. It was only natural to think that Abel’s goal was to win this rebellion and seize the throne of the Vollachian Empire.

He put a person calling themselves the Crown Prince in place, who would seize control over the throne. And if possible, the shadow

Emperor could perhaps even murder his puppet at some point, thus taking the throne for himself.

But—

Abel: “Have no doubt, I hold no intention of handing over the throne. Your assessment is misguided.”

Serena: “So you’re saying all my conjectures are completely off?”

Abel: “Not all. You are correct, I spread the word about the existence of the black-haired Crown Prince with the intention to find that one over there wreaking havoc on the battlefield. But you are mistaking the overall importance.”

Serena: “Overall importance?”

Abel: “How important is it to have him front and center, relative to how important it is to keep him at hands’ reach. The latter is not that essential. —In any case, that naiveté of his cannot condone the sacrifices of others.”

Serena twisted her head, perplexed beyond comprehension.

However, Abel was not obligated to explain everything to her either. For the time being, he had probably provided her with the answers she sought, and resolved the concerns she held for the post-war.

One possibility was, Serena could even end this rebellion by beheading Abel here and now, then take his head with her to the Crystal Palace.

Everything would be nipped in the bud, but to a certain extent, at the expense of Abel’s gratifying sacrifice.

Abel: “Cast aside hesitation and mercy, and make the most of your naiveté. That is what makes you truly special. —Natsuki Subaru.”

The person Serena had called the Crown Prince was probably still ravaging the battlefields of the west.

Even Abel did not have a completely consistent image of the person whose name he just uttered, in his mind. From what he recalled, he had been a hectic handful to deal with as an unvarnished crossdresser, and even while donning the appearance of a child.

With that image of Subaru floundering about, hectically moving bout in confusion upon being tossed into some situation, laying his naiveté and inexperience bare, Abel's lips twisted. With firm disgust.

—No, with hatred, or perhaps, a more appropriate way to describe it would be rage.

Soldier: "—Who are you?!"

As Serena was about to continue questioning Abel, as he concealed his negative emotions behind the oni mask, there was movement in the camp.

Several soldiers guarding the main camp had drawn their weapons, showing utmost caution. Upon taking a look, the soldiers pointing their weapons at a slender figure who had made its appearance from outside the encampment could be seen.

The figure raised its empty hands and chuckled, looking around at the faces of the soldiers pointing their weapons at them.

???: "Myyy~, I wasn't expecting such a warm welcome. I'm quite the popular one, aren't I?"

Soldier: "Don't mess around! Where did you even come from?!"

???: "Guided by the stars… Doesn't that sound a little too poetic, though?"

The anger of the soldiers, believing that they were being made fun of by that ambiguous answer, flared up.

However, the man's attitude did not change in response to their threatening demeanor. Abel knew very well that his attitude would not be swayed by this.

And that was why—

Abel: "—Lower your weapons. That thing does not pose a threat."

Soldier: "B-but…"

Abel: "Even if you were to give him a knife, he would still be unable to do a thing. He is a clown whose only skill is to play with words."

???: "Whaat~, that's a nasty thing to say. I'm hurt, you know?"

He called out to the soldiers that were on-guard to lower their weapons. However, expressing his protest towards that command, the gentle-looking man Abel had spared with a pout of his lips.

Then Serena, who was standing next to Abel, also directed a quizzical look at the man.

Serena: "Why are you here? Aren't you the Stargazer—"

???: "—Ubilk, if you'd be so kind. Pleased to make your acquaintance, High Countess Dracroy. But then again…"

As the gentle-looking man—Ubilk, introduced himself, he smiled bewitchingly with the oddly refined face he possessed.

Ubilk was supposed to be in the Imperial Capital, and more specifically at the Crystal Palace. With pompousness, with the utmost maximum of pompousness he cut off the words he had been stating before, and then, delivered a declaration.

Ubilk: "—That's a conversation for after the Great Disaster, if you happen to survive it, right?"

Chapter 104:
Bastions in Chaos (I)

1

—With that sound, the expression “Great Disaster”, Abel’s black eyes narrowed behind his Oni mask.

The person responsible for this utterance, Ubilk, had a smile on his face, going without revealing the depths of his heart.

He was a gentle and affable man who treated everyone equally. His attitude and entire being had not changed ever since the first time he had appeared before Abel.

Ever since the time he had appeared in the audience chamber out of the blue, without any collaborators, or a shred of concern, nothing had changed.

Presenting himself as a Stargazer, Ubilk had correctly predicted disasters that had befallen the Vollachian Empire, over and over again. No matter what events he foresaw, his own feelings had never once wavered.

Almost like—

Abel: “—Is confronting me here just another event you have anticipated since long ago?”

Ubilk: “Nah, nah. Not at all. You’re giving me way too much credit. I’m faaar~ from being such a big deal.”

Abel: “If all you have to say is nonsense, I shall sever your tongue with glee.”

Ubilk: “Ohhh~ dear, I’m so, so scared. What a stomach-turning thought, as usual.”

While shrugging his slender shoulders, Ubilk boasted this completely unfazed. When Abel sniffed at this attitude, Serena, who was standing next to him, let out a “I don’t get it”.

While comparing Ubilk’s profile with Abel, she raised her hands, then spoke,

Serena: “I’ve seen you before. The Stargazer who strolls in and out of the Crystal Palace… You must be one of the jesters that His Excellency the Emperor keeps at his side. Are you acquainted with him, Abel?”

Abel: “Irredeemably so.”

Serena: “Hmm… I didn’t mean to ruffle your feathers until all of this was over, but may I ask one thing? Just who is hiding their face behind that oni mask?”

As Serena harbored doubts on Abel’s identity, a ray of understanding dwelled within her slit-like eyes.

Certainly, she had held some serious suspicions on that front from the very beginning. About the person who had successfully assumed the commanding position of the rebel forces amidst this great civil war shaking the Empire—including the fact that he kept his true face hidden, he was more than a match for Ubilk in regard to being inscrutable.

However—

Abel: “Answering that question is not a priority at this moment.”

Serena: “There are means to remove that mask by force. I am also quite confident in my abilities in that regard.”

Abel: “Do not. Consider this a warning.”

Serena: “Ho, you’re warning me?”

At Abel’s words, Serena slowly narrowed her eyes belligerently.

Assuming a stern approach, and making full use of the moniker she had been given, the Scorching Lady, Serena Dracroy—had made it this far because she had reduced to ashes all the scorn, all the provocations hurled at her till now.

Due to her creed, Abel's answer was more than enough to inflame tensions.

Ubilk: "Wait, wait, waaait~! Let's calm down a bit! How can me just showing my face like this create such a tense atmosphere?!"

Abel: "If you keep quiet and observe, you may contribute your fair share to this battle without lifting a finger."

Ubilk: "Oh, I don't wish for such a thing. I'd hate to have one, or even both of you bite the dust here, all the mooore~ if I'd be the one to set it all into motion!"

Serena: "—I don't get it."

As the two were at each other's throats, Ubilk raised a relatively flustered voice, reaching out to both of them. Due to Ubilk's reaction, Serena responded the same way again.

Immediately after, she closed one eye as she played with the hilt of the sword at her waist.

Serena: "If you truly are to stand by the side of His Excellency the Emperor Vincent Vollachia, your duty should be to attack me and this man commanding the rebel forces. If you stay put, this man is as good as dead. Shouldn't this be welcome for you?"

Abel: "Who gave you permission to kill me? You can go ahead and die yourself."

Serena: "I'm sorry, but I'm talking to this Stargazer right now. Please don't interrupt our conversation."

Abel: "…"

As Serena pushed her own subject, she stopped Abel from cutting in for the time being. Once she looked at Ubilk again, with a blank expression the latter declared,

Ubilk: "An interesting and intriguing spectacle. But please don't make such a scary face. I’m unarmed, after all.”

Serena: “Being unarmed is no reason for me to let my guard down. Go ahead and give me a reason to remove my hand from the hilt of my sword. Just to let you know, I don’t hesitate to cut someone unarmed.”

Ubilk: “—I can’t be cut down. By you, at least.”

Serena’s tone became gradually harsher, and at the end, her words became a threat. Ubilk, whose face had been looking utterly exhausted just prior, rejected that threat with no more than a few words.

The moment his mouth spoke those words, color faded from Ubilk’s countenance.

Even if the whole picture of those emotions could not be seen, the intent behind these emotions he wanted to display faded away, leaving behind a merely blank, empty, and colorless face.

Serena: “…”

Serena was not incensed by this provocative declaration, and neither did she draw her sword.

What filled her mind, even more than anger, was Ubilk’s very existence—No, rather, it was this suspicious sense of eeriness and a touch of uneasiness towards this being dubbed a Stargazer.

It was as if this person before her very eyes was confronting her, without even confronting her properly.

Serena: “…We should probably kill you right here and now.”

Ubilk: “Ahh, how awful. I’m gravely hurt by this. What do you think?”

Abel: “Every so often, I share the same thoughts Serena Dracroy possesses right now. However, this man has survived to this day. That’s a fact.”

Remaining indifferent to everyone meant never knowing when he had trodden on somebody's toes.

Ubilk, with his complete inability to adapt on the fly, trod on the toes of many in the Vollachian Empire, thus incurring the wrath of countless people. At times, he'd even had a blade pointed at him.

Despite all of this, Ubilk had survived to this day—

Ubilk: "It's the will of the stars. Oh, Ubilk… it's too early for me to die yet, waaay~ too early."

Clasping his hands together before his chest, Ubilk stated thus in a light-hearted manner, to which Serena's cheeks stiffened.

There was no point in debating whether that was true or not. The fact that Ubilk had appeared here—No, the fact that he had first appeared at the Crystal Palace, meant one thing.

Ubilk would not die.

The stars he spoke of—it was as if he was saying that his life was secured, that he had been placed under the protection of the Observers, omnipresent as they ridiculed this world.

Abel: "…"

In the middle of this thought, Abel exhaled, feeling the silencing zeal in that assertion.

Abel's personal feelings towards Ubilk and the other Stargazers mattered naught. What was important, was that Ubilk had appeared before Abel's eyes.

This clown, who was aligned with the stars in every possible scenario, had shown himself before Abel—

Ubilk: "You stepped off the stage once before; rather, it's more appropriate to say that you were forced to, but do you plan to rise up once again?"

Completely ignoring Serena, Ubilk's gaze turned to Abel.

Unsure what to make of those words, Serena frowned her well-shaped eyebrows. But, Abel had no intention of responding to her in either a kind or thorough manner.

Above all, that question was truly infuriating for Abel.

Abel: “I shall tell you something.”

Ubilk: “Yes?”

Abel: “I never had any intention to step off the stage even once, as you put it.”

Folding his arms, he started by correcting Ubilk’s misconceived original suggestion.

Having been ousted from his throne and driven to lands far to the east, Abel had been put in dire circumstances on many occasions. However, his will to fight had never wavered.

He had never forgotten the role he was supposed to play, nor had he ever thought of abdicating it.

Abel: “You cannot comprehend it, Stargazer. As you have never once stepped upon the stage.”

Ubilk: “—. A painful thing to hear, iiisn’t~ it?”

Abel: “You cannot comprehend even that, as well.”

With a series of fitting words and facial expressions, Ubilk attempted to communicate with Abel. However, Ubilk’s emotionless words did not convey an understanding of Abel’s true intentions.

And, that already seemed to be the limit for Ubilk, as Abel had already dismissed it.

For that reason—

Abel: “The time is nigh. That is probably why you have traveled here.”

Ubilk: "…Indeed, but you already knew I was coming, didn't you?"

Abel: "Nonsense. I am nothing like you. I may speculate a second ahead of time, but I am not certain. —Blind acceptance might be a more fitting way to describe it."

Ubilk: "…"

With Abel's comment, Ubilk's expression changed slightly.

The slight quiver of his eyebrows was derived from his seldom-displayed negative emotions. Be it either anger or discomfort, it was nothing short of a rare response.

Unfortunately, there was no such thing as cheap satisfaction to be found in Abel's mind.

Serena: "And now what will you do, you should be at His Excellency's side no matter what. Should I send your decapitated head?"

Abel: "The Emperor would not even bat an eye. If anything, he would be a bit aggravated that he did not issue the order himself, but that would be the end of it. More importantly…"

Serena: "More importantly?"

Even though Serena did not understand the details of the dialogue between Abel and Ubilk, she nodded her head as she saw it heading towards a conclusion.

Abel briefly paused as he saw her wavy brown hair sway over her shoulders in the corner of his eye.

And then, he declared.

Abel: "I shall leave you with a great role to play. —A role that no one but you can fulfill on this battlefield."

2

Kicking off the white snow that had piled up, a shadow raced unhindered across the battlefield.

The ground, covered with a thin layer of ice, was slippery all over the place, the lingering temperature was so exceedingly cold that it seemingly cut through one’s skin, and an enemy, so formidable that it paralyzed one’s instincts, was looming from above. Outright rejecting these various circumstances, at lightning speed, the shadow ran past from behind.

Mezoreia: “You, you, you—”

Cecilus: “Ahahahaha! Instead of “you”, you should call me Cecilus Segmunt! You are more than welcome to address me so loudly that it echoes all over the battlefield…”

Mezoreia: “CECILUS SEGMUNT—!!”

Cecilus: “Yes, exactly!”

Leaving behind a grinning afterimage, the very next moment the soles of his zori pierced the side of Cloud Dragon’s face.

With an explosive sound, its head flamboyantly bounced back, and Mezoreia’s giant body swayed wildly in the air. Emilia was surprised by how a boy much smaller than her had accomplished this.

Emilia: “That boy, he’s amazing…”

Not only had he stopped the Dragon’s breath as it was about to sweep the battlefield, but he had also proudly stated what was likely his name as he began to fight the Dragon without backing down a single step.

Emilia was captivated by the blue-haired child, who had proclaimed himself to be Cecilus.

It was exactly like she was witnessing the boy upon the grand stage he so boldly spoke of.

Emilia: “…”

Cecilus's body moved in and out of Emilia's vision as if he were a phantom or an illusion. Repeatedly, he entered and exited Emilia's field of view from side-to-side, from top to bottom, at a tremendous speed.

He was much too fast for Emilia's eyes to keep up with, so they started spinning round and round.

And it was the same for Mezoreia, whom Cecilus coiled around.

Mezoreia: "—Hk! You are! This dragon's! This dragon's adversary!"

Flapping its wings in the air, the claws and tail of the Cloud Dragon swung about uncharacteristically recklessly.

This was directed at Cecilus, who cheerfully jumped around using a wall of ice that Emilia had built—to keep Mezoreia from leaving the battlefield.

However, the Dragon's attacks merely hit spots Cecilus had long since passed by, leaving her important, real target unscathed.

On the contrary, as soon as Mezoreia's tail hit the wall, Cecilus jumped on it and ran up onto its back in one fluid motion, and,

Cecilus: "Go, go, go, go, go!"

With kicks so swift it was as if he possessed several more legs than he actually did, he knocked Mezoreia towards the ground.

Emilia: "I-it's falling…!"

While it flapped its wings violently, Mezoreia flipped over in midair and crashed into the ground.

After a tremendous roar and tremor, the snow that covered the soil was projected upwards and scattered; Emilia, while being showered with cold wind, was almost unable to withstand the breathtaking spectacle.

But admittedly, this was a ridiculously lucky situation that she could not afford to miss out on.

Emilia: “At this rate, we can defeat Mezoreia…”

Cecilus: “Oops, that won’t do. You’re going to have to hold off on that.”

Emilia: “Huh?”

Though she thought it was a bit unfair, Emilia honed the Mana around her and tried to drop a large block of ice on top of the fallen Mezoreia.

But when Emilia was about to do so, Cecilus slipped in front of her and stuck his finger on the tip of her nose; startled by his action, she stopped moving.

Cecilus, having quickly poked Emilia’s nose, made her blink in surprise, and spoke,

Cecilus: “Listen up. Just now, I saved you from a dangerous situation in the nick of time, didn’t I? And now my one-on-one battle with the Dragon has begun… You know what you should do from here, don’t you? Yes, you should have faith in my victory and nobly pray for me! That’s the role of a princess.”

Emilia: “Umm… But I’m not really a princess? But I’m not entirely unrelated to a throne, though.”

Cecilus: “Princess is just a figure of speech. More precisely, it’s the flower of the story falling madly in love with me, the hero who came to her rescue. The perfect role for someone as beautiful as you, don’t you think?”

Emilia: “Ah, I’m sorry. I’ve already decided on the person I’ll fall in love with.”

Cecilus: “Oh, is that so? Then there’s no way around it. Please continue.”

Despite being incessantly spoken to at a staggering pace, Emilia had not missed anything essential. Accordantly, Cecilus understood it immediately as well, and thus backed away.

Since he had pulled back, Emilia once again raised her hand out towards Mezoreia,

Emilia: “Hiyah—!”

And with that, a giant block of ice fell at full speed from the sky, aimed at Mezoreia who had fallen to the ground.

A boom echoed after it stabbed Mezoreia’s belly, who had been lying face-up on the ground. While hearing the Dragon’s low-toned cries of pain, Emilia readied the next one, saying “One more time”,

Cecilus: “Pardon my impoliteness.”

Right after that, Emilia had her legs swept out from under her as she readied herself, and as she screamed out an “Ahk!”, her body was gently lifted, withdrawing with momentum such that it was like she was being forcibly pulled away from her location.

The next moment, a strong wind raged where Emilia and Cecilus had been, and the shockwave that the Dragon had used the ground as a conduit for gouged that place, making all the soil in a certain range of that spot shoot out.

Had they moved to the side any slower, they would have died.

Cecilus: “As expected, with a Dragon as an opponent, nothing is straightforward, but at least I got a chance to show off every second. But this came just in the nick of time because of all my pent-up frustration from being paired up with all those extras.”

Emilia: “Th-Thank you, for saving me.”

Cecilus: “No, no, don’t worry about it! Beauties who already have a loved one just need to be charmed in a different way. Just remember to invite me to the wedding!”

Cecilus, who had picked her up and saved her just in time, smiled heartily at Emilia’s gratitude.

Strictly speaking, Emilia did not have a loved one, but rather someone whom she might fall for, but right now was neither the time nor the place for quibbles. What was important was—

Emilia: “Use these, Cecilus!”

Cecilus: “Use what? Even you tell me that, I don’t know what I’m supposed to use… Ohh!”

Emilia lowered herself to the ground, as to place her hands on it, and the eyes of Cecilus, his head tilted, started sparkling. In his vision were swords, spears, axes as well as various other weapons of ice, all growing out of the ground.

Ice Brand Arts, which forged weapons out of ice, manifested a row of weapons in front of Cecilus all the way to Mezoreia.

Cecilus: “This is quite spectacular! I like it, it’s cool! To tell you the truth, I only wanted to hold a suitable, excellent sword of some kind, one that’s legendary or magical, but…”

Emilia: “Then are these no good?”

Cecilus: “No, it’s not like I told anyone about this rule, so I’ll just change it in secret! In this scene, it’d be flashier to swing a weapon against a Dragon!”

While saying that, Cecilus stretched his small body’s arms as far as he could and pulled out the two swords of frost on either side. As soon as he did so, Emilia realized her mistake with an “Ah”.

The ice sword had been created by Emilia. Therefore, Emilia would not feel the cold, but it might be too cold for Cecilus, who had not created them.

Emilia: “Come to think of it, Priscilla never said it was cold either, but…”

Cecilus: “Rest assured. I can make up for this inconvenience with the Flow Method, so both myself and the people in the Battalion are fine. Well, I tend to get out of my flow when the Boss and the others are involved, but it’s a fact that I’m especially special for handling it naturally!”

Emilia: “Speshul…”

As unfamiliar words were let out one after another, Emilia could not help but ponder.

This abnormal sensation reminded Emilia of talking to Subaru—after thinking it over, she came to realized, with a “Maybe?”.

Emilia: “Hey, Cecilus! Did you learn those words from Subaru?”

Cecilus: “Subaru-san, is it? Nope, sorry, but you’re mistaken. It was the Boss who taught me these words, but his name isn’t Subaru-san.”

Emilia: “I see, my bad… Looks like I jumped to conclusions.”

Due to her hastiness, Emilia was left disheartened by Cecilus’s answer. However, not wanting to be discouraged, Emilia quickly slapped herself on the cheeks to cheer herself up.

Then, like Cecilus, she picked up an ice armament, a spear, herself, and spoke,

Emilia: “I pulled myself together… Let’s fight Mezoreia together!”

Cecilus: “That’s a really nice change of heart. Come to think of it, I haven’t even heard your name yet.”

Emilia: “Me? I am Emilia… No, I mean Emily! Emily!”

Cecilus: “I see you have your reasons! But I think it’s best if I refrain from saying anything thoughtless here, so I’ll do you a favor and leave it at that, Emily-san. This might be sudden, but I’d like to request something from you in return.”

Emilia: “A favor? From me?”

Cecilus: “Yes. —While you’re dealing with that Dragon, could I ask you to move that thing out of the way?”

After she gave him her name, Cecilus asked Emilia for a favor in a hushed voice. Having said that, he pointed to the ground a short distance away from the spot upon which Mezoreia had fallen onto the ground.

Seeing what Cecilus's finger was pointing to, atop the snowy soil, Emilia's eyes widened with an "Ah".

And then—

Cecilus: "Then please do that, Emily-san. I'll do my job… and how about I do it so flamboyantly, that only the star actor of this world could manage it?!"

After saying this, Cecilus kicked off the ground without waiting for Emilia's reply.

The snow scattered, and Cecilus's body, gripping two swords of frost, ran straight for the dragon. Mezoreia instantly sensed the danger of the small threat rushing towards itself on its scales.

Mezoreia: "Don't friggin' push your luck—!"

A shudderingly enraged roar was raised, and Mezoreia clawed at the block of ice that was about to crush its torso. In an instant, the gigantic mass of ice, as large as a small mountain, unable to withstand the claw strike for even a second, fissured, the cracks running through its entirety with tremendous velocity, then, it shattered all at once.

Once the weight of the ice block was gone, Mezoreia immediately rolled over to face the ground, ready to unleash an attack on the leaping Cecilus—

Emilia: "Hiyah!!"

Emilia threw the spear she brandished at Mezoreia, which struck it squarely on the nose.

The sharp tip of the ice spear did not bury a sliver of its tip into Mezoreia's scales, but the force of its impact had been enough to snap the Dragon's head away as to delay its attack on Cecilus.

Then, Cecilus dove in, his velocity nearly matching that of the thrown spear.

Cecilus: “No blinking allowed, or you’ll go without offering well-deserved applause!”

While weaving eloquent prose, Cecilus’s twin blades of frost shot out with white light.

With a light sound, its scales were penetrated, and the Cloud Dragon was flicked to the left and to the right. Due to the sword dance, it was deprived of its vision, it was deprived of its freedom, it was deprived of any opportunity to counterattack.

Despite being a wee one still, Cecilus’s skills were absurd.

Both in terms of handling her body and weapons, Emilia had believed herself to have become quite respectable, but this was a dimension to which she could not compare herself to. Perhaps he even had the potential to become as absurdly strong as Reid, whom she had happened to meet at Pleiades Watchtower.

Emilia: “But please, don’t become a meanie like Reid.”

Setting aside his ability with the sword, Reid possessed a terribly nasty personality, so she hoped that Cecilus would not turn out that way.

With that wish in mind, taking a sidelong glance at Cecilus, who was attracting Mezoreia’s attention, Emilia rushed to a point a short distance away from the battle.

The favor Cecilus had asked of Emilia earlier was quickly drawing near.

Emilia rushed to the destination, and there she found—

Emilia: “—Madelyn! This is no time to sleep! Wake up, convince Mezoreia!”

Emilia held up Madelyn Eschart’s motionless body, which was buried in the snow, and desperately called out to her.

Chapter 105:
Bastions in Chaos (II)

1

Pressing his fists to the ground, he stood up by overexerting his shaking knees.

The force of the heavy blows had reverberated to his very core, his internal organs, which seemed like they had been scrambled, bellowed.

Lacerations and bruises could be reliably healed by simply sucking up the power of the earth via the soles of his feet. However, the techniques used by his opponent, their nature unknown, would overcome any crude protection of the sort.

His attitude abhorrent, his character loathsome, his enemy was one of the strongest in the Empire.

His techniques, perfected through training that transcended human understanding, toyed with the foolhardy Garfiel around without relent.

However, lack of experience or age was no reason for him to cower.

Garfiel, who was incapable of anything dexterous, required victory, simple as that. Any other answer could not be chosen, and above all—

Garfiel: “As if my amazin’ self could just keep on cowerin’ right next to ya.”

Gritting his teeth, Garfiel looked up and let out a guttural groan from his throat.

His gaze remained fixed directly towards his front, though his attention was set not on the one that was, without doubt, his enemy, but on the man standing beside him, his personal enemy.

???: “Oh dear. Your unrelenting spirit is a virtue, but isn’t it more reasonable in this situation to direct it at the old man over there, rather than at me?”

Garfiel: “That’s just “Kagricon puttin’ things aside”. You’re the one blabbin’ nonsense. Ya did it long before he did.”

???: “That was about a year and a half ago now… Excluding the things you’re already aware of, I do think that it’s not that unforgivable.”

Shrugging his thin shoulders, the man—Roswaal responded curtly.

Without his makeup and clown costume in order to conceal his true identity, he retained the aura of a proper nobleman.

It was a masterful disguise that did not let show just how twisted he was at his core.

Without the advice of the detestable Roswaal, Garfiel’s life would have been in peril, that much was true.

And because Garfiel was aware of this, a feverish anger rose from the pit of his stomach.

On the other hand—

???: “—I’m a tad confused ’bout ya sayin’ you’ve been in a fight with shinobi before.”

The one to mutter so was an old man of diminutive stature, a man who could easily have been mistaken for a dwarf.

Waving the sleeve of his right arm that was missing below the wrist, he donned an expression that made him look like a good-natured old man, yet it was completely unfathomable how terrifying this old man actually was.

Garfiel was painfully aware that it was also part of the shinobi’s techniques.

Everything about him, his gestures, words, actions, even his feeble appearance, were all tools to bring nothing but death to his opponents—Shinobi utilized their entire being as a deadly weapon to finish off their targets.

The shinobi head honcho, the monstruous old man was staring at Garfiel and the other man—or rather, he was staring just at Roswaal. He was not accusing him for rudely intruding into a one-on-one fight, but he was concerned about something else.

—Concerned that he had fought a shinobi before, and the boastfulness of that statement of his.

???: “The basic rule of fightin’ a shinobi’s ta lose yer life. In the case the shinobi’s killed durin’ their attempt, the village’s notified, and the next one’s dispatched, and this happens ’til the other person croaks. So, how’re ya still alive?”

Roswaal: “It’s a little complicated in that regard. Apparently, the shinobi I encountered also had their own circumstances. I don’t know if that’s the right word, but they were runaways.”

???: “Runaway shinobi…”

Stroking his long white eyebrows with his fingers, Olbart whispered.

Even Garfiel had not comprehended the words Roswaal had uttered. The existence of shinobi was merely a slightly credible rumor to begin with, but even then, their actual existence was dubious.

Naturally, no one knew the true situation. He had never even heard of the term “runaway shinobi” before.

Olbart: “Shinobi who’ve escaped from the village, that couldn’t have happened in quite a while now?”

However, instead of denying those words unfamiliar to Garfiel’s ears, Olbart was nothing but frank about their content.

It sounded as if he was aware of the situation concerning the village, those shinobi, as well as everything else; the statement probably was true. He grasped what was in his hands, not out of obligation, but as a way of life.

That was the secret for success in life, of the shinobi named Olbart Dunkelkenn—.

Roswaal: “I don’t know how long a while is for you, so it may be more or less than a while. At any rate, I met those shinobi almost forty years ago.”

Olbart: “Huh?”

Roswaal answered with a shrug of his shoulders, to which the Vicious Old Man, Olbart, raised a voice of doubt.

A similar doubt emerged within Garfiel. Rather, it was more likely that everything Roswaal had stated thus far had just a casual utterance, hence he admired the nerve of the man.

Although he had never bothered to ask Roswaal’s age, he was at most around thirty-years-old—he was unlike Emilia or Beatrice. He had not even been born forty years ago.

And with this ridiculous, spurious trickery targeted at Olbart—

Olbart: “—Shasuke and Raizo, right? Those are the runaway shinobi you’re talkin’ ’bout.”

Roswaal: “Ho.”

Olbart: “They left the village forty or fifty years ago, and the only ones who’re still alive are their brothers. The others’ve been killed off, so there ain’t any other candidates.”

Garfiel dismissed that affair as a joke, yet Olbart played along even more tenaciously. Next to Garfiel staring in bewilderment, Roswaal batted one eye shut.

Looking back at Olbart with his eerie yellow eye, he spoke,

Roswaal: “Well, do I really have the obligation to answer whether you’re right or not?”

Olbart: “Nah. It’s also valid ta hold yer opponent in suspense when a fight ta kill’s on a knife’s edge… Ya might have talent as a shinobi.”

Roswaal: “I appreciate the compliment, but I decline. The talent I desire and the path I want to walk have been decided long before forty years ago.”

Olbart: “Kakakakka! I see, I see. —Well then, it can’t be helped.”

Roswaal, shaking his head, ignored Olbart’s praise.

Olbart laughed without paying heed to that, and immediately afterwards his figure became hazy. In the blink of an eye, the distance between the two vanished. With a leap, the eerie old man’s foot was slammed on his target’s neck.

And that—

Garfiel: “Hk!”

Feeling a gentle breeze on his neck, Garfiel held his breath.

A deadly shockwave scattered where the nape of his neck had been, barely scraping his skin. Olbart’s kick had been unleashed, only to be stopped just in time.

Roswaal: “After that conversation just now, you aim not for me, but him.”

Olbart: “Diminish yer enemies. Easiest ones first. Pretty textbook, ain’t it?”

With strength and proficiency one would not expect from such a small stature, even Garfiel’s well-trained neck would not be able to take a direct hit from Olbart’s kick and remain unscathed.

What had stopped that reckless clash from becoming a reality was a distinctively shaped dagger cutting between Garfiel’s neck and Olbart’s kicking foot—Rather than having blades, however, the weapon possessed parts to strike with.

Called a sai, it was an obscure weapon often employed in the western country of Kararagi, and even Garfiel was now seeing it for the first time.

That, had just saved Garfiel's life.

The owner of the sai was Roswaal, adding the humiliating fact that he had saved Garfiel for the second consecutive time.

Garfiel: "OHHHHHHH!"

The moment he was set ablaze by this humiliation, Garfiel's right arm launched up, killing the wind.

Naturally, the target was the old man, who remained suspended in midair with his kicking leg as his pivot. Since he had no way to escape in midair, he would smash through his torso, thus rendering him unable to fight.

Olbart: "Whoa there."

However, just before that powerful arm struck him, Olbart ducked with an unusually adroit movement of his body, leaping down and to the side, with only his toe hooked in Roswaal's sai.

Evading the unleashed fist by diving under it, Olbart pulled out of range in a crawling position. Immediately, Garfiel stepped in for a follow-up—

Roswaal: "How about we calm down for a bit?"

Garfiel: "Gah!"

As he planned to rush in, his body was pulled backward at the waist, knocking the wind off his sails.

Looking at it, Garfiel came to notice that Roswaal had hooked the tip of his sai onto the clothes at his waist. The former wondered what in the world Roswaal was trying to pull, but he figured out the man's intent the moment he attempted to snap at him.

Because a rotating black blade grazed Garfiel's nose as it came flying by.

Garfiel: “—Hk.”

Roswaal: “The moment you two came apart, he threw a flying blade at your blind spot with his hand behind his back. Putting the spin on it is just a petty trick, but shinobi have a whole treasure trove of that. Not to mention, our opponent’s at the top of their class.”

Olbart: “If ya think somethin’ so pompous as being on top of a small hill, people’ll point ‘n laugh at’cha. Being at the top of the shinobi ain’t somethin’ ta brag ’bout.”

Unconcerned with his attack having missed, Olbart closed one eye and looked at them vigilantly.

Garfiel once again bit his teeth in humiliation at this exchange between the two, of which he had been left out of. Roswaal had saved his life not once, nor twice, but thrice already.

In the fight against Kafma, he had felt on his body that he had overcome one singular wall.

And in spite of that, he was incapable of doing a single thing against these people who were making a mockery of his fight with Kafma. This was a disgrace to Garfiel himself, and to Kafma who had lost to him, but—.

Roswaal: “—Garfiel, do not misjudge his type of strength.”

Garfiel: “Ahn…?”

Roswaal: “You’re strong. So, your opponent tries to avoid meeting you in your domain. Once you see through his wiles, most of the weakness you harbor should disappear.”

Roswaal pulled out another sai as he said this to Garfiel, who was clenching his fists.

With short-strike weapons in both hands, Roswaal was no longer the Head Magician of the Court that Garfiel knew, but rather he was attempting to maintain the appearance of a mere warrior.

There was a moment of confusion, but after a pause Garfiel understood his intention.

Roswaal had to abide by the restriction of not being able to use magic in this situation.

If Roswaal were to use magic, his true identity could be exposed. If that were to happen, this civil war within the Empire could unfold into a war between the Kingdom and the Empire.

Thus—

Roswaal: "All I can do, is provide cover… You're the key to this battle against this General First-Class of the Empire, Garfiel."

Garfiel: "…"

Roswaal: "It's true that we have bad chemistry. You're straightforward and honest, after all. That being the case, I'll find a workaround for the deficiency that creates. So, I have…"

Garfiel: "—A nasty personality."

Roswaal smiled wryly at Garfiel, who had taken from the former's words and continued them.

Roswaal: "Yes, I have a nasty personality. Quite reliable, isn't it?"

Garfiel: "Pah! Quit talkin'!"

With this response to the winking Roswaal, Garfiel wiped his mouth with the back of his hand.

He wiped the blood off that was still flowing from the beatings he had been on the receiving end of previously, and exhaled deeply. From the rumbling sky came the feeling of scorching heat and extreme cold, each no less threatening than the other.

Just the thought of those tingling sensations being directed at his comrades was enough to numb his entire body.

However—

Garfiel: “That’s only for now.”

If he did not focus on the enemy in front of himself, there would not be a next time, nor would there be a time after next time.

Olbart: “Now that it’s two-on-one, it’s gettin’ annoyin’.”

Garfiel took a deep breath, and Olbart sighed at the situation. And at the old man’s words, Garfiel frowned with an “Oh?”.

What’s so strange ’bout it? It may be annoyin’ to him, but it’s been two-on-one since Roswaal showed up.

Garfiel: “Ya got just two opponents, so there’s no point in complainin’ ’bout it now bein’ two-on-one.”

In response to the doubt Garfiel harbored, Olbart bent his neck.

The monstruous old man grabbed his long white eyebrows with his index and thumb, and then declared,

Olbart: “It’s only two-on-one if the two are cooperatin’… What was just a couple of cheeky young’uns ’til now’s started bein’ a pain in the rump.”

Garfiel: “Then, how ’bout ya surrender, since you’re at a disadvantage?”

Olbart: “Kakakakka! Both fleein’ from the enemy and abandonin’ the battle are the worst kinda disgrace, worse than dyin’ a dog’s death. In addition, well…”

Garfiel: “In addition?”

Flicking one of the eyebrows he was pinching, Olbart flashed his teeth.

Contrary to his smile, the small old man overflowed with a tremendous amount of fighting spirit, and then,

Olbart: “—Even this bein’ a two-on-one ain’t a reason ta give up, for me.”

Instantly, the old man's smile faded, his figure evaporating from view once more.

When it came to the Vicious Old Man, left and right were not the only options, the sky and the underground were as well. Garfiel's nerves were on edge, due to the prospect of those possibilities—

Roswaal: "—The inseam."

Prompted by the voice he heard, Garfiel pulled back half a step.

A moment later, his eyes met those of the old man, rising up from under the earth,

Garfiel: "ORAAAAAAA!!"

A blow with his all was swung downwards, as Olbart jumped up to his knees.

Garfiel's fists slammed into the old man's knees, which were like withered branches.

Shockwaves rippled through the ground, causing it to crack, terrific destruction spreading.

With that first direct hit, a battle to the death with the shinobi had begun, in the truest sense.

2

—The hero arriving late.

Although a cliché of that sort did exist, Subaru was not too fond of it.

Strictly speaking, it was correct to say that he had come to think "Don't screw with me" in the process of all the many events he had experienced in this other world he had been transported to.

Subaru: "If this were a game, a manga, or within a story, that would've perhaps been fine."

Events in a fictional world needed developments of the sort, to liven things up.

However, for Subaru, who actually did live within this turbulent world, the sooner a hero, a heroic figure, a person with abilities beyond human understanding appeared on the scene to resolve a conflict, the better.

It was best to have the hero show up as quickly as possible, so that he would swiftly solve the root of the problem.

If people were to say something along the lines of the story not being interesting, that was fine, as it was not a story. Discussing whether it was fun or not could only be done when having the presence of mind to do so.

Subaru: "And yet, it's pathetic that we're the last to arrive!"

Swaying on the back of a Galewind Horse of bright red coloration, Subaru looked to the front in regret.

This battle all around the Imperial Capital would decide the fate of the Empire. It was hard to say who he ought to complain to, but for now, Subaru seethed with rage at himself for being a slowpoke.

Even though he thought about how much he hated it, he ended up turning out the same as a hero who arrived late.

After all—

Subaru: "Isn't this exactly like those heroes with a tendency for being late, being the ones most eager to achieve the best possible outcome in a fight?!"

The reason why late-arriving heroes put in so much work was surely because the heroes themselves were extremely regretful for being late.

The hero was painfully aware that his friends, the people he had to protect, or someone he did not want to lose, had been through hard and painful times in the meanwhile. That was why.

For the first time, Subaru learned the justification for the heroes' struggles, which stemmed from not being able to make it to the battlefield in time from the beginning. —They too, had blamed themselves.

Subaru: "Let's do this, Beatrice!"

Beatrice: "El Shamak!"

With this understanding, the shadow magic of the little girl clinging onto Subaru's chest was unleashed—black clouds appeared out of thin air, one after another, shrouding the heads of the Imperial Soldiers just lined up in a row.

Depriving people of their vision to diminish their fighting strength —was not the case here. The soldiers with these shrouded heads were not being robbed of their sight, but rather, of their fighting strength itself.

Pleiades Battalion: "OOOHH, RAAAH—!!"

The line of Imperial Soldiers with shrouded heads being frozen in place had been crushed by the first attack of the Pleiades Battalion, which had come rushing in with their outlandish fighting style.

Rendering them powerless in order to take away their weapons and armor, as well as breaking any of their limbs so that they could be left behind, had been the fundamental tactic of the Battalion, reflecting the fighting style and intentions of their boss, Subaru.

It was not like he was hell-bent on not killing anyone.

Still, he had opted for a method that would result in as few human deaths as possible. Doing so was the best for Natsuki Subaru's peace of mind, and at the same time—

Subaru: "—I hate the Vollachian Empire."

It was his revenge; revenge against the Empire that forced people to fight and kill each other, just in order to be a warrior.

???: "Schwartz, we are approaching the city walls. We need to decide whether to continue into the Imperial Capital, or to head to the other bastions to provide support."

The ground quaking, was due to Gustav Morello going on a rampage, with his extraordinarily gigantic build.

Having been appointed as the Governor of the Gladiator Island, he was the indispensable brain of the Pleiades Battalion, displaying tremendous combat power as he brandished his four thick, strong arms, keeping the approaching Imperial Soldiers at bay.

While Gustav's powerful upper limbs struck soldiers, sending them flying over his head effortlessly, Subaru saw the walls looming before him—the walls of the fourth bastion of the star-shaped ramparts that surrounded the city.

Conquering each bastion was the condition for gaining the upper hand in this siege.

Subaru: "What do you think, Gustav-san?! How are we supposed to attack?!"

Gustav: "It is not for I, in my capacity, to decide. I shall just present the possible advantages and disadvantages. —If we enter the Imperial Capital and reach the Crystal Palace, we can accelerate the conclusion of the battle. If we go to the other bastions to provide support, we can reduce the casualties on both sides with the help of our main force. That is all."

Subaru: "How troubling! How troubling, but…"

While Gustav was dependable in keeping his cool even in the midst of a fight, Subaru did regard his personality as horrible, since Gustav never helped him make decisions in these situations.

Yet, though he would present Subaru the possibilities, he would never force him to choose.

It was precisely because Gustav abided by that tenet that the Pleiades Battalion had remained united until now, rather than collapsing.

If there was one more reason for Gustav's attitude, and for the Battalion to be this united—

Subaru: "Gustav-san! Take the flagbearer Hiain and half of everyone to support the other battles! Weitz! Take the other half and hold this position! I'll leave it to you!"

As Subaru had been entrusted with making the decisions on the spot, he had to exercise it properly.

Gustav: "—I, as the official, acknowledge those orders."

Hiain: "I'm on it, bro! We're all in this boat together!"

Weitz: "Of course we're in the same boat, lizard…! Since it's your request, I'm gonna listen…"

Hearing Subaru's decision, everyone who had been called upon replied, one after the other.

He had made the extravagant decision to take both of the options presented by Gustav. Even so, that would have to be done by dividing the forces to each battlefield, but—

Subaru: "—If it's us, then we can do it!"

One could easily see how the enthusiasm of the members of the squadron heightened further at Subaru's declaration.

And that was precisely why they were comrades with whom he had fought together ever since that hellish island, making their way over here.

Idra: "Schwartz, what should we do?!"

Subaru: "It's a no-brainer! We're going to make a grand entry through the wall!"

Idra questioned him, as he held the reins of the Galewind Horse, galloping along with Subaru.

Subaru answered the obvious question cheerfully, as he pointed to the ramparts in front of him. Then, with his eyes fixed on the imposing wall, he opened his mouth and declared,

Subaru: “Destroy it, Tanza! I’m counting on you!”

Tanza: “—Schwartz-sama, you sure are a smooth talker.”

Receiving Subaru’s shout of encouragement, a small shadow agilely jumped out from right beside him.

Lifting the hem of her kimono, and kicking off the ground in a dash as she headed to the ramparts, was Tanza. She had ended up working with Subaru through a strange quirk of fate, and was an indispensable member of the Pleiades Battalion.

To be precise, the reason for that was—because she was the strongest attacker in the Pleiades Battalion.

Tanza: “—Haa!!”

Flying like a bullet, Tanza spun in midair, and following that the geta she wore on her feet pierced the ramparts.

One moment later, the robust rampart had been shattered, Tanza’s figure running through it. The shockwave created a crack in the fourth bastion of the city walls, fissures spreading across its entirety.

Subaru: “GogogogoGOOOO—!!”

Everyone: “OHHHH—!!”

Then, with Subaru’s order, the Pleiades Battalion crashed right where Tanza had struck the first blow, with its full momentum.

It no longer was an attack by an individual member of the Battalion, but a blow from the individual living entity that was the Pleiades Battalion. An attack that even the walls of the Imperial Capital of Lupugana, boasted for their robustness, were unable to resist even briefly.

Subaru: “…”

There was a thunderous roar, a terrific plume of dust enveloped them, and then, the ramparts were opened via brute force.

Seeing this overwhelming spectacle, Subaru performed a fist pump, while Beatrice in his arms opened her round eyes wide.

Beatrice: “For that wall to be so easily… That’s too absurd, I suppose…”

Tanza: “—That is the Pleiades Battalion.”

Descending from amidst the dust as to respond to Beatrice’s horrified mutter, came Tanza.

Dusting off her kimono, she was the sort of girl whose facial expression would barely ever stir; however, on this occasion, she seemed to be just a little proud of herself.

Even though she did not show much camaraderie, she had recognized herself as a member of the Pleiades Battalion. Otherwise, she would not have been affected by the “Power of Unity”.

However, Beatrice did not seem to like Tanza’s attitude.

Beatrice: “You have an impudent expression on your face, in fact…!”

Tanza: “Even if you call it impudent, this is the face I was born with.”

Beatrice: “Facial expressions are different, I suppose! They can be changed, in fact.”

Louis: “Uhh! Ahh, uhh!”

Looking down at the clearly aloof Tanza, Beatrice, who was on horseback, had her face flush. Then, as if taking Beatrice’s side, Louis, who had been clinging to Subaru’s back, also began to make a fuss.

To the frenzied girls, Subaru raised his voice with a “Waitwait, calm down!”, before continuing,

Subaru: “Don’t fight! We’re a team! Comrades! A Unit!”

Beatrice: “Younit…?”

Tanza: “Understood, Schwartz-sama.”

Beatrice: “Grrrrr, I suppose.”

Beatrice cocked her head in confusion at the unfamiliar echo, whereas Tanza bowed, as it was a familiar one.

Knowledge of Gladiator Island was the difference between those reactions, but Subaru’s lips curved as the atmosphere seemed to become more and more like a spark for Beatrice’s anger.

However, rather than Subaru moving to mediate there—

???: “Damn you, prepare yourselves—!”

Subaru: “Eh?”

A lone Imperial Soldier, creeping up amidst the dust created by the collapsed walls, raised his sword, training it on Subaru riding atop horseback.

Even if it was hard to believe, to this enemy soldier before them it was clear that Subaru was the leader of this group. It was the way of the Empire to not underestimate children, even if they did not know any better.

Therefore, the soldier’s sword veered not from its aim, and was driven into Subaru—

Louis: “Uau!”

In an instant, the force hugging Subaru from behind became stronger, and his vision changed in a flash.

What had occurred was plain and simple, in the blink of an eye, the Galewind Horse had moved—No, it had teleported away from the spot it had been standing just before.

Idra: “Wh-What…? Uurf…”

The sudden teleportation caused Idra, the holder of the reins, to swoon, involuntarily coming to vomit, his internal organs upset. Subaru also felt like his body remembered this sensation, that of the unusual power Louis at his back possessed.

Then—

Beatrice: “Shamak.”

Imperial Soldier: “Wha-?! Ku… Guah?!”

With a brief chant from Beatrice the Imperial Soldier was covered by a cloud, and a fluid kick from Tanza swept the legs of the stunned Imperial Soldier in splendid fashion, knocking them down onto the ground, lost of consciousness.

After this momentary display of teamwork, the two who achieved it exchanged glances from on and off the horse,

Tanza: “Excellent work.”

Beatrice: “You too, your moves weren’t bad, in fact.”

Thus, the tense atmosphere that had prevailed earlier completely changed, as they acknowledged each other.

Subaru: “Well, it’s good to see you little girls warming up to each other… By the way, Louis! Don’t do that so suddenly, you’ve turned Idra’s stomach inside out! Even though it helped a lot!”

Louis: “Ahhh, uh!”

Subaru: “Hmmm, good answer! Idra, take a deep breath! This is the first time that happens but maybe not the last.”

Idra: “I-I’ll try my best…”

With the power of Louis’s teleport, at least one unforeseen accident had been averted.

If push came to shove, Subaru would not hesitate to make use of it, no matter how much Idra would be about to throw up.

Subaru: “Not like I could handle two or three in a row to begin with… Gustav-san! Hiain! Weitz!”

At the call of the reinvigorated Subaru, the faces in front of the collapsed wall looked back at him. One-by-one, they looked into the eyes of that familiar face with a firm gaze.

Subaru: “I’m counting on all of you!”

Gustav: “I will, in my capacity, fulfill my duties. You ought to do likewise.”

Hiain: “Let’s get it! Time for the triumphant return of the Pleiades Battalion in its full and imposing force!”

Weitz: “Schwartz, we’ll defend this place to the last… Go take that throne…!”

Gustav’s group headed off to another battlefield, Weitz’s group stopped to defend the collapsed walls; and as Subaru left his dependable men to their respective posts, he poked Idra in the chest with the back of his head.

As he got headbutted, Idra looked like he was holding Subaru in his arms as he rode the Galewind Horse,

Idra: “Well, we got in. Looks like we’re the first ones.”

Laughing bravely, Idra rode the Galewind Horse over the wreckage of the city walls and into the inner city. While swaying to and fro’ on the same horse, Subaru also entered the Imperial Capital of Lupugana.

The cityscape of the Imperial Capital hidden within the high walls could not be seen in its entirety from the outside, but it was a methodical, orderly, and disciplined arrangement of buildings.

Subaru: “The city’s representative must be a nervous wreck to build it like this.”

If the person in question had been listening, they might have argued how impossible it was for them to be responsible for adding on to a city that was built hundreds of years ago.

So, having stated this one-sided impression, the Pleiades Battalion surged into the Imperial Capital.

Their goal was—

Beatrice: “Subaru! What should we do, I suppose?!”

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama, what shall we do?”

Louis: “Uau! Au, aa, uhh?!”

Subaru: “Of course, it’s obvious! Head straight to the Crystal Palace of the Imperial Capital! Let’s rub this warm welcome straight into the pompous face of His Excellency the Emperor!”

Subaru, having been asked this question by all the girls at once, responded to them collectively.

Beatrice, Tanza, and even Louis all nodded in reply to Subaru’s answer, but only Idra, who was forced to be close to all of them, muttered quietly,

Idra: “On the battlefield with four children in tow… I guess I didn’t have the talent of a warrior after all.”

Indeed, that was a fitting thought for a miller.

3

—And, concurrent with the Pleiades Battalion led by Natsuki Subaru breaching the city walls, being the first to finally enter the Imperial Capital of Lupugana.

???: “Surely, I had not expected you to be so dogged.”

Groups of rebels were besieging the Imperial Capital in their plans to overthrow the very foundations of the Empire—And the fixed destination for all of them, expending their lives for the sake of reaching it, was the Crystal Palace.

The throne room was located in the most elevated, most prestigious room in the castle. With the national banner of a wolf pierced by swords hoisted on the wall behind it, and a blood-red carpet laid out before it, present there was the throne upon which all the authority of this Empire was concentrated; and upon it, the Emperor sat.

Young, intelligent, and as ruthlessly beautiful as a finely sharpened blade, the Emperor did not change his complexion even as the masses came flocking in, their swords pointed at his throat.

Despite what he himself had stated, the situation nevertheless surpassed his expectations.

Even though—

???: "Out of the countless threads you have laid out, up to which layer were you referring by that?"

???: "…"

As this was the throne room, those words were too irreverent to be uttered to the Emperor who was seated on his throne.

However, there was neither a loyal retainer to condemn that insolent man, nor were there any soldiers to behead him, and the room echoed with the sound of the intruder's presumptuous footsteps on the carpet.

There was also another inscrutable thing, within the vacant throne room.

Supposing others were present in the room, they would have frowned upon this fact. —Or perhaps, they could not even have frowned.

Because in order to recognize that fact, one would need to have sufficient reason to break through the cognitive block.

A gift had once been presented to an ancient Emperor, by a tribe he had shared a friendship with.

A mask that took after the Oni Clan, a clan created for the sake of killing the most terrifying existences in the world, making those gazing upon it to avert their eyes in fear of what laid on the other side of the mask.

Therefore, it was not easy to recognize that the tone of voice of the person wearing the oni mask was exactly the same as that of the Emperor.

And so, a presence had made its appearance before the Emperor Vincent Vollachia, bearing the same tone of voice as the Emperor, striding proudly and fearlessly through the throne room as if it were his own.

That presence was—

Vincent: “Unsurprisingly, you are emotionless to the very core. — Even when you look up from below at the throne you were ousted from like this.”

Alas, it was the triumphant return of the rightful Emperor, who’d had no recourse but to abandon his throne before.

Chapter 106:
Bastions in Chaos (III)

1

When Berstetz Fondalfon made his return to the throne room, noticing something strange, he came to find that the door to the most venerable room in the Crystal Palace was firmly closed.

The word “closed” did not simply refer to the mere opening or closing of the door.

In this case, “closed” literally meant that the door was completely sealed off from the outside world. It was a manifestation of the intention of the master of the Palace, the intention to never let anyone else enter.

However—

???: “—In this case, I wonder whiiich~ of the two Emperors’ intentions is more appropriate to keep in mind for this, Prime Minister-sama?”

Berstetz came to a stop, narrowing his already thread-like eyes even further to the utmost, due to the clownish manner of the delicate man that was stretching out his arms and standing in front of the closed door.

The man standing there with a faint smile on his face was an exception of some sort, being allowed to enter and leave the Crystal Palace as he pleased because of his Stargazer peculiarity, making him an unpredictable entity who had obtained the position of being neither friend nor foe.

Berstetz: “Ubilk-dono, regarding the throne room…”

Ubilk: “I’m not gonna leave you high and dry, so I’ll tell you the truth. His Excellency the Emperor is present. Both the real and the fake, so they shooould~ get their face-to-face meeting.”

Berstetz: “…Incomprehensible.”

Even though he had an inkling, Berstetz chose to respond like this as he placed his hand on his chin.

Exactly as he had mouthed, it was incomprehensible to him, and there was no doubt that the situation was difficult for him to just accept. At Berstetz’s reaction, Ubilk tilted his head, saying “Incomprehensible?”,

Ubilk: “What’s so hard to accept? Are you wondering how the real Emperor was brought here? If that’s the case, I was guided by the whispers of the stars…”

Berstetz: “Even on the battlefield, you can manage to walk down a path that is free from falling arrows. Even if soldiers are slashing at each other in close quarters, you are able to step through without a splatter of blood reaching you, let alone their sword blows, correct?”

Ubilk: “Yeah, that’s hooow~ it is. But that’s not all.”

With a smirk Ubilk nodded, making no pretense of hiding anything.

As ridiculous as it sounded, Berstetz had been witness to Ubilk’s abnormal abilities with his own eyes.

Ubilk had once leisurely walked through a literal rainstorm of projectiles and a forest of swords without suffering a single scratch. Ubilk claimed to follow the whisperings of the stars, but Berstetz could not determine whether him possessing superhuman fighting skills was true or false.

If one thing could be said for certain, then it was that he was enveloped by a power beyond human understanding, be it the whispering of the stars or Ubilk’s own abilities.

And because he was so useful, neither the real Vincent Vollachia nor the fake Vincent Vollachia had been willing to let go of Ubilk.

Everything was—

Berstetz: “So that you serve as a guiding light, for the purpose of preventing the Great Disaster.”

Ubilk: “Whaaat’s~ this, wasn’t it due to my own humanity being acknowledged?”

Berstetz: “If anyone was to be called forth to the Crystal Palace because of their humanity, it would be General First-Class Goz. Aside from him, everyone else would be called due to their abilities. I myself am no exception.”

From the perspective of running a nation, personal attachment was nothing more than the sound of insects flying, it ought be ignored.

That was Berstetz’s view, and it was almost certainly the same view held by both Vincent Vollachias.

It was not a question of good and bad, or likes and dislikes, but rather a topic that should be discussed from the perspective of necessity.

In that regard, Berstetz was only a necessary cogwheel at this point. If his position were to become unnecessary or worthless, he would have no qualms about being removed.

Ubilk should not deviate from his required role as well, regardless of his resolve.

Berstetz: “If you were aware of this, you would not have overlooked this plot of mine and His Excellency who sits on the throne now, would you?”

Ubilk: “Could it be that you consider my actions as betrayal? Thaaat’s~ complicated. After all, in order to betray, you gotta be trusted first. Or, do you trust me?”

Berstetz: “No, not at all.”

Ubilk: “That so? It hurts me to have that be said, but…”

Putting his hand on his forehead, Ubilk looked amused as he spoke of how much it had hurt him. Whether this was out of placidity or something else, Berstetz had never witnessed him failing to keep a straight expression.

He had never thought of this as unpleasant before, but at this moment, for the very first time, he considered him an eyesore.

The real Vincent Vollachia, who had been banished from the Crystal Palace, thus relinquishing of his title as Emperor—he had now been brought through the door, pushed into this decisive scene.

Ubilk: "Allow me to answer one question, Prime Minister-sama… I haven't changed my standpoint."

Berstetz: "—What standpoint, exactly?"

Berstetz inquired whether he purported to be a friend or foe. Upon hearing that, Ubilk put his hands together in front of his chest, making a sound that echoed through the air.

Ubilk: "Of course, my standpoint of wishing to avert the Great Disaster and maintain the peace and quiet of the Vollachian Empire."

Berstetz: "—. For that reason, the confrontation on the other side of this door is necessary?"

Ubilk: "Yes, that's right, that's right. Everything I do is for the sake of that. —The beating of my heart, the breathing that inflates and deflates my lungs, the flow of blood through my body, everything."

Berstetz: "…"

Berstetz remained silent in response to Ubilk continuing on, tapping on his own chest.

Ubilk's unchanging smile, unwavering demeanor, and somewhat devilish gaze seemed to be sane and serious to Berstetz's eyes.

He could not say for certain whether that sanity and seriousness was a peek into the other side of madness.

Berstetz: "—Your Excellency, what will you do?"

As Ubilk stood guarding the great door and the two Emperors faced each other on the other side of it—Berstetz muttered to himself, thinking of the person he had banished.

Berstetz did not care if he were to be beheaded, if his soul were to be lit ablaze, if he were subjected to any other kind of brutal execution.

If Vincent Vollachia, one of the wisest Emperors in the history of the Empire, truly wished to be Emperor, so be it.

Therefore—

2

???: “A man always quick to act, always light in words. I would not count on something of the ilk of the Stargazer, who placed his faith in the skies above.”

???: “Firstly, I expect no sort of loyalty from that thing. If hierarchy were to be established based on loyalty, Vollachia would not have been preserved as it is till the present day. But then again…”

???: “…”

???: “Had my ruin come as a result of being unable to question the upsides and downsides of the ambitions you have hidden, then one could easily say it is but natural that the prospect of me stepping through the Palace floor like this would be one so far off in the distance, now would it.”

Treading upon the blood-red carpet, Abel posed a question to the one before his eyes, the former’s gaze fixed on the latter, arms crossed.

There was no room for debate as to whose hand had aided Abel in this instance of arriving here. That man, who read through the peculiarities of that which was outside the norm, pouring heart and soul into realizing the wishes of the Observers, was without peer in regard to the act of treading the outside of the game board.

Much akin to a loose cannon. However, a cannon that could not be divested of its station, unless the conditions were to be met.

Identifying the conditions for forcefully divesting that loose cannon of its post had been a particularly difficult task to the extreme, being that making it stir was a double-edged sword. Yet, he had done it.

The fact that he was now once more setting foot on the throne room from which he had been ousted, was proof of that.

The scheming, the concealment up until this moment, it was no exaggeration to state that it had all been done in order to wrestle back this opportunity.

Abel: "…"

The face of the man sitting on the throne he had his eyes set on, the one to whom he was about to pose a question, was one Abel had seen many times.

His own face, it was. It went far beyond logic like mere intimate familiarity or whatnot.

It was a visage that to others would appear like that of Vincent Vollachia himself; however, to Abel, who had known the man who had mastered the art of disguising himself with that face for years, it appeared to be a poorly crafted mask.

A mask would remain a mask however, even if poorly crafted.

A mask over one's face concealed their true visage, accomplishing the role of covering up their real thoughts, making them invisible. Henceforth, Abel posed his questions not with his eyes, but with his words.

And in addition, he posed a straightforward, piercing question, one devoid of any smoke and mirrors.

Abel: "—Have your wishes in ousting me, thus joining Berstetz, come true?"

The query spoken by Abel, had anyone heard it, was one that would surely have caused outrage.

The aftermath of the banishment drama that had begun in a room in the Crystal Palace had already spread throughout the entirety of the Empire. Even now, Imperial Soldiers and rebels were clashing by the walls surrounding the Imperial Capital, their lives continuously being scattered to the wind.

The people living in the Imperial Capital, too, were entrusting their lives to the outcome.

Against this backdrop, Abel's question was the sort that could not escape being criticized as leisurely.

Still, Abel had voiced so. The rebel, who preferred not wasting a single thing, who had worked out so many wily schemes to get to this point, had voiced so. Because, it was necessary.

To determine what Abel—Nay, what the real Vincent Vollachia, ought to seek in the forthcoming dialogue with the fake Vincent Vollachia.

Finally, after pausing for a time too long to even be hesitation, yet too short to be dubbed contemplation—

Vincent: "—No, not yet. I have not yet obtained the result I seek."

In a voice imitative of the one that had cast the inquiry, thus was the answer from the false Emperor to the true Emperor.

Abel: "…"

For that reply, Abel likewise needed a moment of time.

He paused for a breath, putting neither hesitation nor contemplation betwixt.

And then—

Abel: "Have yet to obtain what you seek, is it?"

As that spilled from him, he closed both his eyes. —Going against the natural habit he had.

Never did Abel close both eyes simultaneously. He was forced to keep one eye open at all times, lest his preparations be too deficient as an Emperor who ruled his Empire lifeless after the blink of an eye.

The point here was not that for Abel, who by product of training and self-awareness was capable of keeping one eye open even when sleeping, his consciousness remaining half-awake, this marked the first time in several years in which darkness came as a result of closing both his eyes.

It was that by doing so, by possessing the very capability of doing so, Abel had made an assertion of his own intents.

In other words,

Abel: “That is deceit.”

From the moment he had set foot into the throne room, no anger, no disappointment had been present within Abel’s voice and gaze both. The same applied even when it came to being before the man who had performed an act of treachery, stabbing him in the back. His steely self-control had allowed him to do so.

Here, Abel’s voice, which had assiduously rejected all emotion, was for the first time laced with a tone.

A tone of disdain which he had stopped concealing, directed towards the person who had disguised himself in his own visage.

Vincent: “…”

With those words spoken, the false Emperor, warming his throne, kept his silence.

Silent, he kept. Though, it would have been somewhat helpful had his silence been out of trifling pride.

Abel: “Ousting myself from the throne, you removed that damned Goz from the equation as he had gained knowledge of the situation, schemed to anticipate and crush my plans after my escape, and took part in the destruction of the Demon City. The smoldering embers have spread to the entire nation, permitting that the bounds of the Imperial Capital, a place where rebels armed with their designs of insurrection have never been allowed to reach, would at last have their tainted, boorish feet enter it.”

Vincent: “Do you believe it would have not come to pass, had it been yourself on the throne?”

Abel: “To begin with, had I been on the throne, all this now would not have come to fruition. As a result, the conflagration you have brought upon has scorched the Empire. However.”

Thereupon cutting off his sentence, Abel extended his hand towards the oni mask that covered his face.

And then—

Abel: “—A way to immediately snuff out these flames exists.”

Having spoken so, he ripped off the mask affixed to his face, thus exposing his real face to the outside, within eyesight of the other person.

With his countenance looking down upon him and both of them alike in every way, like two peas in a pod, the two Emperors faced one another. Real and fake, a perfect mirror such that none would be able to detect discrepancies.

Abel: “…”

He was a wise man. Abel’s actions and words would have conveyed his intentions clearly.

With matters having come this far, he had sufficient understanding of his disadvantageous position, of the difficulty in fulfilling his plan. It was time for the irresistible waves of reason to sweep away the schemes that had been hatched.

If the obstacles they had set their eyes on, if the Great Disaster to be fought against were both the same, that would be only logical.

Henceforth—

Abel: “I shall—”

He was about to announce his intent to return to the place he was supposed to be.

He would issue a decree difficult to oppose, thus settling the battle initiated by foolish reasons.

And, it happened just prior to that.

Vincent: “—Your Excellency.”

That one expression, cut off the rest of Abel’s words.

It was an expression that ought not be stated, with that appearance, with that voice. Deprecating oneself and putting the one it was directed to at a higher standing, it was a stupid statement from someone who had lost awareness of his own position, which ought not happen.

The moment it was heard, Abel’s words were interrupted for a beat.

Perhaps, that was the second time Abel—No, Vincent Vollachia, had had his expectations betrayed in the Crystal Palace, a possibly fatal moment.

On the first occasion, he had been ousted from the throne. And now, on this second instance—

Vincent: “…”

Slipping into that momentary gap, the false Emperor rose from the throne.

Raising himself from his sitting position, the difference in their heights, which had been only that of one looking down on the other, once more increased for a smidgen. However, that notion vanished in a blink’s worth of time. No more did it matter.

The reason for that being—

Vincent: “—Your one lapse was in having a bird’s-eye view of the board.”

The figure informing him of this had closed the distance in the time of a sole breath, looming before Abel.

3

—Inside the Crystal Palace in the Imperial Capital of Lupugana, two Emperors, one true and one false, were within breathing range of each other.

At that very moment, various changes occurred simultaneously all over at the places the Imperial Capital was being laid under siege.

Each of them had been caused by different feelings and beliefs, but they all had just one thing in common.

That one thing, was that none of the changes occurring at these places had been desirable.

???: “—El Fula.”

Wielding a wand in their hand, they created a gust of wind in the parched air of the battlefield.

Normally, this magic would focus on slitting the opponent’s throat with precision and minimal effort. However, Ram had realized that this would not be effective against the enemy present upon this battlefield.

Forming a horde, stone golems were standing in her way as if they did not have a life of their own.

They had nothing akin to a self-consciousness, they attacked approaching objects mechanically, and although they were humanoid in shape, they lacked what one would call the vital points of the human body.

Whether their heads were removed, whether their limbs were severed, they attacked their enemies using the remaining parts of their body as weapons.

Therefore, Ram's signature tactics were ineffective.

But she could not just throw the towel like a genteel damsel who was completely incapable of doing anything on her own.

???: "Let loose—!"

In response to the glaring Ram who stepped towards the horde, a line of brown-skinned war maidens likewise pressed forward on the front line. The People of Shudraq fearlessly pushed onto the battlefield with their bows poised, their arrows drawn, their shots fired at the encroaching obstacles of stone.

Applying wind to each of their arrows, Ram attempted to rout the problem away by force.

The windborne arrows were vested with speed and rotation, and the moment one struck a stone golem, the arrowhead would emit a burst of wind with penetrating force such that it would pulverize the golem.

The arrow would continue with unrelenting force and pierce right into the stone golems behind it in a chain reaction, causing the same destruction and increasing the damage.

With just a single arrow fired, two to three stone golems would collapse as a result.

In addition to that—

Ram: "Fula."

The whispered, delicate chanting would create a wind of a different wavelength compared to the destructive wind, and blow the earth apart almost as if caressing it to scatter the stones it was composed of.

At once, the arrows that had dropped to ground after destroying the stone golems would whirl up, and thus make their return to the hands of the running Shudraqs, just to be nocked and released to then defeat the stone golems again. Again, and again.

Ram: “Fula, El Fula, Fula, El Fula.”

The alternate chanting, the rapid use of the magic in succession was like a delicate motion combining the selfsame system of the magic.

The People of Shudraq, who had nothing but respect and admiration for the Vollachian Empire that had mastered the art of warfare at the expense of developing magic, could not comprehend this extraordinary skill.

It was like she was threading a needle with her eyes closed and her hands tied. Or perhaps, it was a superhuman feat, akin to putting the selfsame thread through countless lumen simultaneously.

Because of the arrival of Ram and her highly effective wind magic on the battlefield, the Shudraq’s breakthrough power had swelled severalfold.

The female warriors, having been left behind due to Zikr Osman’s faith and sentimentality, were using their consequently preserved strength to crush the forces of the nigh-impenetrable third bastion.

???: “Ahh, how pleasant! To be able to shock both friend and foe!”

With glossy black daggers gripped in her hands, Mizelda said this as she raced across the battlefield.

Although she boasted a prosthetic leg in place of the one she had lost, her unfaltering gait gave no sense of deficiency. Mizelda overtook the frontline of the battlefield, the place where the arrows of her allies flew towards mercilessly and, swinging her daggers in both hands, she tore apart the stone golems like a storm, opening a hole in their group.

???: “Sister will dodge them on her own! Don’t stop! Let Ram’s wind carry our spirit!”

Taritta, herself armed with a bow on hand, fired three shots in the same time the other Shudraqians took to fire one, and with her eyes fixed on the back of her older sister rampaging on the front lines, she made an appeal to her brethren.

In accordance with that, as the arrows of the Shudraqians dealt a crushing blow to the group of stone golems, Zikr and the others who had picked their lives back up after they should have been thrown away, charged in to destroy their battle formation.

???: “Move, move, move! You small fry stone golems, you ain’t gonna take over this battlefield!”

Letting loose a vulgar voice at the head of the group, was a man with an elegant, flowing swordsmanship contrary to his apparent character. Bringing demise to several stone golems with one sweep of his swords, the man with an eyepatch leveled the battlefield in a single move.

If one went by what had been described so far, it was a war situation that could probably be labeled as overwhelming superiority.

However—

Zikr: “Pull back—!!”

Mounted on the back of a Galewind Horse with a beautiful coat, Zikr shouted, and the group running on the front lines immediately split up. Right after, a “wall” fell from overhead towards the center of that group.

A thunderous roar and violent tremor engulfed the land; without exaggeration, this phenomenon was like fighting a fort itself—such was the threat posed by Moguro Hagane, who had become one with the city wall, and which would not diminish no matter how many stone golems were chipped away.

Literally, with one swing of Moguro’s arm, their gains in the battle would be nullified in the blink of an eye.

Rather than seesawing evenly, the battle had been unfolding with one step forward, followed by two steps back.

But—

Ram: “—What?”

Ram, who had been concentrating on advancing forward onto the battlefield, as well as delivering arrows to the Shudraq and having their arrows pierce through the enemy, narrowed her light-crimson eyes and pondered the changes that had taken place.

It was only Ram at first who noticed the signs, but gradually, the change in the battlefield over the third bastion became one noticed by all.

A change, namely—

Jamal: "—Fuck you! Don't turn your back on your enemy! Are you even a General First-Class!"

Moguro Hagane, who had become a huge figure of unbelievable proportions, was struck by vulgar swearing hurled towards their back.

Yes, towards their back. —Moguro Hagane, had taken a giant step towards the Imperial Capital, turning their back on Ram, the Shudraqians, and the throngs of warriors they had encountered on the battlefield.

4

???: "It's no good! She won't wake up at all!"

Shaking her shoulders, shouting at her, and lightly tapping her cheeks did not awaken the limp dragonkin girl in her arms—Madelyn Eschart.

Emilia, after retrieving her from the snow, where she lay motionless, was trying her best to make the hectic battlefield a little better, but she was unable to get any results.

Emilia: "Mezoreia is…"

Emilia, her silver hair fluttering in the cold wind, held Madelyn, still locked in a stubborn sleep with her eyes closed; and once she turned around, she came to witness a battle between two extraordinary beings taking place.

On one corner was a Dragon clad in clouds, separated from ordinary creatures by the sheer nature of their very existence.

And, while the blue-haired boy on the other corner would perhaps look and talk like a small child, he was flying around the battlefield with a fighting style that would put any adult or Emilia to shame.

The battle between the Cloud Dragon Mezoreia and Cecilus Segmunt was now a legendary one.

Cecilus: “Shuwa!”

With the soles of his zori on the icy wall without any apparent aid, Cecilus’s body ran through the air at an angle parallel to the ground.

Without anything to hold on to, the human body would normally fall to the ground. Yet, Cecilus ignored such natural principles and made use of the towering ice wall as a foothold from which to approach the Dragon above Emilia’s head.

Taking one last powerful step, Cecilus’s body caught up to Mezoreia with lightning speed.

Mezoreia flapped its wings and tried to keep its distance, but it was at the mercy of his maneuvers, being hit by the slash of an ice sword to its exposed neck without being able to defend itself, once Cecilus had avoided its swinging claws.

Mezoreia: “—GYAHHHHHHH!”

From the Dragon came a cry of anguish that was quite unlike a Dragon, and then came a shrill noise of the ice sword shattering against the Dragon’s neck, conveying its demise through sound to those around in the environs. Was it the robustness of the Cloud Dragon’s scales that had shattered the ice blade, which had been hardened like iron, or was it the speed with which Cecilus had swung the sword that had made it shatter?

In any case, the disintegrated sword of frost had served its purpose, and Cecilus was defenseless in midair—

Cecilus: “I’m spoiled for choice with this many options to pick and choose from! There are no limits, no petty tricks!”

The voice, its high pitch comparable to the sound of the sword of frost shattering, was an indication of Cecilus’s natural voice and excitement.

Cecilus’s words, spun in a pleasant tone, were followed by a second sound of ice shattering—no, not a second, but a third and a fourth in succession.

Cecilus: “Ch-ch-ch-ch-ch!”

Not unprotected in midair as one might have thought, Cecilus sprung upwards, without fail.

He pulled out a myriad of weapons of frost created by Emilia—weapons created via Icicle Line, one after another, which he had shoved into his clothes.

From his back, his waist, and between his thighs, the items Cecilus had picked up while catching up with Mezoreia, who was escaping into the sky, were swung one after another by Cecilus’s hands while in the air, peeling off Mezoreia’s scales.

Swords, axes, spears, and hammers of ice wreaked havoc, and the Cloud Dragon was put on the defensive due to the violent assault. Or perhaps, even that expression was a misnomer seeing as Mezoreia was unable to defend itself.

Emilia: “Wow…”

Her eyes were able to follow him because she was far away in a spot where she would not get caught in the crossfire, but if Cecilus were to move right in front of her, Emilia would probably not be able to follow his afterimage.

Considering that level of surprise, then perhaps Cecilus would be able to defeat Mezoreia even if Madelyn did not wake up.

Though her heart was not in a state that she would not feel frustration at that.

Emilia: “You’re fighting for someone you care about too, aren’t you?”

Emilia lowered the corners of her amethyst eyes at the sight of Madelyn’s unconscious sleeping face.

Madelyn had always been hostile, angry, and unwilling to listen, but Emilia did not know her well enough to dislike her for it.

What she did know, was that the reason she was angry laid in her feelings for someone she cared about, and Mezoreia had come down to help Madelyn in this way.

If Mezoreia were to die while she was asleep, just what would happen to Madelyn’s mind?

Emilia: “Madelyn, wake up! Wake up already!”

They were in the middle of a battle. Moreover, Cecilus had saved Emilia’s life from peril.

It was impossible for her to be so selfish as to ask him to back off or not to kill Mezoreia.

Therefore, that only left Madelyn. Only she could end the battle without Madelyn herself or Mezoreia, who had come to her aid, losing their lives.

Cecilus: “Oh, I see! So the wing’s joint is weak!”

Despite Emilia’s hopes and considerations, the analysis from Cecilus, who had been cheering for battle, proceeded.

Looking back at her memories of fighting Volcanica, at the time Emilia had had no idea of what the weaknesses of the creature known as a Dragon would be, but Cecilus seemed to be different.

The blow of Cecilus’s sword had met the joint of one of the Dragon’s wings as he had stated, while he continued to fight in the air using the Dragon’s body as a foothold, not falling out of the air, and in the meantime, he dodged the attacks from its wings and tail, performed in an attempt to fling him away.

In an instant, the nature of the scream changed, and blue blood dripped onto the snow-white decoration.

It was proof that a slash had skewered the sturdy scales, reaching beyond them.

Cecilus: “If a Dragon were to lose its wings, what would make it different from a ground dragon? Have you had a chance to learn how to fight while on the ground in your long lifetime?”

He was not mocking it, nor was he belittling it.

Cecilus’s tone of voice had remained the same; if anything, he was saying it to hype himself up. But even Emilia was convinced that what he had been saying was about to become a reality.

If Emilia had been convinced, Mezoreia, who was being directly swung at by the sword, ought to have been convinced of it even further.

A Dragon having its wings cut off, thus falling to the ground.

Emilia, who had no wings and was not a Dragon, could not imagine how unbearable that would be. But she could see how it would take away Mezoreia’s chances of winning.

It was hard to believe that Cecilus, who could not be kept up with even in the sky, could be kept up with on the ground.

Mezoreia: “—This dragon is…!!”

A moment later, Mezoreia’s low voice boomed, trying to sweep aside the impending humiliation.

Kicking Mezoreia in the flank, Cecilus leapt up and his slash drew near the root of its wing. Just before it hit, it did a spinning drill and flipped from down facing to upward facing while airborne.

Looking up towards Cecilus aiming for the wing, Mezoreia’s draconic arm reared up in front of the former.

A human body could easily be torn apart if it were hooked in either the claws or the scales.

Even Cecilus, who could move fast, was no exception to this, making Emilia come near to shrieking. But Emilia's scream was directed not at Cecilus's death, but at something else.

Cecilus: “Hoowee, that was a close one!”

The swinging arm of the Dragon had certainly caught Cecilus in midair.

However, Cecilus aligned his sole against the Dragon arm striking at him, allowing him to run alongside the arm while it unleashed its ferocious blow.

Launching himself using the tip of the Dragon's claw as footing, he started running near the Dragon's elbow.

He had been able to convert a strike that would have blown his body apart upon impact into an opportunity to run and jump out of the way; it was his ridiculous foot speed that had allowed him to escape an otherwise certain death.

Cecilus: “Beauty-san!”

Emilia: “Ah, yes!”

Being called a beauty, Emilia was at loss for any words of modesty in response.

Instinctively sensing why she was being called upon, Emilia leapt away from the tip of the Dragon's arm, and then cast a new weapon of frost in Cecilus's vicinity, who had landed on the ice wall.

Cecilus quickly picked it up, turning to Mezoreia, who was about to give chase, and bent his knees in preparation for another leap.

The distance that had opened between them could be closed in the blink of an eye, but in there laid Mezoreia's chance for victory, as right now no attacks from Cecilus could reach it.

Naturally, Mezoreia would put all its energy into this. —At least, that was what ought to have happened.

Cecilus: “Hm?”

Getting ready for an immediate attack, Cecilus tilted his head while he crouched down.

Despite his tacit understanding and despite the fact that he was giving up the first move, the expected attack did not arrive.

Emilia seemingly harbored the same doubts as Cecilus. Before she even knew it, Emilia understood that this was the final frontier between over victory or defeat as she was pushed to her limits.

And yet, Mezoreia did not move. On the contrary—

Mezoreia: “…”

Immediately before this moment, Mezoreia had tried to swing its Dragon arm to obliterate Cecilus. Having stopped moving in midair, its white eyeballs with pupils and irises black stared at a single point.

At Cecilus, who had tried to put it on the ropes, making it taste humiliation—that was not so.

Aside from Cecilus, who was posturing on the ice wall, and Emilia, who was cradling Madelyn, there was another presence that Mezoreia could not ignore on this white-dyed battlefield.

Mezoreia, still as if it had been struck dead, raised its gaze even higher into the sky.

It stopped and gazed towards a point in the sky much, much higher than its own.

Emilia: “…Is there, something flying?”

Emilia followed Mezoreia’s gaze and focused on the ashen, snow-laden clouds.

Even higher in the sky than where Mezoreia’s huge body floated, there was a shadow of something flying just barely visible to Emilia's eyesight.

The only options Emilia could consider flying in the sky were the Dragon in front of her, the flying dragons that flew in numbers across the battlefield, or Roswaal getting sidetracked during his travel time.

And—

Mezoreia: "—It can't be."

Mezoreia flapped its wings as it muttered this.

The body of the idling Dragon resumed its movement. However, it was not a move to unleash a decisive attack like it was supposed to do just prior,

Cecilus: "Whaaa?! Heyheyhey, wait, wait, this can't be happening?!"

As soon as Cecilus observed its movement, his expression trembled with the greatest of shock.

Until then, his expression had seemed to be happy regardless of what was done to him, but now his eyes darted about quickly in bewilderment. That was only natural. At a time he had expected his opponent to rush in, Mezoreia turning its back like that was quite unbelievable.

Mezoreia: "…"

Not heeding Cecilus's voice, Mezoreia flapped its wings and tore through the sky.

Once the Dragon had decided to fly and started moving, its speed was extraordinary, turning back and rising into the sky so swiftly, that it was like an arrow being shot with full force.

Cecilus: "You think I'll let you do that!!"

In order to prevent the airborne Dragon from escaping, Cecilus bent his knees not for a counterattack, but to explosively unleash the strength required from his legs to chase after the flying Dragon.

The small body made an incredible thrust, causing the thick, huge ice wall to fissure and crumble starting from his sole, as Cecilus's body leapt away.

Flying in a straight line, Cecilus's figure surpassed the Dragon's speed, homing in on its wings. He drew closer. Closer, closer, and closer, until—

Cecilus: "—Ah, damn, looks like I can't reach."

No matter how fast Cecilus was on his feet and how far he could leap, he was incapable of erasing the distance to the Dragon which was already in the sky.

Alas, Cecilus's body could not keep up with Mezoreia, the latter pulling away, and once he hit the apex of his leap, he lost his momentum, dropping back down. Had the Cloud Dragon shifted its aim and gone for Cecilus, even he would perhaps have been in danger.

But Mezoreia did not retaliate. Instead, it rose steadily and ripped through the sky.

And—

Cecilus: "—It's heading into the Imperial Capital?"

5

—Changes had taken place in multiple places in the siege of the Imperial Capital, amongst them, the developments that had occurred in two places were of particular importance.

At the same time these had transpired outside of the Crystal Palace, within the throne room, two Emperors met face-to-face, their gazes so close together that their eyelashes could have touched those of the other.

Abel: "…"

The rebel ringleader, Abel, had been a move behind; however, he switched gears on the spot.

He leaned forwards as to play his best move—or rather, to play the next best move he had, against the person donning a visage identical to his own, who had approached his immediate front before his eyes.

Abel: "—Hk."

A sharp strike was delivered to his left clavicle, his thoughts soldering red from the severe blow.

Taking a look, he saw that what had struck the base of his neck was being held by the hand of the one right before him, an iron fan—the preferred weapon of the person wearing the same visage as his own, an object he knew from sight.

Handling that weapon took something special, and he had harbored doubts of just how powerful a thing it was, many times in the past.

Abel: "…"

The fact that he had attained the answer to his past questions, the pain penetrating his brain, he consciously excised them both from his thoughts.

Picture in your mind the priorities of the present moment and immediately formulate measures to address them. Taking into consideration a combination of feasibility and effectiveness, alongside your injuries, arrange the priorities.

But—

Vincent: "This is not a board game. This is why you are not worthy of being a warrior, it feeeels."

Faster than Abel was able to choose from the myriad of options that had emerged within his head, the warrior displayed the techniques that had permeated his body, his veins, rather than his head.

Mercilessly twisting Abel's arm, he snatched away the thing which was held by the now-weakened limb, and in the moment following that, Abel's vision was covered in dark for an instant.

Abel: "…"

Has he crushed my eyes, or have my eyes been blinded in some way?

A moment's pondering, negated by the fact that his blocked vision returned immediately afterwards. If so, what had been the true meaning behind the other party's actions? And coincident with those thoughts, he realized.

—That again, his own face was covered with something that felt familiar.

Abel: "You—"

And thus his lips, moving faster than his hands or feet, let out a sound as he glared into the black eyes before him.

With those words from Abel, on whom he had put the oni mask that had previously been snatched away, the false Emperor before him—No, Chisha Gold, twisted his lips, the lips on a face that was not his own.

Recognizing that upon his own face was an awfully decadent smile, Abel's eyes widened.

A moment later—

Abel: "…"

—A white light came rushing in, piercing a wall of the throne room, and perforated the chest of the one at the apex of the Empire, Vincent Vollachia, from behind.

Chapter 107:
Chisha Gold

1

The oni mask did not obscure just how the man's face stiffened as he was pushed away.

An expression of that sort would easily lend itself to misinterpretations. Despite his cleverness, or perhaps because of it, the Emperor would often abridge his statements, even when unfavorable; and his countenance was no less taciturn than his mouth.

If there was somebody able to seize the truth behind that expression, it was probably himself, who had spent several years at the Emperor's side.

Chisha: "Or, perhaps—"

Were it the Emperor's little sister, whom he held sacred in every sense of the word, at this place, would she figure it out as well?

In any case, it was pointless to make comparisons now.

After all, in this minuscule, isolated place in time and space, nobody was present other than himself.

2

???: "Chesha Trim, would you be willing to die for my sake?"

Upon their first meeting, having disclosed his name, he received a question treating matters of life and death in exchange.

Chesha, fourteen years old at the time, had believed himself to be mature for his age, but meeting that boy, two years younger than himself, forced him to reconsider.

What the youngster before his eyes exhibited was true maturity, whereas his own case was mere conceit.

???: “…”

Once the question came out, the boy awaited with his black eyes fixed on him.

His hair and irises, both black as if imbued with shadows, were considered uncommon traits, even in a land so rich in racial diversity like the Vollachian Empire. Although Chesha’s eye color differed, he likewise had been born with black hair. For that, he would often become the subject of mockery, so he could sympathize with the boy.

Or maybe not. It felt nothing short of insolent to think that they shared something to sympathize over.

Physical characteristics, however rare they may be, amounted to trifles when compared with what actually made the boy especial. Superficial coincidences aside, the child’s very origins elevated him far from ordinary folks, and that refined, precocious attitude was also a product of his upbringing.

He stood in a unique position, where he must grow this way, lest he would not survive.

To be precise—

Chesha: "—Prince Vincent Abellux."

His name was accompanied by a title, his role acquired at birth.

This black-haired youngster, Vincent, was the son of Drizen Vollachia, sovereign of the Vollachian Empire, and therefore one of several children bestowed with the possibility to one day stand at the pinnacle of the Empire.

He had more than twenty siblings possessed of similar qualifications, but that did not devalue his noble blood in the slightest.

Regardless—

Chesha: "…"

Chesha reminisced on his course of action heretofore, seeking to solve one doubt: how had he ended up encountering such an outstanding lad, not to mention riding the same carriage as him?

All had begun with a simple act of assistance.

He had come across a stranded carriage, its wheel stuck in a ditch on the highway. Pushing and pulling, many attempts were being made in vain to release it. He approached the scene and freed the lurched carriage from the deep ditch by inserting a board and utilizing it as a lever.

Much to his surprise, that vehicle belonged to the lord of the Abellux Domain, and aboard sat that individual famous for his rise to headship through the Miracle of Abellux, Vincent Abellux himself.

"Miracle of Abellux" was the name given to a rebellion that had begun with a vassal of the House of Abellux betraying their long-lasting patronage by conspiring with another family. But albeit their tactics had been brilliant, they had suffered defeat at the hands of an eleven-year-old commander. In the end, all conspirators had been massacred.

His household's members and soldiers having given in to distress and disarray, Vincent, whose name remained unsung back then despite his princely status, had devised a plan for them without delay. By exercising his prodigious finesse, he had thus achieved victory.

The vassal behind the rebellion had underestimated Vincent as an enemy, judging him to be an easy prey whom they could behead for a trophy. Those presumptuous delusions had become the cause of their demise.

Facts came to light, as did apocryphal rumors, giving him quite the outrageous reputation.

As a civilian of the Empire, Chesha heard the stories as well, but he had never pondered the odds of getting involved with him—yet here he was, by a twist of fate, in front of the person dreaded by the public.

And then, that had been cast towards him. —If he was willing to die for him or not.

Chesha: "…"

Whatever had he aimed to earn with that inquiry, Chesha could not discern.

In the first place, he had been invited aboard for two reasons: to thank him for releasing the wheel, and to bring him into the mansion.

Of course, Chesha held not the right to decline. No matter how much he resented this, his opinion carried nonexistent weight.

Hence, he had resigned a fraction of his time and stepped into the carriage. Once he had set foot onto the vehicle, Vincent had begun the interrogation.

It was inappropriate to start that interaction with an acquaintance who only helped him resume his journey. But this boy was a prince by birth, thereby accustomed to having people heed his wishes.

Notwithstanding, he bore a relatively recent record of annihilating an entire family and its retainers, out of fury towards the vassal who had committed treachery against him. Nobody would blame a twelve-year-old for developing an extreme distrust of people after an experience of that ilk.

Perhaps his mind would not be at ease unless he managed to confirm everybody’s allegiance, even that of a casual passerby.

The silence had already extended for ten-odd seconds, more than enough for it to turn disrespectful.

The issue at hand concerned a figure not simply superior, but supreme. Still, he understood what answer he ought to give, and what answer the other wanted.

Obviously, the other wished to hear a single phrase, “I would”.

This was a test for Chesha, as a citizen of the Empire. Either he pledged unwavering loyalty and eternal servitude to the prince, or he would incur the forenamed’s wrath, knowing that within him, potentially, lay the seed of a tyrant.

Enduring the improper distance between them, Chesha bowed his head deeply before the possible sovereign—

Chesha: “—My apologies, but I am afraid I would nooot.”

And so, he spoke the one reply that he should have avoided.

Chesha: “…”

His head still lowered, Chesha cursed himself for committing such a gaffe on impulse. Moreover, he felt the urge to grab his own head in embarrassment at his lack of self-control.

With his impatient nature as the reason, he had gotten in trouble with a powerful individual and ended up banished from his hometown. Time after time he would tell himself that his behavior could ruin his prospects, yet he had never been able to mend it.

And at last, he had addressed the worst possible answer to the worst possible addressee.

He would soon perish in one of the most stupid ways: falling victim to his own idiocy.

However, he could not act brazen enough as to give the desired answer in the desired manner to a question about death, much less with the overbearing tone in which it was delivered.

If his heart were to shatter, were his pride to be extinguished, then, as far as he was concerned, even if he still breathed, he was dead too.

He did not cherish Vollachia's praxis, but he was nonetheless a man of the Empire.

Therefore, he held no regrets towards his response.

If anything, he felt sorry for taking his pitiful frustrations out on a boy who had merely sought something that would assuage his own trust issues.

At least, that guilt would disappear once the rageful blade unattached his head from his shoulders—

Vincent: "Perfect. Maintain that outlook, for you shall be serving me hereafter."

Chesha: "—. I will?"

Vincent: "Do not end your affirmations in a rising tone. Otherwise, they shall come across as interrogative."

Chesha: "I did not err, the pronunciation was intentional… So, does this mean you will not execute me?"

Vincent: "Seconds after securing you? That would be senseless."

Closing one eye, Vincent scowled with a hint of annoyance.

Receiving a meaningless question irritated him, yet he did not protest when denied a vow of loyalty. Chesha found that strange, but he kept his composure and reexamined the situation.

For some reason, Vincent seemed to overlook Chesha's irreverence.

Far from that, he seemed to consider recruiting Chesha as his retainer.

Chesha: "I apologize, but I cannot wrap my head around this. Is it a hobby of yours to jest with those you intend to kill before taking their lives?"

Vincent: "Do tell, why do you insist that I kill you with such obstinacy? That is far more incomprehensible, I dare say."

Chesha: "I do not mean to offend, but it is well-known that you do not take kindly to those who oppose you."

By the time he realized that his comment was again of the undue sort, it had already escaped his mouth.

However, since he had succeeded in committing one transgression, Chesha shifted into a bolder stance, ready to find out how many more he could commit before reaching the threshold, putting his life on the line.

Like whenever he enjoyed a book, cultivated new knowledge, or proved his theories through execution, he was determined to decipher the prince's unrevealed thoughts.

If he died in consequence, so be it.

While Chesha surrendered almost his whole future to embark on this reckless undertaking, Vincent, now aware of the context, nodded with an "Ah" before continuing,

Vincent: "If you are referring to the latest rebellion, I made an example of that family because it was necessary. You ought to collar any wight who might be aspiring to attempt the same deed. Fear produces the best effects for that."

Chesha: “And is that also why you had the instigating servant’s advance troops dismembered and put on display on the road?”

Vincent: “If a life must be ended, then you had better exploit it to the utmost first. People should die in an efficient manner.”

So replied Vincent, his chin resting on his hand, as he sat inside the carriage. His austere, realistic perspective left Chesha at a loss for words.

What Chesha had mentioned was the first and main counterattack that Vincent had launched in order to suppress the rebellion—slaughtering the enemy vanguard, plus the barbarous profanation of their cadavers.

After enduring the anguish of being mangled while alive, their corpses had been lined up within the battlefield. Hearsay had spread that getting caught would result in similar punishment, and thus, the other traitors had chosen to disregard their agreement with the primary conspirator and relegate themselves to the role of spectators.

Alone, bereft of any escape route, said conspirator had gone to confront Vincent, only to end up ensnared in the latter’s sanguinary stratagem. They, alongside their relatives and retainers, had perished savoring the same hell that the other soldiers had.

Naturally, with the emergence of this information, the public had reshaped its notion of Vincent Abellux into that of a brutal, bloodthirsty prince. But—

Chesha: “—Are those rumors of your own creation, perhaps?”

Vincent: “If my sole presence elicits dread in you, I can at least say that their purpose has not gone unfulfilled.”

Chesha: “Hahaaa, good to hear, I guess…”

More and more did Vincent’s thoughts sound too impressive for ones that had sprung from a twelve-year-old.

On the other hand, although Vincent had pardoned his irreverence, Chesha did not expect to be capable of performing whatever mission Vincent had in store for him.

Vincent: “What exact purpose do I expect from you, you wonder?”

As if he had read Chesha’s mind, Vincent delivered the next question.

It was vaguer than the previous one, and moreover, it required Chesha to unravel the mystery with his own brain. Surely, there was an arduous mission meant for him, but he needed to pinpoint what it entailed.

A very challenging problem, indeed.

Born into the Imperial Family, Vincent was destined to take part in the Empire’s imminent rite sooner or later. What purpose could he find in a mere plebeian like Chesha?

Chesha: “I doubt I can do much more than help you pull a jammed wheel ouuut.”

Vincent: “And that shall benefit me.”

Chesha: “Hoho, I assume you are planning to go get stuck in a ditch quite often from here on out, if you require my strength that much?”

He felt almost inclined to congratulate himself for reaching a new milestone in disrespect with that aggravating quip.

Yet, upon hearing it, no part of Vincent’s countenance twitched.

Vincent: “Correct. The road I am traversing is fraught with ditches, and I cannot avoid all of them. However, I cannot stay in a ditch waiting for the issue to solve itself; otherwise, death shall come for me. And that means, I shall need a method to pull myself out whenever I get stuck.”

Chesha: “…Before we continue, are you sure this discussion is still about wheels?”

Vincent: “I have not belied the subject once ever since we began talking.”

The bizarre reply made a chill run down Chesha’s body, not because he felt threatened, but because he finally assimilated that his conversational partner was a phenomenon.

In addition, the aforementioned phenomenon held him in oddly high regard.

Chesha concluded so from the fact that, despite the irreverent attitude adopted, the rude replies given, the impolite retorts uttered, Vincent appeared uninterested in killing him.

Was that proof of Chesha’s merits, or proof of Vincent’s principles?

Regardless, he would never have imagined that a day this eventful awaited him upon waking up this morning in his shabby lodging.

Vincent: “…”

While Chesha remained silent, Vincent looked at him, head poised on his hand, one eye shut.

That gesture gave off the odious impression that he was basking in the satisfaction of shutting his opponent’s mouth. Losing all strength to resist, Chesha turned his disgruntled gaze towards Vincent, and arrived at a sudden realization.

Chesha: “I see, you never close both eyes at the same timeee.”

Vincent: “There you have it.”

Chesha: “Huh?”

Putting a hand to his pointed chin, Vincent replied to Chesha’s offhand observation with a nod.

Unable to grasp the meaning of that sentence, Chesha tilted his head.

Vincent: “If you wish to know the reason as to why I did not execute you, therein it lies."

Vincent's explanation was short, but his mien indicated that he deemed it complete. The moment Chesha noticed that, everything fell into place.

The precocious boy put many adults to shame with the schemes that he concocted, and with the unbridled way he wielded his talent as a Prince of Vollachia, yet nonetheless he was twelve years of age.

—If he were not, he would have already learned how naive it was to expect those around him to possess wisdom matching his own.

3

—Chisha Gold.

That was the new name conferred on Chesha Trim upon entering the Abellux estate as Vincent's recruit.

Chisha: "Since my family is back at my hometown, I would rather keep my name from becoming well-known to avoid causing them unwarranted trouble. Though, I suppose you would find it easy to murder all my worries away…"

Vincent: "You seem very obstinate in portraying me as a bloodthirsty brute. Are you also responsible for the sobriquet of Sanguinary Prince that people call me in the streets, perchance?"

Chisha: "Why, I believed that was another one of your fear-based strategies. I have heard accounts about parents mentioning you in cautionary tales for children, as in, "Behave, or else the Sanguinary Prince will come"."

Vincent: "Come, but for what purpose, according to them? As if I would bother."

Chisha: "Oh, but what if you show up and hire them against their will, like you did to me? Pretty frightening, if you ask me."

Vincent: "I advise you to watch your tongue, or I might end up justifying those fabrications with your blood."

Conversations with Vincent blurred the line between seriousness and jest.

Should the need arise, Vincent would pay with somebody else's life, no hesitation. He would never do that if unnecessary, though. He handled human lives the same way he handled money or goods.

When consorting with him, one could not ignore that he regarded whichever as limited resources with equal value.

The reason for the name change to Chisha Gold matched his statement; he was worried that somebody in his hometown would turn indignant at the news of Chesha Trim's promotion and involve his family in retaliation.

Notwithstanding, even if his family were harmed, he would not go out of his way to help.

Albeit callous in the eyes of some, a certain distance existed between him and his kin, and just with that he was being compassionate enough towards the relatives who had neglected him in the most critical of moments.

Funnily or not, the surname Gold pertained to a family exterminated by Vincent as a punishment for treachery.

Perhaps it had been a little jape of revenge from Vincent towards Chesha's rudeness; but that aside, it misled the public into rumoring that he had spared one descendant of Gold, while condemning them to endure the humiliation of failing to escape his control, which reinforced his standing as the Sanguinary Prince.

As for the first name, Vincent had suggested a single letter modification, so it sounded similar to his original one, just like Chesha had hoped. Since he had had no motive to complain, and no malice seemed to be implicated this time, albeit adjudging it frugal, he had approved the idea.

Despite everything, after a lifetime of being ostracized for his proclivity to theory over practice and for his social clumsiness, Chesha's rebirth as Chisha brought a welcome change.

Never could his remote village have provided him with so many books and activities to indulge in.

He had gotten the opportunity to resettle, far from those who had unjustly scorned him for being inept at tilling or harvesting the fields, and he would never trade that for anything in the world.

However—

Vincent: “We are in the next ditch, Chisha. Prove your utility.”

Every time, those words warned him that Vincent was about to harass him over a problem leagues above stuck carriage wheels, initiating a discussion that would persist until a solution sprang.

Vincent’s drive made him a force to be reckoned with.

In what way did Vincent view and perceive the world, tackling various issues at the same time, with consistent focus as well, despite bearing two eyes and one head like ordinary men?

Sure enough, a lord held the duty to involve himself in his domain’s matters, but it was an unscrupulous thing to anticipate from a twelve-year-old, even more so when he lacked adult figures to rely on.

But any commiserations that an outsider might direct at Vincent would disperse upon being faced with his performance.

Being associated with Vincent demanded a vast array of specialized knowledge from Chisha, which granted him no time to loiter.

As soon as they solved an issue, a new one appeared; sometimes, another issue would surge while the current one was still at hand. And while he racked his brains over those different problems at once, the Abellux Domain continued evolving.

The quality of life improved, while the residents’ initial apprehension transformed into commendation.

Vincent had the ability to turn terror into admiration and servitude into adoration, both well-deserved.

He did not bother with others’ opinions of himself, and therein lay the reason for which he held that aforementioned ability.

Vincent: “Chisha, you have educated yourself well on the flood control system. Now, I must discharge that incompetent administrator from his post. I shall adduce his charges of embezzlement heretofore and have him decapitated.”

Chisha: “In my humble opinion, such charges do not warrant a decapitation.”

Vincent: “So, he earned his profits due to effort? Is that what you are telling me?”

Chisha: “…This topic is a little too far from my specialtyyy.”

Vincent: “If what he has pocketed were offset by his work, I would ignore him. Otherwise, retribution is due. By refusing to correct his misconduct, even after repeated warnings, he himself depleted the allowances that I conceded.”

Beneath Vincent’s drastic initiative and resoluteness hid his fastidious side, contrasting with his expectations towards others and, as an underlying factor, inclining him to criticize those unable to meet them as slothful.

Vincent was no meritocrat, though; he did not disrelish people solely for being incompetent.

Were he to put his own doctrine into words—

Vincent: “—One ought to perform the vocation that corresponds with their caliber.”

He wished for everybody to live with all their might, no respite.

Knowing this, the boy named Vincent Abellux and the circumstances behind his fastidious perfectionism seemed to start shining in a different light.

Unbelievable as it might sound, Vincent did not possess unwavering confidence, nor did he take pride in himself.

For more, he constantly hungered.

For more, he constantly lamented.

For more, he constantly struggled.

At the core of Vincent's being lay a driving force. It was not gratitude towards the princely status bestowed upon him, but a furious determination to fulfill the role that said status demanded.

And the motive that made Vincent harbor these fierce sentiments was—

Vincent: "—There is one despicable man, Stride Vollachia his name."

Some time after joining Vincent, Chisha found himself frowning at the words that his master had spoken.

Luckily, or rather, proving Vincent's discretion accurate, Chisha indeed had somewhat of a talent to pull wheels out of ditches, thanks to which he had managed to not lose his job.

That said, he had been steered down this path little-by-little.

His position's pros and cons had revealed themselves one after the other, tipping the scales in a way that made it difficult to tell which side weighed more.

And Chisha was still in the process of pondering that, when, for the first time, Vincent exposed something unrelated to work, something stemming from somewhere in his heart.

Chisha: "Stride Vollachia, is it? Pardon my ignorance, my studies must still be insufficient, considering I have never heard that name."

Vincent: "No, your studies are not to blame. In fact, your life would be at risk if you knew that information. That man's existence has been long erased from the records of the Imperial Family of Vollachia, after all."

Chisha: “…”

Chisha thought about how Vincent might have just endangered him by disclosing that so incautiously, but, given his position, it was difficult to interrupt the latter once he had started talking.

Besides, he was interested in that man who had been ousted from the Imperial Family.

Chisha: “Well, ousting someone of the Imperial Family does not sound possible. Even if it were done, their blood still flows through their veins. Plus, that is what the Imperial Selection Ceremony exists for.”

The Imperial Selection Ceremony, held in order to determine the Empire’s next sovereign.

This ceremony, a competition where the Emperor’s offspring would kill each other to reach the pinnacle of the Empire, was a prime representation of the nation’s essence, with origins dating back to its very founding.

The last one standing would be crowned Emperor.

And as the Emperor of Vollachia, they could seize the Yang Sword, emblem of their reign.

Chisha: “Though, in theory, one can live without fighting if they renounce their right to inherit the throne, or so I have heard.”

Vincent: “A mere prevarication. That is fantasy, naught but a tool to cull beforehand those who, despite possessing the right to power, lack the courage to triumph in the ceremony. And that is to say, your concerns are correct.”

Chisha: “So ousting a member of the Imperial Family is unthinkable.”

Vincent: “Yet, Stride Vollachia suffered that unthinkable penalty, and was therefore disengaged from the Ceremony’s ensemble. Even so, given that the Imperial Selection Ceremony progressed without delay afterwards, that wight most likely did not elude death.”

Vincent's gaze, colder than usual, was tinged with deep disdain towards the man in question.

Stride Vollachia, the man who had been removed from his position as part of Vollachia's Imperial Family, erased from the historical records—He was of the exact sort that evoked Vincent's fury.

To those who did not perform their assigned role nor exert their natural abilities to the fullest, he offered zero clemency.

Chisha: "…Even so, how come you know of his existence, when no one is supposed to, Vincent-sama? Did a chatty gentleman of high status tell you, perhaps?"

Vincent: "Never afraid to step over the hierarchical ditch with your insolence, are you? —The journal."

Chisha: "Journal?"

Vincent: "Yes, Stride Vollachia's journal. It was concealed in the Crystal Palace's library, where I found it. Shame that such an intriguing tome turned out to be full of unreadable, nonsensical inscriptions."

The way Vincent curled his lips in displeasure was a gesture of unmitigated loathing.

Vincent generally took a tolerant approach when digesting and evaluating things. He went through said thought process with impressive speed, which, for better or for worse, almost made it seem like he judged without prior deliberation. It would strike anybody as unusual to witness that same Vincent displaying such negative emotions.

Chisha: "And what was inscribed in it? Would you ever show it to me?"

The topic piqued his interest.

Nevertheless, deep down, he knew well that his attention was digressing from the journal's contents, towards discovering what put his troublesome master in so much anguish.

Aware of Chisha's inner thoughts or not, Vincent closed one of his black eyes and, piercing him with his gaze, spoke.

Vincent: "I shall not show it to you. —Not that anthology of worthless delusions about the Observers and things akin."

4

???: "Well, no offense but you seem like quite the overthinker, always looking for reasons and whatnot. Chesha, I don't think normal people make schemes while frowning as intensely as His Excellency or you do."

Chisha: "—First, please mind your words; second, my name is Chisha."

???: "Oh my, I'm so sorry! What could be more discourteous than mistaking a fellow actor's name?! I'll reflect very deeply about what I've done. Chisha, Chisha, Chisha, Chisha, Chisha, Chisha, Chisha!"

Chisha: "…"

With energy and nothing else worth describing, the blue-haired boy kept talking.

The boy, named Cecilus Segmunt, was of the same class as Chisha years ago: somebody whom Vincent had sensed potential in and thus picked up.

If one possessed great skill and the readiness to exercise it, Vincent would engage them.

Vincent questioned neither one's origins nor status. While these ideals had earned him some detractors, none of them could deny that the Abellux Domain was blooming further every year, under his rule.

Notwithstanding, albeit prestigious origins were not a requisite, the gap in educational level made it too difficult to find another civil officer of excellence among commoners. Hence, Chisha's workload never abated.

However—

Cecilus: “A good military officer needs nothing but pure brawn. Though, in my case, as an actor, I need to have splendor as well, but I’m already one of a kind in both of those aspects anyway!”

Chisha: “You sound rather confident… But you probably do have enough strength to vaunt. Which, ironically, makes it more bothersome, but that is no concern of mineee.”

The energetic little child—perhaps he was too old to be called that, being six or seven years younger than Chisha; although doing so felt natural for the latter, now eighteen years of age. Unfortunately, Cecilus lacked the characteristic cuteness of boys his age.

And not due to his appearance or conduct, but due to that skill of which he boasted with pride.

Chisha: “…”

After joining the House of Abellux, Chisha himself had trained in martial arts, for bodyguarding and self-defense purposes, but he was aware that his proficiency was that of an average man. And rather than moving his own body, he was suited to moving crowds.

Of course, he ought to forget said pretext and avoid neglecting his training henceforth if he wished to improve. But even in the eyes of someone as inexperienced as himself, Chisha could tell that Cecilus’s power surpassed the norm by far.

Chisha had already met a phenomenon of ingenuity.

Yet, he had never imagined that he would come across a phenomenon of armed might like this one.

Chisha: “The more I know, the less I understand what Vincent-sama… What His Excellency wishes.”

Cecilus: “Oh, there you go again with the deep thoughts, Chisha. But don’t fret, I’m here to give you the answer. That’s what people call… foreshadowing, yes!”

So declared Cecilus, thrusting a nimble finger towards Chisha, whose eyes widened.

Looking at the other's reaction, Cecilus retracted his finger and continued.

Cecilus: "Wait, you've never heard the term? Let me explain then. Foreshadowing means showing important information in a story, but disguising it in a…"

Chisha: "Yes, I know the definition of "foreshadowing". The expression you see now on my face means that I cannot fathom why you brought that up."

Cecilus: "Ah, I see! It's pretty simple, just so you know. I'm telling you, what you and His Excellency have in common is that constant urge to find the meaning of every little thing."

Amused, Cecilus brought his hands together in front of his chest as he laughed. Then, he broke the clap and revolved on the spot, pointing with open hands at all that surrounded him.

Cecilus: "Alright, let's suppose that there's indeed meaning to everything! Which is to say, all that stuff you can't explain at this moment serves as foreshadowing for what's to unfold sooner or later in this plot! Heart-pounding, isn't it?!"

Chisha: "The expenditure of unaccounted funds and the amassing of goods of dubious provenance do not quite strike me as foreshadowing for the future, but as evidence of prevalent corruption and bribery."

Cecilus: "Do you hear yourself?! What you just mentioned is stuff you can solve in the present! Meanwhile, I'm talking about that which you cannot. Come on, Chisha, I know you're so much smarter than this!"

Chisha: "…"

Bringing his spinning feet to an abrupt halt, Cecilus objected, brows furrowed in annoyance.

While it displeased him to see Cecilus annoyed at him without a clear motive, somehow, Chisha found a tiny scrap of salvation in those words.

As he toiled to satisfy the demands that Vincent had imposed on him along with his post, one doubt had lingered at the back of his mind: why had he been the one seized?

Years had elapsed, in which he had even gotten to know Vincent as a person, yet he still was unable to explain that.

Because that problem did not pertain to Vincent, but to Chisha himself.

Without an answer to cure his woes, remaining at Vincent's side had taken a heavy toll on his psyche, but now—

Chisha: "…If that is the case, could my presence itself be foreshadowing something, too?"

Cecilus: "Oh? You've already absorbed the knowledge, impressive. Well, with how intelligent you are, no wonder you learn so quickly! Now that deserves my absolute respect, I could never do the same!"

Chisha: "If you wish to show me respect, how about you start addressing me with an honorific? I am your senior, superior to you in both age and rank, am I not?"

Cecilus: "Awww, but addressing a friend with an honorific feels a tad too distant, don't you think? We're going to be on the same boat, now and for many days to come. So let's go ahead and throw all those pesky formalities out the window, shall we?!"

Chisha: "Friend…"

With those unreserved words, plus a pat to his shoulder, the boy left Chisha speechless.

While he was surprised at the familiarity with which the former could close the distance between them, too, the true shock had come when he realized that, in his path thus far, not once had somebody called him a friend.

In the few years since forsaking his hometown, being taken by Vincent, studying assiduously under the aforementioned, drudging away at work, he had not become close to anybody.

Of course, although there had been people who had appreciated him for business reasons, those did not count here.

Chisha: “…”

Cecilus: “What’s the matter? Hm, maybe you’re right, should I start with the honorific, then? Like in those stories where the distance keeps shrinking one step at a time, until the end, when the two realize their paths have crossed! That kinda development is charming in its own way, so I wouldn’t mind turning the rudder towards…”

Chisha: “No, you do not need to. —His Excellency is one who favors a job done with dispatch.”

It was not like he had grasped Cecilus’s drivel in its entirety, but if, in the end, they were going to arrive at that destination anyway, then he preferred to take the briefest route.

While deriding himself for harboring thoughts so deeply tainted by Vincent’s doctrine, Chisha chose not to negate Cecilus’s ideals and, instead, accept them.

Were he to mimic that man’s speech style—

Chisha: “I shall expect you to wield your power when necessary, for the sake of seeing His Excellency’s desires fulfilled. That, no doubt, is the reason why you were plucked…”

Cecilus: “That’s foreshadowing the role he’ll need me to carry out, right?! You can trust me, Chisha! I might be useless at anything that’s not fighting, but in battle, I won’t let anyone catch up with me!”

Chisha: “I look forward to that.”

The slender child puffed out his thin chest as he bragged about his hypothetical feats, but Chisha did not laugh at him.

In accordance with Vincent’s discretion, as well as his own, he would give Cecilus Segmunt a place corresponding with his caliber.

Moreover—

Chisha: “—I suppose, for now, I must await the day I will perform the function I foreshadow.”

Assimilating the role that his much younger friend had mentioned, Chisha whispered.

And as if fate had listened to him, the Imperial Selection Ceremony, involving Vincent Abellux, commenced around six months after this event.

5

With the death of the former Emperor, Drizen Vollachia, ensued the commencement of the Imperial Selection Ceremony.

Because of his indisputable talents, Vincent Abellux had been regarded as an enemy by his other siblings, being caught in a besiegement made up of concentrated attacks from the latter, in one opportunity.

However, as it turned out, Vincent lived up to his initial reputation and expectations, winning the Imperial Selection Ceremony with overwhelming strength.

Having vanquished all his siblings, having been adorned with the crown of blood of the Vollachian Empire, Vincent Abellux—No, the Seventy-Seventh Emperor, Vincent Vollachia, was born.

Part of the bloody path that Vincent had trod, part of the great river of blood that Vincent had pooled had perhaps been due, in part, to the contributions of Chisha and Cecilus, who had served as his subordinates.

However, in regards to this Imperial Selection Ceremony, the role that had been expected of Chisha, in the plan carried out for the sake of Vincent’s victory—had been something quite different from “freeing a wheel from a ditch”.

During the battle, Chisha's entrusted role had been to make the very last move on the board—

Chisha: "—I see your younger sister has escaped unharmed. She may have quite the fierce and uninhibited personality, but I am certain she understands her predicament. I believe things have been settled, for the time being."

It was in an office, namely a room within the Crystal Palace in the Imperial Capital of Lupugana.

In that room used by the Emperor, who stood at the top of the nation's politics, Chisha experienced having that familiar face regarding him back, a situation which would likely take him a while to deal with in this calm of a manner.

Even though the Emperor himself sat atop a chair of considerable authority, he showed no sign of breaking his usual demeanor. Even when assured that his victory in the Imperial Selection Ceremony was unshakeable, he did not even show a glimpse of a smile from a sense of accomplishment.

Never did Vincent smile. At least, not while passing as a prince or the Emperor.

When not playing as the prince, his lips would actually come apart and form a mischievous grin. However, the opportunities for that seemed like they would decrease significantly in comparison to then, as well.

He had become the Emperor. And thus, he would not permit a moment during which the Emperor was not the Emperor.

—No, he could spare a singular moment when that was not the case.

Chisha: "I could not believe my ears when you inquired about a way to save Prisca-sama."

Assuming that no one else was listening, Chisha spoke of the greatest secret of this iteration of the Vollachian Empire, one in which he was directly complicit.

Coinciding with the conclusion of the Imperial Selection Ceremony, the birth of a new Emperor was announced.

But the fact of the matter was that the Imperial Selection Ceremony, in which only the last of the Imperial Family would succeed to the throne, had not been carried out fully. —Two candidates had remained at the end.

These two, were Vincent Abellux and Prisca Benedict.

Prisca Benedict was described as a tragic princess who had gulped down a poisonous cup herself, losing her life.

In actuality, she had indeed drunk the poison, yet she had not lost her life.

She had not consumed the poison from a cup, instead having done so to save her squire, who had been so concerned for her master as to cling to the possibility of saving her life.

The venom had arrested Prisca's heart just long enough for everything to be concluded before it resumed beating anew.

The Imperial Selection Ceremony was over, Prisca Benedict had been interred in a tomb.

Vincent Abellux became Emperor, and Prisca Benedict assumed a different identity, a life not by that name—.

Chisha: "Supposing I were from a family that had served the Empire since ancient times, I might have had to admonish His Excellency for his outrageous wiiish. However, I hail from a family of commoners."

There was no basis for which prestige or tradition were to be appreciated in particular.

A certain amount of respect was to be given, their value was even to be acknowledged, but they ought not be misunderstood as something above all. In the Vollachian Empire, prestige and tradition were merely tolerated.

And that was why—

Chisha: “I had not the slightest bit of hesitation in partaking in this plan.”

Vincent: “…”

As the Emperor, Vincent, kept his silence, his innermost thoughts were perhaps unfathomable, but his actions were clear.

From the very start, amongst his many siblings, Prisca had always been special to Vincent. Although Prisca shone brightly in Chisha’s eyes because of her sagacity, it was not only because of her ability that Vincent had an eye on his younger sister, even though he was much older than her.

Despite being akin to the very picture of arrogance, Prisca respected Vincent and treated him truly as a blood-related elder brother.

Since the Imperial Selection Ceremony was the fate of the Imperial Family of Vollachia, they mutually acknowledged that they were not allowed to coexist, even with compromises—Until Vincent tore that fate apart by his own hand.

This came much to the delight of Chisha, and, above everything else, as a relief.

Vincent’s approach was to demonstrate his full capabilities within the position and role he had been bestowed with.

Vincent had not changed his ways from the day of their meeting until the present day. So, what kind of rationale could have possibly manifested from the fact that he, of all people, had chosen to permit Prisca’s survival?

If she were found alive, he himself would be endangered, and violence would break out whereupon the foundation of trust that the Emperor had built up in the Vollachian Empire could be lost.

As Emperor of Vollachia, what argument could he have that could justify it?

None. Of course he would have none. It had not been a decision made rationally.

It had been a desire born of emotion, a wish, a prayer.

Vincent Abellux had not wanted to kill his beloved sister.

Henceforth, Prisca Benedict had been kept alive, and Vincent wore a crown of falsehoods.

That had made Chisha happy.

Vincent had made the judgment that he wanted to bring Prisca back to life, rather than having her be kept alive, and so, he had asked Chisha for a way to get rid of the obstacle—the wheel stuck in the ditch.

Chisha: "Foreshadowing, was it?"

The nonsense Cecilus had uttered before the Imperial Selection Ceremony began crossed his mind.

Even something that in the moment did not make any sense, something which seemed meaningless, could be found out to possess meaning in the distant future. It could even be understood as having been present for that very purpose.

Like his own position and actions, as well as Chisha's, were perhaps the foundation for that future.

Chisha: "Well, it truly is annoying to admit that what Cecilus was talking about was pertinent, and I can see him getting overly enthused, so I will never tell him."

Vincent: "You have been this way for some time now, however I have been giving it some thought recently. Have you completely lost your color, and along with it, everything you have cultivated whilst in service of mineself?"

Chisha: "Surprisingly, I have been doing quite well, ever since I skirted the oblivion of death."

Knowing it was disrespectful, Chisha shrugged in front of Vincent. The Emperor changed his posture, but he would not rebuke the former for that unless it were done in public.

Having changed his manner of referring to himself, in Vincent's sable eyes, Chisha's reflection was as he had stated: completely white and bereft of color.

During the Imperial Selection Ceremony, after being nearly killed in a stand-off with an enemy and then returning from the brink of death, Chisha's black hair had been drained of all its color, turning completely white.

Since then, he had been wearing white, exactly the opposite of the black attire he had been donning, for some reason or another. Having even repainted the iron fan he used out of preference, he was thus completely white, his clothing uniform.

Of course, that had not been just for his amusement.

After being on the verge of death, and after losing his color, Chisha had awakened to a strange "ability". In order to handle this "ability" of painting himself in the color of others, he had to keep constant awareness.

A measure necessary, as to imply to himself that he was able to dye himself in any color.

In any case, the particulars of this "ability" had been kept from Vincent as well. He would not disclose it to anyone, naturally. Let alone to the loose-lipped Cecilus, or to others with whom he had little connection.

It was always a good idea to have an ace up one's sleeve, a trump card, or a secret move or two ready to go.

However—

Chisha: "If Your Excellency would finally release me for the great work I have done, then I believe no longer would there be any need for such machinations."

Vincent: “Suppose you were me, do you believe I would have you dismissed and alive, being aware of a fact of utmost importance, one that must be kept under wraps, in the Empire, and let you sleep peacefully at night?”

Chisha: “Developing a hypothetical within another hypothetical is somewhat bad manners, but I guess losing my head before I leave the castle is all I have in store right nooow.”

Vincent: “If you comprehend that, and if you value your life, then continue to serve me obediently. So long as you can prove that you are of use to me, I shall keep your head attached to your torso.”

As he declared so in an arrogant tone, Vincent rested his chin atop his hands, his elbows on the desk.

It was difficult to tell if either of them was serious in this frivolous exchange, but it was necessary for the Emperor, who did not spare any words for others, to let him speak out like this and make sure.

As per that exchange, Chisha Gold’s status and the role expected of him would go unaltered, though Vincent had become the Emperor, but—

Chisha: “—The state of the Sacred Vollachian Empire may or may not change.”

Already, the radiance of the Yang Sword, the absolute symbol of the Vollachian Empire, had been betrayed.

The Imperial Selection Ceremony, which had taken place ever since the Empire’s establishment, had been finalized in a way different to how it had been until now. Thus, what would normally follow the Ceremony would also change dramatically, in the future in quintessence.

Going down that path, prioritizing his own desires and opting to save his younger sister. Vincent did all that.

A new path would be opened, a path different from the one that had existed thus far. Chisha found himself slightly excited by that fact and the anticipation that came with it.

However, he would never display it in his expression, in his words, or in his attitude.

That was, because he was conscious of his friend’s, of Cecilus’s bad influence.

6

—The days passed by at a dizzying pace.

The former system of the Nine Divine Generals was restored, and the rankings of the Imperial Nobility were reset.

By purging those who had become a mere shell of their former selves and enjoyed high status because of history alone, the way of the Vollachian Empire, which flew the national flag of a “wolf pierced by swords”, was enforced inside and outside its borders without exception.

The way of doing things that had lasted till the previous Emperor, who had unthinkingly believed the unwritten rule that the strong were absolutely right and had let the Empire fall to ruin internally, was completely disavowed and the initial principle that the strong were to be respected was scrubbed out.

Those who sat on their bloodlines and family’s social standing were robbed of what had represented them, while those who had been waiting vigilantly for the opportunity to come around were given a chance to take on the challenge.

From the outside, Vincent Vollachia’s reign would have perhaps seemed no different from the history of the Empire thus far.

However, its reality was quite different. Those who knew what was going on behind the scenes experienced it firsthand.

Before long, it became something that many in the Empire, and even those outside in other countries, would likely come to know.

About the grandeur of Vincent Vollachia’s remaking and reforming of the Empire.

Useless conflicts would cease, and absurd fights to the death would no longer be applauded.

Proof of strength was no longer based on an individual's military prowess, and those who held ambitions not suitable for their stature would prove with their lives the difficulty of truly fulfilling those ambitions.

It was as if they were watching the process of completely painting over the criteria for what was "strong".

However—

???: "I'll be the First, Anya'll be the Second, and after Olbart joins, Chisha'll be the Fourth. His Excellency's choices aren't so bad, but Chisha, your complexion doesn't look so great, does it?"

Chisha: "I am the Fourth because otherwise it does not quite sit right for me. As Cecilus knows as well, I…"

Cecilus: "On physical strength, absolutely. Well, well, I'm not claiming to understand your feelings at all, but I guess this is the way the pecking order's determined in the world ruled by HisExcellency. It's hard to know which is which when there are mixed standards, but I'm feeling rather positive about it."

Vincent: "What is the reason for that? Aside from the fact that you are immovable as First."

Cecilus: "You took the words right out of my mouth! That you did is the biggest reason. But that's not the only one. I think having Chisha there will change your point of view."

Chisha: "Point of view… In other words, can I take that to mean that of one's way of fighting?"

Cecilus: "That's the gist. If me and you go at it, Chisha, you'll die in the blink of an eye for sure; however, what if you start with a thousand men? It might take a thousand seconds!"

Chisha: "I doubt it would. But I understand where you are coming from. While I gain a thousand seconds…"

Cecilus: “His Excellency, or someone else, can fulfill their purpose. My one greatest flaw, as the leading actor of this world, is that there’s only one of me in this world.”

There were those whose natures would not change at all, even if they gained a higher standing or if the way of the Empire changed.

However, Cecilus embodied that first principle. The reason for why was that, in the most ancient eras of the Vollachian Empire, “the strong” had garnered respect from everyone.

Everyone throughout the Empire knew that the one in question was unpopular, did not have a personality that would be liked by everyone, and did not have the character to be an example for anyone.

Still, should anyone be asked who the strongest in the Empire was, their chests would swell with pride as if they were tied to him personally.

And they would say that it was Cecilus Segmunt who was the most powerful being in the Empire.

The fact that Chisha was considered to be able to gain a thousand seconds if he were to gather people against Cecilus, had also been the reason why he had felt at ease with the position of Fourth of the Nine Divine Generals, going without firmly refusing it.

Hence, albeit he was of the opinion that he was being overvalued, Chisha had resigned himself to that position and role. For the most part, it worked well.

If there was any problem, it was—

???: “—My my, isn’t this luuucky~, General First-Class Chisha. Today’s fortunes are good, aren’t they?”

That person, who had started a conversation like that in a friendly manner, gave him a small smile.

When it seemed that everything was going favorably in the Empire, the ominous feeling he held towards the being that had introduced themself as a Stargazer, and whose comings and goings to the Crystal Palace were permitted, had felt like a black spot on his white body.

—The fact that the ominous feeling had been no mistake was proven years later.

Stargazer: "—The coming of the Great Disaster has been passed down in a commandment. It is regrettable, Your Excellency."

In the center of the Emperor's office, a man who by all rights should not have been there had announced that with an expression that felt like they were trying to say, "I am solemn from the bottom of my heart".

Chisha, who was present at the meeting, frowned at the words of Ubilk the Stargazer.

Chisha: "…The Great Disaster?"

It was something he did not recall having heard of, yet at the same time it sounded like something that could not possibly be a good sign.

It could also be called a mass-scale disaster. A prediction that it would be no ordinary calamity could be conjectured. However, what disturbed Chisha was the one addition that Ubilk had appended.

Just why was this man still saying things like it being a pity, and so forth, in regards to Vincent?

Chisha: "Ubilk-dono, I have no doubts about your authenticity as a Stargazer. On numerous occasions, you have been able to anticipate insurrections, cataclysms, and matters that were liable to occur within our country. In many cases, your prophecies have helped to limit the damage, Ubilk-dono."

Ubilk: "Pardon me, General First-Class Chisha. Hooowever~, I have one correction. I didn't make any prophecies. I'm only conveying the whispers of stars. I can't take credit for that."

Chisha: “…I respect your opinion, Ubilk-dono. Of course, we need to be prepared to deal with the Great Disaster, but may I ask what you expect to happen?”

Ubilk’s expression in response to Chisha, which had been cryptic until then, took the shape of a smile.

Chisha posed a question that needed to be asked while being suspicious of Ubilk, whose face was rich in expression, yet none of it heartfelt.

Ubilk’s role, who called himself a Stargazer, was similar to that of a faith healer or fortune teller.

However, the accuracy of Ubilk’s predictions was extraordinary, setting him apart from charlatans which felt like they used an element of theatrics to boost morale.

However, the drawback was that there were many details that were vague and somewhat circular in terms of how much they related to Ubilk’s personality.

But, as Chisha had also mentioned, there were actually a smattering of situations that had been triggered by Ubilk’s advocacy and resolved without major incident, regardless of whether they had been natural disasters or man-made.

It was because of Vincent’s appreciation of his abilities that he had been allowed free access to the Crystal Palace.

Chisha was not very keen on making heavy utilization of the unfathomable Ubilk, but Vincent’s stance was that those that could be used ought to be used.

For instance, that applied all the same in regards to giving positions to those who had served his brothers and sisters who had died in the Imperial Selection Ceremony. To have Berstetz Fondalfon at his side as the Prime Minister, even though he was the cream of the crop, was madness.

However, the Prime Minister was a man who held surprisingly strong faith in the Empire, and so long as Vincent continued to act like Vincent, there was no fear that Berstetz would bare his fangs against him.

In any case—

Chisha: “If you are going as far as to call it a Great Disaster, it must be incredibly difficult to avoid. Fortunately, both General First-Class Cecilus and Arakiya are available… Well, I can say that those two are typically available at all times because it’s dangerous to leave them apart…”

Ubilk: “—It’s ruin, General First-Class Chisha.”

Chisha: “Hmm?”

Recalling the faces of Cecilus and Arakiya, the First and the Second, who had a special reason to be there, Chisha was half-steeped in despondence when an unexpected sound brought him back to reality.

Further furrowing his brow, Chisha gave Ubilk another opportunity to speak.

In response, Ubilk prefaced his remarks with the words, “As I said”,

Ubilk: “What’s coming, General First-Class Chisha, is ruin. The Great Disaster is a means of ruin that’s gonna destroy the Vollachian Empire. It’s something that brings destruction beyond even the reach of the sun’s light. Alllthough~…”

Chisha: “…”

Ubilk: “From the outset, the Yang Sword cannot be used to its fullest potential. Riiight~?”

The moment Chisha, who had been standing behind Vincent, heard this, he jumped into the middle of the room, placing the iron fan he had pulled out to Ubilk’s neck, knocking him off balance.

And just like that, he would drive his iron fan into Ubilk’s head, who had fallen to the ground, sparing no quarter—

Vincent: “—Halt, Chisha. There is no point in killing him.”

Chisha: “But, Your Excellency. This thing knows of matters it has no right knowing. Surely, Your Excellency did not tell him?”

Vincent: “Nonsense. I would never let my mouth slip to a clown. Most likely, as you would put it, he learned it from the stars.”

Ubilk: “Ahaha, that’s correct. Say, I guess I was about to die just now?”

With a finger of his poking the iron fan that had been stopped just before striking him, Ubilk produced a half-smile.

Looking down at that, Chisha fretted for a moment as to whether he really should dispose of Ubilk, then let out a heavy sigh and took a big step back.

Chisha: “I apologize for my discourtesy. However, I would ask that you refrain from such careless remarks, as I cannot guarantee that my hand will be stayed again next time.”

Ubilk: “Ahem, how careless of me. As expected of one of the Nine Divine Generals, even though you’re referred to as the civil servant type, your skill is that of a warrior.”

Chisha: “No need for flattery. Rather—”

Cutting off there, Chisha averted his gaze from Ubilk and turned to look behind himself.

There, Vincent, in the same posture as when he had received the Stargazer, sat at the large desk where he did his work, and looked their way.

Faced with those black eyes, Chisha suddenly recalled how they had met.

When he had come face-to-face with Vincent for the first time, the two of them had been at a roughly similar distance from one another, inside the carriage.

Why was he suddenly recollecting that moment? Most likely, the feeling now was similar to the one he'd had at the time.

His state of mind equal to the one he'd had then, Chisha could not help but probe Vincent.

Chisha: "Your Excellency, you seem unsurprised by Ubilk-dono's prophecy from just now. May I inquire as to the true reason for that?"

Ubilk: "Ummm~, I don't do prophecies… Uh."

Chisha: "My apologies. However, I would advise you that there will not be a next time."

As Ubilk attempted to cut into the conversation uninvited, the iron fan grazed his cheek and pierced the wall. From his cheeks, which had suffered a slight cut, a drop of blood welled; Ubilk thus raised both his hands in a vow to remain silent.

Without even looking in his direction, Chisha stared at Vincent—Nay, Chisha glared at him.

To Chisha's discernment, Vincent closed a single eye, and stated,

Vincent: "The signs of the disaster have already been reported. The Observers have whispered that the forthcoming Great Disaster shall bring about the downfall of the Empire."

Chisha: "—Why did you not share it with me at the time… No."

Astonished by the contents of Vincent's speech, Chisha's tongue stopped just as he was about to argue. Shortly before, in the words that Vincent had uttered, he had sensed an indescribable dread.

Ruminating on what had caused that, Chisha widened his eyes slightly.

Chisha: "Your Excellency, if I have not misheard, who has given you that guidance? —The Observers, was it?"

A long time ago, many long years prior, he had heard of them from

Vincent on one occasion.

Stride Vollachia was a banished member of the Imperial Family, a man whom Vincent had designated as an abomination and a despicable existence, on whose journal that expression, “Observers”, had been noted down.

And now, Vincent had mouthed that expression. That too, was an expression connected to the Stargazer, Ubilk, an expression whose nature he had grasped since that time long ago.

Chisha: “Your Excellency, by Observers, do you mean the “stars” Ubilk-dono speaks of?”

Vincent: “…I share the same perception. What Ubilk has recited is a type of announcement, of what the Observers had peered at.”

Chisha: “—. So, do you believe that Stride Vollachia was a Stargazer as well?”

Vincent: “The likelihood of that is high, in my view. But, he differed from the others who proclaimed themselves to be Stargazers. Were you to analyze the contents of his journal, you would notice the hostility of Stride Vollachia towards the Observers.”

Chisha’s dissatisfaction with Vincent grew as the revelations unfolded.

Both before and after he had become Emperor, he had willingly burdened himself with an immense workload, yet he still had saddled himself with such troubles, which he had not shared with Chisha.

For the sake of keeping it hidden from Chisha, he had certainly gone to great lengths.

If he had that much effort to spare, he ought to have shared it from the beginning.

Ubilk: “Please calm down, General First-Class Chisha. His Excellency had his reasons for not discussing this with you. I respect that decision.”

Chisha: “I believe I advised you there would not be a next time.”

Ubilk: “I know, I know. Buuut~, if His Excellency has trouble speaking about the matter, I thought it’d be better if I did. That’s why I’m present together with General First-Class Chisha, isn’t that so?”

Still holding his hands up, Ubilk looked toward Vincent over Chisha’s shoulder.

It was irritating that he acted as if he understood Vincent’s thoughts, but Vincent did not refute Ubilk’s suggestion.

In that case, Chisha had no right to dismiss it either. Besides, there was a limit to how many concealments he could be saddled with.

Chisha: “I would recommend that you drop the pompous act and choose your next words carefully.”

Ubilk: “I appreciate your concern. Well then, I’ll inform you in a concise way. —About the Great Disaster that will bring ruin to the Empire.”

Despite having been warned about the pompous act, Ubilk interrupted himself for an instant.

However, the anger towards Ubilk was outweighed by the interest in the words that were to follow. Consequently, Ubilk remained unpunished for ignoring the warning, and continued spinning his tale.

That continuation was—

Ubilk: “—The death of His Excellency Vincent Vollachia, that will be the signal for the beginning of the commandment.”

7

The tactless Stargazer left the room, leaving only the apex of the Empire and his trusted confidant in the office. —No, Chisha was no longer sure if assessing himself as such was correct.

For he would be unable to claim being one's confidant, if the latter were unable to unravel their heart of hearts to him.

Unexpectedly, perhaps the malign declarations that the Stargazer was being bombarded with, the declarations that he was a clown, were also appropriate for himself.

Chisha: "When I disguised myself and replaced Your Excellency, the Stargazer never approached meee. Were those instructions given by Your Excellency as well, perhaps?"

Vincent: "If that which is being kept secret were to be recklessly talked about, then all plans would be rendered null. Thus, it is only natural to tie up loose ends before something goes wrong."

Chisha: "I suppooose. I would do the same thing."

It was not so much a collusion, but Ubilk, who appeared as if he had free rein, was also kept on a tight leash by Vincent.

There was a secret agreement exchanged between the two parties concerning the Great Disaster.

However—

Chisha: "I do not understand. Why conceal it even from me?"

Vincent: "—. To get rid of unnecessary and cumbersome thoughts."

Chisha: "Unnecessary and cumbersome…"

Vincent: "Were you aware of this matter, you would perhaps think of saving me. However, that is a futile thought."

Shaking his head horizontally, Vincent stated this devoid of any hesitation.

Albeit it was his life at stake, Vincent would not falter from the truth before him. However, his own acceptance of that truth and Chisha's were matters entirely different from one another.

Chisha: "It is only natural that I should put Your Excellency's life first. Why do you call it futile?”

Vincent: “Recall all the stories which the Stargazer brought about thus far, claiming them to be his commandment.”

Chisha: “The stories brought by Ubilk-dono…”

At being told this, Chisha pondered.

If the Great Disaster was the only thing Vincent had kept from Chisha, then Chisha was well-aware of all the other prophecies Ubilk had brought.

They were all useful portents for natural disasters and rebellions, both posing as omens of situations that could lead to a conflagration. Thanks to this, it had been possible to keep the damage to a minimum—

Chisha: “—Though with varying degrees of damage, all of those situations did happen.”

Vincent: “Indeed. Never has there been a case in which it was possible to prevent one from happening, having been informed as to its signs. Whether man-made or natural disaster, the first move always happens. Even if we are able to deal with the damage that follows.”

Thus, Ubilk had said.

Vincent: “The Great Disaster that thing spoke of, shall commence with my death.”

Chisha: “—Hk, then what I ought to do is safeguard Your Excellency’s life and defy the Stargazer’s commandment!”

Vincent: “Do you think I have not attempted to ascertain whether that is feasible?”

Chisha’s knee-jerk objection was negated by Vincent’s unhurried words.

Naturally, the ideas that had come to Chisha in the heat of emotion had all been tested by Vincent.

In the past, other prophecies brought about by Ubilk, unrelated to the Great Disaster, had been challenged time and again as to check if they could be prevented.

While fulfilling the role of an Emperor to the fullest extent, behind the scenes—

Chisha: "—Your Excellency."

Vincent: "What?"

Chisha: "I have a question, which has come up to me just now."

Suddenly, as a cold, somber voice permeated his brain, his own, Chisha spoke thus.

He had stated that he had a question, but his brain was numb. Completely numb. Be it a mental block as a reaction due to his brain being overworked, or a consequence of it refusing to work, it was completely numb.

However, regardless of the reason for its numbness, the question had already been raised, the Emperor had received it.

And then—

Vincent: "I shall allow it. Speak."

Chisha could not deny that which the Emperor had chosen.

Hence, Chisha could not refuse what the Emperor had granted permission for.

And so, as Chisha experienced his own brain being numbed, he posed his query.

Chisha: "Since when have you been aware of the signs of the Great Disaster?"

Vincent: "—The journal."

Quietly, Vincent opened a drawer in the desk he utilized to perform his duties, took out an old bound book, and placed it upon the desk.

A journal that had become a topic of conversation once in the past, but which he had never seen. The journal left by Stride Vollachia, if it conveyed the signs—

Chisha: “Your Excellency, what you have done so far—”

Meeting Chisha, originally Chesha Trim, walking alongside him, cultivating him over time, picking up Cecilus, taking part in the Imperial Selection Ceremony, saving Prisca Benedict’s life by going against his own principles in a first, and paving a new path as the Emperor of the Vollachian Empire.

The whole of Vincent Vollachia’s journey had been—.

Vincent: “—After my death, the ruin caused by the Great Disaster must be minimized. This is the purpose of the reform, that of the Nine Divine Generals.”

Chisha: “…”

Vincent: “—Your purpose, Chisha Gold.”

8

Chisha: “I demand to know who these Observers are, and I demand you to disclose whatever information you may have on them.”

Pushing the open iron fan against another’s neck, Chisha issued a threat, his tone low.

However, as Chisha directed that ghastly hostility at him, the facial expression of Ubilk, who had had his back pinned against the wall, was a carefree one, as if bemused, unable to read the situation.

His expression unchanging, Ubilk called out to him with “General First-Class Chisha”, then continued,

Ubilk: “I’d thought that you and His Excellency the Emperor had discussed that a few days ago, and that you had come to terms with it down inside, General First-Class Chisha…”

Chisha: “It took me a few days to review the preconditions to make sure there was no mistake. Unfortunately, there is currently no way to directly reject His Excellency’s thoughts.”

Ubilk: “I’m sure it’d be the same even if you’d discussed it with me. But, as expected from the General First-Class who also serves as His Excellency’s body double, you do take after him plenty.”

While being held in place Ubilk spoke, to which Chisha produced a faint look of puzzlement. Taking in that reaction from Chisha, Ubilk shook his head, then stated,

Ubilk: “His Excellency also asked if there was a way to bend the commandment. Buuut~, I can return you the same answer as I did then. There is not.”

Chisha: “—. What is your purpose? Ubilk-dono, you have introduced yourself as a Stargazer, thus gaining the position to stay at the Crystal Palace and deliver prophecies from the Observers. Myself at the helm, people aside from His Excellency do not think highly of your existence, Ubilk-dono. If His Excellency does pass away as per the prophecy, you shall not escape destruction.”

Ubilk: “You put that so clearly it hurts me… Buuut~, General First-Class Chisha, that assumption of yours is off.”

Chisha: “…”

Ubilk: “More important than my own destruction, is the fulfillment and realization of the commandment. My purpose, is to ward off the destruction due to follow the Great Disaster.”

As he spoke, the grin disappeared from Ubilk's face.

Ubilk's face, vanished of the artificial emotion it had possessed, had lost its warmth. Capturing it from up-close, made Chisha get an impression as if he were facing Ubilk's real face for the first time.

For an instant, he suspected that that was due to some technique of Ubilk's—

Ubilk: "I don't have any power of that sort. Didn't I destroy my own Evil Eye in front of your very eyes, General First-Class Chisha, as to display I held no malice towards His Excellency at the very start? Do you wish to confirm that?"

Chisha: "—. No, that is fine. Unless I have misheard, you, Ubilk-dono, have stated this? That your purpose is to ward off the destruction due to follow the Great Disaster."

Ubilk: "Yes, that's correct. In that respect, that purpose is in accord with His Excellency's."

The replying Ubilk was devoid of faltering, and Chisha could perceive no falsehoods in his opinion.

If he were to lie here in the first place, it made no sense that he would not lie to make himself, rather than Vincent, look good to Chisha. Even Ubilk would not be too thrilled were he to be killed after carelessly provoking Chisha's ire, most likely, despite that expression of his suggesting he did not mind being killed at any time.

In addition, even though he had some thoughts on Ubilk's behavior and perceived him as a nuisance, Vincent's reasons for not sending Ubilk away were understandable.

Vincent and Ubilk were both working toward the same goal.

Chisha: "It does not seem to me that Ubilk-dono is thinking of preventing the Great Disaster itself. Why is that?"

Ubilk: “Oh, it’s simple. The Great Disaster cannot be postponed. It’ll happen without fail, sort of like a foregone conclusion. My purpose, once the Great Disaster has happened, is to ward off the destruction it brings. In other words…”

Chisha: “In other words?”

Ubilk: “If the Great Disaster doesn’t actually happen, my commandment won’t be fulfilled. For that reason, even if all the factors that’d cause the Great Disaster are destroyed, I’d become said factor.”

That was a fanatical way of thinking, the means and the ends were both mixed up.

Gulping due to that incomprehensible absurdity, the iron fan that was already on Ubilk’s neck was made to dig into it with further force by Chisha. Pointed against a vital point, putting enough force into it would have Ubilk’s throat severed there.

Allowing Ubilk himself to understand this, Chisha’s voice became sharper.

Chisha: “Then it would be best if we remove that factor with our own hands hereeee.”

Ubilk: “I wish you wouldn’t, but I’m not gonna stop you. Thoooough~ let me tell you one thing, supposing you kill me, the next Stargazer will appear. That’s how it works.”

Chisha: “…”

Ubilk: “Four major disasters will destroy the world. The opportunity to stop one of them has come. We are terminals of self-purification and self-defense brought about by the stars, and there are infinite substitutes.”

Staring into those eyes from which nothing could be sensed, Chisha ground his teeth.

That there were no threats, no falsehoods, and that Ubilk himself was at least speaking seriously, was something that Chisha could sense.

—In order to ward off the destruction wrought by the Great Disaster, he would make it so the Great Disaster would happen without fail.

A declaration far too absurd, far too illogical, yet it was an invitation to a war of attrition, employing countless lives as shields, that even Vincent was unable to do anything about.

A possibility popped up, however; that perhaps, of some of the Stargazers who had brought commandments thus far themselves had served as sparks, playing a role in the materialization of their prophecies.

But if they were to ascertain this and massacre the Stargazers, eradicating them, being that the conditions for their emergence were not known, it was likely that they would need to murder all those capable of becoming one.

That, would be tantamount to destroying the country.

Ubilk: "His Excellency is admirable. Having attachment to individuals is something that makes up very little part of my nature, but I gotta take my hat off to His Excellency for the way he is. Someone who's not a Stargazer isn't capable of being like that."

Chisha: "…Ubilk-dono admiring someone that greatly, what an unfunny jokeee."

Ubilk: "I truly mean it. There's no one able to accept their death forewarned by the commandment with peace of mind. And yet His Excellency's making all preparations for after his own death. Even if he has no hopes left for living, he hasn't given up fighting. Truly, the King of Sword Wolves."

Ubilk's words, muttered solemnly, were a solid expression of his admiration for Vincent.

The Sword Wolf he had spoken of, the "wolf pierced by swords" that was the national emblem of Vollachia, was a celebration of the way of life of a warrior that did not falter even when saddled with life-threatening wounds.

In that sense, as Ubilk had declared, Vincent's way of life was that of the Sword Wolf itself.

Ubilk: "General First-Class Chisha, I've spent all my life with the intent to fulfill my commandment with my entire heart. Buuut~, it's not like I believe that my commandment is more wonderful than all. In case you're saying it's difficult to accept, General First-Class Chisha, it's okay if you were to try it out."

Chisha: "Try it out… Exterminating you, Ubilk-dono, and those with the same station you have, you mean?"

Ubilk: "I did state that there are infinite substitutes, but there's a limit. There are only so many lives. Trying it out with the support of General First-Class Cecilus would be worth the shot."

Once more, Ubilk's mind was hard to grasp in regards to just how much of that proposal came from what he truly felt.

For a moment, Chisha did consider it to be a decent idea, proof of just how shaken up he was.

Supposing he did as Ubilk had stated, disclosed that fact to Cecilus and guided him as the latter probably did nothing but babble about it, they may be able to wipe out the citizens of the Empire.

—No, that too was impossible.

Were Vincent to discover that plot, he would halt any nonsense of the sort immediately. Cecilus was a friend, but his priorities were very much fixed within his mind.

For Cecilus, Vincent took precedence over Chisha. And that was the reasoning as to why Cecilus Segmunt was the First, even though his head was not to be trusted one bit when it came to thinking.

Chisha: "Nevertheless, the likes of disclosing this to Cecilus was an option that had not occurred to me, and that is quite laughable, even if I say so myself."

An out-of-place, deep emotion carved a faint smile onto Chisha's lips.

Emerging in his head vividly, was Cecilus pouting his lips, protesting vehemently—

Chisha: "…"

He suddenly recalled an exchange they'd had one day quite clearly.

Cecilus: "If me and you go at it, Chisha, you'll die in the blink of an eye for sure; however, what if you start with a thousand men? It might take a thousand seconds!"

Chisha: "I doubt it would. But I understand where you are coming from. While I gain a thousand seconds…"

Cecilus: "His Excellency, or someone else, can fulfill their purpose. My one greatest flaw, as the leading actor of this world, is that there's only one of me in this world."

The smiling face of his friend as he spoke of random things came to mind.

Suddenly, he had a thought.

Chisha: "Ubilk-dono, I would like to inquire something of you. — These commandments you receive, in what way are they brought to you?"

Having been questioned, Ubilk widened his eyes in amazement slightly.

He then cocked his head, regaining his usual atmosphere of meekness that had vanished, and,

Ubilk: "It varies. More often than not, I receive them in something like a dream."

Chisha: "Then, would that also apply to the commandment regarding the Great Disaster that you have conveyed to His Excellency?"

With the questions piling up, Ubilk nodded with a face of perplexity. Exhaling at that answer, slowly, Chisha gave form to the thoughts that he'd had.

Chisha: "If, in the commandment you have received, the moment His Excellency loses his life is present—"

Pure white vanished, and thus, he painted over his uncertain self that could be dyed in any colour, not just with anyone.

Appearing there was—

Chisha: "—The Vincent Vollachia that dies there, which one is it, I wondeeer?"

9

—Chisha Gold, formerly Chesha Trim, did not consider himself to be someone with a very high sense of loyalty, nor had he pledged unwavering obedience to His Excellency the Emperor.

As none other than Vincent Vollachia himself had stated.

At a time Chisha had been asked if he would be willing to die for Vincent, returning the direct reply that he would not do so.

To keep that in mind as he served him, so had Chisha been told.

In accordance with that declaration, and with those sentiments, Chisha had come to serve Vincent.

Therefore, he would not do anything akin to dying for Vincent's sake.

Even if he did not pledge unwavering loyalty to Vincent, he pledged a loyalty born of common sense. As one of the people of the Empire, as one of the Generals of the First-Class of the Empire, he also happened to possess some sense of respect towards His Excellency the Emperor.

Conduct that felt as if it ran counter to Vincent's command, was preposterous.

Hence, Chisha's choice was something made not for Vincent's sake, but for all intents and purposes, it had been made for the sake of those very same feelings at the very origin of it all, when he had happened to run into the prince on that road.

Back then, the many people around him had avoided getting involved upon laying eyes on that carriage, which they could tell at a glance had high-class folk riding in it.

They would have been fine with helping out, but if they turned out not to be able to, instead incurring displeasure, their lives would be in jeopardy.

While able to perfectly grasp the thoughts of those people, Chisha had stepped up to the carriage.

It was not as though he had wanted to help people.

However, he had thought it a shame were he to miss out on the opportunity to test his arithmetic and studies, which were said to be useless in the village that was his hometown.

Indeed, the same went this time around.

A chance to get behind the thoughts of Vincent Vollachia, a man whose ingenuity could make anything go according to his hypotheses, would probably never come around again.

Moreover, ever since Vincent Vollachia had been a young child, he had steeled himself to accept that moment with solemnity.

In other words, this was a challenge to partake in a crucial bout on which the life of Vincent Vollachia was staked.

A man whose blood would boil once the gauntlet was thrown down, a man whose spirits would rise more and more upon the realization that his enemy was a mighty one indeed, a man whose soul would ignite as a means to fell his opponent. That was a man of the Empire.

And Chisha Gold, was a man of the Empire.

What sort of feelings, what sort of thoughts had been in Vincent Vollachia's mind, at the time he had decided to place Chisha under his care, as to learn under him, to become capable of using the same intelligence as himself after his own demise, were unclear.

He did not understand, nor did he want to understand.

Once he understood that he did not understand, he had had many of those hot-headed thoughts.

Vincent had once given a few words on it, that he had experienced those very same thoughts.

And thus—

Chisha: "The ruin brought about by the Great Disaster… Just what is the Great Disaster, don't make me laaaugh."

Labeled as the likes of a mass-scale disaster, it seemed the Great Disaster would somehow try to trample, to plunge the Vollachian Empire into ruination. From Chisha's point of view however, it was humorous.

The Great Disaster would commence with the death of Vincent Vollachia.

The Great Disaster would not start without Vincent's death, in other words, the Empire could not be destroyed if he were allowed to live, so had he not already lost before the destruction had started?

Setting Vincent Vollachia aside, what was the destruction to come, what was the Great Disaster?

—Vincent Vollachia, the Seventy-Seventh Emperor of the Sacred Vollachian Empire.

Chisha: "His Excellency himself is the Vollachian Empire. The utter devastation and ruin of the land after the death of His Excellency is an incredibly absurd, side-splitting, comedy of comedies."

He ridiculed the yet-unseen Great Disaster with a manner of speech akin to Cecilus.

Ridiculing the Great Disaster that he most likely would never lay eyes upon, he stuck out his tongue.

Chisha: “A dog that seeks to snatch a lowly victory, how can that be the one to kill our Sword Wolf? —Don’t you dare underestimate Vincent Vollachia, who I supported, who I built up.”

If you are someone who can kill him, then what are you waiting for? If you say you will snatch him away, go for it.

Forewarned ruin and all the like, don’t you dare think that you can destroy our Emperor, our Empire.

That day, when I got the wheel out of the ditch, it was for the sake of this moment.

For the sake of ridiculing this destruction, all of it was—

Chisha: “—Foreshadowing. Though, I shall absolutely not say such a thing, for if I did, Cecilus would get overly enthused.”

10

—A white light shone dazzlingly within the throne room, and immediately afterward, scarlet blood splattered grandly.

Upon the red carpet, a slender man stood, drenched by the fresh blood that had just been scattered.

The man, donning a ridiculous oni mask on his face, widened his black eyes hidden behind the mask, frozen in shock at the events that had developed in front of him.

And before that man who was standing stock still, the body that had gushed copious amounts of its blood crumbled, toppling to its front.

His chest, lacking any defenses, had been run through from behind, destroying his heart without a shred of mercy, eradicating, ripping away anything and everything necessary for the maintenance of life.

???: “…”

Unable to support the falling body with his arms, it helplessly collapsed onto the carpet.

With that, the fallen body did not stir, with nary a twitch, nor with even a gulp of air much less any final words.

None may live, having had their hearts pierced.

Consequently, that was an event inevitable, the terminus of fate as was bound to arrive.

???: “…”

The man had died.

He was Chesha Trim, became Chisha Gold, and finally as Vincent Vollachia, the man had died.

—And that was the entirety of what had transpired, in that moment.

Chapter 108:
The Forthcoming Great Disaster

1

—The final act of Chisha Gold, posing as the Emperor, was beyond comprehension.

???: “…”

Having been ousted from the throne, Vincent Vollachia began giving his name as Abel, gained support from the People of Shudraq in the large forest to the east, and personally took the lead of a rebellion that had upheaved the Empire.

This was not what he had hoped for when planning for the future, but this was rather Chisha’s plan, who had deliberately gone the full length, committing treason, thus driving Vincent away from the Imperial Capital. He would not do an about-face so easily.

Therefore, he had taken measures to clearly inform him that his actions, that his motives were futile.

Destined death, brought about by the Stargazers, was something that Abel had resolved himself for long ago, from the time he gained self-awareness as an Imperial Prince of Vollachia.

When commandment and forewarning were received, it was foretold that upon the death of the Emperor who had ascended to the throne, the Great Disaster, which was to bring about ruin, would commence.

It was not as though he himself had been mentioned by name.

However, once he laid eyes upon that forewarning, he had been convinced that he would be the one to ascend to the seat of Emperor.

He had been convinced that, were it not him, the Vollachian Empire could not be saved.

To his other brothers and sisters, he could not entrust that great duty.

Putting the entirety of his capabilities and his potential into it, Vincent Abellux would take the seat of Emperor, and as Vincent Vollachia, he would take measures for the Empire to not be undone.

That was the plan that Vincent Vollachia, that Abel had staked his life on.

He had restored the system of the Nine Divine Generals, whom everyone worshipped in the Vollachian Empire where the strong were revered, and upon their apex, he had placed the unmistakable strongest.

Distorting the way of being of the Empire, rife with senseless barbarism as it was, he had guided them so that they would lose their reluctance regarding orderly violence.

Thus leaving as much potential as he possibly could so that the Vollachian Empire would survive, even after his death.

Everything, had been part of the plan on which he had staked his life.

Abel: “…”

The body, unable to do anything but lie face down, continued to spill vast volumes of blood from its chest, its heart having been pierced.

Black hair and black eyes; each time he looked in the mirror, his face made him feel anger and frustration at his lack of power, his lack of knowledge. That face had been deprived of blood, its expression soaked in blood as it gazed at nowhere in particular.

His current body, manifested through the “ability” which he had professed to have attained while on the verge of death, a time at which his color had vanished, did not return to his original form, even once his life had come to an end.

Nevermore would he lay eyes upon that form, nevermore would that impudent speech strike his eardrums again.

Nevermore.

Abel: “Why.”

A question that ought not be asked, spilled from his lips.

The one who was to answer that question, would never open their mouth once more. Even so, the lips that were supposed to avoid all that their owner knew to be meaningless, spilled that question.

The prophecy of the Great Disaster, it was conceivable that it could be overturned were one to be aware of its conditions.

He had sought out that method in the past. He had conveyed so to him, that ought to have made him understand that it could not be done. And yet, as Chisha had still not been convinced, he had committed treason in vain.

In this way, the confrontation they’d had within the throne room ought to have been proof that no means with which to avoid the Great Disaster existed.

He had trained Chisha, so that he could entrust him with the Empire after his own demise. To think as he did, to arrive at the same conclusions as he did, in order for him to be able to fulfill being a proxy of Vincent Vollachia.

Therefore, were he truly Vincent Vollachia, he was supposed to have accepted defeat with grace.

Accepting defeat and lowering weapons, putting an end to this futile battle, restoring the throne to the returned Abel so the latter could welcome death, and then, with that, he would supposedly oppose the Great Disaster of ruin.

That had not come to pass. A foolish gamble it had been.

Even if he were to die in Abel’s place, as Vincent Vollachia, were the Great Disaster to not deem it acceptable, it would amount to a foolish gamble that had ended in naught but a useless death.

That especially was what Abel abhorred, a death inefficient to the utmost extremes.

Even though Chisha Gold had presumably been aware of that.

Abel: “Why.”

Endless doubt and bewilderment, stained a deep scarlet by the flowing blood.

Even if he asked once more, there would only be another layer of silence piled on, gone without replies. That too, was what Abel loathed, inefficiency to the utmost extremes, and then—

???: “—Well, ain’t that just ‘cause it was a bad plan?”

Immediately after, a second shot of white light was fired, zipping straight towards Abel, who stood bolt upright.

2

Calling it light was no falsehood, the blow that brought death aimed for Abel faster than an arrow.

To begin with, Abel was not a fighter.

Even supposing the shock from the immediately preceding event had already passed, it would have been entirely impossible for him to react to the white radiance that had grazed the edge of his vision for nary a moment.

Ergo, what had saved Abel’s life in that moment, was not a judgment of his own.

???: “…”

It came to pass right as Abel was on the verge of being run through by the light approaching him from the front, about to have his heart extirpated.

A roaring sound and violent tremors furiously shook the throne room—Nay, the entire Crystal Palace, and a tremendous impact destroyed its firm walls. The origin of the impact did not stop at just destroying the wall, and wedged its way between Abel, who was standing bolt upright, and the corona zipping towards him.

With a sound akin to a splash of water, the white light obliterated that interference. And thus, that which had saved Abel's life by a hairbreadth was—

Abel: "—An enormous arm, is that Moguro Hagane?!"

Moguro: "Man at throne, protect. His Excellency, ordered me."

The wall-esque object that had made a sudden appearance before Abel's eyes, was the right arm of Moguro Hagane, which had been thrust into the throne room.

Moguro, a Meteor also known as the very Crystal Palace itself, was supposed to be participating in a fierce clash unfolding upon the battlefield, having taken in the ramparts of the Imperial Capital of Lupugana as their own body.

And yet—

Abel: "Was it Chisha…?!"

Moguro's earlier statement was proof of the fact that they had received orders to protect Abel.

Then, the one to direct Moguro to return from far away had been the one who sat upon the throne possessing the function of exerting influence on the Meteor; none other than Chisha Gold could have done so.

That Abel's life would once more be targeted right after he himself had been shot, had been his prediction.

Abel: "—Hk, Moguro Hagane! Bring me outside!"

Moguro: "Who, you. My, priority, His Excellency—"

Abel: “The Emperor has died! If I die, his death shall be in vain!”

Moguro: “…”

Taking in those domineering words from Abel, Moguro noticed the collapsed silhouette as they peered into the throne room.

Moguro’s state was such that it was difficult to tell where their eyes were present. Once the green orbs emerging from the city walls flickered, however, they too recognized the death of the Emperor, who had collapsed face-down.

Moguro: “The body—”

Abel: “It is superfluous! Worry not for the dead!”

Shouting at Moguro as they attempted to retrieve the Emperor’s corpse, Abel jumped towards the titanic right-arm before him. As he clung onto one of the fingers of the hand-like shape, Moguro pulled their arm out of the throne room, causing Abel to be bathed in raging winds as he was extracted out into the sky.

Moguro: “…”

Moguro had become one with the ramparts, having altered the latter’s structure to allow themself easier movement.

Moguro’s body was now that of an enormous golem greater than fifty meters tall, and riding on the arm as it was lifted, Abel’s elevation was about the same.

With the cityscape of the Imperial Capital in sight from that height, the path Moguro had taken from the third bastion that they had been protecting alongside the buildings trampled in said path was visible. It was apparent that they had bolted straight towards this place, devoid of any other concerns.

Apart from that, though the battles at each bastion were still ongoing, the reasons for their conflicts had vanished already, and so those who needed to prepare for the upcoming battle were squandering their lives in vain.

In vain, their lives were—.

Abel: "—Hk."

A disturbance arose in his thoughts, and Abel put strength into his arms clinging onto the gargantuan rock.

This was not the time to cling to bygone events and have his thoughts dispersed into many fragments. Already, events were unfolding. It was just as he had told Moguro. —If he were to die now, that death would be in vain.

At the very least, he must ascertain whether that death had held meaning or not.

Abel: "I shall not die."

Voice leaked as if being wrung out, and Abel bit down on his molars and stared downwards, intently.

Even if he raised his voice here, it would not reach those whose lives were clashing on the battleground. However, he must inform them that the meaning in this battle had been lost, by any means necessary.

Moguro: "Danger."

As Abel was thinking, Moguro's gale-like voice struck his eardrums.

Their difference in their physique was so significant that each and every single one of Moguro's actions was akin to a human's actions towards an ant. However, it was not as though Moguro had rocked his eardrums without purpose.

Gyrating their colossal frame, Moguro turned their back on the Crystal Palace with Abel protected in their right hand. As sounds of successive impacts resounded from the exterior of the right hand he was held in, Abel's cheeks contorted.

The sequence of strikes came not from one direction, rather, they were raining down from all angles.

The enemy was simply great in numbers. —No, a collection of magic users that could aim for their enemies with such precision, would be infeasible on this soil of Vollachia.

That was to say, this was not a group large in number, but the mastery of a single person.

A truly powerful individual who lent the illusion that a great number of people were performing a simultaneous attack from all directions—resuscitating the memories of the time when his thoughts had ground to a halt due to shock just before, Abel raised his face.

That fighting style, the voice of that undesired reply, were present in his memories.

That was—

Abel: "…"

Moguro twisted their body, defending Abel from the downpour of bullets, and descended.

Looking up at the sky from within that fist, he saw the traces of a shadow moving too fast for eyes to fix upon. Albeit exceedingly rare, it was a form that could be seen within the Vollachian Empire.

Soaring by means of flying dragons, 'twas the acrobatic flight of the flying dragon riders able to control them—Nay, there were currently no riders in the Empire capable of gliding through the sky at this speed.

To be precise, that was the level of ability known as the "utmost limits of flight", the domain where the Empire's strongest flying dragon rider was without peer.

In an instant, white light dispersed, the sound of Moguro's enormous body being broken by the impact reverberated, and a part of the broken wall grazed Abel's cheek. Without distorting his countenance due to the pain, he saw it.

The flying dragon rider passed by the vision of his black eyes covered by the oni mask—Ashen-brown hair, cracks running through his features bereft of color, and dark eyeballs, akin to a moonless night, with a golden radiance looming therein.

His form appeared far too unrecognizable, but even so, there was no mistaking him.

Abel: "—Balleroy Temeglyph! For what reason are you alive?!"

Balleroy: "I ain't gonna talk to ya, Mister Oni-Mask."

Producing a beautiful voice that gave off an elegant impression, he refused to reply while still affirming his existence.

Fading from sight once again, the enemy that steered his flying dragon to slice through the air—Balleroy Temeglyph, was unmistakably the perpetrator who had aimed for the throne room of the Crystal Palace from the outside, the one who had shot the fake Emperor through the heart.

Known as the Magical Sharpshooter, he was the man who reigned supreme at the apex of all flying dragon riders.

The former Ninth of the Nine Divine Generals, who in the past, during a rebellion that had occurred within the Empire—

Moguro: "Balleroy, died. You, fake."

Their perception the same as Abel's, the giant Moguro fired a counterattack.

With Abel enveloped by their right-hand, Moguro swung the left arm of their huge body, and quite literally mowing down the air, they launched an attack towards Balleroy's flying dragon.

People would tend to believe that big things moved sluggishly, but that was but an illusion originating from their viewpoints being far away from the events.

In addition to protecting Abel from the magic sniping, they had blocked the entirety of the enemy's attacks until this point. Moguro's movements were keen, nimble, and precise.

Moguro: “Fast. Meticulous.”

However, even with Moguro’s reflexes and agility, subduing Balleroy, who made the entirety of the sky into his domain as he flew around it, was unfeasible.

The special trait of a flying dragon rider was not restricted to just speed, but extended to having the potential to move up, down, left, right, front, and back. To move in every conceivable direction, was their greatest advantage that could not be taken away lest they were felled to the surface.

On top of that, Balleroy was no ordinary flying dragon rider, he was their apex.

Abel: “He’s clad himself in wind…!”

Balleroy’s tactics excelled in sniping while moving via the use of magic, but his strengths as one of the rare wielders of magic within the Empire were not limited to only offensive implementations.

By shrouding wind around the flying dragon he steered, he actualized a maneuver that other flying dragon riders could not, increasing its speed and softening the impacts it took, making himself unable to ever be caught.

However, in order to put it into practice, a strong coordination with his flying dragon was indispensable.

Abel: “Has that flying dragon also soared back from the beyond?!”

Flying dragon riders boasted tremendous strength in battle, but their greatest drawbacks were that it took time to cultivate them, plus that they could not ride upon the back of any flying dragon apart from the one they chose as a partner.

To kill a flying dragon rider, their flying dragon must first be killed. The cause of Balleroy’s death was no exception.

However, Balleroy had soared back. Quite literally, he was soaring through the sky together with his beloved dragon.

Abel: “The Great Disaster—”

It was not as though any clear or observable damage had arisen.

However, since Chisha had lost his life as Vincent Vollachia, there was no choice but to suspect that the events transcending human comprehension that had ensued thereafter were related to the Great Disaster.

Even so, it was nonsensical for Balleroy Temeglyph to be the bearer of the Great Disaster.

Of course, Balleroy was the apex of flying dragon riders, a truly powerful individual amongst the Empire’s strongest.

Were he inclined to do so, he would have no trouble in doing away with Abel’s life.

And yet—

Moguro: “Shaking. Endure.”

Abel: “It matters not, do it!”

The inorganic voice sent forth an intense wind, and Abel raised his own voice in response.

The following moment, Moguro, lunging with the enemy as their aim, thrust their arm down to their own feet. Even if those were called “feet”, looking at Moguro’s currently enormous body, it appeared as if they had become one with the street.

Posterior to being plunged into a street of the Empire, the left arm produced a creaking sound, and after a moment of resistance, the street that had been uprooted was magnificently heaved into the sky.

Abel: “…”

The sight of parts of a district being sent flying was something that Abel had laid eyes upon a short while at Chaosflame, priorly. It had been an absurd sight back then as well, but it had been nothing more than the city's residents coming together to hurl demolished buildings.

However, in Moguro's case, that was a feat of strength devoid of intricacy, an unmistakable act of violence.

It was a sight that proved that Moguro Hagane was extraordinary, that proved that he was one of the Nine Divine Generals.

Without doubt, Balleroy too was an extraordinary individual, but Moguro, in addition to the other Divine Generals, also possessed those same qualifications. Therefore, Balleroy could not be capable of being the bearer of the Great Disaster.

Of course, were the street that had been ripped from the ground to be hurled and nothing more, the astute Balleroy would just evade and be done with it.

Hence, with the block of the city that could be called a cannonball having been thrown, Moguro—

Moguro: "Pulverization."

A slam of their left arm, and it was turned into innumerable projectiles obstructing Balleroy's aerial escape path.

Shrapnel scattered in all directions, each piece a mass of rock or clump of soil even larger than a human. Thus dispersing with that singular blow from Moguro, it was such that an ordinary human would be quite likely to suffer fatal injury with even a mere graze.

Naturally, if Balleroy were to be struck by it, even he, who had mastered the Flow Method, would end up showing a fatal opening in midair. In order to avoid that,

Balleroy: "Carillon!"

In accordance with the sharp voice amidst the windstorm, his flying dragon soared in order to slip past the bullet rain of boulders.

Flapping its wings as it diced the air, his flying dragon aimed for the one area in the world where the incessant downpour of boulders was slightly weaker—

Abel: “Obviously, that is a trap.”

Moguro had deliberately left a region in which the downpour was slightly weaker, however, even if Balleroy and Carillon were aware that it was a ruse, they could not afford to be hit by the shrapnel, so they had no choice but to fly into it.

What remained was whether Balleroy, riding his beloved dragon at a high speed, would be victorious in evading the blow expected from Moguro.

With his flying dragon wrapped in wind, Balleroy accelerated, soaring through the sky as he obliterated the obstructive shrapnel with lights.

Moguro gyrated the left arm they had drawn back, and a blow that could drill a hole through the world burrowed through the sky of the Imperial Capital.

As mutual Divine Generals, a duel that could have never been realized in Balleroy’s lifetime unfolded, and as both of them crossed with all of their might up high in the air, they began their showdown—

—That instant, faster than they could crash into one another, the clouds of the Imperial Capital were blown away with the sound of an explosion and its shockwave.

Abel: “—Hk.”

Though direct damage from the explosive power had been averted, the aftershock was so intense that it seemed like it would tear Abel’s body away from clinging to Moguro.

But, no matter how harsh a situation his slender body faced, Abel would never close both his eyes. Henceforth, his eyes firmly grasped the events of that moment.

Abel: “Moguro’s, arm—”

Just before Moguro's gyrating left arm was able to display its might by pulverizing Balleroy, an interference occurred, and the part equivalent to a human's brachium was torn asunder.

Spinning with vigor, the arm of Moguro, humongous enough to rival the castle's own size, danced through the air. Leisurely slipping out by flying under the damage, Balleroy had survived the rain of shrapnel—Not just that, he had escaped completely unharmed.

Then, the one that had destroyed Moguro's arm, thus saving Balleroy from his predicament was—

???: "Oh, OHHHHHHHHHHHH—!!!"

As a deep voice that rumbled the atmosphere was raised, there was a fierce collision, an impact from the side. Arm demolished and posture broken, Moguro's green orbs scintillated at what had barged in.

For Abel too, this interference had been unforeseen. Though, it was something to be expected.

After all, if the opponent was Balleroy Temeglyph, who had soared back from death.

???: "BASTARD! GET THE FRIG' AWAY FROM THIS DRAGON'S DARLIIIIIIING—!!!"

Brandishing claws of a dragon, it easily tore through Moguro's body, fashioned from the city walls, and alongside a roar, a blow from its tail slammed against Moguro, destroying one part, the latter's mass being reduced in the blink of an eye.

It was extremely abrupt, but that was a matter of course. —The opponent was of the strongest lifeforms in existence.

Abel: "The Cloud Dragon, Mezoreia… is that which resides within, Madelyn Eschart?!"

Mezoreia: "RAAAAAAAAHHHHHHH—!"

The howling Dragon raged with its whole body, and with a collision caused Moguro's enormous build to sway greatly. With each blow the ramparts fissured, its broken pieces plummeting onto the Imperial Capital.

The Crystal Palace, extolled as the world's most beautiful castle, had its gardens trampled upon, subjected to devastation, while the cityscape of the Imperial Capital, constructed in a well-arranged, orderly fashion, met its demise with each passing second.

In addition, the catastrophes assailing the Imperial Capital did not end there.

Abel: "…"

Indistinguishable amongst the thunderous sounds of the Dragon's wrath as it laid waste to Moguro's body, what had reached Abel's ears was the sound of destruction, akin to the world crumbling, originating from a distant location.

Thus directing his gaze there, to behind the Crystal Palace—where a reservoir was present, a cistern which made use of springs amidst the mountains and was utilized as a water source for the entire Imperial Capital, had its bulwark pierced through by Moguro's left arm, that had been cleaved just moments before.

A beat later, fissures expanded from the point the arm had penetrated, and the water from the reservoir began seeping out from the cracks. Gradually amassing vigor, before long the entire dam would crumble and become a stream of mud flowing through the Imperial Capital.

Guiding the residents of the Imperial Capital, as well as the Imperial Soldiers and rebels participating in the battle, to refuge as soon as possible was—.

Moguro: "—Blunder."

Right after hearing Moguro's whisper, a mutter not all that quiet, a feeling of floating assailed Abel's body.

Looking over his shoulder as he felt his insides rising up, Abel saw that it was not that he had been thrown, but rather, that Moguro's arm, the hand of which Abel had been held in, had been crunched through by the Dragon above the wrist.

It was not that he had been targeted. Rather, it had been nothing more than a result of a foolhardy attack.

However—

Abel: "—Oh."

Engulfed by the momentum of his freefall, Abel's body spun around over in midair.

His arms, which had been clinging onto Moguro's arm, had been detached from it, but even if he were still hanging onto it, given the arm had originally been the city's walls, it would have ended up being his cause of death, most likely.

However, even if Moguro's arm had not become his cause of death, at this rate, Abel would slam into something that was very much similar to it, and similar his fate would be.

Abel: "I need to—"

Find something; looking around, Abel's eyes were drawn to one point.

However, that point was not a source of aid.

What had entered Abel's vision was the large hole in the Crystal Palace through which Moguro had pulled him out.

The hole led to the throne room. He was unable to peer inside, yet his attention was drawn to it.

He had been the one to say "worry not for the dead", yet he too had pretty much drunk from the same poison.

Abel: "…"

He did not know whether he had found a way to break through the deadlock or not, even with that sole second.

But that he had not squandered that one second was proof of Abel's unrelenting spirit, the indelible scar engraved upon his soul for all perpetuity.

Then again, if he were to plunge to his death like this, discussing the scar engraved upon his soul would have no merit.

???: "Pull—!!"

Abel: "—Hk?!"

Lost in what he ought to do, Abel arranged his limbs as to diminish the impact, but before that could happen, he was forcefully met with a soft sensation.

Unconsciously holding his breath, Abel's body rebounded, and he fell on top of that sensation once again. Repeating that countless times for a brief moment, Abel came to notice he was bouncing on a spread-out cloth.

Someone had spread out piles of cloth beneath the descending Abel, thus catching his fall.

Digesting the reality of his narrow escape from death, Abel rolled off the cloth right away, and off its edge he placed a foot on firm ground. While on one knee, he raised his face in order to ascertain the doer of said deed—

???: "—Weeeell~, the time for the commandment has arrived!"

Abel: "…"

???: "Are you His Excellency, or perhaps His Excellency? Either way, the Great Disaster has come around! Won't you fight against the Great Disaster together with me?!"

Are you really so delighted with the fulfillment of the prophecy?

Spreading his arms, both his demeanor and voice were joyful and far too out-of-place, with the battle between the titanic Moguro and the Cloud Dragon causing the demolition of the city to his back, the man—Ubilk, smiled.

Celebrating the moment in which the commandment he had been granted as a Stargazer, had, without a doubt, been materialized.

3

The thunderous boom of the walls breaking reverberated, violently shaking the Crystal Palace. Upon being convinced that something decisive had occurred, Berstetz Fondalfon entered the throne room.

And then—

Berstetz: "—Is that, Chisha-dono?"

The wall of the throne room had crumbled, and amidst the freshly scattered dust, Berstetz found the form of the black-haired Emperor toppled atop the scarlet carpet, thus lowering the corners of his slit eyes in gloom.

Walking closer towards it, he saw that the body, collapsed face-down, had been punctured on its chest. The heart that ought to have been beating within had exploded, the thread of life had been cut.

Though he was not a military officer, he understood with a glance. It had been an instant death. There had been no time to even feel pain.

Berstetz: "Considering what we have done, this could be said to be quite the merciful end."

Ever since he had committed treason, raising a rebellion against the Emperor, Vincent Vollachia, Berstetz had resigned himself to the fact that his death would not be a peaceful one whatsoever.

As an accomplice, Chisha should have steeled a similar resolve as well.

But then again—

Berstetz: “Though, from my discussion with the Stargazer, it seems you had set your eyes on something different than me.”

Though a clear act of treachery, Berstetz had no intent of condemning it.

Rather, his true feelings were those of admiration.

In order to gain that which one desired, they must exhaust all of their strength in attempted pursuit; such was the Empire’s essence.

Neither Berstetz nor Chisha possessed the fighting strength needed to abide by the Empire’s mantra, but they were alike in the sense that they both compensated for what they lacked with their ingenuity.

The new form of the Empire constructed by the Emperor, Vincent Vollachia, had also recognized and certified that as a form of strength.

Berstetz had also approved of that way of doing things in the Empire, and adhering to it, Chisha had made a magnificent example.

With his own strength. —As a man of the Vollachian Empire, that was a deed of honor.

Berstetz: “Although, it seems it will be difficult to find the time to speak words of praise.”

Looking down at the corpse, Berstetz gazed at the hole in the wall where a gale was blowing in. On the other side, he could ascertain the presence of an enormous body, colored like rocks, in motion—the presence of Moguro Hagane.

Given these circumstances, it would be strange if Moguro had killed Chisha.

In his position, Moguro was supposedly an ally of Chisha, the latter playing the part of Emperor. Chisha’s cause of death had been a blow through the chest, but it would have been impossible for Moguro’s giant body to execute a strike with such precision.

If there was concern to be had, it was of the strange words that the Stargazer—that Ubilk, had left behind as he passed by Berstetz, the outside of the Crystal Palace the place he was heading to.

Berstetz: "The Great Disaster, and the ruin it brings… Just, what is it that I am unaware of in the Empire?"

???: "—My my, has nobody informed you? In that case, shall I fill you in?"

Berstetz: "…"

His cheeks stiffening upon suddenly hearing a voice, Berstetz slowly turned his gaze back.

His eyes, directed towards the large hole, turned back to the collapsed remains of the Emperor. Then, he cast his gaze further upwards, to the deepest part of the throne room—to the throne.

Even as the entire castle yet shook from the impacts, the throne went without moving, firm in its position. As the national flag depicting the Sword Wolf swayed in the wind, before it was a silhouette, resting chin in hand.

Augustly sitting on the throne where His Excellency the Emperor ought to be sat, the figure looked down upon Berstetz.

Berstetz: "—Wha…"

Properly speaking, Berstetz should have raised a stern voice, should have reproached the disrespect of the person sat upon the throne.

However, he was incapable of doing so. It was true that he had been rendered speechless due to the shock, but above that, Berstetz did not possess the qualifications to reproach them.

In this Vollachian Empire, the position of Prime Minister ranked second after the Emperor and the Imperial Family in terms of authority.

It was possible to say that the Generals of the First-Class extolled as the Nine Divine Generals held a similar rank, but more important was the fact that there was almost nobody in the country that Berstetz, with the position of Prime Minister, could not reproach.

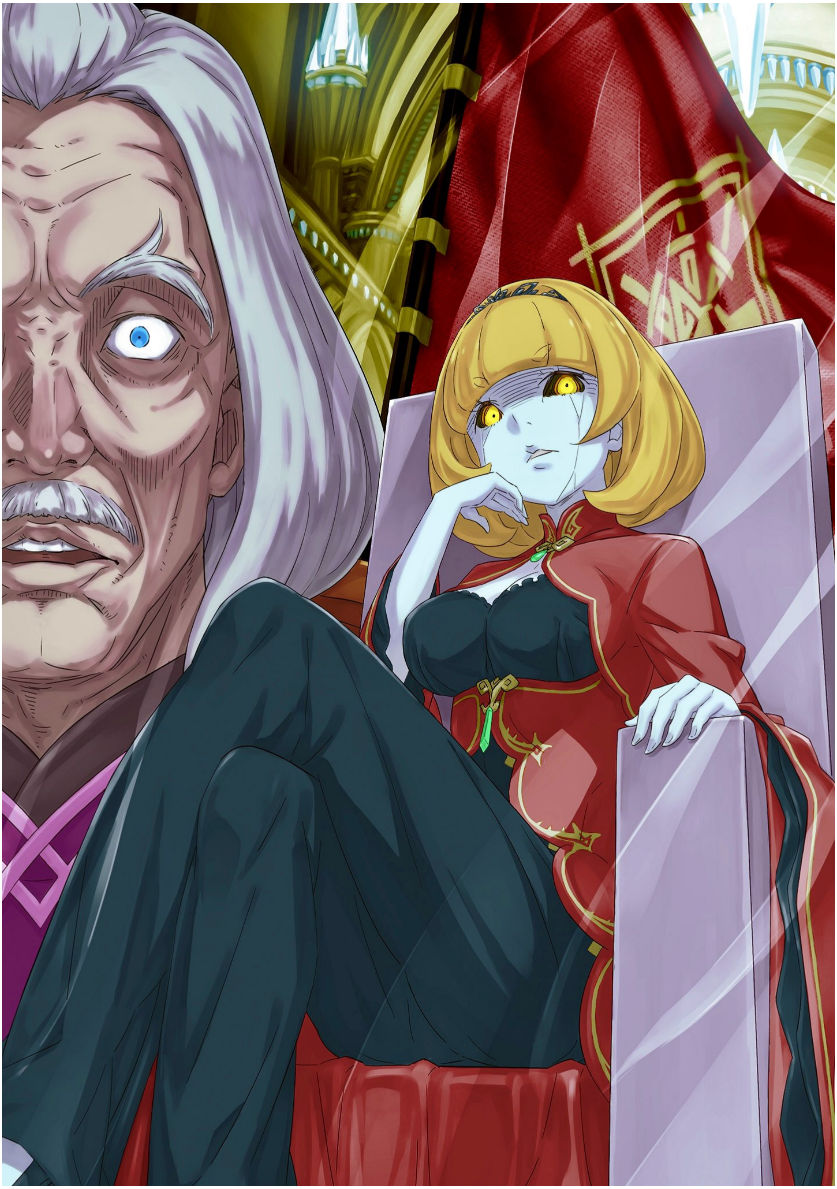
Nevertheless, Berstetz had been unable to rebuke the other party.

The reason was—

???: “To think you would yet live, you are quite tenacious, Berstetz. —Say, who won the Imperial Selection Ceremony? Vincent-niisama? Or was it Prisca?”

Cracks formed on her pale and beautiful face, the member of the Imperial Family of Vollachia spoke.

The master whom Berstetz Fondalfon had served priorly, the Imperial Princess who was supposed to have perished, having suffered defeat in the Imperial Selection Ceremony, Lamia Godwin, leisurely crossed her legs atop the throne.



Chapter 109: Sword Wolf of the Empire

1

He was reminded of an aggravating affair.

As per his recollections, Petra had been the one talking.

Petra: “The Master has a very bad personality. His speech is shabby, he pesters people, and he seems to enjoy being scolded, which is weird at times, but he is really good at teaching.”

Being unable to unfairly demean a person because she did not like them was Petra’s nature, even though she was not willing to admit it.

Garfiel and Petra were close in age, so was it perhaps safe to say they were even friends? He liked Petra’s noble nature, no wonder Frederica was so taken with her.

In terms of loss-prone personalities, Garfiel’s love for Subaru and Otto was probably of the same vein. After all, blood proved the siblings.

If so, Garfiel had to admit that too.

Roswaal L. Mathers was a love rival, a malcontent in the Camp who had plotted unforgivable misdeeds, and a natural enemy that he had never liked since long ago.

Still, Roswaal’s teachings were spot on, and that had kept him alive.

Roswaal: “Garfiel, that’s a shuriken. It’s coated with poison. Even if you avoid it, it’ll explode. What is the right move?”

Garfiel: “You’re a tad slow, ain’t’cha!”

Howling, Garfiel stomped on the ground, and immediately afterward, the earth rose up to protect the two of them as a shield.

The light sound of a shuriken piercing into the wall of earth, followed by the sound of an explosion, scorched the atmosphere.

As Roswaal had predicted, correctly so, damage could not have been avoided had it been parried with his gauntlets.

His sharp fangs creaked due to that fact—

Garfiel: “Who’s next?”

Roswaal: “I am.”

With an immediate answer to his question, Garfiel turned to Roswaal behind him.

A moment later, Roswaal used the sai in both his hands to knock away a kunai thrown at him. Seeing a shadow flashing above his head, Garfiel launched his fist in its direction, bereft of hesitation.

There was a ringing sound, and the strike of Garfiel’s fist was met with a kick with the outer part of a foot, delivered mid-flip.

That attack had been unleashed by Olbart, who had ceased his skull-shattering attack on Roswaal’s head. The monstrous old man countered Garfiel’s fists with his legs, all while saying,

Olbart: “Damn, this really is turnin’ out ta be a problem. Ain’t two against one unfair?”

Garfiel: “Don’t try ‘n change the rules now, old fart!”

Olbart: “Kakakakka! I’m free ta say anythin’ I wanna.”

Drawing back his foot from where it had impacted the fist, and using it as a springboard, Olbart leapt towards the back. For a moment, Garfiel was about to step forward to follow up,

Garfiel: “…”

A shuriken, swooping in from his side, passed right under his nose as he stopped, slashing through the air.

Letting it sail by, Garfiel exhaled deeply. Roswaal, right next to Garfiel, changed his expression as he re-gripped his sai.

Garfiel's lips curved at the sight.

Garfiel: "What'cha smilin' at?"

Roswaal: "Nothing, nothing. Well, I was just admiring the remarkable speed of your growth. Even without me saying anything, you've managed to anticipate the surprise attack just now. You're learning things as you fight."

Garfiel: "You're sayin' I'm just bein' sly, ain't'cha? And my amazin' self ain't gonna be as shitty as you or that old man."

Roswaal: "It takes talent to be nefarious, you know. The way I see it, you don't have the predisposition to be nefarious. You're about on par with Emily."

Garfiel: "Of course not! Don't put me in the same basket as her!"

He snapped at Roswaal's remark, but after he himself voiced that out loud, he reflected, concluding that that reaction would have possibly hurt Emilia had she heard it.

Either way, his mind was on Emilia and the other members of the Camp who were probably on the battlefield like Garfiel, and on those who were fighting alongside them. He took a deep breath as he thought of Heinkel and the Shudraqian women, as he thought of Ram's safety as well, the latter having joined them.

Olbart: "Ya got a lotta time on yer hands, don't'cha? Yer people are in a tough spot, ain't they? I'm sure we got a stronger lineup than ya do."

Garfiel: "—Hk."

Olbart's words frustrated Garfiel's attempts to regain his composure and face the situation.

The feeling of having one's mind read would make one suspicious that their intentions could be predicted on the battlefield, a situation most undesirable.

But next to the impatient Garfiel, Roswaal shrugged,

Roswaal: “Your opponent wants you to get heated. In your case, that could eliminate any hesitation, but it’s not good to mix impurities into your fervor. In addition…”

Garfiel: “In addition?”

Roswaal: “He’s been quite chatty to begin with, but haven’t the number of attempts to deceive us through words increased? Seems like the old man is also getting quite irritated.”

Olbart: “—. You’re a disgustin’ young’un, ain’t’cha?”

As he spoke, the glint in Olbart’s long, brow-covered eyes took on a shine of vexation.

And, after hearing Roswaal’s statement, Garfiel realized an obvious truth—His opponent was as annoyed by this battle dragging on as he himself was.

Olbart laughed, provoked, teased, not because he could afford to, but because he wanted his opponents to believe that he had room to, so that he would gain the mental upper hand.

Whereas with Garfiel, his feelings could immediately be seen in his face, voice, and fur.

Thus, in this sort of psychological warfare, one could win in the blink of an eye by leading their opponent by the nose.

Roswaal: “Even so, you can win provided you surpass your opponent’s strength and they play on the same field you do. However…”

Garfiel: “I know. If a bastard stronger than my amazin’ self only fights in the field I’m good at, then no matter how hard I try, I won’t be able to see a way to win. But…”

The fact that Garfiel was now fighting in the Vollachian Empire was the result of a rather unfortunate combination of various coincidental events.

However, what the dice had rolled mattered not; there was no denying the reality before him.

And in the years to come, battles comparable to this one in the Empire could befall him without end, as long as he was with Emilia and Subaru.

That was to say—

Garfiel: "—Done with whinin'."

Roswaal: "Mhm, that's right. That's good. This is the end of your boyhood."

Garfiel wrinkled his nose at Roswaal's histrionics.

For Garfiel, being congratulated or praised for his growth by Roswaal was nothing to be happy about. However, he liked that expression, "end of boyhood".

From this point onward, Garfiel would continue forward as someone who had matured.

Olbart: "—Dear, oh dear. This is why I hate young'uns. Unlike this old man who's got no room ta grow, y'all can reach enlightenment on a dime."

As he twisted his neck and shook the ankle of the foot that he had off the ground, Olbart sighed.

However, the Vicious Old Man's light-hearted derogation contained genuine hostility. —Yes, hostility. Up till this moment, Olbart had considered Garfiel to be of a lower rank, aiming to eliminate him.

It was proof that Garfiel had finally been recognized as an enemy.

Garfiel: "Finally…"

Garfiel's blood was red-hot with enthusiasm for earning the right to go toe-to-toe with Olbart.

He breathed in through his nose again, loudly and deeply, and exhaled through his mouth. Then, he became conscious of the blood circulating in his body and his power that could not be seen—.

Olbart: “Ahhn?”

Suddenly, a dumb-sounding voice was uttered, disturbing Garfiel’s concentration.

It had been uttered by Olbart standing in front of him; for a moment he believed it to be a shinobi technique to disturb his composure. However, it was not.

Because, that opening had been born in Olbart, rather.

Garfiel: “…”

He was the head honcho of the shinobi. The opening that had arisen was as small as the eye of a needle, but Garfiel could not help but gasp, as he had never shown such laxness before.

What in the world had brought it about—

???: “—Waitwaitwait! It’s unfair to withdraw in the middle like this, it’s a waste, you’re not reading the mood! Pretty sure I’m right on the mark on you being even more unable to read the mood than I, aren’t I?!”

There was a figure running across the battlefield, raising a noisy voice and leaving behind a cloud of dust.

A small boy who gave the impression that he was out-of-place on the battlefield was calling out in a shrill, high-pitched voice from a considerable distance—However, the speed at which he ran was unusual.

The screaming boy was looking up at the sky, chasing a huge being as it flapped its wings.

Garfiel understood at first glance that it was the Dragon that had landed on another battlefield a distance away from here. He understood that, but this situation where boy and Dragon were playing tag was one beyond his comprehension.

A battlefield where anything could happen, although he had a strong hunch on that—

Olbart: "…Why's that bastard Ceci so small?"

Garfiel's eyes narrowed at the incomprehensible sight, but a subdued voice reached his ears.

Olbart, standing on one leg and still yielding an opening akin to the eye of a needle, was distracted by the Dragon and the boy—or rather, the screaming boy.

And then—

Olbart: "Well, Chesshy, you've taken my style, haven't'cha?"

The old man's clouded eyes filled with surprise and suspicion, after which they eventually turned clear and were instead filled with anger.

It was an emotional change that had lasted less than ten seconds, yet he had no idea what thought process had brought forth this change in Olbart.

But, if it was one of only a handful of openings that the Vicious Old Man had made in his life, the devious Roswaal was not going to overlook it.

Roswaal: "—You must really be unaware of the situation if you can afford to look away from him with how he is right now."

Thrusting the tip of the sai he was tightly grasping, Roswaal stepped into the needle-thin opening which had arisen.

His immediate reaction disturbed, the strike grazed Olbart's left shoulder as he twisted around. The speeding mass of iron had connected with Olbart's shoulder, causing the old man to gnash his teeth as his diminutive figure melted into the ground.

It was the technique of swimming through the earth, which he had displayed several times during this battle.

But—

Roswaal: “Garfiel!”

Garfiel: “I know!”

As irritating as Roswaal’s advice was, he could already see the strategy in the making.

After all, Garfiel’s Divine Protection of Earth Spirits was a Divine Protection that drew Mana from the ground via the soles of his feet. In other words, it connected him to the earth.

Even if an opponent was under the ground, if he concentrated, tracking their position would be—.

Garfiel: “—Ah?”

Suddenly, all the hairs on Garfiel’s body stood on end as he was seized by a strange sensation.

He felt a repulsive sensation, as if his neck was being licked by a tongue which felt strangely coarse. That sensation was not coming from Olbart in front of him, but from a much larger, wider area.

Roswaal: “Garfiel?”

In response to the motionless Garfiel, Roswaal raised a questioning voice.

Not entirely in response to Olbart’s earlier comment, Garfiel also yielded an opening. An opening that the monstrous old man would surely have exploited.

However, there was no attack. On the contrary—

Roswaal: “The traces of the old man, they vanished?”

Roswaal muttered, frowning his shapely brow and going without relaxing the grip on his sai.

He was correct; signs of Olbart's presence were supposed to be there, but none were present. Of course, the opponent was a shinobi. He likely knew how to hide his presence to the greatest possible extent.

Yet, that was not the case. Olbart's presence below ground seemed to be getting distant.

He was moving away from Garfiel and Roswaal at breakneck speed, and then—

Garfiel: "What the fuck‘s this feelin'…"

Roswaal: "Garfiel, the old man is—"

Garfiel: "It's strange, disgustin' even, it's like "the winds of Aihiya corrupt the water"…"

Roswaal, still wary of Olbart, did not share the sense of danger with Garfiel.

If he could not feel it, then it was probably not Mana that was causing the disturbance. It was a huge, tremendous sensation which Garfiel could feel underfoot drawing near.

—It was a feeling that Garfiel, who possessed the Divine Protection of Earth Spirits, noticed most quickly.

Garfiel: "The soil of the battlefield… No, the earth of Vollachia, is running wild?"

Garfiel could feel the horrifying screams of the vast earth.

Any resentment that the battle had been left unfinished, or that the opportunity to break one of the walls had been lost, dissipated before the weight of what stood in their way.

Garfiel: "Roswaal! Fly right now ‘n let everyone know!"

Roswaal: "…"

Garfiel, forgetting the pseudonym he was meant to use in the Empire, called out to him; Roswaal did not interject, perhaps out of respect for the urgency of the situation.

Garfiel shouted with a sense of urgency, in spite of his hatred of the other party.

It was—

Garfiel: "—All of Vollachia's gonna turn into enemies!"

2

—Lamia Godwin was one of the daughters of Drizen Vollachia, the Seventy-Sixth Emperor of the Vollachian Empire, an Imperial Princess defeated and killed in a conflict against Vincent Abellux and Prisca Benedict, in the Imperial Selection Ceremony.

In the Imperial Selection Ceremony, brothers and sisters were forced to kill each other until a single one remained; yet she had formed an alliance with her other siblings to defeat Vincent, who had been viewed as the one most likely to take the Emperor's throne, as she excelled in cornering her opposition through the excellent usage of schemes and traps.

However, her plan had failed to disprove what had been speculated at the start. The alliance collapsed, and in the end, she had lost her life in a duel with her sister, Prisca, being that there was no love lost between the two.

Among those involved in the Imperial Selection Ceremony, it would often be stated that she would have won the throne given her age and capacity at the time. Had it not been, for Vincent.

However, defeat was still defeat. Upon facing a cold, hard, and irrefutable reality, Lamia's body was reduced to cinders by the flames of the Yang Sword. That, too, was supposedly a cold, hard, and irrefutable reality.

And yet—

Berstetz: "Your Excellency Lamia, but how…"

Berstetz would normally keep his eyes closed and narrow, but now they had opened just enough to allow one to ascertain the gray coloration of his pupils, betraying his astonishment towards the person before him.

What Berstetz's trembling vision beheld was none other than the countenance of his master Lamia Godwin, a countenance still vivid in his memory, but now sitting on the throne with the flag fluttering in the wind to the back.

Excepting, however, the cracked, bloodless white face she now donned, and the beautiful red irises that had transformed into an eerie golden glow standing out amidst pitch-black darkness.

Lamia: "Berstetz, did you not hear my question? Has Vincent-niisama won the Imperial Selection Ceremony? Was it Prisca? It cannot be, was it Palladio-niisama, of all people? It would be nightmarish, were anyone else besides those two to vie for the throne after my defeat."

Berstetz: "—. His Excellency Vincent Abellux ascended to the throne after the defeat of Your Excellency. To the present time, he has continued to reign for nine years."

Lamia: "However, he has died. Is that the answer to what is lying beneath my feet?"

Cutting off Berstetz's words, Lamia looked over the prone corpse as she rested her chin upon her hand. While unable to discern the face from her position, she was able to tell the body apart from those of her other blood siblings.

Technically, Berstetz had surmised that the fallen Vincent was in fact not the real Vincent, but rather Chisha Gold in disguise, though that was beside the point.

Berstetz: "With all due respect, Your Excellency Lamia, but would you lend me an ear?"

Lamia: "What is it, Berstetz? You have been a faithful henchman of mine. If you have any questions, then I shall answer them."

Berstetz: “For what reason have you returned? If I may add, the throne is reserved for none other than the Emperor of Vollachia to sit upon. —You do not possess that qualification, Your Excellency.”

Berstetz uttered this fully aware that it would have been disrespectful and that it would give rise to displeasure within his conversational partner.

At one time, he had served and had done everything in his power to raise her as the worthy successor to take the throne of the Vollachian Empire. Back then, he would have been delighted had he witnessed Lamia sitting on the Imperial Throne in such a manner.

—Welling up in the depths of his chest were boiling, unbearable hatred and anger.

Berstetz: “Make a wise decision, Your Excellency. We were defeated.”

With a reverent hand against his chest, Berstetz advised Lamia as he had once done.

When she was still young, but beautiful and intelligent, Lamia had the flexibility to listen to Berstetz’s recommendations, take them seriously, reflect and digest them, and let them guide her to the right answer.

This cunning, poisonous virtue of Lamia—

Lamia: “You have fallen sick, Berstetz. No matter how much you love and devote yourself to it, this country will never repay you.”

Tilting her neck, Lamia responded, her expression unchanging as if frozen solid; and Berstetz acted immediately in return.

The ring on his finger had glinted mysteriously once he turned his hand on his chest toward Lamia.

A Meteor it was, given to Berstetz as a mark of being the Prime Minister.

Berstetz: "Prepare yourself—!"

Berstetz's will had elicited a response, and from the glowing ring's jewel, a fireball shot out.

It was something Vincent too possessed for the sake of self-defense, and it released the Mana accumulated within it as magic, an attack towards the one whom Berstetz had once sworn fidelity to—No, towards one who bore her likeness.

Just like that, Lamia defenseless on the throne was engulfed by the fireball—

Lamia: "Fool. Of all things, you employ fire against a member of the Imperial Family of Vollachia."

The subsequent moment, dazzling red light illuminated the throne room, and the flame was bisected diagonally, going in two different directions. Lamia and the throne avoided the blast, given its momentum, which in turn crashed into the wall upon which the flag had been draped, giving rise to flames.

If left unattended, that conflagration could spread to the flag, then engulf the entire Crystal Palace in flames. However, Berstetz's attention was focused on what was in front of him, rather than on the Crystal Palace's future.

Rising from the throne, Lamia held in her hand a glowing treasured sword of crimson.

That unmistakable form was the pride and joy of the Vollachian Empire—

Berstetz: "—The Yang Sword Vollachia."

Lamia: "It is only natural for someone of Vollachia's Imperial Family to possess it, yes?"

Once more Berstetz opened his eyes to a width on par to the width of a normal person's squinting eyes, and reflected within them was Lamia leaping toward him, holding the brilliant Yang Sword in her hand.

With a swing, Lamia's slash loomed. Were that dazzling crimson no forgery, Berstetz's existence would be torched, not even ashes would remain.

He had to move, but he was not able to.

He had not been trained in that way, and, more importantly, he was blinded by the radiance of it all.

The radiance of the Yang Sword, symbol of the Vollachian Empire —.

Lamia: "Goodbye, Berste—"

A flash of light fell upon Berstetz, and even he himself understood at that moment that his life, that the life of this wicked man, who had pretended to be a loyal subject and had shaken the Empire to its very foundations, was arriving at its terminus.

???: "Nuuuuun!!"

The great door of the throne room was suddenly smashed open from the outside, and something flew in from the other side with tremendous force. Its speed unchecked, it flew directly into Lamia, who had been swinging her blade at Berstetz, blowing away the Imperial Princess's thin body with a "Guh".

Lamia: "Wha…"

Feeling that his imminent death was growing distant, Berstetz came to see that what had collided with Lamia was a battle-axe which had been thrown. It was one of the weapons held by a set of armor arranged in the hall of the Crystal Palace in front of the throne room, a gleaming piece with ceremonial decorations.

Even so, the battle-axe had always been well-cared for, kept ready to be used on the battlefield, since not displaying weapons that were actually useless was not the imperial way.

And thus, it had stopped Lamia on her tracks from her front, blowing her away towards the back of the throne room with terrific momentum.

Berstetz: “Who did…”

Has thrown that axe, was the doubt Berstetz harbored. He turned around, but before he could confirm who it was, loud footsteps approached him at once,

???: “Traitorous retainer, Berstetz Fondalfon! I was against keeping someone like you as Prime Minister the whole time!!”

Berstetz was grabbed by the collar and lifted to his feet by a huge hand, which forced him to face a bearded giant of a man. The titan was endowed with a loud voice that befitted his large body, and a stern face that looked as if it had been tailor-made especially for him.

His naked upper body was covered by an armor of well-trained muscle, and his vigor had not diminished in the slightest, even though he had been in captivity for more than a month—

Berstetz: “General First-Class Goz Ralfon…”

Goz: “You will be tried in public! Of course, General First-Class Chisha, who planned and carried out this treason, is just as guilty! Regardless of your true intentions, you are guilty of plotting against His Excellency and your own allies!”

Berstetz: “…”

Goz: “In the first place! Do not underestimate us officers and our soldiers! No matter how many hardships we may face, the Great Disaster will be crushed by our combined efforts!”

The giant who had spoken loudly, Goz Ralfon.

He was one of the Nine Divine Generals of the Empire, ranked Fifth. A man who, due to his loyalty and unfortunate timing, had become the second victim of Berstetz and Chisha’s schemes, Vincent being the first.

However, as his interference had aided Vincent in his escape from the Imperial Capital, Berstetz could not be lenient on him for the sake of his own objective.

It was the way of the world, and the imperial way itself, that one side would win and the other would lose when both sides gave their all for their own cause. Therefore, he did not feel even a bit like apologizing for that.

Berstetz: “Why are you here… You were supposed to be chained up in the basement of my mansion.”

Goz: “A brave girl rescued me! She possesses a strong heart… You were out of luck to have trapped her alongside me! She is a lady the Vollachian Empire should be proud of!”

Berstetz: “…I see, it was her, huh.”

Berstetz’s mind flashed to the blue-haired girl he had been holding captive in his mansion.

She was a valuable user of healing magic and, according to Madelyn, she was a young girl from the Oni Clan. He had intended to make her a candidate for the Emperor’s consort, both in terms of her abilities and her race.

He had evaluated her as a strong-willed and vibrant woman, but apparently that had still been an underestimation.

He intended to not get too hung up on that, though, now that the failure of the plan had become apparent.

However, what was worrisome concerning the truth of Goz’s appearance—

Berstetz: “General First-Class Goz, have you already heard about the Great Disaster?”

Goz: “I have not heard the details! However, I have heard that it would happen at the cost of His Excellency’s life! I must inquire Chisha about that as well… But my priority is His Excellency’s life! Where are you keeping His Excellency, you…”

Responding in an unnecessarily loud voice, Goz announced his intentions to Berstetz.

Internally, Berstetz had admired, and even resented, the fact that Chisha had kept the Great Disaster completely to himself, even though it had reached even Goz, but that was all he felt.

Halfway through his words, Goz had noticed something, his eyes widening.

And then—

Goz: “Wha, ah…, Hi-His Excellency… HIS EXCELLENCYYYY!”

With a scream, Goz crumpled to his knees. Berstetz, thrown by the momentum, fell to the floor on his buttocks, but Goz did not care as he clung to the corpse before him—to the corpse that had collapsed on the red carpet, the corpse that would move nevermore.

From Goz’s widened eyes tears streamed, absorbed by his thick beard. The tears pressing down his beard, he pounded his large fist against the carpet with force,

Goz: “Your Excellency…! This Goz Ralfon, was too late…! What folly! What an act of folly! No longer can this folly be atoned for except by death…!”

Berstetz: “G-General First-Class Goz! Please remain calm! That man is…”

Goz: “This is no situation to remain calm in! Damn you, Prime Minister Berstetz! Are you satisfied with this?! You have taken the life of His Excellency, and now this very Empire itself—”

Berstetz: “The deceased is General First-Class Chisha!”

Berstetz loudly silenced Goz, who had been furious at the Emperor’s corpse, which had been pierced through the chest.

Opening his eyes wide towards Berstetz, who had let out a yell seldom heard from him, Goz then carefully examined the lying corpse,

Goz: “This is General First-Class Chisha…? Ridiculous! If so, then what happened!”

Berstetz: “Even I do not know the details of the situation. However, I think that the death of General First-Class Chisha in the guise of His Excellency and this unprecedented situation… may have something to do with the Great Disaster.”

Having calmed Goz and his flurry of emotions, Berstetz had also organized his own thoughts.

Perhaps his death as Emperor and the rebellion he had committed with Berstetz were all part of a plot hatched by Chisha Gold.

And this had not been unrelated to the events of the Great Disaster that had popped up time and again.

If anyone did know anything about the Great Disaster, it would be —

???: “—That is just awful, all of a sudden. I have not been treated like this in all my life and in my death.”

Goz: “…”

A quiet voice could be heard from the back of the room.

Lamia’s voice, who was supposed to have been blown away, felled by a blow from violent throw of a battle-axe performed by Goz barging in.

Before proceeding, let it be clear that her presence had not been forgotten.

Despite his subsequent boisterous exchange with Goz, Berstetz had not bothered to mention her because the power in that battle-axe had been, without a doubt, deadly.

Goz Ralfon was a General admired by many others in the troops, second only to Chisha Gold in terms of commanding large armies; but he was also possessed of outstanding individual combat skills in comparison with the latter.

Were Goz to unleash an attack with the intention of defeating an opponent, the body of an average man would be maimed in a single hit, if said average man were on the receiving end.

However, for Lamia, that had not been so. —At least, not strictly speaking.

Lamia: “Well, this body… It does not seem to feel any pain, so I guess that is a relief.”

Saying this, Lamia stood up and tilted her head as she slowly connected the right half of her body together—which had been shattered like pottery.

No jest nor metaphor in that expression, it had been spoken in its truest sense. There had been no blood flowing from the wounds, the crushed parts wriggled and combined together like ice filling out a lake.

But, things did not end with the fact that someone who was supposed to be dead had come back to life, suddenly reanimated.

Goz: “Prime Minister Berstetz, if I am not mistaken, that person is…”

Berstetz: “—. This is Her Excellency Lamia Godwin. She passed away nine years ago during the Imperial Selection Ceremony.”

Goz: “Why is Her Excellency the Imperial Princess, who is supposed to have died in the Imperial Selection Ceremony, doing this?! And I even attacked Her Excellency Lamia?! Do not tell me that His Excellency the Emperor kept his sister alive?!”

Berstetz: “That cannot possibly be the case. His Excellency Vincent Vollachia has no attachment to such sentiments. Considering her strange appearance, it is Her Excellency Lamia who is the problem.”

Having corrected Goz’s reflexive shortsightedness, Berstetz took a close look at Lamia, who was still restoring her body, and arrived at this conclusion.

If possible, he would prefer prolonging the conversation with Lamia to obtain more information.

Berstetz: “It was no one else but me who closed the window for negotiations.”

Lamia: “Yes, so it seems. Even though I was intending to talk this out in proper fashion. So, what happened?”

Berstetz: “That is a good question. Perhaps I was getting desperate, thinking that my allies would betray me as I take on this last great challenge in my life. I am quite surprised by this side of mine.”

Goz: “This is not the time to say that!! Your Excellency Lamia! I am Goz Ralfon, a General First-Class serving His Excellency the Emperor Vincent Vollachia! If you would oblige and let yourself get tied up!”

After Goz had launched a preemptive strike, Lamia would likely turn a deaf ear even after stating her willingness to talk.

As Lamia affirmed this, Goz took a large step towards her. Even with his battle-axe no longer in his hands, his arms were still as thick as logs.

Even with the power of the Yang Sword and the physical enhancements that accompanied its wielding, Lamia’s ability should not have been sufficient to stop Goz.

Even though Lamia was not supposed to be the type that was unable to understand the difference in strength between both of them—

Lamia: “I refuse doing such a thing. I am not going to have my freedom taken away right after awakening again.”

Goz: “Then, by force…”

Lamia: “—Besides, you know?”

Thinking that she was not willing to listen, Goz was already about to take an even larger step forth, and it happened.

Lamia’s bewitching golden eyes flickered, and the situation changed. —As shadows dwelling in the selfsame pitch-dark goldeness arose around her one after the other.

Goz: “What the hell?!”

Goz cried out in horror, Berstetz also lost his voice as he choked up.

As if shadows had risen from the ground, more eerie-looking figures with the same eyes and cracked skin, which had lost their color like Lamia’s, appeared.

That alone was astonishing, but Berstetz’s and Goz’s shock did not end there.

There was also the fact that they recognized everyone who had risen—

Lamia: “—I pity you for clinging to an Empire that will end regardless.”

As she stated this, Lamia raised the Yang Sword to the heavens. In the same manner, more than two dozen figures around her all reached for the heavens as well, unsheathing their treasured swords of crimson; all members of the Imperial Family in possession of the qualification that allowed them to not be burnt away.

3

—The battle between the Eighth, Moguro Hagane, and the previous and current Ninths, Madelyn Eschart and Balleroy Temeglyph, continued raging in the Crystal Palace’s proximity.

The extraordinary battle that unfolded within its immediate vicinity was a clash between gigantic ramparts in the shape of a human and a cloud-clad Dragon; and with the addition of the Empire’s most powerful flying dragon rider, it turned into a fierce battle that would go down in the history of the Empire.

The thunderous roar, the rumbling of the earth were the very screams of the Vollachian Empire, the water streaming out of the destroyed reservoir turning into a wave of mud flowing into the Imperial Capital.

The Imperial Capital of Lupugana—or rather, the Sacred Vollachian Empire itself was in the midst of an unprecedented upheaval that foreshadowed its destruction.

And yet, despite these circumstances—

???: “Are you His Excellency, or perhaps His Excellency? Either way, the Great Disaster has come around! Won’t you fight against the Great Disaster together with me?!”

The Stargazer, with his arms outstretched and a broad smile on his face, not looking at the crumbling streets of the Imperial Capital, was more than out-of-place; he was nightmarish, carelessly trampling on the understanding of ordinary people.

But alas. The one confronted with the Stargazer’s eccentric smile was the one person who had the least permission to be ordinary in this Empire.

Abel: “…”

For a moment, Abel glanced behind the curtain at the miracle that had saved his life.

What had saved Abel from falling from a great height was a cloth stretched to the max placed exactly where he had fallen, an improvised cushioning material gathered from the rooms of the Crystal Palace and the surrounding buildings.

He could understand the mechanism that had saved him. The question was, why could it have been prepared?

This sort of preparation would be unfeasible unless one knew that someone—no, that Abel would fall there.

Abel: “How much did you know?!”

The moment he reached that conclusion, Abel’s outstretched hand grabbed the smiling Ubilk by the chest. He pulled him to his feet forcefully, and Ubilk bellowed an “Owowow”, his eyes widening.

Face-to-face, directly in front of him, sparing no quarter Abel stared at Ubilk, and,

Abel: “Chisha’s plan… No, that is not it. How far in advance did you know whose death would bring about the Great Disaster? You said that it would be my death that—”

Ubilk: “Yeah, I did say that. —That Vincent Vollachia’s death would be the beginning of the Great Disaster that will bring ruin to the Empire.”

Abel glared at him from a distance their breaths could be felt, but Ubilk’s relaxed demeanor did not falter. Perhaps it was not so much composure, but rather it was a different kind of disgusting anticipation or exuberance.

In fact, Ubilk was in high spirits, as if at last the opportunity he had been waiting for had arrived.

But—

Abel: “Vincent Vollachia is I.”

Ubilk: “No, no! Your Excellency! That’s wrong. That’s nooot~ true. I’ll say it out loud; that’s incorrect, Your Excellency.”

Abel: “…”

Ubilk: “General First-Class Chisha Gold has unquestionably fulfilled the role of Vincent Vollachia. His Excellency himself, of all people, had molded General Chisha Gold to do so.”

Abel: “I…”

It was not for that purpose that he had kept Chisha Gold by his side.

Upon the Great Disaster’s arrival, he would need someone with the ability to take charge of everything within the Empire to replace the helpless Emperor who would be unable to be present; that was his belief.

Someone who, after Vincent’s death, would cooperate with a worthy successor and save the Empire.

Abel: “Why did you take part in this plan?”

Ubilk: “What’s that?”

Abel: “As a Stargazer, you are only interested in the fulfillment and implementation of your commandment. Then, if you wished to ensure that the Great Disaster would happen, you should have made use of my life. Why did you decide to go along with Chisha’s uncertain plans? It is nonsensical.”

A Stargazer was a commandment’s puppet in human form.

No matter how much they could possibly have pretended to be likable or accommodating, what lay inside was naught but an obsession with their commandment and a fanatical desire to fulfill it.

His priorities should have been clear. So, why had he sided with Chisha’s plan?

Abel: “What was your reason? Answer me.”

Ubilk: “Ummm~, I think you’d be offended if I were to say it, Your Excellency.”

Abel: “Speak.”

Ubilk: “Well, it doesn’t really matter to me whether it was His Excellency himself or General First-Class Chisha. It’d be good if the Great Disaster happened, and it’d be bad if it didn’t. If it didn’t happen even after General First-Class Chisha died in the guise of His Excellency, then I’d have to do sooomething~ about His Excellency himself… Do you get what I’m saying?”

Abel: “—. In that case, is this situation what you had hoped for?”

With that, Abel quietly gained an understanding, as Ubilk stuck out his tongue in a mischievous manner. At the same time, he comprehended that talking to Ubilk any further would be of no use.

Releasing his grip on Ubilk’s collar, Abel slowly turned around. Reflected in his eyes through the oni mask, were several figures holding the edge of the cloth that had saved Abel.

None of their faces had ever been seen at the Crystal Palace before, but—

Abel: “These people, are they also a part of your faction?”

Ubilk: “There aren’t enough of us to call it a faction, though, areee~ there?”

Shrugging his shoulders, Ubilk spun around and spread his arms in front of his accomplices. The crowd of roughly ten-odd people, assembled without regard for their age or gender, were presumably Stargazers just like him.

Even if one were to try and cull them, their numbers would increase. Since it was unknown how the pawns of the Observers were selected, he had left them alone despite knowing of their existence.

Ubilk: “As I said, we’re moving in accordance with the commandment. What are you gonna do, Your Excellency?”

Abel: “What am I—”

Going to do? Abel tried to put his thoughts across his tongue as he pondered such.

However, in the middle of responding to Ubilk, the ground was shaken by a particularly loud impact. Some distance away from Abel and everyone else, a part of Moguro’s body fell to the ground, making a large sound.

The battle yet raged on. However, since it was two against one, Moguro’s disadvantage was undeniable.

Balleroy Temeglyph, a man who was supposed to be dead, had been resurrected alongside his beloved dragon.

The worst possibility one could deduce from this, was that it was just not limited to the two of them.

Ubilk: “The turmoil in the Imperial Capital and the crisis in the Empire, events that defy reason are truly a manifestation of the Great Disaster.”

As Abel shielded his face from the dust sprinkling down, Ubilk cocked his chin to point to the sky.

The resurrected dead and the Dragon ran amok, foretelling mounting damage that would probably not end there,

Ubilk: “The Witch of the Kingdom, the Night Weeping of the City-States, the Collapse of the Holy Kingdom, and the Great Disaster of the Empire… The four disasters that will destroy the world. Their time draws near. Even at this very moment.”

Abel: “…”

Ubilk: “Oh, and Your Excellency, this is just my personal opinion, but…”

Ubilk deliberately clapped his hands as if speaking of something that he had failed to mention. Then, the Stargazer pointed overhead to Moguro’s battle—No, he was pointing to something else.

He pointed not to the battle, but to the throne room bearing a sizable hole, which laid in the Crystal Palace, the latter being rocked by the shockwaves of the fierce fight.

Ubilk: “Why did I cooperate with General First-Class Chisha’s scheme, waaas~ it? I’m sincere in saying that I would’ve been fine with both, but… I thought that with Your Excellency, our odds would be better.”

Brazenly laughing, Ubilk lowered the hand that pointed to the Crystal Palace and, in the same motion, pointed it at Abel.

Ubilk: “I prioritize the fulfillment of the commandment. My goal was to start the Great Disaster, and theeen~ to hold back the destruction it’d bring. —I haven’t wavered in my priority.”

A Stargazer was obsessed with the realization and fulfillment of their commandment, a living puppet enslaved to their goal.

That perception remained the same. And without that perception being altered, Ubilk presented the reasons for his actions, the rationale for his choices, and the future that he pursued.

He said that, in order to save the Vollachian Empire from the Great Disaster, he would prioritize Abel.

Abel: “—Chisha Gold, you…”

What kind of future, what kind of expectations had these disguised black eyes, imbued with the color of Vincent Vollachia, imbued with his color, painted?

Why had he not understood that words like “hope” and “dreams” were naught more but silly escapism from reality?

Ubilk: “—Oh?”

An unexpected explosion roared in Abel’s ears as he put his hand to his face and grabbed the cheek of his oni mask. Ubilk let out a silly voice in response, followed by a heavy sound of something falling beside them.

Upon looking at it, Abel came to see that something had fallen onto the cloth that had caught him earlier. However, unlike him, the cloth had not been stretched to help, and it did not fulfill its purpose as cushioning material.

However—

???: “You were correct that this cloth would be laid out! Prime Minister Berstetz! Are you alive?!”

???: “That took quite the toll on this old body, but somehow… Hm.”

Shaking off the cloth that covered them, a large man with his upper body bare and a white-haired old man carried in the former’s arms emerged from under the cloth.

Both of them looked familiar; Abel had never thought that he would run into them here.

Ubilk: “Ohhh~, if that isn’t General First-Class Goz? And Prime Minister Berstetz’s safe, too.”

Berstetz: “One would think you would have long since absconded, yet you are still here…”

Goz: “You! You are the Stargazer who instructed General First-Class Chisha and Prime Minister Berstetz with all these superfluous things! Because of you, His Excellency… His Excellency is…!!”

As the large man—Goz Ralfon, who had apparently jumped down from the large hole in the Crystal Palace, so stated, he approached Ubilk while carrying Prime Minister Berstetz in his arms.

Now that he knew what Chisha had been attempting to do, he thought that Goz would not have been killed, but how was it that he had appeared here in this state following the events that had taken place?

Just how much had been shared between Berstetz and Chisha?

Goz: “The turmoil in the Imperial Capital and everything else! It is all caused by your schemes! You should die in order to atone!”

Ubilk: “Wait, waaait~ a minute please! I wasn’t even all that involved in it, nor did I have anything to do with what happened to General First-Class Goz! Because, you see, as far as the commandment’s concerned, Goz isn’t someone to pay much thought about…”

Goz: “How dare you, you bastard!”

By once again running his mouth, Ubilk incurred Goz’s wrath more and more. Berstetz writhed in pain, as if Goz had forgotten that he was carrying the former.

Moreover, the changes in the situation did not end at just that—

???: “Uwah?! The closer I get and see, the more puzzling everything becomes! I ran after the Dragon that ignored me, only to find out that the one replacing it as my opponent was a big golem! Sure, it might serve as a decent show, but I don’t think it’s capable of acting as a substitute!”

Abel: “…”

And right after he heard a yapping, high-pitched voice, the owner of said voice made their entrance wrapped in a tremendous wind while a cloud of dust spread behind him.

Gliding on the soles of the zori he wore, he looked up at the sky with his hands forming a brim. A boy who had been uncalled for, sporting blue hair and a kimono, had arrived—everyone’s eyes widened at the sight of his raucous demeanor, speech, and conduct, but above all else, because he looked like a mere shrunk-down version of a familiar figure.

Goz: “C-Cecilus Segmunt—?!”

Cecilus: “Hmm? Did you call me just now? Well, I’m quite embarrassed for having managed to do something so grand that my name has spread with lightning speed. To be honest, I thought the best moment would be me cutting down that Dragon, but I hate just how much of a star I am!”

Goz: “…No doubt, it is General First-Class Cecilus!”

The boy, who was watching the battle between Moguro and the Cloud Dragon, turned around and uttered those words with an unmistakably unique sense of distance.

This was, without a shadow of a doubt, Cecilus Segmunt, the strongest of the Nine Divine Generals, the First, who stood at the peak of the Vollachian Empire’s military might; but his state that of a child.

It had been at about this age when Abel had first picked up Cecilus as a subordinate, taking him under his wing. Since then, his mind aside, his body was supposed to have grown up.

Abel: “But you, why are you small… I can only believe that this is the work of Olbart Dunkelkenn; but, if that is the case…”

Then, contradictions with Olbart’s behavior during their meeting at the Demon City of Chaosflame would arise.

Olbart was, some way or another, unaware of the fact that Chisha had been masquerading as the Emperor. But supposing that Olbart had been employing the same technique he had utilized on Natsuki Subaru, Medium, and Al, with Cecilus as the target, he could not help but cast doubts on the actions taken.

Why would the Emperor himself have Cecilus infantilized, he wondered.

A logical explanation for it seemed improbable. Cecilus had gone without being corrected for over a decade until now. At this point, nothing could shackle him down.

In other words—

???: “You’re way too light-footed for a pipsqueak, ain’t’cha? Can’t believe someone’s gettin’ such a large lead on me, I’m really startin’ ta feel my age.”

Immediately after the thought crossed his mind, a petite shinobi—Olbart Dunkelkenn, made his appearance right there and then. He had supposedly been entrusted with a bastion to defend the Imperial Capital, yet he had abandoned that role, returning to the Crystal Palace.

When it came to the reason as to why had Olbart, the shinobi head honcho, done such a thing,

Cecilus: “Huh, I thought I’d shaken you off, but I actually didn’t? That’s great, old man! Still wanting a stage role even at that age, how admirable! Bravo!”

Olbart: “So loud. At this point, ya forgot stuff altogether, haven’t’cha?”

Cecilus: “Forgot stuff? Well, I got no idea what you’re talking about though.”

Olbart: “Ceci’s small, so if I didn’t do it, it’s gotta have been that arse’s fault, Chesshy’s. Tho’ I like ta steal others’ skills, I don’t like it when they steal mine.”

Cecilus: “Ahahahaha, that’s an amazingly selfish complaint! I don’t dislike it, rather, I quite like it.”

The old man, his lips curved in dissatisfaction, was laughed at by the much younger Cecilus, who was barely taller than him.

The Stargazer, Ubilk, was still being pressed for answers by Goz, while Berstetz had been stolen of his freedom, being carried by Goz’s brawny arms, his mind more focused on whether the consequences of the still-raging battle between Moguro, the Cloud Dragon, and the resuscitated Balleroy were about to befall him.

Abel: “…Just, what is this?”

One after the other, people gathered at this place.

The majority of the Nine Divine Generals of the Vollachian Empire had come to this location, he came to realize.

Had this, too, been brought about by Chisha?

Having been trained to perform all that Vincent Vollachia could as well, just how much had Chisha Gold surpassed the latter’s expectations?

He had given his own life to keep Abel alive, and what was to come after—.

Chesha: “—My apologies, but I am afraid I would not.”

Abel: “…”

Once upon a time, faced with a query from Vincent Abellux, Chisha Gold had replied thus.

Upon being asked if he was willing to die for Vincent, he had returned the frank answer that he would not.

Then, the one for whom Chisha had laid down his life, was not Vincent Abellux.

Certainly, it had not been for Abel's sake, nor for Vincent Vollachia's, either. It had not been for a play on words of the sort, for that which Chisha had laid down his life for was—

Abel: "—Heed my words! The Great Disaster is nigh! From here on, you shall abide by my command!"

Grinding his molars together, Abel lifted his face, leaped atop the rubble, turned around. Then viewing the entirety of the ensemble present, he thus asserted for all to listen.

Upon Abel's proclamation, each and all of those in their self-centered doings observed him.

At that moment, with the exception of Ubilk and Berstetz, who were in the know, the eyes of everyone, Divine Generals included, had the utmost doubt flash across their eyes—Just who in the world is this man?

Taking that in, Abel reached for the oni mask upon himself, seizing its cheek. His visage had been covered with an object by Chisha, in the latter's final moments; now removing it, Abel bared his real face.

And finally—

Abel: "I am your Emperor, Vincent Vollachia. —The apex, of the Sword Wolves of the Empire."

Chapter 110:
Congratulatory Words

1

Digging into the ground powerfully with their bestial claws, they launched their body forward with such force that they seemed to be pulling the ground out.

Their companions, using their wits and martial prowess, were scrambling to take control of the battlefield. As to aid them, Frederica Baumann raced across the battlefield.

The beautiful, golden-haired leopard sailed through the wind, fulfilling her role as messenger through and through, being that she was the second fastest among all those roaming around the battlefield.

Against the overwhelmingly superior quality of the regular soldiers of the Imperial Army, the rebels, who were, to put it bluntly, a patchwork of people, had been able to bring the situation to a stalemate thanks to the information gathered by Otto Suwen, Abel's management of that information, and Frederica's ability to transmit said information in a quick manner.

Regardless of whether Frederica had been aware of her contribution or not, now armed with information most important she kicked the ground away; the impact that that intel would bring about was of particular significance.

It was—

Frederica: "—A message from the Master and my brother; there are signs of a change within the land."

With ragged breaths, pushing her exhausted beastified body, Frederica, undoing her beastification, announced her arrival at the main camp in a hurry, not hesitating in exposing her bare skin to all.

While she had been traveling across the battlefield, Garfiel, having survived a fierce fight, had communicated those words to Frederica bearing a passionate expression; one not proud of the outcome of the battle.

Ragged and bloody, Garfiel had lived through a fight to the death, a battle that Frederica could not even begin to imagine. Her sisterly feeling of wanting to sing her brother's praises for his struggle had to be postponed in the face of his desperate plea.

Fortunately, Roswaal, arriving with the Flying Dragon Squadron as reinforcements, had been by Garfiel's side, and had been able to lend him proper assistance, regardless of Garfiel's feelings about said assistance being given to him by his love rival.

???: "—. That wasn't very specific. Any more details?"

Frederica: "I do not know, I can only say that it was a gut feeling from my brother's Divine Protection. It is just…"

???: "Just?"

Frederica: "My brother's hunches are usually right, regardless of whether they are favorable or not."

Garfiel's instincts were as good as a wild animal's; even though he had never been wild, one could call them his wild instincts. Garfiel's instincts did not work well in everyday life, and his unrefined behavior would often come to the fore in front of Ram, but when it came to fighting, the reliability of his instincts was unparalleled.

That was why Frederica had, without any hesitation, rushed to the main camp.

???: "…"

Hearing Frederica's plea, the beautiful Serena Dracroy—a High Countess of the Empire who had come to their side with her Flying Dragon Squadron as reinforcements, looked to be deep in thought.

Rumor had it that she was an acquaintance of Roswaal's, who the latter had gone to request help from. Since she was Roswaal's acquaintance, she was probably a woman of strong character. However, it was also a common characteristic of Roswaal's acquaintances that, personality aside, no doubts would exist in regards to the excellence of their abilities.

This was evident in the fact that she was currently serving as a substitute for the absent commander-in-chief at the main camp, where the movement of the rebels, now a large army, was being controlled.

???: "Frederica-sama! Here is a cloak for you to wear!"

A red cloak was draped over Frederica's shoulders from behind as she looked thoughtfully at Serena's profile. It was a cloak that only Generals of the Vollachian Empire were allowed to wear; but the person who had done so with grace was not familiar with the meaning of that adornment.

Because of this, Frederica smiled, happy for the gesture of pure goodwill.

Frederica: "Thank you, Schult-sama. I apologize for my unseemly appearance."

Schult: "No, not at all! Frederica-sama has worked hard, running around amongst so many people! I think it is very admirable!"

Pulling the cloak tighter around her, Frederica thanked Schult for his hospitality. But, it was Schult who was the one who was bowing before Frederica, his small body filled with charm.

Schult's feelings of being left behind in the main camp and having to watch the progress of the battle with a sense of dread must have been even more painful than Frederica's, who was at least able to fulfill the role of a messenger.

Still, it was admirable of him to give Frederica words of appreciation upon her return.

???: "Yeah, Freh is great too. Uu wanted to go fight like crazy with Mii and the others like crazy."

Next to Schult was Utakata, whose black hair was dyed pink at the ends, nodding with her arms crossed.

Flinching at the little girl's warlike comment while saying, "I-I wonder about that", Frederica turned her attention back to Serena.

Serena stroked the large scar on the left side of her face, which had been engraved by a sword, and spoke,

Serena: "Signs of a change within the land of Vollachia, yes? How foolish it would be to disregard the words of one whom Roswaal values so highly."

Frederica: "So…"

Serena: "While maddening, it also fits with what the man who disappeared with the Stargazer said. It was a selfish thing to say, to entrust me with a great task that only I could fulfill. It was as if…"

Frederica: "As if?"

Serena: "It was pride as if he were the Emperor himself. Even though we're in a position where we've come to bring him down."

Serena, her arms crossed, sighed with a complicated expression that was neither angry nor bemused.

She spoke of the man in the oni mask—Abel. He had originally been in charge of commanding the rebels at large, however, he had left the main camp, entrusting Serena with that role.

In regards to that, Serena had not disclosed any details regarding the kind of conversation that had taken place at that time.

Frederica: "Before he left here, what did Abel-sama say to you, Serena-sama?"

Serena: "—. That the conclusion draws near. However…"

Serena paused, her almond-shaped eyes now filled with indignation. Her well-shaped chin indicating the battlefield, her eyes glowing with resentment, the Scorching Lady, known for her fiery presence, continued,

Serena: “The conclusion won’t be favorable to either side, the Imperial Capital’s and the rebels’; it’ll end up being undecided.”

Frederica: “It will end up being… undecided?”

Serena’s expression suggested that she would not even be able to say it, which perplexed Frederica.

What kind of situation could possibly be expected when the outcome of a battle of this magnitude taking place would end up being inconclusive? In the first place, it would be inappropriate to use words that could be taken to mean that all efforts would be in vain when addressing the person whom he had entrusted with the command of the battlefield.

Abel, who had left that unsaid, did not understand the human heart to a fatal degree; that much must be said.

In any case—

Schult: “Does this mean that the battle has concluded? If so, does that mean that Priscilla-sama, Al-sama, and Heinkel-sama will return?”

Frederica: “Schult-sama…”

With melancholy in his round eyes, Schult stood up on his tiptoes and looked out over the battlefield.

The boy’s eyes were drawn to a corner of the increasingly harsh battlefield—where the red sky and the white sky, two battlefields that even Frederica was unable to traverse, laid.

Merely approaching them instilled a feeling of dread in her beastly instincts, instilled a certainty that her body would not be able to withstand them.

Frederica: “…”

For that reason, Frederica did not feel herself capable of speaking words of comfort so readily.

What had been happening under those skies was surely a phenomenon that transcended Frederica's imagination. She felt ashamed, lowering the corners of her eyes.

Utakata: "Shuu, don't worry. Puu and Yor are both strong. They're as strong as Mii and Taa."

Schult: "Utakata-sama…"

Utakata: "Uu-chan is fine."

Schult: "Utakata-chan-sama…"

Puffing out her chest, Utakata stroked Schult's pink curly-haired head with violence, utilizing her hand.

It was a childish and baseless assertion, but it had resonated with Schult because Utakata had not hesitated in speaking it. Once Schult nodded his head, Frederica's lips parted slightly.

Once again, turning to face Serena,

Frederica: "What are you going to do, Serena-sama? If you choose to not abandon my brother's intuition, then you need to deal with what Abel-sama said…"

Serena: "I'm in a quandary. Needless to say, there's no time for hesitation. —Behold."

Serena once again cocked her chin, directing Frederica to look toward the battlefield, to which the latter responded with a "Huh?". With her emerald-green eyes, Frederica witnessed, even from afar, a change in the battlefield—a rampaging giant castle wall shaped like a human, one of the Nine Divine Generals, had turned their back, rushing toward the Imperial Capital.

Frederica: "Is that… headed towards the Crystal Palace?"

Serena: "The more things go on, the more they go as he says, hm? —Though, I don't know the truth of your brother's statement that Vollachia will become the enemy.”

At the reckless action of the Steelman, Moguro Hagane, Serena frowned with a face that seemed to have an idea of what was going on.

And then—

Serena: “Tell everyone. —As soon as there is anything abnormal at the Crystal Palace, cease all the fighting. To prepare for things to become inconclusive, where this battle, the blood spilled, and lives lost were all in vain.”

2

—With a shrill sound, the Blue Dragon Sword, an axe, and a barbarian sword struck each other in midair, sending off sparks.

All of those were steel, steel wielded without mercy for the purpose of reaping the life of their opponent.

One person’s senses had been growing duller, but once something was directed at them once more, feelings of dread welled up from within their skin, from within their bones, due to their life being threatened.

They had never thought of themselves as mentally fragile. Rather, they had always believed that, compared to other children of their age, they had been blessed with superior courage, combined with the experience of having survived scenes of carnage.

However, upon experiencing the sizzling pain of being scorching by a blast on their skin, upon feeling as if their lungs had contracted due to the tension of the moment, causing them to suffocate, it seemed like the foundation of that trust directed at oneself was wavering.

The most important reason for that feeling was—

???: “—!”

Even amidst that fierce battle, a contemptuous gaze would be directed toward them.

The man’s gaze was the biggest factor that increased Petra’s feeling of suffocation; it was as if it was saying he had not forgotten about her and holding a knife against her.

The man was an Imperial Soldier with a bandana wrapped around his head, wielding an axe.

This person, whose name she and her companions did not know, was the true identity of the formidable foe that was currently tormenting Petra and her comrades.

As long as one lived, death would always be adjacent.

Regardless of the situation, circumstances could change in the blink of an eye. Petra ground her teeth together with force, as the man in front of her seemed to be an example of that absurdity.

Kneeling on the ground, Otto struggled to breathe. Having taken the brunt of the blast from the magic stone used for the emergency evacuation, his fatigue was quite high.

That was why Petra could never afford to be weak on the battlefield, where both the strong and the weak alike put their lives on the line.

Medium: “Haaah! Al-chin!”

Al: “Yeah, Lil’ Miss Medium.”

The one person with the high-pitched voice, a voice unsuitable for this blood-scented battlefield, and the one person with the dispirited voice worked together, exchanging sword blows with the one person possessor of a pitch-black murderous intent.

Cooperating with Medium, who used her small body to the fullest, Al waged battle with the Imperial Soldier. Their fighting ability was not enough to overwhelm their enemy however; and so, their fierce bout continued.

No offence to Al being who he was, but Petra was disappointed with him as a reinforcement.

Petra: “If only it were someone like Garf-san or Emily…”

Not only were they reliable allies, to put it plainly, but they would surely have overwhelmed their opponent as far as fighting ability went.

Al’s ability, being unlike theirs, was not very high in Petra’s estimation. Even though he was better than non-combatants like Petra and Otto, she felt that he was weaker than any of the People of Shudraq.

However, in the sense of possessing not-so-outstanding strength, the same was true of their opponent, the Imperial Soldier.

Without a doubt, that Imperial Soldier was weak compared to Emilia, Garfiel, and the Nine Divine Generals of the Empire. Even still, Petra was terrified of him.

Overwhelming magic would not be needed to shoo away a bug that had perched itself on a flower. It could be brushed off with a finger or even with a bit of water. Thoughts of the sort were apparent in the attitude of this Imperial Soldier.

On this battlefield, Petra and the rest of her group were nothing more than hard-working little bugs—.

Soldier: “—You’re a pain in the ass, man.”

Suddenly, the man’s voice slipped into the cowering Petra’s ears.

For a moment, her shoulders jumped. But, the one who the other person was calling out to was not Petra nor was it Otto, the man was calling out towards the pair he was crossing weapons with, which was also the direction Al was in.

Al: “Hah! Ngha! Take this!”

The man swung the axe in his hand, aiming it at Al’s thick neck. However, the moment the Blue Dragon Sword in the one-armed Al’s possession met it, the man immediately turned himself around, delivering two, then three heavy attacks in quick succession.

By means of some bizarrely risky slights of hand, Al managed to parry the barrage of blows.

Petra was not at all at ease, even letting out a couple of little screams of “Kyah!” and “Yikes!” as she watched.

Otto: “I would like to support Al-san somehow, but…”

Otto seemed be similarly anxious, there had been more impatience than fatigue in his voice.

There was clearly a sense of urgency in the battle waged by Al, who had made his entrance with much fanfare; although he was fortunate to have been able to survive up until now, there had been five times where one wrong step could have resulted in his death.

The possible existence of a sixth time, to Petra, seemed to have some terrible odds.

Soldier: “You’re still a pain in the ass.”

However, it seemed that the opinion of the Imperial Soldier was slightly different from that of Petra and her comrades.

The man, who continued to shrug off the attacks, even though it was by the skin of his teeth, took a large step backward, whereupon he raised his axe-less hand, casually waving it in the direction of Al and Medium.

Immediately after, a fireball burst to life in the air, rushing furiously toward them, incinerating the sky.

Al: “Oioioioi!”

Medium: “HIYAAAH~!”

She did not understand why, but a Spirit was being forced to obey in an unjust way.

Al and Medium ran to try and escape the fireball approaching them, in great troubles. The fireball missed the two of them, going onto the trees in the surroundings, then spreading to the grass on the ground, causing a swell of flames.

Otto: “This is bad… Hk.”

Petra understood what Otto had just muttered.

From what she saw, the flames brought about by the fireball did not burn Al and the others, instead consuming their surroundings. The blaze surrounded Petra and everyone facing the Imperial Soldier, blocking any escape.

The rising fire created a circle, trapping them.

The Imperial Soldier could have possibly been aiming to block their escape route, even in case he had missed. But, that situation had Petra’s group grinding their teeth in frustration. Their opponent tilted his head.

Soldier: “I don’t like this.”

To that quiet, totally inappropriate remark, Al raised a “Huh?”.

His Blue Dragon Sword in hand, he pointed to their surroundings, now in flames,

Al: “After all this, what are you saying? Cherish what you got, your resources. How hard do you think plants gotta work to make oxygen, so that humans can take a deep breath and be aight…”

Soldier: “I should’ve killed you about six times so far, but I haven’t been able to kill you even once. Even when I’ve pushed you into spots you shouldn’t be able to dodge out of. It’s disgusting.”

Al: “I can’t believe you just said that. Man, today’s a real pain.”

Al’s response was met by the man shrugging and growing even more distrustful of him.

Not knowing the limit of Al’s strength, the Imperial Soldier seemed to be quite confused. To be honest, it was very disgusting to agree with that person, but Petra had the same doubts about Al.

Al looked like he was going to die, but he still did not.

He was meeting the attacks of the Imperial Soldier, but managed to avoid fatal wounds with his high-risk movements. —He had surely avoided fatal wounds, and fatal wounds only.

But it did not give off the feeling that he was hiding his capabilities. It was all inconsistent.

That was why the Imperial Soldier could not get a decisive blow to cut his losses, as well.

Soldier: “Even if you’re on the same level as I am, I get the feeling you’ve got no training at all and that you’re just winging this. In that sense, that guy over there is probably more in my class.”

Otto: “…Do you mean me? If so, I would like to raise an objection on my honor.”

Medium: “That’s right! Your evil character is different! You’re more dangerous, and sneakier!”

Otto: “Even though you are on my side, you still stab me in the back.”

Otto, having unexpectedly been pulled into the discussion, gave a wry smile.

His demeanor made Petra somewhat frustrated, but that quickly faded.

Petra: “…”

Otto glanced and winked at Petra. She thought about it, sensing something other than bitterness in his expression; he was plotting something.

Without saying a word, he wanted Petra to try to guess.

Soldier: “This is taking too long.”

Just after Petra had surmised this, the Imperial Soldier, with a cold voice, snapped his fingers.

Right after that, about ten fireballs, each smaller than before, were created all at once. They scattered in all directions at unreadable speed, which ignited not Petra and the others, but the trees and ground surrounding them.

He did that to expand the formation of flames encircling them, magnifying it with more flames and black smoke—

Medium: “Hothothothot! It’s burning, it’s burning!”

Al: “Calm down, lil’ missy! Come here before your braids burn!”

Surrounded by flames, a fiery Medium jumped up and down, holding her long braids. She crossed the line of flames, jumped to Al’s side, and looked back at him with tears in her eyes.

Gripping her barbarian sword tightly again, she glared at the person who had done this to her—

Medium: “Huh?!”

Al: “Is this for real…?”

Medium’s surprise was matched by Al’s exasperation.

The cause of their reaction was the disappearance of the Imperial Soldier who had created this spectacle of flames.

Medium: “…”

The figure of the Imperial Soldier had vanished amidst the flames and black smoke. Had he retreated to hide from the flames, or was he simply waiting for them to slowly burn to death?

Al: “Tsk…”

Medium: “He’s totally gone! We gotta get out of here before we burn, too!”

Al’s helmet-covered vision swept around, searching for the figure of the man who had disappeared into the flames. All the while, he held his Blue Dragon Sword against his own neck in a strange stance, his eyes looking for the Imperial Soldier.

Beside him, Medium also looked around a bit, impatient with the enemy she could not find, pleading for them to escape the growing fire.

It was certainly natural for a person to give priority to getting away from a dangerous place, rather than obsessing over the man’s whereabouts; thus avoiding putting carriage before ground dragon.

However—

Petra: “…”

His body supported by Petra, Otto placed a tad more strength into the hand of his that was placed on the former’s, squeezing it. And that tight grip was taken as a silent instruction by Petra.

Petra vehemently agreed with his wariness; they should not let their guard down.

Furthermore, Petra put her other hand on top of Otto’s hand—

Otto: “—Thank you, Petra-chan.”

Immediately after uttering these words of gratitude, Otto shifted in place and fell onto his back. —A moment later, an axe, cleaving the air sideways, narrowly missed him.

Petra: “…”

The killing intent of the Imperial Soldier, approaching covertly amidst the smoke emanating from the spreading fire of the camp, struck, and missed.

The man, having missed in that moment of truth, widened his eyes in amazement ever-so-slightly. But, as if quickly regaining his composure, the man attempted to pull back the axe he had just swung—

Petra: “Jiwald!”

Soldier: “Guh.”

Petra, holding up five fingers, released from all of them a low-power Jiwald that caught the Imperial Soldier in the face, drawing an arc; one of the five rays had seared their opponent’s right eye.

Petra’s attack had aimed to suppress the enemy, sacrificing pure power. It had achieved its goal in splendid fashion, the man who’d had his eye burnt crying out in agony and recoiling.

Then, a spinning figure leapt at him from above.

Medium: “Let’s gooo!”

Beyond the flames, Al hunched over, and from his back, using it as a springboard, Medium leapt.

Spinning vertically, Medium flashed the barbarian sword tightly gripped by both her hands, driving it into the Imperial Soldier, his posture shot, without relent.

Medium: “Uryahhhh~!”

A hard sound echoed, and a shade of vermilion different from that of the burning flames mixed with the latter.

The sound that had echoed was not the sound of a skull being split by the barbarian sword. Raising her head, Petra took a glance, and came to see that the man had, by his own volition, met the swing of the barbarian sword with his forehead.

That hard sound had probably been from armor that he had placed under his bandana. That was how he had taken Medium’s blow. Of course, he was not completely unscathed.

Swinging his axe with vigor, his shaking free hand on his forehead, awkwardly he dodged the follow-ups, stepping back, and further back, and further back—

Soldier: “Shit…”

A bandana stained with blood fell from the man’s head. Even with the armored bandana there, the man’s forehead had been cut open, the bleeding from his split forehead did not seem like it could be stopped.

The man, bleeding profusely, glared towards Otto and Petra.

SETOWI

The look in his eyes seemed to be asking how his surprise attack had been detected—

Otto: "—I will not tell you. I am not your parent, nor am I your brother."

Even though Otto was lying on the ground, he still spoke up as if he were proud of his victory.

In response, the Imperial Soldier clicked his tongue. He clicked his tongue, wiped the blood from his forehead with his palm, and,

Medium: "Ah! Wait! It'd be so unfair if you just run away!"

He did not choose to be reckless, and rush at Otto.

With his right eye closed, occluded by heat and blood, the Imperial Soldier disappeared amid the flames. Having become unable to be seen once more, Petra was wary of yet another surprise attack.

Al: "He ain't coming back… He doesn't seem desperate enough to continue fighting with such a disadvantage."

Petra: "Ummm, I disagree. Wasn't it like we were the only ones who were desperate?"

Al: "I know how you feel, Lil' Miss. But it's the other side that ran away without leaving any final words. We win, we win. —It's our wiiiiiiiin!"

Medium: "We wiiin!"

Facing the direction the Imperial Soldier had just disappeared into, Al and Medium shouted a victory cry.

Petra's heart was lightened a little by the two of them. Although, she was not sure if their cheering would actually pester that Imperial Soldier.

In any case—

Petra: “In the end, how did you know how to read that man’s moves? It was a gamble, wasn’t it?”

Otto: “It was not my doing, it was thanks to you, Petra-chan.”

With Al, who had sheathed his Blue Dragon Sword, lending him a helping hand, Otto was helped up, and spoke of Petra. However, she was unable to take credit for everything.

Otto: “In the first place, I was his target, so I knew that the last move would be aimed at me. It was the sound of footsteps that told me the time and direction of the attack.”

Medium: “Footsteps?”

Petra: “Otto-san’s channel let him hear from the little ones under the ground… Correct?”

Otto: “Correct answer.”

With her guess proved right by Otto, Petra put her hands together in front of her chest.

From the start, the reason Otto had been targeted by the enemy was due to his use of the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language to maintain control of the entire battlefield. However, they had no idea how that Imperial Soldier had appeared while avoiding Otto’s Divine Protection, as he could grasp the entire situation by hearing the voices of animals and insects.

To perceive such an opponent, the same method as before was not enough.

Petra: “So, that’s why the little ones under the ground… They were useless as Otto-san said, since they don’t have eyes to see what’s going on outside.”

Otto: “I just wish I had chosen my words a little more carefully…! Anyway, I took a listen to the animals and insects in the ground and determined where he was by the sound of his footsteps. It was a bit hit-or-miss, but Petra-chan was able to help me pick up the voices with her Yang Magic.”

Petra: “Otto-san, you had a bad look on your face when giving me the signal.”

What Otto had requested from Petra, back when he had gripped her hand tightly, had been the support of Yang Magic.

With her help, Otto had employed his Divine Protection, and thus, he had guessed his opponent’s position from the sound of his footsteps, avoiding the latter’s final ambush and conversely, they had inflicted a painful blow on their opponent, forcing him to retreat.

Otto: “—. To tell you the truth, I wanted to make him unable to continue fighting.”

Petra: “I agree. He wasn’t strong, he was just good at killing. More importantly…”

Medium: “Hothothot! We’ve gotta get out of here fast, or we’re gonna get cooked!”

Having a dangerous enemy retreat did not necessarily erase the situation of having their environs on fire.

Hearing Medium’s appeal, Al lent his shoulder to Otto and said, “Yeah, you’re right”. Petra, along with Medium, led them along, looking for spots where the effects of the flames were less severe.

And so, the group attempted to leave before the flames engulfed them—

Otto: “Let us get out of here as soon as possible. There is now a reason to return to the main camp.”

Al: “…The way you just put it doesn’t sound like the prelude to a heroic tale in which you brag about surviving a dangerous opponent.”

Otto: “Yes, it is bad news. Things are getting very time-sensitive… Earlier, I was trying to listen for footsteps, and this is just a secondary piece of information that I happened to hear.”

It was an unpleasant preface, one spoken just as one hardship was about to be over.

Chased by the heat of the flames, but still unable to overlook his statement, Petra turned to see a grim-faced Otto behind her—or rather, he was looking out over the entire battlefield.

Otto: “I got indications that the whole battlefield is going to become even more dangerous due to something completely different from the Dragon and the burning sky and whatnot. In fact, it is right in front of our eyes.”

By complete coincidence, at the exact same time that his bro detected it through the Divine Protection of Earth Spirits, Otto Suwen had obtained the same information through the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language; he now voiced it.

3

???: “—I have heard that there is a so-called Great Disaster drawing near which will endanger the Vollachian Empire. As I am a General First-Class of the Empire! As I am a General that still survives though living in disgrace! No matter what it takes! I shall not die without being of service to His Excellency the Emperor!”

Being thus informed by the large man that had been chained to a wall underground—the person that had introduced himself as Goz Ralfon, Rem understood that problems aside from the rebellion would soon shake the Imperial Capital.

Although Goz had been quite weak after having been given only one meal every two days, after Rem had healed him as a mere stop-gap measure through her magic, he had become surprisingly energetic, his vitality regained.

She had believed the majority of that effect to have been brought by, most likely, due to his own pre-established notions.

Goz: “Girl, your treatment has saved my life! Normally, I would have liked to invite you to my home as to introduce my savior to my wife and children, but I must now head to His Excellency’s side!

I shall repay you for this!!”

Rem: “Ah, umm, yes.”

Goz: “If possible, leave this place and join up with the regular army! General First-Class Moguro Hagane or General Second-Class Kafma Irulux shall do you no harm! Avoid the other Generals of the First-Class! Your words will not get through to them!”

Having been released from his chains, Goz thus declared in an extremely loud voice. He leapt out of the basement with tremendous speed and, after rebuking the soldiers guarding the mansion, ordered them to accompany him to the Crystal Palace, which was visible from a distance.

The opinions of the guards were divided in two in regards to that.

It seemed that even the mansion’s soldiers were split between those who knew of Goz’s existence and those who did not. Those who had been kept in the dark were not amused, while those to whom the information had been disclosed felt the deep trust placed in them by Berstetz.

Therefore—

Goz: “I see. You lot will stand in my way, then?”

With nothing to wear and his bare upper body covered with an armor of muscle, Goz fixed his eyes on the guards who had drawn their weapons, blocking his path.

Goz was unarmed, and the time he had spent in confinement was not limited to merely one or two days. He was far from being in perfect condition. However, the guards had opposed him not because they stood a chance of winning or whatever.

Goz: “Very well. Just as I am loyal to His Excellency the Emperor, you lot are loyal to the Prime Minister. I shall certainly see that honor through to the very end!!”

The overwhelming aura emanating from him was clear, even as he looked at the soldiers who opposed him.

Goz's bare-knuckle fighting style in the one-sided battle that followed, too, was clear.

There was a swing of one of his huge fists, and in one blow, several guards were sent flying.

The slight advantage in numbers had not even made a difference. They had been instantly, and overwhelmingly, suppressed.

Rem: "I'd heard his name from Abel-san as one of the Nine Divine Generals, but…"

Actually, the only ones of the Nine Divine Generals that Rem had seen in person were Arakiya and Madelyn, back at the Fortress City of Guaral.

Even when compared to both of them, Goz's presence would not be outdone.

He might have been at a disadvantage at this moment, but only in what could be accounted for in weapons, equipment, and exhaustion.

Goz: "You have fought well! That is why you are Sword Wolves of the Empire!!"

Thrusting his arms up in the air, standing right in the middle of the battered soldiers, Goz passionately uttered his praise.

If she was not mistaken, she had heard that he was the person who had risked his life, sacrificing himself so that the true Emperor, Abel, could escape. However, he was so lively that it seemed like a lie that he had been exhausted from having been tied up.

In the first place, it was unclear why he had been tied up in the basement of the mansion.

Goz: "Once again, Prime Minister Berstetz Fondalfon! I shall not let things go according to your plans! You too, General First-Class Chisha! Uoooooh—!!"

Before they could discuss things in detail, Goz boldly dashed out of the main gate of Berstetz's mansion, with the guards on his side in tow.

Overwhelmed by the valor of the Lion Knight, Rem could do nothing but watch his back as he left.

However—

Rem: "There's no need for me at that palace."

In an unexpected turn of events, the mansion's soldiers were now gone; no longer were there any obstacles before Rem.

Rem checked to see if the soldiers who had been struck down by Goz were alive or dead. After applying only minimal treatment to those who had been seriously wounded, utilizing one of the long swords as a cane, she moved around the mansion, heading to a room which she had entered many times.

And then—

Rem: "Katya-san, it's me, it's Rem. Please come out."

Katya: "…I absolutely don't want to come out. Wh-What was that loud voice just now?"

Rem: "I understand how you feel. But the person with the loud voice has already left. I think we should talk about what we're going to do from here on out."

Katya: "What we're going to do…"

Rem's voice urged Katya, who did not allow Rem to see her, to make a decision through the door to her room.

At present, Goz's bravery, for better or worse, had wiped out the mansion's soldiers, so the urgency to leave the mansion had diminished.

However—

Rem: "The Great Disaster…"

That was the reason as to why Goz hastened to meet the Emperor, who was said to be present at the Crystal Palace.

To be precise, the main justification for Goz heading to the Crystal Palace was to confront the impostor posing as the Emperor. Nevertheless, it was true that his purpose was to prevent that mysterious disaster.

In any case, Goz had advised her against sticking around.

If that was the case—

Katya: "—Th-There's no reason for me to leave here, after all. I-I'm a hostage."

Rem: "There are no more guards left to detain us. There isn't a reason for us to continue being held hostage any longer."

Katya: "B-but still…"

Rem: "—I understand. Please, at least open the door. I'd like to check if you are safe."

Though Rem was at a loss, Katya, who had been undaunted by her insistence, finally folded.

After a few moments of silence after that final request from Rem, the wheels of her wheelchair were heard moving, and the door was unlocked. And so, the door to the room opened,

Rem: "Excuse me. Let's go."

Katya: "Huh?! Ah, hey, wait!"

Rem: "I'm sorry. Me just wanting to check if you were safe was a lie."

After entering the room, Rem found Katya by the door, and then, quickly walking behind her, she pushed her wheelchair out of the room.

A panicked Katya attempted to resist, but she was powerless to stop the wheels, unable to resist Rem's forceful action; and like that, she was pushed along.

Katya: "Wait! I have someone I have to wait for here…"

Rem: "I understand that perfectly well. But waiting here isn't safe. Even if we're to wait for your fiancé, let's at least go somewhere safe."

Katya: "Safe? A place safer in the Imperial Capital than this place —"

Doesn't exist, or so was Katya probably going to say next.

But Katya, who was in the middle of speaking while twisting her head left and right to glare at Rem behind her, abruptly widened her eyes round, staring towards the sky.

Prompted by Katya's reaction, Rem gazed upwards, only to lay eyes upon a large, a titanic shadow overhead, as they walked down the hallway of the mansion.

—A colossal castle wall in the shape of a human straddled the mansion, stepping toward the center of the Imperial Capital.

Rem: "…"

In comparison to Goz's rampage, or even in comparison to any of the attacks perpetrated by the rebels trying to breach the Imperial Capital, seeing a giant foot stomping and bounding through the city, passing close by them, had been heaps more shocking.

Feeling the wheels of Katya's wheelchair lifting off the ground due to the tremors of the earth and the impact of the feet, Rem and Katya looked at each other in alarm, and,

Katya: "I-it doesn't seem like this is a safe place, for sure…"

Rem: "Yes. Let's hurry."

As expected, the giant step just now was one of the few things that were an exception to the norm amidst this whole uproar, but it would be foolish for Rem to go out of her way to say that and incur Katya's displeasure.

With Katya now meek and obedient, Rem who was pushing her wheelchair, headed for,

Katya: "Your companion is still recovering, isn't he? What are you going to do?"

Rem: "He really shouldn't be moving around too much. However, I can't say that…"

Responding to Katya's words with that, the two reached the room Rem had intended to reach.

Inside this room was Flop O'Connell, who had been brought to the mansion alongside Rem. He had not fully recovered from his serious wounds, and he was still under house arrest.

As per her answer to Katya, he should preferably be left to rest if at all possible, but—

Rem: "Flop-san, it's me. May I come in?"

???: "Mhm, is that Wife-san?! I'll open the door now."

She received a response immediately after she had knocked on the door, and subsequently, the door opened. The seemingly near-instantaneous reaction from the door made Rem and Katya's eyes go round; it was no wonder, however, as Flop had apparently been lurking by the door, tightly holding a small hand mirror.

Rem: "Um, Flop-san, what's with the mirror?"

Flop: "Weeell, to tell you the truth, it was kinda meant to be a weapon. You heard a very loud voice earlier, didn't you? The city's getting noisy, so I thought someone hostile might come barging in."

Flop answered as he twirled the hand mirror, reminding Rem and Katya that they were there as prisoners of war and hostages, so there had been no tools in their rooms that could be employed as weapons.

However, a mirror as a countermeasure was not ideal.

Rem: "…You mean, you can fight using that mirror?"

Flop: "Unfortunately, this is about all there was in this room. But I've never fought with a mirror before, so maybe I have a dormant talent for it! What do you think, Wife-san?"

Rem: "Sure, why not. I'd like to stop talking about unnecessary things and do what's necessary, however."

Flop responded to Katya's scornful eyes in his usual tone of voice; it was reassuring that he was behaving as he normally did, but at the same time, Rem wanted to put this aside for a while, as they were in such a dire situation.

Regardless—

Rem: "This is Katya-san. I met her at this mansion."

Flop: "I'm Flop O'Connell. You must be the friend of Wife-san's that I heard so much about."

Katya: "…I-I don't remember becoming friends with this girl, but…"

Flop: "If that's the case, then you should prepare yourself to become friends with her. Making good friends is the key to a better life. Even if it isn't, there's nothing wrong with having a lot of friends."

Katya: "I'm… probably not as good at that as you are…"

As per Rem's expectations, Flop's personality was one that Katya was not very comfortable with. Nevertheless, Flop's disposition was such that he did not mind if Katya was frank with him, so it would be the best situation if Katya was just bitter about it.

Rem: "Flop-san, the situation in the Imperial Capital right now is…"

Flop: "I've more-or-less understood it. Madelyn-kun came to meet me right before she left for the battle."

Rem: "…Madelyn-san, came to meet you?"

It was an unexpected personal connection; she knew that Madelyn had been visiting Flop, but she had never expected that they would become friends, even going so far as for her to come to greet him before going off to battle.

However, if one of the Nine Divine Generals had spoken to him directly, it was even possible that Flop would know more about the situation going on outside than Rem.

Rem: “Well then, that makes the conversation faster. The guards of the mansion are already gone, so we should be able to stay or escape at our leisure, but… I say we should escape.”

Flop: “I wonder if that has anything to do with the loud noises and the terrible tremors from just now?”

Rem: “Yes. But it’s not just that. Something even worse could happen.”

Katya: “W-worse than that! A-are you kidding me…?”

Rem answered Flop with concern, and upon hearing that, Katya turned pale, shaking.

All of that had not been about scaring Katya into obedience, but rather about a real, though unconfirmed, possibility of danger. On the other hand, it was no more than “something could happen”, so it did not provide any assurance off of which they could act.

Flop: “Still, I think we should leave this place, Wife-san.”

Rem: “—Indeed.”

With that question from Flop, Rem nodded without hesitation.

Despite the fact that they were under house arrest, life in the mansion was not so uncomfortable. Although they were not allowed to leave the premises, they were allowed to go to each other’s rooms, Flop’s wounded body was being taken care of, Rem had been able to meet Katya, and there was no reason for any great anger or hatred toward Berstetz, who was supposedly their enemy.

As for the reason for Berstetz's rebellion, Rem had a suspicion that Abel, or rather, Vincent, was the one at fault all the more.

Nevertheless, leaving such circumstances aside, Rem's emotions were probably the most decisive reason as to why she wanted to leave the mansion.

Staying in captivity like this would worry a number of people who had shown kindness towards Rem.

That was the reason as to why she needed to get out of such an unjust and dishonest situation as soon as she possibly could.

Flop: "Okay, got you. I have no objection either. Wife-san and Miss Katya, let's get going."

Rem: "Are you sure?"

Flop: "Even if I stay, there's not much that I can do other than lie in bed. I'm still a peddler, so I have to be somewhat physically active or I won't feel at ease."

As to keep Rem from getting upset, Flop made a clenched fist as he smiled. Then, he interjected with a "Besides",

Flop: "Actually, I've been entrusted with a message. If I accidentally overslept and missed the opportunity to tell it, I wouldn't be able to face the world, or my sister, for that matter."

Rem: "A message… who is it from?"

Flop: "From a Sword Wolf of the Empire who has taken on the stigma of a traitor himself, and who, in my personal opinion, has taken a great gamble."

Flop winked, and Rem looked daunted at his reply.

Apparently, it was not the person that Rem had in mind, but it was nice to know that Flop would be coming along.

Rem: "As you can see, it'll be no small feat to push Katya-san's wheelchair while carrying Flop-san on my back, so…"

Katya: “You’re asking me what to do, but you have no intention of letting me do it, do you!”

Rem: “As long as all of you aren’t in danger, I’d be happy to leave you alone…”

As long as it remained unsafe to take them out by force, they were left with no other choice but to do so. As expected, Rem did not intend to save them beyond the extent of her ability, but if she could do so, then she had no choice.

She would do so, even if she had to manipulate their feelings. — Even while knowing that it would not shine well upon her.

Rem: “…”

For a moment, Rem felt like she was doing the same thing as she had done to the hand that had been extended toward her, and her heart fluttered due to her complex feelings on the matter.

Quickly shaking off that feeling, Rem nodded to Katya and Flop with a “Well then”,

Rem: “Let’s be careful when leaving the mansion. If we encounter someone, be cautious. We don’t know the people who are coming into the Imperial Capital, either.”

Katya: “Don’t say such scary things… Aren’t you injured? Can you even go?”

Flop: “Ha-ha-ha, thanks for your concern. Fortunately, Wife-san has been casting her healing magic on me devotedly. The gouged flesh is filling in nicely, and I think my blood’s starting to replenished. As for my physical condition, I guess I’ll just have to ask you to give me a shout when running is needed.”

Rem: “I’ll take that into consideration. My legs aren’t in perfect shape, and Katya-san’s in a wheelchair.”

Once again, she realized that each of the three gathered here were physically impaired. Still, it was crucial for them to join forces, as losing any of them would be unacceptable.

And so, with much enthusiasm,

Flop: “By the way, Wife-san, what about all the other people who are being held prisoner besides us?”

Rem: “…That eluded my mind.”

Flop pointed that out, taking the wind out of her sails, prompting Rem to put a hand to her forehead.

There was a separate building in the mansion, and in that building were held captives other than Rem’s group—among them, there were several people who claimed to be the black-haired Crown Prince, the illegitimate son of the Emperor of Vollachia.

Most of them had apparently been used as a justification to raise an insurrection against the Emperor. However, this was not a problem unrelated to Berstetz, who had rebelled over the issue of the Emperor’s heir. So, they were being taken as prisoners of war whenever possible and kept to ascertain whether they were truly the Emperor’s child or not.

Rem: “They can’t be said to be either our enemies or our allies, so I want to ignore them, frankly.”

Currently, setting Katya aside, Rem and Flop’s situation was a very complicated and difficult one.

Even though she had no strong cause or claim, she had reluctantly joined the rebels led by Abel. However, she had been separated from that group, and she was not acquainted with the group of “Crown Princes” being kept captive.

Rem and her group had no idea if they were friend or foe, and their attitude towards them was also unknown.

Rem: “…”

That was why, her real opinion was as she had just stated.

However, leaving them in the locked detached building while Rem’s group left the mansion to escape from the looming, incomprehensible Great Disaster also brought Rem distress.

Even if saving all of them was a difficult deed, she wished to diminish casualties as much as possible.

That was why the guards who had been beaten down by Goz had been given the minimal amount of treatment.

Katya: "…Why don't we just find the key and place it where they can retrieve it themselves?"

Rem: "Ah…"

Katya: "I-I don't know. I don't know, but if it's dangerous, I don't want to get involved. But I can't help but hesitate. Is that strange?!"

Rem: "No, no, it's not strange. Right?"

Seeing that Rem was worried, Katya offered a compromise.

Rem only had one of two options in mind; to help, or not to help. She felt saved by Katya's words.

As the latter had stated, it would be fine to locate the key to the detached building, making sure that the captives had only a little trouble obtaining it. That would ensure the captives' safety along with her own peace of mind.

Flop: "Seems like you've got everything covered."

With Rem's and Katya's conversation coming to a close, Flop nodded in satisfaction.

Meanwhile, he had been braiding some of his own long blond hair, before then gently placing his hand on the door. As he pushed it open,

Flop: "Well, for now, we need to find where the key to the detached building is… Let's wait a sec."

Flop, who was about to go through the door, closed it while withdrawing his earlier statement. That sudden action of his caused

Rem and Katya's eyes to widen, astonished.

However, Flop put his finger to his lips and said, "Be quiet". Then, he opened the door slightly, as to peer outside. Standing beside Flop, Rem also looked out.

Rem: "—Ah."

Katya: "H-hey, what is it? I don't have a good feeling about your reaction at all…!"

Once Rem found out why Flop had closed the door, her breath hitched; frightening due to the signs the two gave off, Katya's voice quivered.

But Rem was unable to find words to relieve Katya's anxiety right there and then.

That was because, for Rem and Flop both, it was a scene that was outside the realm of their imaginations.

In the courtyard of Berstetz's mansion, figures other than the soldiers were standing there.

They were—

Flop: "…Somehow, they look sickly pale, don't they? Maybe they aren't getting enough sleep, I wonder."

The looks of the figures, enveloped in a bloodthirsty aura, were so, so strange, that Flop's joke had come out as dry.

Donning pale complexions with no signs of life, cracks running across their visible skin—a group of people, bearing features that could be recognized at a glance as bizarre, were occupying the mansion of the Imperial Prime Minister.

4

Flop: "…At a glance, they all appeared to be Imperial Soldiers, didn't they?"

Shutting the door without a noise, Flop muttered, holding his breath together with Rem and Katya.

In frankness, the scene they had put their eyes on had been so alien that Rem, bereft of the composure to do as much as to pay attention to the details, was unable to affirm Flop's irresponsible claim.

It was just that—

Katya: "Th-There are creepy people entering the mansion…? Doesn't that mean someone from the rebel army is trying to kill His Excellency the Emperor?"

Rem: "They seem like they'd be impossible to communicate with, and they also gave off a different air. It wasn't like they were angry or overexcited or anything like that, rather…"

Flop: "It's like they're creatures that aren't human, but take human form. I also got the feeling that it'd be difficult to gain an understanding by talking to them. It feels like my wounds are spiking with pain, that's a bad omen."

Whether she wanted to or not, Rem agreed with Flop's opinion.

As she had not checked what lay outside, Katya had not seen or understood the people the other two were referring to, but she surely would have been shaken had she looked.

Looking at her friend, who she felt had quite a different sense of logic, Rem had a sudden brainwave.

Rem: "Don't tell me, that's the Great Disaster…?"

She had only heard of the expression "Great Disaster" from Goz, but she supposed it was something nefarious regardless of its exact nature. Having heard about it being imminent, and having laid eyes on the beings outside, she could not help but believe there was a connection between the two.

Moreover, this was just Rem's intuition as a practitioner of healing magic, but, Rem: “It didn’t feel like there was life in them. It was as if…”

Katya: “Y-you’re not going to say they’re dead people, right? Calling them something like Hollows, is ridiculous…”

Flop: “Though, it may be too soon to laugh that off still. The ones outside took the appearance of Imperial Soldiers, and come to think of it, their armor, as well as their faces and napes, seemed to be somewhat tattered. Perhaps there’s a chance they still bear the wounds they received in life… What do you think?”

Katya: “What do I think? I have no idea!”

Flop’s expression, true to his nature, caused Katya to lose her head and dart her eyes about in bewilderment.

But the fact that she was rejecting it vehemently served as undeniable proof that she, too, had perceived that something abnormal was happening from Rem and Flop’s behavior.

Even worse than that was—

???: “—Gyah!”

???: “Guh!”

???: “—Ah.”

Small wails of pain were heard in succession, wails from the guards outside who had been put to sleep—due to having been beaten down by Goz. Rem had deferred their treatment for later, yet they now spilled their death cries.

In frankness though, it was not as if she had ascertained it with her own eyes.

Flop: “…Seems it’s going to be hard to talk and reach a mutual understanding with them.”

Flop’s words, his cheeks tightening greatly, told of the undeniable ultimate fate of the soldiers.

Those enigmatic forces, their faces pallid, had bestowed the collapsed soldiers with the coup de grace. There had been zero margin for discussion. —That Rem, and everyone else, would be an exception to this rule, was difficult to envision.

Rem: "I…"

Had she at least put the soldiers in some room, would it have been different?

Had they, in their unconscious and defenseless state, been moved to a safe place, their arbitrary demise could have been avoided. That being the case, the onus for their deaths would lie with Rem. She had not done everything possible.

Katya: "—Hk, is this the time to be thinking about that!"

Rem: "K-Katya-san…"

Katya: "If you get depressed now, it won't just be those three who die. I-I don't want… anything like that…!"

As Rem cast her face downwards in chagrin, it was seized by both of Katya's hands, one hand on each cheek, and the former's head was raised by force. A teary-eyed Katya snapped at Rem as to reproach her, attempting to obliterate Rem's fainthearted disposition.

Katya's momentum, and wholly honest words made Rem catch her breath.

Nodding quietly after that,

Rem: "Flop-san, the situation has changed. We have no choice but to go unlock that one separate building."

Flop: "Mhm, indeed, Wife-san. I was thinking the same thing. I dunno if we'll be able to get on friendly terms with the Crown Princes who've been detained in that building, but there's always the train of thought that the enemy of my enemy is my friend."

Rem: "Yes. With a common enemy, there's the possibility that we can work side-by-side.”

With that declaration, Flop immediately approved the change in course. Seeing the consensus between Rem and Flop, Katya shook her head up and down in agreement, and spoke,

Katya: “If that’s decided, then get on with it, get on with it already! Please do your best at breaking the lock to the detached building already. Y-you can do it, right?”

Rem: “…Fortunately, I picked up a sword to substitute for my walking stick, so I can use that.”

The sword would likely break, but in exchange, she would be able to destroy the lock on the door, at least.

No longer would it be possible for them to traipse around the mansion searching for the key. It would be too difficult.

Flop: “We need to get there before they turn their attention to the detached building, but the problem is…”

Rem: “Katya-san’s wheelchair…”

All eyes were on the wheelchair.

The wheelchair, which had been a gift from her fiancé, was a very well-made, high-end one, but that notwithstanding, it would not be possible to conceal its sounds; those of the wheels turning, and those of its many parts operating.

It was not ideal for situations in which one had to move without being detected.

Katya: “I… I…”

Faced with the same tough challenge, Katya’s gaze faltered as it flickered left and right, upwards and down.

However, seeing as she possessed a physical disability, Katya and her wheelchair were inseparable. She herself was aware of this, and after a few moments of anxiety, Katya spoke.

Katya: “Leave me, and go open that building. I-I’ll wait for you alone…”

Rem: “Alone… But, I can’t let you do something like…”

Katya: “I’ll lock myself in my room! They won’t know I’m there if I shut myself in there and stay quiet, right? If those people are undead or anything of the sort, it’s probably safer to stay hidden and not do anything stupid. B-but I’m not telling you two to go and do something dangerous.”

The fact that she was speaking so quickly, and that her voice had gone up in pitch, was no more than evidence that her innermost thoughts were frantic.

But that Katya’s proposal came from her mustering the entirety of what paltry courage she possessed, was something Rem and Flop comprehended to a painful extent.

They understood that her feelings, her faith, ought not to be rejected.

Rem: “Flop-san, stay with Katya-san and…”

Flop: “No, you’ve got to take Miss Katya’s determination in mind, Wife-san. The chances of success are higher if the two of us were to deal with it. Worst-case scenario, one of us could serve as a decoy.”

Rem: “…”

That truly was the worst-case scenario, but if she were to avert her gaze from that which she wished to not think about, she would have no escape from being overwhelmed by the horrible situation once she actually found herself in it.

Therefore, despite taking into account the possibility that that worst-case would overwhelm her, Rem assented with a nod.

Rem: “Without fail, I’ll unlock the detached building and return.”

Katya: “D-do it properly. It’s no good if you don’t come back too. Promise!”

Rem: “—I will.”

Grasping Katya’s hand, Rem exchanged words of firm promise with her.

Bearing Katya’s concern, so clumsy as she was, Rem kept its weight within her heart so that she would not forget it. And with that, Rem and Flop nodded to each other, and they exited the room.

Flop & Rem: “…”

While stifling their breaths and concealing their bodies, the two of them made their way out into the corridor, and as they surveyed their surroundings—in search of those eerie “enemies”, they managed to advance towards the back of the mansion, where the separate building laid.

As they made their way, wafting in the wind was the scent of blood belonging to the soldiers that had been slain. A deed performed by the enemies, numbering over ten, wandering through the mansion paying no concern to any danger.

Flop: “…Seems like they’re looking for something.”

Rem: “People who are alive, perhaps?”

Flop: “No, I get a feeling like, taking out the ones on guard duty was something they just did while they were at it. There aren’t enough people for them to comb the mansion that thoroughly, it’s likely they have a much more definite target.”

Keeping their bodies low while enroute, Rem and Flop exchanged opinions on the enemies’ behavior.

Hearing Flop’s keen insight brought Rem some vexation, feeling as if she were always off-mark every step of the way.

Flop: “I’m not too sure of this idea either, it’s something I just thought of.”

And, to have Flop smooth over things frustrated her.

At the very least, she would contribute to freeing those imprisoned in the separated building, thus making up for it.

Rem: "—That wouldn't be enough, would it."

Something that ought to be called fortunate, however, was that the sensory functions of the strange-looking "enemies" did not seem to differ much from those of humans, nor had they been boosted with incredible abilities beyond Rem and Flop's grasp.

Thanks to that, somehow, they had managed to approach the separate unit while avoiding detection. Though, a problem arose then.

Flop: "As expected, they didn't fail to notice it completely, huh?"

Having witnessed the same sight Flop had, Rem nodded in silence, agreeing with the former's words.

As they hid behind the building and examined the unit's surroundings, the problem, three figures belonging to "enemies", could be seen. As they were searching for something, it would be unnatural for them not to stop by such a conspicuous structure.

The problem was the building's interior; if the Crown Princes were truly confined within, the "enemies" would massacre the former without a word edgewise the moment they broke through the door.

There was no time to lose. If they did not act this very instant, their lives would be forfeit.

Flop: "Wife-san, I'll attract their attention. Can you do them in while I keep all three occupied?"

Rem: "…"

Flop: "I don't mind if we reverse our roles, Wife-san, but I think it's more likely that you succeed than me with my lack of nerve. I'd like you to decide now."

A forceful declaration, but a decision was necessary.

Taking that in, Rem closed her eyes for a second, then quickly opened them.

And then—

Rem: "Let's do it. I'll go around the back. Flop-san, it'll take only a second."

Flop: "Yeah, I'll leave it to you. I don't want to boast, but serving as a decoy's one of my strong points."

Rem nodded to Flop's answer, speaking of himself as reliable, and they then split up.

With the three "enemies" right in front of the building's entrance, while they planned to breach the large door, Rem and Flop separated in different directions, as if to sandwich their foes.

Rem: "…"

Squeezing onto it, Rem ascertained the feel of the steel sword she had carried for the purpose of breaking the lock.

Never had she had experience wielding the sword, nor was wounding another her forte. If anything, breaking Subaru's finger was all Rem's battle experience amounted to. It was possible to say that it was far from a solid foundation for her self-confidence.

But whether she had confidence in herself or not was irrelevant. She had to do it.

Do-or-die.

Flop: "Heyhey, gentlemen, are you all doing well? I'm a peddler with nothing to sell. At present, I just want to make myself known!"

Abruptly, Flop slipped out from behind the building, and started a conversation with the "enemies".

Although he had to draw their attention on the spur of the moment, and although there had not been any major preparation done in advance, and speaking of Flop's demeanor, it was far too assertive as to slip by them.

Enemy: “…Who the hell are ya?”

Riveted by Flop’s entrance, the “enemies” turned around, one of them apparently uttering so.

Their voice was cold and devoid of warmth, yet in it dwelled definite intelligence, which had come to Rem as a fairly large surprise, having presumed that communicating with them, let alone negotiating, would be impossible.

However—.

Flop: “Oh my, perhaps you can speak? Assuming you can, then maybe I should change my attitude, don’t you think?”

Enemy: “Ahh, ya’ve got it wrong, then. Everyone in the Empire’s gonna die.”

Flop: “I see. —Turns out there’s no margin for negotiation after all!”

So did Flop loudly assert, as to veil over the savage reply given by the “enemy”. An unequivocal cue for Rem’s heart to melt, in whom hesitation had emerged for a moment, so that she would stir.

Having heard things thus far, Rem did not hesitate in her subsequent action.

Rem: “Ah, AHHHHHH—!”

The moment she resolved herself to make her move and initiate her assault, albeit she knew she ought to be silent, she emitted sound. Were she to forgo raising her own morale in that manner, from within, she would not be able to continue with said subsequent action.

Pulling the sword from its scabbard, she held it aloft, and with might and main, she thrusted it at an “enemy’s” back turned to her. They raised a shriek of “Wha?!”, but twice, thrice she swung the sword in a daze.

Not granting the “enemies” who had turned their attention to Flop a chance to turn around, a chaotic series of strikes ensued. She knew not what it would take to incapacitate her opponents from doing battle, nor how long it would take her, hence she swung the sword with reckless abandon.

She had conscious awareness of the solid sensation of her hand rebounding, though everything besides that was rather blurry.

Nevertheless—

Flop: “Wife-san! It’s okay now! You’ve done them in already!”

Rem: “Ah…”

Having been called out by an earnest voice, Rem came to her senses and saw Flop’s figure in front of her.

Then looking for the “enemies” that were supposedly between the two of them, Rem came to find them at her feet, defeated—or rather, she found the pieces of what used to be those “enemies”.

Upon gazing at that, at the completely unexpected way they had been felled, Rem’s eyes widened with a “Huh”.

Flop: “To me, it looked like they were shattered. In fact, looking at the remains like this, it looks like they shattered like pottery or glass.”

Rem: “…Do you think they’re… dead?”

Flop: “At the very least, I think it’s doubtful that they were even alive before they were smashed into smithereens like this.”

Crouching down, Flop answered, holding scattered pieces of the “enemies” between his fingers.

Hearing his answer, Rem got quite the unpleasant feeling upon realizing that, exactly as if it were the answer she had been expecting.

For Rem, taking the life of a living creature was something abhorrent that ought to be avoided as much as possible.

Consequently, she realized that she had held a shameful expectation; she had wished to protect her mind through the doubt of whether the "enemies" she had vanquished were defined as a living being or not.

Flop: "Wife-san, their companions will notice it before long as well. Let's hurry to the detached building and open it up."

Flop made the decision to put off Rem's sentiments for the moment. She did not object to Flop's course of action as well, believing it to be the correct choice.

At the minimum, she attempted to give legitimacy to her actions; and as she was on the verge of unlocking the separate unit, she noticed something.

Rem: "Huh?"

Beneath her feet, the fragments of the "enemies" she had ground to a fine powder wriggled unnaturally, the wriggling different from how it would occur when caused by the wind or an earthquake.

???: "—We won't die that easily. 'Cause we're dead."

Rem shuddered, and the moment she experienced a sensation of unease, the voice of an "enemy" slipped into her awareness.

Turning around, Rem and Flop witnessed the supposedly-beaten "enemies" regenerating. The broken pieces of pottery fused together as if time had been reversed; though fissures with the appearance very much as if they were seams were visible, they had been restored to their original state.

Rem & Flop: "…"

Petrified by that impossible spectacle, Rem and Flop both froze in place.

Rem promptly decided to do the reverse of what Flop had done back in Guaral, where he had protected her, and put strength into her legs, hoping that she could at least shield Flop.

However, the unrest in her mind caused her knees to stay rigid, and her crippled legs would not let her actualize it.

If anything, it produced a fatal collapse of her posture in front of the “enemies”.

She had to raise it, she had to raise the sword. She had to do it, faster than her opponent, and yet.

She would not make it in time.

Rem: “—Hk.”

There was a flash of a grey light of dull hue with a swish. An “enemy” was about to strike Rem and Flop down, devoid of any mercy, with the sword in his hand—And it happened at that exact moment.

???: “—El!”

???: “Minya!!”

Two high-pitched voices overlapped, ushering in the extraordinary phenomenon that occurred immediately afterward right in front of Rem’s eyes.

Before her eyes, purple crystals scored a direct hit on the three sword-wielding “enemies” from behind, running through their chests. Furthermore, the astonishment did not end at that.

Enemy: “Gah.”

And then, in the moment immediately subsequent to a howl of pain from one of the pierced “enemies”, they had their entire body morph into the same dark-purple crystal that had penetrated their chest. And once more, they shattered.

If a difference did exist, it was that the “enemies”, now in purple fragments, displayed no signs of reviving.

And the one who had successfully saved Rem and Flop just barely, was—

???: “—Kept you waiting, Rem! The real star has stepped on the stage!”

Bravely announcing so, a small silhouette jumped off a large horse that had leapt over the outer wall, infiltrating the grounds of the mansion.

And thus, a boy of black hair with nasty-looking eyes, holding up a little girl in a dress in his arms, turned to Rem, closed one eye, and flashed a toothy smile at her.

Rem was left speechless due to his flamboyant appearance and announcement, and finally, she spoke.

Rem: “—Who are you?”

The young boy who had so gallantly made his appearance was someone who, to Rem’s eyes at least, was unknown.

5

—There was a loud, violent knock on the door, which caused Katya to feel a chill run down her spine.

Katya: “No, no, no, don’t come in, don’t come closer…”

Pushing her wheelchair to the back of her room, she clutched her curly hair and prayed, frantically.

She had sent Rem and Flop away, having declared that she would wait alone for the time being. Katya was going to stay hidden as long as possible, even breathing as little as she possibly could.

And yet, an”enemy” had noticed her existence, and now she was frightened to death.

Katya: “I’m unlucky. I’ve always been so, so, unlucky…”

The fact that an“enemy” had stumbled upon this room was purely the result of random chance, in their attempt to find survivors. Seeing as they had found her so easily, her luck was awful.

Maybe Rem and Flop would not make it back in time. Such a convenient thing would never happen to her.

Katya: “…Brother.”

Obviously, she was unable to see the other party outside the door.

However, according to Rem and Flop, the third party wandering around outside, who were neither Imperial Soldiers nor rebels, had the appearance of the dead.

When it came to the dead, the first person that came to Katya’s mind was her own big brother, Jamal Aurélie. The brother whom she had thought unkillable, and who had met an untimely demise.

She could not help but think that she would like to see him at least one more time. Even as a Hollow.

However, when it came to the inexplicable situation of the dead actually being out and about, what came to mind was not an obsession with her brother, but rather self-pity; it was wholly unsightly.

She could not even have such lofty compassion as to pray for Rem and Flop's safety and hope that they would survive in her stead. All she had was a sense of self-preservation, a sense of self-preservation which she could not help.

I'm just an imperfect and helpless person, one who doesn't deserve to be loved by anyone.

Katya: "I'm kind of like…"

Anticipating, hoping, and wishing to be saved was a mistake in and of itself. Due to her thinking such impudent thoughts, Rem and Flop would possibly end up as collateral damage.

Was this not the result of Katya's bad luck and ineptitude, which had ended up getting Rem and Flop caught up in this?

Katya's throat froze as those endlessly desperate thoughts were interrupted by a creaking sound of the door, finally beginning to show signs of being broken into.

Faced with such a hopeless situation, she cursed her body, seemingly incapable of even screaming satisfactorily.

However—

Katya: "Huh?"

Just when she thought that the door was about to be breached, it happened.

On the other side of the door, the "enemy" that had been trying to break in ceased moving. —Or, more precisely, they had been forced to stop their destruction.

Because, the entire body of the "enemy" had burst into flames, enveloped in vermillion.

And then—

???: “The Micro Spirit I scared into doing that was my last one.”

A new voice, one different from that of the burning “enemy”, reached Katya from the other side of the door.

Katya looked up as if she had been startled by the sound of the cursing voice. Then turning the wheel of her wheelchair, Katya took hold of the door herself by her own volition.

With a trembling hand, she unlocked the door that she had been so afraid to open, and opened it.

Behind the door stood a man, kicking the burnt and charred corpse of the “enemy”.

???: “Kept you waiting, Katya. —Let’s get out of here.”

He had lost his familiar bandana, and his normally upswept hair was hanging down. Katya’s eyes widened at the man, his forehead and cheeks covered in dried blood, who was reaching toward her.

Then, as she wheeled toward the man,

Katya: “Late… you’re so late, you idiot! I-I would’ve killed you if I’d died!”

And then, she tearfully dove into her fiancé, who had ruthlessly made his appearance.

6

—At the Crystal Palace of the Imperial Capital, at the star-shaped ramparts, and at the rebel stronghold, various situations were unfolding.

There were some who were aware of the circumstances, and others who knew absolutely nothing at all.

Those people were all jumbled together on a battlefield transformed into a crucible of chaos—no, the Vollachian Empire was what had been transformed.

Where bloodshed was rife, where the loss of life, akin to leaves falling from a tree, was revered, where taking action for the sake of blossoming ambition was considered the right thing. Its vast lands pulsated, and those engraved into the history of the Empire rose, one after the other.

What could it be called, if not a nightmare?

???: “—The Great Disaster.”

Indeed, if not to be designated as a nightmare, then it could only be designated as a Great Disaster.

The Stargazers, who infested the Vollachian Empire, had loudly proclaimed this to be one of the mass-scale disasters that would drive the world to ruination, as declared by the commandment they had been bestowed with.

That in itself was a matter inconsequential to the crux that had brought about the circumstances known as the Great Disaster.

The important thing was that this disaster induced the ruin of the Empire’s soil, and at its terminus, the wish would be fulfilled.

For that purpose, the moves to be made, the measures to be exhausted, absolutely everything would be expended.

Dying and bringing death, killing and being killed, through those means, amassed on the vast lands of Vollachia, were mountains of corpses.

If the entirety of Vollachia’s spilled blood was the foundation of the plan, all that remained was.

???: “All that remains is to carry the plan out to the end. —Deliberation: Required.”

With that, the bearer of the Great Disaster, the symbol of ruin, congratulated herself very, very quietly.

Bonus Short Stories

The Land of Wolves:
Death unto the Weak, No Mercy VIII

“Enter.”

“Excuse me.”

When he knocked on the door in front of him, he was granted admittance.

Once authorized, he announced his presence and pushed the office’s door open. In an instant, the room welcomed him with an oppressive atmosphere, as if it were imbibed with the unadulterated essence of the mansion’s master.

“There is no way I can get used to this.”

Letting out a frank cavil, Chesha Trim put a hand to his own mouth.

A candid opinion, truthful perhaps, but reckless nonetheless. Even he would often admonish himself about this unfavorable habit of speaking his mind without a second thought.

And here were the consequences…

“You dare expose your master to your dissatisfaction upon arriving at his office? Your disrespect knows no bounds.”

“Prince Vincent…”

“Call me not ‘Prince,’ but ‘Your Excellency.’ Were you one among the rest of my subjects, I would not bother correcting you, but you shall continue addressing me on future occasions. Bear this in mind henceforth.”

While handling a quill over the large desk allotted for his official duties, the boy delivered a warning.

His stern words rebuked Chesha for that gaffe. However, his criticism was appropriate, and despite what the word choice might suggest, he did not intend to administer another punishment besides this reprimand.

Therefore, Chesha bowed deeply on the spot.

“Understood, Your Excellency Vincent Abellux.”

Thus he readdressed his master: Vincent Abellux, prince of the empire.

A few days ago, Vincent, bearer of lustrous, black hair and dark, wise eyes, had encountered Chesha by chance and, much to the forenamed’s surprise, brought him in as a subordinate without consent.

Once an ordinary citizen of the nation, Chesha now spent his days in the mansion of a noble, offspring of the emperor too, discovering a new, hectic world.

Nevertheless…

“Your Excellency, I came to inform you that I finished the books you ordered me to read. And I must say, the library is quite different from my hometown’s. There is a wider variety of books here, and preserved in impressive condition as well.”

“A deteriorated book transmits deteriorated knowledge. It is said that, in the Kingdom of Lugunica, they employ magic to prevent that, but such conveniency is not available to us in the Empire of Vollachia. Workers are required for that task.”

“Hahaaa, yes, I can see that. Thanks to those efforts, I did not struggle with guessing faded characters, nor with the frustration of getting engaged in a story, only to find that its ending has been cut off.”

“Those are common occurrences. As for you…”

“Yes?”

“I believe that I provided you with a considerable quantity of books. Given the brevity with which you read through them all, I presume that you are enjoying your stay.”

Vincent poised his chin on his hand, supported by the desk, and raised his gaze towards Chesha. Seeing the slight, cynical grin on his lips, Chesha closed one eye and shrugged.

That silent gesture was all that he could muster in response to Vincent’s undeniable inference.

His original plan did not include serving a Vollachian prince… yet, as much as he adjudged it hectic, Chesha had found gratification amidst that routine.

By nature, he disliked adapting to his environs; he preferred to walk at his own pace, regarding whatever river flowed beside him with little more than a sidelong glance.

‘Egocentric’ was the perfect term to describe his attitude.

“In my hometown, my troublesome character became the cause of my exile, whereas in Your Excellency’s mansion, it does not seem to hinder me in any significant way.”

“That is not your assessment to make, but your peers’. Thus far, no complaints about your behavior have reached my ears, though.”

“Unfortunately, I find it difficult to even come close to Your Excellency in terms of ill repute. You may defy them, but those old, yet heated rumors about your familial exterminations are not going to cool off with ease.”

“Hmph, your mouth opens so often, yet desirable things come out seldom.”

With a light snort, Vincent fended off Chesha’s disrespectful remark.

While it was not the latter’s intention to anger him, the prince harbored remarkable magnanimity… No, rather, he reserved his emotions, such as anger and fear, for worthier purposes.

Despite being still a boy, the younger one by two years as well, he managed himself with astounding rigor.

He never closed both eyes at the same time in front of Chesha, nor anybody else for that matter.

Not one second of laxity would the absolute regime of his psyche ever condone.

“Tell me about the distribution map for the aquatic mabeasts inhabiting the Godlet Waterfall.”

Faint perplexity tinged Chesha’s mien when the conversation digressed into an unexpected subject.

Soon he recognized its connection to the previous reads that he had mentioned in his latest report.

“I remember now. Their breeding season is near… And during this period, culling measures should be carried out to prevent their influence on fishermen’s hauls.”

“Regarding the vicissitude of the Kraukraun Grassland nomads’ ruling class.”

“Since the power balance among said land’s nomads made them quite prone to repeat the same history, they needed to create new arms, techniques, or prodigies, lest conflicts would never be settled.”

“If the ‘Stone’ in the Gairahal Wetlands moves, when shall its next activity be predicted to occur?”

“Considering its cycle, within the next two years. And given that the records of major activity were twelve years apart, we can anticipate a large-scale earthquake in six years.”

From economy, then anthropology, to geology, Vincent tested Chesha without pause. Each query demanded him to cite those texts… Not via memorization, but via comprehension and application skills.

From Vincent’s mouth sprang more questions, which diverged into linguistics, astronomy, arithmetic, international magic techniques; and Chesha exerted his brainpower for all of them.

Once they finished…

“Very well. You have proved that you did not lie about having read the books.”

“…This went beyond a mere reading or writing test. You have set such high standards for me.”

“High standards? What is that supposed to mean?”

For an instant, Vincent seemed caught unaware.

An atypically childlike expression disrupted Vincent’s adult composure. In this state, his countenance rendered him a normal boy of handsome features.

“I shall not tell a swordsman to fire his sword. I shall order that he slash with it.”

However, that unusual semblance faded seconds later into a display of philosophical insight.

While he understood Vincent’s purport, Chesha could not help but deem it an overestimation. He had managed to reply in the desired way this time, but who could guarantee that he would never lose track of the boy’s wisdom and bring shame upon himself?

“I fear the day when I will no longer be able to fulfill Your Excellency’s expectations.”

“Heed your steps, and you shall elude it. My ideals allow no indolent wight to walk abreast with me.”

“Oh, how you limit my choices.”

To detest not the unskilled, but the indolent: a sentiment most emblematic of the person called Vincent. It was at that moment that Chesha recalled the main reason why he had stopped by this room.

He was awaiting the next instruction, having completed the assigned reading, but not only that…

“Your Excellency Vincent, while it may be impertinent, I want to request something.”

“Do tell. Unless it is a holiday, in which case, do not even bother begging.”

“I would indeed like to discuss the terms of my work at a later date… But my actual request relates to my hometown, where my family lives.”

“Your hometown, you say?”

Someway, Vincent’s interest flared up when Chesha broached that topic. In the middle of opening the seal of a letter on the desk, the boy’s hands became still, while his black eyes stared at Chesha.

Upon first arriving in the mansion, Chesha had undergone an interrogation regarding his antecedents, through which he had briefed Vincent about his expulsion from the village. Chesha had displeased the village’s aged landowner, and not even his family had stood up in his defense. Ergo, no home awaited his return.

“I assumed that any matter pertaining to that village would be long dissociated from you. Or perchance you still resent those who banished you… So, you wish to borrow my soldiers to enact your revenge?”

“Hahaha, you jest. And if you would be so kind as to brush off what I will say next as a joke too…”

“Say it.”

“Judging by that radical proposition, is it safe to assume that you amuse yourself exterminating rebels along with their families?”

Unsure of what he was expecting, Vincent pardoned Chesha’s jest with an irked face. Albeit Chesha phrased it as a joke, part of his doubt stemmed from genuine concern.

Should he construe these indecorous persiflage and jokes as a peculiarity of Vincent, or as the Vollachian imperial family’s typical sense of humor?

Putting that irrelevant query in the back of his mind, he spoke:

“My apologies, but I am not so obsessed with my family as to wish ruination upon them, so I do not need to borrow your soldiers. In truth, I want you to assist me in delivering a memento.”

“A memento… And who is it that you need slain?”

“It is not a head, nor an ear, nor a finger.”

“…”

“It will be the first pay I receive while working in this mansion.”

When Chesha explained his petition, Vincent’s face scrunched up in confusion.

He could brook the rebuff of his imperial quip, but not hearing Chesha’s words without grasping the meaning behind them. However, Vincent’s skepticism was justified.

“My apologies, but I need you to understand the reason behind this is a mere whim of mine.”

“How unfathomable. I understand that your indifference overrules your resentment, but what would gifting your salary be, if not a token of gratitude? Towards the wights who spurned you, no less.”

“…”

“What compels you to remit money to them? You are no stranger to the saying, ‘the blood of the covenant is thicker than the water of the womb,’ are you?”

Disbelief made Vincent’s obduracy grow to unforeseen extremes.

Hearing his master almost argue in favor of the familial extermination as a more rational idea, Chesha breathed out a feeble sigh.

He was not lying. He did not feel aggrieved enough to seek his hometown’s destruction, but neither was he so indulgent as to forgive his family’s acts on grounds of their kinship.

Quite the opposite, in fact.

“Answer, Chesha Trim. What compels you to ask for…?”

“To put it succinctly, revenge.”

“…What?”

Upon hearing Chesha’s answer, Vincent ceased all movement, betokening discontent with his expression.

Knitting his eyebrows did not suffice, Vincent etched flagrant wrinkles between them, while his eyes strove to read Chesha’s intent to no avail.

“Your philosophy is beyond my comprehension. How shall you achieve revenge by remitting money?”

“Good question. As I have explained to Your Excellency before, I was banished from my hometown. My family did not bother supporting a stubborn troublemaker like me… They must be convinced that I will not make it far into the outside world before dropping dead due to a silly misstep.”

“Perhaps. How does that solve my doubt?”

“What if that very same troublemaker were to send them some decent money? Imagine their faces when they get proven wrong, would that not be hilarious?”

“…”

How dreadful would it be if the boy from whom they anticipated a beggar’s death sent them a copious amount of money, as if thanking them for ousting him? And that wealth would bring not joy, but anguish, for despite being its possessors, their right to squander it did not come guaranteed.

So had Chesha Trim plotted in retaliation against his hometown and family, inferior in severity to destruction, yet an effective way to gloat nonetheless.

“This is purely based on my imagination, though.”

He affixed that affirmation at the end, aware that his logic was difficult to follow. Unlike Vincent, Chesha did whatever he could to avoid abridged explanations.

Regardless, Chesha trusted that his choice contained nothing nonsensical nor insane, yet…

“…Pfft.”

“Your Excellency?”

Suddenly, Chesha raised an eyebrow and called out to Vincent.

Chesha found himself feeling slight surprise. Ignoring Chesha’s bemused gaze, Vincent put a hand to his own forehead…

“Hahahahaha!”

And so, his voice rose into a guffaw.

Eyes wide open and paralyzed, Chesha watched Vincent laugh.

Some times, Vincent would joke or banter. Others, he would don a sardonic smirk or snort. But never could he have pictured Vincent thus, laughing with his mouth open.

“I was convinced that Your Excellency never laughed.”

“What foolish thoughts you voice. You dare present such a malicious scheme to me and tell me not to laugh? What unbridled disrespect, insolence!”

“Had I done it on purpose, you would have adduced it to reprehend me…”

He had not aimed to amuse or bewilder him; this exploit did not involve deliberation. At least, it did not cause his master to assess him as a creature of unfathomable psyche, though.

“Hmph,” chuckled Vincent, struggling to repress the impulse that lingered after that hearty laughter, with a nod. “I see your vision now. However…”

“Ah, of course, this would apply exclusively to my first pay. I am quite greedy, you see… so, no matter how much this mansion’s library provides, it will never satiate me.”

“Good to know. Like swordsmen need their swords and civilians need their books, every living being needs nourishment.”

That response was a tacit authorization of Chesha’s revenge, and also a promise of complicity.

Grateful for Vincent’s approval, Chesha spoke again:

“While we are here, Your Excellency, if you do not mind granting me something extra…”

“Speak. The more secretive your exposition is, the less attention I pay.”

“If you say so… Could you confer a new name onto me?”

“…”

Upon the reveal of the additional favor, Vincent tensed his lips and narrowed his eyes.

That request signified Chesha Trim’s renounce of his birth name. Although he planned to remit his salary to his hometown as a token of revenge, he did not wish ill upon his estranged family.

If news spread that Chesha served a Vollachian prince, it would place an unnecessary burden on his family. The possibility of Chesha’s family trying to take advantage of his status existed too.

So, instead of discommoding Vincent with such matters…

“Does the surname ‘Gold’ appeal to you?”

Contemplating Chesha’s circumstances, about which he did not need to inquire, Vincent submitted a name. Chesha felt impressed by his master's perspicacity. Notwithstanding…

"If I remember correctly, that surname belongs to a household of traitorous subjects, who were exterminated by Your Excellency."

"You do remember correctly. You have earned my praise for your memory."

"I must say I admire Your Excellency's dedication to intimidating others."

Albeit he was not determined on refusing, the fact that somebody could conceive an idea so vicious amazed him. Regardless, he had no actual qualms about bearing the surname Gold.

"Very well, the last name will be Gold. What should we do about the first name? If you ask me, I would prefer one similar to the original."

"Similar to the original, huh. Then, let us call you Chisha."

"…"

"Chisha Gold. Hm, not bad."

Complacent, Vincent went ahead and validated the modification, with which he seemed to find no fault.

Not because he lacked seriousness in naming a person. There were simply no aspects that he found fault with. The combination of a resemblant first name and a reusable last name.

In fact, he appeared proud, almost congratulating himself for fabricating the optimum option.

"…? Is something wrong, Chisha Gold?"

"Oh, no, no, nothing. I am once again awash with admiration, is all."

Thus, Chesha Trim became Chisha Gold.

In other news, Chisha carried out his revenge without hassle: when his salary reached his family in their hometown, they froze in shock at the great sum, which wreaked distress.

Furthermore, Chisha informed his hometown about the House of Abellux's involvement in this donation, and thereby executed another vengeful scheme against his troublesome master: proclaiming the name of the 'Sanguinary Prince.'

END

The Land of Wolves:
Death unto the Weak, No Mercy Zero:
The Nine Divine Generals

1

Before his eyes were bundles of documents piled up into mountains. After finishing the first mountain, Chisha Gold massaged the skin around his eyes and slowly stood up.

Chisha: “Oh dear, it appears that I am showing signs of being a tad strained.”

In the Vollachian Empire, it was normal for the strong to be revered, and for the weak to be disdained.

Since such a stern ironclad rule of blood was imposed widely, it was indeed easy to form misunderstandings, but it was not as though everything was driven by the clash of swords sparking against each other.

Though it might have been obvious, there was also the existence of negotiations unaccompanied by a sword, purely by means of words, money, and goods. Since there existed people who engaged in such negotiations, and though this also may be obvious, there was also a considerable amount of paperwork.

Chisha: “His Excellency often preaches the importance of civil officers, but, after all, it would be a thorny path to spread such an awareness among the people of the Empire.”

In Vollachia, ever since the time that one was a young child, there were many things decided based on physical strength. If the standard of value were purely brute strength, then it would not be difficult to imagine the treatment of those unsuited for fighting.

The public gaze of the Empire’s Sword Wolves was harsh on those who pretended to be wise. It would have been better had it been only the public gaze that was harsh, but because their harshness went as far as their claws and fangs, it was a great deal of trouble for the weak.

In reality, Chisha had been one who had faced extreme hardship during his childhood.

Although, in Chisha's case, when in a direct confrontation with an opponent he was no match for, he would make full use of tools and arithmetic to launch a counterattack, or would manipulate language and information to turn his opponents against each other; so, he was left undefeated.

However—

Chisha: "If you are defeated, you lose your life, and if you fight back, you lose your place. It seems a pity that I am not suited to the soil and water of the Empire."

Ultimately, since that disposition of Chisha's was the cause of him leaving his hometown, it became tempting for him to lament just how absurd life could be.

Be that as it may, it could be said that he was rather lucky, for his life had not been exhausted as he drifted through the stream.

Chisha: "Only…"

Muttering to himself, Chisha stood as he gazed out of the window of the room that was granted to him so that he could perform his official duties.

Positioned at the innermost place of Vollachia's Imperial Capital of Lupugana, the Crystal Palace—This castle, known for having the foremost beauty within this world, was a rare article that the people of the Empire could find value outside of strength in.

Extolled to have such beauty, the gardens of the castle had also been extremely intricately designed, but—

???: "Ahahahahahaha! Hold on, hold on, Anya, there's no way you'll be able to seize me like that! Are you perhaps messing around, dozing off, or getting distracted?"

Arakiya: “Cecilus, I’ll kill you.”

Cecilus: “Doesn’t that favorite phrase of yours become kinda empty after saying it for years?”

Arakiya: “I’LL KILL YOU!”

The gardens of the beautiful Crystal Palace, its vegetation was ripped out one step after the other as legs kicked off the ground, and it was devastated by a vortex of flame that chased after the fleeing back; it was being painted over into a wretched spectacle, never to be seen again.

The rampage and voices that lacked any concern for their surroundings whatsoever was a playful bout between two fellow natural disasters, one that nobody would heedlessly approach.

That was the reality unfolding in the Crystal Palace of His Excellency the Emperor, who sat at the pinnacle of the Empire. Upon beholding it, Chisha narrowed his long-slitted eyes, expressing his feelings of lament.

???: “—General First-Class Cecilus! General First-Class Arakiya! Cease this folly! Just where do you think you are right now?! This is the revered castle of His Excellency the Emperor, Vincent Vollachia! Compose yourselves!”

As if speaking by proxy for those inner thoughts of Chisha, a deep, angered voice broke into the garden where lightning and flame entwined.

However, it seemed like the owner of the angered voice did not realize that he was helping to raise the level of the increasingly noisy atmosphere, so the voice accomplished nothing but adding fuel to the lightning and fire.

Cecilus: “Oh? Goz-san! If you have any complaints, please direct them towards Anya, and not me! After all, I’m just bustling about like I usually do!”

Arakiya: “Goz, hindrance.”

Goz: “Alright! Are neither of you listening?! You are lacking in self-awareness as Generals!!”

At the situation which only continued to become more obstreperous and noisy, Chisha silently left the window. Then, while massaging his brow with his fingers once again,

Chisha: “It should not have turned out this way. Oh, how I pity myself…”

With that, he expressed lament of his own circumstances once more.

2

—One of the Nine Divine Generals of the Vollachian Empire, Chisha Gold was granted the position of Fourth.

Whenever he looked directly at that title of his, Chisha would make a sour face at how unbalanced it was.

Unbalanced in the sense that he was not worthy, and in the sense that it was a position he had not desired.

Chisha: “The Nine Divine Generals are the honor of military strength, a title that ought to be granted only to military men who are worthy of the seat of General First-Class. It would have been better for me to be made Prime Minister, instead of granting it to that turbulent individual.”

???: “Stop being half-assed, how about you just accept your fucking position, Chisha.”

When Chisha spilled his miscellaneous thoughts, a visitor interjected vulgarly.

Stepping into the office, using the entirety of his small body to occupy the sofa, the hyena person of small stature—

Chisha: “—General First-Class Groovy Gumlet, are you not unsatisfied? With the fact that I am one of the Nine Divine Generals, not to mention one who is above you in rank.”

Groovy: “Kah!! Don’t make me fucking laugh, goddammit. The topmost one is Cecilus. As long as that doesn’t change, then the order of the ones under him doesn’t have any significant meaning! You should know that too, bastard.”

Chisha: “As usual, in contrast to your appearance, speech, and conduct, you are quite the capable intellectual. I am impressed.”

Groovy: “That means you think that I’m a fucking idiot, doesn’t it? Goddammit Chisha.”

Flashing his sharp fangs, Groovy tried to intimidate Chisha with his cute and round eyes.

Though his outward appearance was not very menacing, as Sixth of the Nine Divine Generals, he was one of the Empire’s strongest warriors; and, unlike Chisha, that title was not merely a decoration.

Be that as it may, that he had paid a visit to Chisha’s office like this was not for the sake of an important discussion between two fellow First-Class Generals of the Empire about asserting influence over the future of Vollachia. Rather—

Groovy: “Cecilus and Arakiya, that fucking goddamn duo, they had the nerve to mess up the gardens that I tend to! Chisha, you bastard, you better properly discipline them!”

Indeed, it was for the sake of pleading his complaints on the matter of the garden’s wretched state.

Groovy was a distinguished warrior of the Empire, but he also possessed notoriety as a craftsman and artist, separate to that of being a warrior. The gardens, which played a part in the beautiful scenery of the Crystal Palace, were also one of his works.

Known as the Master of Cursed Tools, Groovy was enthusiastic about developing arms and weapons for the purpose of killing and harming people, and he was also well-versed in the restoration of old buildings and ruins that held historic value.

On that point, he could see eye to eye with Chisha, who could feel the grace in the functional aspects of antiques.

Chisha: “First, Groovy—let me preface this by saying that I fully understand the sentiments of the Generals, but let me just tell you this…”

Groovy: “Oh, what is it, what is it? If it’s just a fucking standard apology, then there’s no point.”

Chisha: “I will first answer that I have no reason to apologize. At any rate, it is not my duty to discipline Cecilus, for there is no position which even does so.”

Groovy: “Hah?! You’re refusing to discipline him?! Are you fucking abandoning your duty as his owner?”

Groovy’s eyes looked utterly perplexed, but Chisha was the one who found it unbelievable.

He had certainly known Cecilus for a long time, but Chisha was not his parent, sibling, or anything of the sort. Chisha had no obligation to educate or discipline Cecilus, and besides—

???: “Groovy, unreasonable. Cecilus, anybody, discipline, impossible.”

Sitting on the floor, Moguro Hagane spoke by proxy for the conclusion of Chisha’s inner thoughts.

Moguro, who called themself a Steelfolk, a peculiar race whose bodies were made out of metal and minerals, could have been mistaken for an avant-garde decoration if they simply sat there and remained silent.

According to what Chisha had heard, the first meeting between Groovy and Moguro, who now had a surprising friendship, seemed to be when Groovy thought Moguro was a furnishing of the Crystal Palace and had tried to put them away into storage.

Regardless of their start, the two had become close, and now the both of them were paying a visit to his office together.

However, the fact that they were close friends, and cooperating to do whatever they were told, were separate matters.

Groovy: “Ah? What the hell are you saying? Goddamn you Moguro! Even though I came to complain about those two fucking idiots making a fucking mess, how do you have the nerve to oppose me!”

Moguro: “Invited, me, gardening. Your, complaint, support, incorrect.”

Groovy: “Goddammit! I’ve been double crossed by my friend! How could this possibly be, FUCK!”

Groovy clutched his head in perplexity, and his fur scattered as he raged atop the sofa. Observing that state, Chisha let out a “That is it” as he fiddled with his bangs.

Groovy: “That? What is that? Goddammit.”

Chisha: “It’s the same as how General First-Class Moguro did not do what you told them to just now, General First-Class Groovy. Cecilus will not do what I tell him to. Therefore, your pleas to me are meaningless.”

Groovy: “FUCK! So then, I’m supposed to be prepared for those fucking idiots to lay waste to the gardens each time I tend to them? GODDAMMIT! Then just let it pile up with sand, fucking hell!”

Chisha: “—. I understand your sentiments, so I will pass them on to His Excellency. For the time being, I would be grateful if that satisfied you.”

It was not enough of a counter-proposal to be referred to as such, but that was the extent of the compromise offered by Chisha.

Groovy made a fairly bitter face regarding the matter, and hesitated to nod, but,

Moguro: “Groovy, compromise.”

With that, at the straightforward words of his friend, he made a profusely loud click of his tongue.

???: “The Stargazer who hangs ‘round the Palace, wouldn’t it be better ta kill it?”

Was there at least one person who could visit without giving him a headache? Even though Chisha did not hold his head at these opening words, he did begin wanting to hold it.

The Stargazer, brought up as the topic of conversation, was a person who was neither a military officer nor a civil officer, but had special privileges to visit the Crystal Palace as he pleased, and they were someone whom even Chisha did not think of kindly.

Be that as it may—

Chisha: “The information that it brings is adequately useful. Sir Olbart, you should also be aware of that.”

Olbart: “Of course, I’m plenty aware. But, there are Stargazers who got a similar position outside of it, ain’t there? If that’s tha case, there shouldn’t be a problem with replacin’ it.”

Chisha: “In other words, Sir, you think we ought to eliminate Ubilk-dono?”

Olbart: “It’d be pointless if the other Stargazers were all tha same as it, but I’ve tortured enough of ‘em ta understand that ain’t the case.”

Saying that, Olbart Dunkelkenn sat cross-legged on the reception table as he scratched his back.

While he had the aura of a good-natured old man, he was the chief of the Shinobi, a group of extraordinary superhumans, and had deeply immersed himself in the dark side of the Empire for a long time, coming to be quite proficient at dirty work.

Stargazers—Those who devoted themselves to the fulfillment of the commandment that they received from the stars; Ubilk, who frequently visited the Crystal Palace, was one of them. Aside from him, there were some other Stargazers here and there, and in order to question them about the authenticity of Ubilk’s words, many were imprisoned and put through the hardship of torture by the hands of Shinobi.

Chisha: “Despite going to that extent, the words of Ubilk-dono could not be concluded as falsehoods.”

Olbart: “That’s why, I ain’t sayin’ we should get rid of all the Stargazers. It’s just that I want ta get rid of it.”

Chisha: “Sir Olbart, are you saying that that is for the sake of His Excellency the Emperor?”

Olbart: “Hmm? That’s just me feelin’ good ‘bout serving my duty as a General. Not only is this me seriously doin’ my job, but it’s also for tha sake of His Excellency, right?”

Shamelessly, Olbart tried to force his demands to be met. While Chisha was astounded by that stance, there was some truth to what he was saying.

Especially since this old man known as Olbart, did not mainly serve due to loyalty or his conscience.

At the extremities of probing into his own desires and way of being, he had been perfected as the apex of the Shinobi, so it was important for Vincent’s reign that he treated Olbart well to keep his mind open.

However—

Chisha: “It is going a bit too far for you to try and bend His Excellency’s will by flashing your military might.”

Olbart: “Good grief… as expected, yer tha most frightenin’ outta tha Nine Divine Generals.”

Chisha: “Oh? To receive such an evaluation from the Vicious Old Man himself, I am surprised.”

Olbart: “If it was only ‘bout being strong, then it would be Ceshi or Araki, but yer strength ain’t somethin’ that can be compared ta those kinds of aspects. Surprisingly, that’s the same as it, right?”

Chisha: "…"

Olbart: "In this country, I think tha ones who get up ta tha worst stuff are guys like ya."

Being spoken of with quite an unexpected appraisal, Chisha made an astonished expression. Seeing him in that state, Olbart laughed with an amused "Kakaka-kka!" and jumped up.

Dropping from the table to stand on the floor, he turned his back and waved his hand.

He probably came in with the expectation that luck may be on his side, but yielding upon understanding that it would not come to fruition was quite manly. Olbart had survived for so long to that age not just because he was strong, but because he was tough.

Chisha: "Only, it was probably an exaggerated opinion that I am the most frightening."

Olbart: "Yer free ta think that way. Just as I'm free ta think this way."

The fact that he had no intention of bending his opinion was a trait of Olbart, who seemed like he was reasonable, yet refused to understand others.

Flashing his teeth as he smiled, the old man departed, and as Chisha saw him off, he massaged the skin around his eyes with his fingers.

His shoulders were also stiff from all the paperwork, but taking consultations again and again in his office like this was also troublesome. In the first place, why was everyone going to Chisha in succession?

Chisha: "I wish they would stop bringing things to me, just because it would be difficult to directly communicate such things to His Excellency."

Of course, everyone probably had the consideration not to bother Vincent in his busy position, but Chisha being chosen as a substitute was probably not the entire reason for this.

Was it because it was easy to speak to him? Or perhaps—

???: “Well, ain’t that just ‘cause if His Excellency was willing to lend an ear, it’s unthinkable that it would be for anyone ‘cept General First-Class Chisha.”

Chisha: “—General First-Class Balleroy.”

Leaning against the opened door, what Chisha saw from within the room was a tall figure who gave off an elegant atmosphere—It was the man known as Balleroy Temeglyph.

He called out Chisha’s name, and upon seeing the latter’s reaction of a slight frown, Balleroy shut a single one of his eyes, and,

Balleroy: “What’s wrong? Is there something on my face?”

Chisha: “No. It is just that I feel strangely linked by fate with the Divine Generals today. General First-Class Balleroy, since I have now happened to see you, today I have seen the figures or heard the voices of all except General First-Class Yorna.”

Balleroy: “Well, I’ve also had some strange days. While we’re on the topic of strange and peculiar things, General First-Class Chisha, would ya like to relax for a bit and go on a long ride with me?”

Balleroy walked up to Chisha as he made a proposition, and hearing that, the wrinkles on Chisha’s brow became increasingly deep.

As an oddball to the many obstinate folk within the Nine Divine Generals, Balleroy possessed an exceptionally honest human nature. Nonetheless, he was not such a close friend that he would make this kind of proposal.

Chisha: “If that were to happen, it would be in accordance with Cecilus’s suggestion and expectations, though.”

Balleroy: “Ta-hah, now that’s the level of discernment I would expect from ya.”

At Chisha’s identification, Balleroy placed his hand on his forehead and laughed, Balleroy: “Just as ya guessed, Cecilus had requested that I do this. Somehow, it seemed that he felt responsible for ruining the gardens together with Arakiya…”

Chisha: “General First-Class Balleroy, if you are a General, you ought to handle information properly.”

Balleroy: “General First-Class Chisha, it seemed he was worried that what happened in the gardens was causing wrinkles to gather on your brow, so he asked if I could take you flying through the sky to help take your mind off of things.”

Chisha: “As usual, I am surprised he is a man who is capable of leaning in the direction of thoughtfulness.”

Although, on top of being a moment of rare thoughtfulness, relying on Balleroy instead of his own strength seemed to be a sign of growth.

If there was not really a glimpse of growth, then with his own philosophy, which was incomprehensible to others, he would have tried to carry out his gratitude towards Chisha using his own strength.

Balleroy: “So then, what shall we do? Would you like to relax for a short while on my Carillon?”

Chisha: “I appreciate the proposal. But, I also have piles of work to get through…”

Balleroy: “Oh my, that’s too bad… I wish I could help out, but unfortunately I’ve never been remotely good at this kind of work.”

Staring at the heaps of documents atop the desk, Balleroy scratched his cheek. Even so, the fact that he was apologetic about being unable to help out made Balleroy much more personable than the other Divine Generals.

It was something that neither Groovy, nor Moguro, nor Olbart, nor anyone else had brought up. If it were Cecilus or Arakiya, they would have probably exemplified their refusal at merely the sight of the mountain of documents.

Henceforth—

Chisha: “—For the time being, it seems that there is a need for me to carry this burden on my back.”

With that, the man, who alongside Cecilus was indispensable to the Nine Divine Generals, massaged the skin around his eyes once again.

END

The Dragon Kingdom:
Meili's Witchbeast Observation Record II

1

Meili Portroute's ordeal had reached a new stage. Accompanied by her two companions, Annerose and Clind, they had used a rather unconventional method to visit Lugunica Castle in the Kingdom of Lugunica's royal capital. Using Clind's mysterious power, the three of them had traveled by teleportation. The boulder-faced knight charged with guarding the castle dropped his head into his hands, saying, "If such a person truly exists, no amount of security will ever be enough to protect people of importance…"

Meili was apologetic, feeling rather sorry for him. If there had, in fact, been someone with Clind's abilities during her and Elsa's time in the assassination business, then they would have completed their assignments with much less hassle. So, in that respect, it was a good thing that Clind was just a child-loving pervert who served Annerose.

"Unfortunately, it's not the kind of power I can use freely. I hope you're aware that proper compensation must be paid. Gratitude," he said as he glanced over his shoulder at Meili.

Meili's shoulders shook. She felt uncomfortable since it felt as if he had read her thoughts, but she quickly realized this wasn't the time to be worrying about Clind or the boulder-faced knight. The reason being…

"Are you the girl who can lead the way to the Pleiades Watchtower?"

The question came from the monster standing before her. As a tamer of witchbeasts, it wasn't that she had the power to fight directly herself, but she had certainly encountered a variety of opponents weak and strong during her time with Elsa—who loved fighting. However, she had never encountered anything like the one standing before her now; he was a true monster.

"There's no need to be so nervous… But I suppose it doesn't sound very convincing when it's coming from me."

"…"

Meili stood frozen as this monster before them addressed her directly. "I don't mean to frighten you. I only wish to ask you a question, first of all." Then, looking over her slender shoulder with his blue eyes, he asked, "How did you tame that witchbeast?"

"…"

Meili flinched, and a small creature suddenly leapt onto her head. As it extended its pincers towards the sky, the young man raised his eyebrows slightly in surprise.

"Whoa."

Everyone else was not so calm as pandemonium quickly spread amongst the group. Meili reflexively covered her face as small pincers snapped above her head, her mind overcome with confusion since she didn't know what to do.

"Meili! Calm down!" screeched Annerose from right beside her in an attempt to pacify her. It was no use, however, for Meili had fallen into a state of disarray in this terribly unexpected occurrence.

Following her deep rooted defensive instinct she had developed from a young age, she let the witchbeast rage as it attempted to cut down everything in her vicinity—

A sudden voice and sharp slap cut through the chaos in the great hall.

"Dumbass. You're the one causin' her to panic, so get your ass back here."

"Huh?" Meili raised her head to see the monster in front of her stepping back.

The source of this voice and the loud slap was a young girl with gold hair coming forward to meet them. Her crimson eyes peered at

Meili, and then at the creature on her head—a small, crimson scorpion. "I understand how you feel—bein' leered at by a crowd of people as though you're some weirdo. They're a bunch of creeps."

As she spoke, the girl held out a finger towards the crimson scorpion, which aimed a pincer at it. "Whoa now." She quickly pulled her finger out of harm's way and gave a cheerful laugh, one protruding tooth standing out from the rest. "Heh, what a lively insect! Your pincers seem pretty sharp, eh?"

"…It could probably slice a thin finger riight off."

"Heey now, are ya serious? Then that coulda been pretty dangerous."

The girl's demeanor, which was more unorthodox than reckless, made Meili respond in her natural way of speech.

"Lady Felt, please be careful," said the man standing behind the smiling girl. "Though it may be tiny, it's still a witchbeast."

"So you're the pipsqueak professing to be able to control witchbeasts, right? Putting it on your head like that ain't nothing, I guess. Looks like you could be telling the truth. More or less…"

At the caution of the monster, the girl sharpened her almond-shaped eyes and, with that expression, surveyed the distinguished old men lined up inside the great hall.

"You old geezers haven't learned anything, have ya? Don't you remember how you pulled the same sorta shit when you came to see me and pissed me off? Or are you all a bunch of idiots or somethin'?"

"Lady Felt, just because you are a candidate doesn't mean you can behave like that…" criticized Bordeaux.

"I was like this before I was given an insignia," she retorted, crossing her arms. "Just 'cause you're old doesn't mean you can pretend to be hard of hearin'. If you want to be treated with respect, then show me some sincerity first."

The bald old man—Bordeaux—furrowed his thick eyebrows and fell silent.

Watching this exchange from the side, an elderly man they called Miklotov laughed with a “Ho ho ho ho.” He caressed his long beard in good humor as he spoke. “You’ve become better at forming your arguments, Lady Felt. Could this be a sign that you’re becoming more aware of your position as a candidate for the royal selection?”

“Who knows? Although, I gotta say, I’m not sure if I’ve developed that kind of annoying awareness yet, but…” After answering Miklotov’s question, Felt pointed to the tall, red-haired figure behind her with her thumb, causing the monster to widen his eyes. “But I have become self-aware enough to know I’m this guy’s mistress and that I gotta reel him in whenever he accidentally scares people.”

“Well, then we’re grateful that you’re with him,” Miklotov replied.

“Don’t mention it.”

Brazenly responding to her senior, Felt spun around to face the visitors. Meili slightly stiffened at the strong-willed crimson eyes pressing upon her.

Felt laughed good-humoredly. “I’m Felt. One of the royal selection candidates, and that Sword Saint’s mistress. Nice to meetcha.”

Giving Meili an abrupt slap on the shoulder, Felt nonchalantly declared herself the tamer of a monster.

2

The monster known as Reinhard van Astrea was able to accomplish his job with ease after Felt calmed Meili down.

“She certainly is the owner of a divine protection…the Divine Protection of Witchbeast Manipulation. It’s an incredibly rare ability that allows her to manipulate witchbeasts at will.”

With a single glance at Meili, Reinhard identified her power. Since getting others to believe in Meili’s abilities was their objective, his assurance was welcome, but…

“Just so you know, we were prepared to test the validity of our claim regarding her powers. Please do not think you did us any favors,” said the girl standing next to Meili.

“You’re pretty anal about bein’ in someone’s debt, huh. You’re pretty mature for someone so small. Don’t worry, Reinhard only glanced at her, so I don’t think you owe us anything either.”

“Splendid, then.”

Taking no notice of Meili—the person concerned—Annerose and Felt argued on equal terms.

In any case, with proof of Meili’s witchbeast-taming divine protection, discussions with the Council of Wise Men could probably move forward. That is to say—

“The way to the Pleiades Watchtower is therefore possible with Emilia’s vassal—this Meili Portroute,” Annerose boldly proclaimed to the Council of Wise Men gathered there.

The wise old men began their discussion at her words, but Felt and Reinhard, having arrived late, were a step behind in the conversation. Folding her arms, Felt tilted her head. “The Pleiades Watchtower…”

“It’s the tower that Lady Emilia, Subaru, as well as Lady Anastasia went to,” Reinhard explained. “In the far east, at the edge of the Augria Sand Dunes, sits a tower where the Sage, Shaula, resides.”

“…Naked Lady didn’t really feel much like a Saage,” Meili mumbled reflexively at the mention of the Sage, before immediately slapping a palm over her mouth—but it was too late. She’d drawn the attention of Felt and Reinhard, who both stared at her.

The two stood beside Meili, the small crimson scorpion still perched atop her head.

“I see… I got the jist of it. Because of your divine protection, the witchbeasts coverin’ the path to the tower don’t see you as a disturbance and allow you to pass unchallenged."

"Judging from the conversation just now, it seems as though you've already been to the Pleiades Watchtower and come back," commented Reinhard. "Did Lady Emilia and the others get back safely?"

"H-Hold on, hoold on! I'm…not alloowed to talk without permission!"

Meili, being pressed, refused to speak. As she shook her head with a hand still over her mouth, her three-strand braid shook from left to right. The small crimson scorpion raised its stinger in support of her and snapped its pincers as though it was trying to intimidate the two.

Clind cleared his throat as help to the flustered Meili and cut into the space between her, Felt, and Reinhard. "We're very grateful for your cooperation, Lady Felt and Sir Reinhard. However, Meili is also in an extremely difficult position, and no matter how young Lady Felt seems, and how dazzling her soul is, we cannot hand her over. Gratitude."

Turning towards Clind's mysteriously sparkling eyes, Felt's cheeks stiffened. "What the—you sure are sayin' some creepy things there…"

Gently inserting an arm in front of Felt to protect his mistress, Reinhard compared Meili and Clind. "When you say 'difficult position', is that what you are here to talk about?"

Giving a deep bow, Clind affirmed Reinhard's question. "Indeed. Discerning."

At that conversation, Felt made a face that showed her lack of understanding. But before they could explain, the conversation had moved on—not between Meili and the others, but rather, Annerose and the Council of Wise Men.

"I understand that Miss Meili's rare ability would help us clear a path to the Pleiades Watchtower in the eastern part of the kingdom.

Considering this, what could we offer you in return?"

"Uncle… Margrave Mathers spoke with Emilia after she got back, and I've been told that he will need help to make use of the tower. Please arrange workers and guards for that purpose."

"Hmm. As representatives of the Kingdom, we certainly have no reason to reject that request if there's a chance for us to use the Sage's tower. However, that is not all, I assume." Miklotov ceased stroking his beard and narrowed his eyes.

Meili was caught off guard by his unexpectedly sharp gaze. She had always seen Miklotov as a kind and gentle man, but now she knew there was more to him than just that. After all, he represented the kingdom's decision-making body.

Holding Miklotov's gaze, Annerose did not sway. "…Yes, we have another request."

Meili admired the courage and composure of this girl younger than her. These qualities ingrained in the young noblewoman since birth, and the strong sense of self-consciousness she displayed were truly impressive.

Annerose gestured her hand at Meili, who stood dead still in silent admiration. "The girl who holds the ability that you require in order to reach the Pleiades Watchtower."

"Yes, what about her?" asked Miklotov.

"She has taken part in numerous crimes within the Kingdom of Lugunica as well as other nations. We want her absolved of those crimes and a guarantee of her personal safety."

"What?!" Bordeaux's eyes widened and he rose to his feet at Annerose's demand. In a thick voice full of disbelief, he thrust a quivering finger at Meili. "And what exactly are these crimes she's taken part in?"

"Subversive activities, assassinations, and an attack on Margrave Mather's mansion and attempted manslaughter of its residents," explained Annerose.

"It may be impertinent, but it should be mentioned she committed other crimes such as putting the village in the Margrave's domain in danger and threatening the lives of the villagers," Clind added. "Addition."

"She's unquestionably a serious criminal!" Bordeaux banged his fist on the desk at this outrage, the sound reverberating through the great hall.

Feeling the dry atmosphere and the severe gazes focused on her, Meili came to grips with their reactions, considering them to be only natural. No matter how young she may be, this was a justifiable response to what she'd done. It was the response of the Emilia Camp—Emilia, Subaru, and Petra—that had been strange. However…

"Why did ya feel the need to bring that shit up?" Felt suddenly asked.

"Lady Felt, that has nothing to do with us…"

"If we don't ask," she began, cutting off Reinhard, "they're gonna start talking about punishments and whatnot. I'm more interested in this because there's no point in discussing all of that. So, why'd you go and bring it all up?"

In an instant, Bordeaux's fury simmered down as though it had been drenched with cold water, and the other wise men—including Miklotov—looked to Meili for an answer.

Meili dropped her gaze, trying to carefully choose her next words. As though attempting to encourage her, the small crimson scorpion dropped to her shoulders and reassuringly clicked its pincers.

Receiving courage from this, she opened her mouth. "I did a lot of bad things, but…even so, there are people who toold me it was okay to live regardless of my past."

"…"

"Don't you think they're biiig dummies? I think so too. But I don't want to be the cause of their trouble, sooo…"

"You wanted to come clean with your past crimes and clear your name before they came to light."

Miklotov narrowed his eyes at Meili, who pressed a finger to her lips as she struggled to explain. She was fully aware that she was making things easy for her as she nodded. "Yes. Selfish, isn't it?"

"Perhaps, but the nature of your divine protection may be substantial enough to warrant this. Hmm…"

"Lord Miklotov? What are you thinking about?" asked Annerose.

"…Suppose we want you to stay and serve the Kingdom in exchange for absolving you of your crimes and giving you your freedom, what would you think?" Miklotov asked Meili as if to test her resolve.

Meili tensed up at this query, but slowly shook her head side to side. "No, I don't want thaat… It might be selfish, but I've already decided where I want to live my life."

At her reply, Felt roared with laughter. "Kuhahaha! Get rejected, old man!"

"My lady…" chided Reinhard.

Waving her hand dismissively at the knight's words, she continued. "Quit it with the jokes, old man. You shouldn't ask for something ya don't really want. Sayin' no can be tiring too, you know?"

"Dear me, you've really become sharp with your words, Lady Felt… Incidentally, it must be some kind of fate that we met here today. There is something I'd like to ask you."

"I figured as much when ya didn't drive me away. It's Reinhard, right?"

At Felt's perceptive reply, a smile formed on Miklotov's wrinkly face. Beside them, Bordeaux sighed with a grim face, and Annerose and Clind both relaxed.

Unfortunately, the one who was central to the whole discussion—

Meili—had no idea what was going on. “Um, so what’s going to happen to meee?” she asked.

“Do we need to spell it out for ya? Just show us how useful you are. Don’t worry, it won’t be dangerous. After all—”

“—I’ll be with you,” Reinhard declared as he stepped forward, holding out his hand with a broad smile. Looking down at that hand, Meili thought to herself, The road to freedom won’t be easy.

END

Arc 8:
Vincent Vollachia

Volume 34

Chapters 1-15

Chapter 1: Change of Victory Conditions

1

—The battle between the Imperial Forces and the rebels that had begun with the Imperial Capital of the Vollachian Empire, Lupugana, as the battlefield, had entered its final phase, scattering the seeds of chaos throughout the country.

The death of “Vincent Vollachia”, who had been killed by a bullet of light in front of the throne within the Crystal Palace, at the innermost part of the Imperial Capital, seemed to be similar. The Nine Divine Generals, ordered to guard the city walls protecting the Imperial Capital, had abandoned their duties, and the sudden arrival of unknown fighters in the battlefield, in addition to the mysterious group from the west that had opened a massive hole in the front line, most certainly had contributed to the chaos scattered throughout the city. There was no doubt that these too were seeds of chaos.

However, currently, the location of the seed that had grown the most in this situation of war was—

Vincent: “—Abide by me! The situation is no longer remotely close to that of conflict between the Imperial Army and the insurgents! The intervention of a third party has changed the conditions of victory!”

Standing upon a pile of debris, a man raised his voice on an impromptu stage.

He was a handsome man, with sharp black eyes, tinged with a heated intellect, dried blood clinging to his black hair, and a voice that carried well even on a roaring battlefield.

In a battlefield dominated by violence—no, in the Vollachian Empire dominated by violence, one might only wonder what could possibly attract people to the impotent figure of this man.

No one ridiculed the man, even if they wished to. They just turned their attention and listened.

The blood flowing through their veins as people of the Empire, their way of being that had been defined by none other than this man himself, would not allow them to turn their ears away from the voice that was raised on an unshapely pedestal.

—Would not allow them to turn their ears away from the one exclaiming from his throne atop the rubble, Vincent Vollachia himself.

Everyone: "…"

Vincent's loud declaration had been heard by a distinguished lineup of people.

Lined up were Goz Ralfon and Olbart Dunkelkenn, both members of the Nine Divine Generals, as well as Berstetz Fondalfon, the Imperial Prime Minister, and even Ubilk the Stargazer, who had been allowed entry into the Imperial Palace with the special role he held.

Considering the faction each one of the attendees had been on during the conflict just before, it was more than possible to say that being face-to-face with them, at a distance such as to make him defenseless, was rather deadly.

However—

Vincent: "Moguro Hagane is suppressing him, but the one they are facing in the sky above is Balleroy Temeglyph, who is supposed to be dead. Somehow, he has risen with his own beloved dragon."

Berstetz: "I have a message for you on this matter. —I encountered Her Excellency Lamia Godwin in the audience chamber. I believe it is the same person as she was back then."

Goz: "Why you! That report should be raised by me! Your Excellency! It was not only Lamia who was present, but also other members of the Imperial Family who perished in the Imperial Selection Ceremony!"

To Vincent’s words, Berstetz and Goz responded.

Goz, who had remained unchangeably loyal to Vincent, despite his disappearance, was still vexed by Berstetz’s switch.

Nevertheless, since Berstetz’s original concern was the prosperity of the Vollachian Empire, the old man’s attitude could be described as natural when it came to a situation where the very existence of the Empire was at stake.

Once these ramblings had been dismissed as trivial, Vincent’s concerns were narrowed down.

Vincent: “Ubilk, you had some advance knowledge of the cause of the Great Disaster. That being the case, do Balleroy Temeglyph, Lamia, and the other Imperial family members reviving constitute the Great Disaster?”

Ubilk: “Regarding that matter, I can say “yes” and “no” to that, Your Excellency. The whispers told me that Vincent Vollachia’s death would be the trigger for the Great Disaster, and I plotted aaall~ kinds of schemes to prevent the downfall of the Empire…”

Vincent: “You were not aware of the details?”

Ubilk nodded with a carefree look on his face and answered, “Yeees~, that’s right”.

The answer had been somewhat expected, but the certainty gained was beneficial to Vincent. Ubilk and his fellow Stargazers were in opposition to the Great Disaster, which was evident in the fact that they had saved Vincent from a fall.

Vincent: “If that is the case, in the current situation, your presence is currently outside of our consideration. Maneuver only not to die.”

Goz: “Your Excellency! Please leave this situation to me, and put your own safety first! I, Goz Ralfon, will do everything in my power to redeem myself for my absence—”

Vincent: “—Silence.”

Goz: “—Hk!”

Glancing at a heated Goz, Vincent, with a single word, crushed his momentum.

Goz wanted a chance to prove his loyalty to the Emperor and redeem himself for being late at a crucial time, but having allowed Vincent to escape from Chisha’s rebellion in the first place meant his performance had been sufficient.

Had Goz not put up a tough fight, Vincent would have been captured by Chisha, and it was highly possible that even preparing the current situation in the Imperial Capital would not have been possible—Indeed, the current situation had been prepared.

Vincent: “…”

Vincent placed a hand on his chin and drew a mental map of the Imperial Capital, piecing together the situation.

Although the loss of blood and the exhaustion of his body were affecting his ability to think, fortunately, the pain in his collarbone from being struck by Chisha in the throne room was jolting his consciousness. His determination, too, remained at its peak.

He did not think that even this pain was part of Chisha’s plan, but—

Cecilus: “Um, sorry to interrupt while everyone’s chattering, but I have a role to enchant the world in my own way. Is it okay if I excuse myself?”

Goz: “Wha?! General First-Class Cecilus?! What are you talking about?!”

Cecilus: “Well, I do hear about this General First-Class person from time-to-time, but I’m not really interested, so it doesn’t really stick in my mind. Maybe you’ve mistaken me for someone else? It would be quite a pity for this General First-Class person to get compared to me in that case!”

In this situation, it was not just Vincent’s mind that was whirring and spinning around.

Moreover, within a radius of several tens of meters—which was a mere single step for Moguro's huge body, the battle against the duo of the Cloud Dragon Mezoreia and Balleroy continued.

Water flowed out from the shattered reservoir, which could be seen to have been broken from a distance; it was only a matter of time before waves surged into the entire Imperial Capital. In addition, Cecilus, who had been making a fuss, had become tiny.

Although Goz, Berstetz, and even Olbart's attitudes on display were that of waiting attitude for Vincent's decision, only this young thunderbolt did not fit into his plan.

Not only his appearance, but also the contents of his mind seemed to be biased towards immaturity, so Cecilus did not have a trusting look in his eyes towards Vincent's declaration.

Cecilus: "That was quite a splendid speech earlier! I'm sure it's a fact that you're the Vollachian Emperor, but unfortunately, I don't bow down to others just because they're an Emperor. If you want to change the path I take, you'll have to prepare a hanamichi for me!"

Vincent: "—. Just like Natsuki Subaru did, is that so?"

Cecilus: "—? Unfortunately, I don't know who that is. The name sounds similar to the name of someone I know, but I can't quite recall. I feel like I talked about this earlier with a beautiful woman."

While twisting his neck and fidgeting his short legs, Cecilus answered .

He was not sure who the "beautiful woman" Cecilus was worried about was, but once the young Cecilus entered the battle for the Imperial Capital, Vincent had been convinced.

Convinced that Natsuki Subaru was the one who led the unexpected group that ravaged the battlefield from the west, and that he was also the one who had brought Cecilus with him.

And then—

Vincent: "It is not restricted to the current situation. It is nothing new that you do not follow mine orders. Feel free to run around as you like."

Cecilus: "Oh, you are very understanding. However, I have no intention of obediently following someone's orders regardless of what I'm told anyways. So, I'll take my leave here if you don't mind."

Vincent: "Cecilus."

Cecilus waved his hand at Vincent, who had decided to let him do as he pleased, and was about to dart away. When his name was called from behind, the young lightning turned around with a "Yes?".

Vincent's gaze met Cecilus's eyes, which still carried the same difficulty in handling as when they had first met.

Vincent: "As per our former agreement, I shall prepare the stage for your grand moment."

Cecilus: "—Aha."

Cecilus left with a small laugh after Vincent's short declaration.

The speed of his lightning-fast movements, not even leaving a trace, with him still in his unfinished state, was why the title of Vollachia's strongest belonged to that man, and why that title was unshakeable.

In any case—

Berstetz: "Your Excellency, is everything all right? As for General First-Class Cecilus…"

Vincent: "I do not have time to waste on trivial matters. Very much like you and Ubilk were treated. More importantly…"

The handling of the disappeared Cecilus was less urgent than addressing the current problem at hand.

Vincent faced Berstetz's narrow eyes and spoke in a voice that could be heard by Goz, Olbart, and the others behind him.

What he said was—

Vincent: "—We shall abandon the Imperial Capital. We shall retreat while maintaining as much of our military strength as possible."

2

Riding atop a red Galewind Horse, the group rode through the Imperial Capital in a whirlwind of confusion and chaos.

The flag bearers were the familiar faces of Natsuki Subaru, flanked by the cavalryman Idra Missanga and the powerful young girl Tanza, with whom the Pleiades Battalion's breakthrough ability remained strong.

Subaru: "Plus, now we add the two leading stars there, Beatrice and Louis, and we're the ones with the momentum!"

In front, Idra was holding the reins and at his back, held in Subaru's short arms as if being sandwiched, was Beatrice, then Louis who was nestled on Subaru's back.

Unexpectedly, the four children were led by the adult Idra but—

Beatrice: "—Minya!"

Louis: "Uau!"

Tanza: "I beg your pardon."

Beatrice's hand held up as she fired purple arrows, Louis's unrestricted attacks as she teleported through space, and Tanza's fists as she effortlessly reaped through the ones blocking their path.

After jumping over the destroyed city walls into the Imperial Capital, Subaru and company were aiming for the Crystal Palace, which could be seen in the distance—a gleaming castle where the fake Emperor presided.

The fake Emperor that was in that castle, the one who impersonated

Vincent Vollachia.

If they could be defeated, it would put an end to this great civil war in the Vollachian Empire, in which Subaru was inevitably embroiled.

So believing this, he plunged in, ready to go wild and wreak havoc.

Idra: “Schwartz! These guys are springing up no matter where we go through! What is this?”

Idra’s voice, though not quite a scream, was throaty with a deep-seated fear.

Perhaps his consternation was felt through the reins in his hands as the gait of the Galewind Horse began to falter, but it would be unreasonable to expect him to just endure it or forget about it.

Anyhow—

Subaru: “What’s really going on with these pasty-faced guys?!”

They knew that once they rode into the Imperial Capital, they would naturally be met with determined resistance from the Imperial Soldiers.

However, it was only during the initial stages that Subaru and company actually encountered Imperial Soldiers in the Imperial Capital. From then on, Subaru and the others were confronted by strange-looking beings, all of them with pale faces.

Those with pale faces and golden eyes, with glass-like cracks all over their bodies, obstructed Subaru and the others with a cold, heartless demeanor.

—No, they were not standing in the way of only Subaru and company.

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama, those ones, they are also attacking the Imperial Soldiers.”

Tanza kicked a group of pale faces and slammed them against a wall, throwing out a report as such.

As she said, what was unfolding at the edge of her vision was the presence of the "enemy" who was not attacking Subaru and company, but rather the Imperial Soldiers who were guarding the city.

Of course, these "enemies" did not care about Subaru's feelings, unlike the Pleiades Battalion. They were relentless in their attempts to take the lives of Imperial Soldiers using the weapons they wielded.

That was why—

Subaru: "—Tanza! If you please!"

Tanza: "I understand."

Hearing Subaru's unreasonable request, Tanza accelerated as she kicked the ground.

She charged like a speeding ball into the ranks of the enemy—the Imperial Soldiers, and caught up with those who were about to take their lives, cleaving them in the back with her thick-soled shoes.

???: "—Hk!"

A short cry of pain could be heard, and the kicked "enemy" crashed into the buildings on both sides.

Tanza glanced at the destroyed buildings, the Imperial Guardsmen whose lives had been spared beyond the thick plume of smoke, and then said, "Go ahead," as she let them off.

Fortunately, the soldiers who were saved chose to leave the area instead of attempting to target Tanza's back.

Subaru: "That is helpful… but what about these guys?"

Tanza's efforts were averting unwanted deaths; however, Subaru suffered the brunt of her blow and was left gasping at the devastation caused by the "enemy" that crashed into the buildings and shattered them.

The reason why the “enemy” did not get up was partly that Tanza’s kicks were so powerful, but more importantly, because they were in no condition to get back up.

The body of the “enemy” was shattered and in pieces. However, their body was not a grotesque corpse, but rather had been shattered as if they had dropped a china cup on the floor.

There was no blood, either. As if there was no blood in their bodies.

Subaru: “How do they work? Is it like a puppet or maybe a robot…?”

Beatrice: “—It can’t be, the Sacrament of the Immortal King, in fact?”

Subaru: “—! Do you have an idea, Beatrice?!”

Subaru did not miss the words spun by Beatrice’s cute cherry-like lips, who was resting her body on Subaru’s chest, completely trusting him.

Beatrice lowered her head in response to Subaru’s reaction,

Beatrice: “A kind of magic that, upon death, returns the soul to the body from which it has left… a forbidden technique, I suppose. It was originally researched by Mother, but it was supposedly left incomplete.”

Subaru: “A forbidden technique for raising the dead, so like the type of magic of a necromancer, then? There’s a part of my head that’s still a little fuzzy, but man, your Mother is a good-for-nothing!”

Beatrice: “This is not the first time that Subaru has spoken ill of Mother, in fact. But, Betty will get upset if you keep saying it, so be careful, I suppose.”

At Beatrice’s suggestion, with her eyebrows raised, Subaru stuck out his tongue and closed one eye in reflection.

However, the opinion of the cute Beatrice was not to be dismissed. What if necromancy, with a name like the Sacrament of the Immortal King, was what was creating these enemies?

Subaru: “You mean there’s someone like a necromancer in the Nine Divine Generals of the Empire?”

Beatrice: “…If that’s the case, then Abel is out of line for not having talked about such things beforehand, in fact. Plus, it would mean that we wouldn’t be able to distinguish between friend and foe, I suppose.”

Subaru: “I guess that’s also possible in an Empire with buggy ethics, but… wait! You know who Abel is?!”

Beatrice: “…Betty knows, in fact.”

Hearing this unexpected name from Beatrice’s mouth caused Subaru’s eyes to widen. At Subaru’s surprise, Beatrice affirmed it with a bitter look on her face.

Beatrice’s contact with Abel, and that it was not just another person with the same name, was clearly conveyed in her bitter face.

Because Abel was essentially incompatible with everyone, the obvious explanation would be that he was incompatible with Beatrice as well.

Subaru’s stomach churned just thinking about what kind of irreverent attitude Abel had subjected Beatrice to but—

Subaru: “—Of course that guy is here.”

It was inconceivable that Abel would not be in the middle of the siege in this great battle. But, since he did not know the specifics of the composition of the rebel forces, he felt a different emotion when told clearly that this was the case.

If Abel was here, then Subaru’s antics would need to be given some extra thought.

Subaru: “Then, should I leave the zombie fighting to them over there rather than me? Or would it be better if it was me with the cute and zombie-savvy Beatrice running in to deal with the… OUCHOUCHOUCH! What?!”

Beatrice: “Hmm, I suppose. Subaru’s face was a bit annoying, in fact.”

Subaru: “Why! This look in my eyes between charming and cheeky is from birth you know?!”

Beatrice: “It was annoying how strangely relieved you looked when you heard Abel’s name, I suppose.”

Subaru’s mouth curved into a pout as Beatrice pinched his thigh along with an irrational accusation.

Although it was hard to say by exactly how much, Beatrice’s judgment of Subaru might have become stricter in the period of time that they had been separated.

Certainly, he recognized Abel’s excellence in terms of ability. But, under the circumstances of this large-scale conflict, he was not taking any comfort in hearing Abel’s name.

By any measure, meeting Beatrice was a more joyous occasion than meeting Abel.

Subaru: “You’re my number one, Beatrice, don’t misunderstand.”

Beatrice: “Then prove it going forward, in fact.”

Subaru: “Oh, absolutely!”

In response to Beatrice’s benevolent judgment, Subaru tapped Idra on the shoulder and made the Galewind Horse stop at once.

There were no signs of enemies or civilians in the surrounding area, but he wanted to decide on a course of action for the future.

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama, if you are done flirting, what would you propose we do?”

Subaru: “You’re acting so thorny! I wasn’t flirting… but Beatrice! Does that zombie magic stop when the user is defeated?”

Stung in the side by Tanza’s blank expression, Subaru sought Beatrice’s informed opinion; Beatrice, when asked, fiddled with her vertically rolled hair with her fingers, and the two of them, with the same expression on their faces,

Beatrice: “The types of magic that interfere with the bodies of others are predominantly Yin Magic and Yang Magic, I suppose. With either of these attributes, generally speaking, when the caster dies, the effects of the magic are cut off, in fact. So likewise, it would be nice to think that this is the case, I suppose.”

Tanza: “That phrasing has some wishful thinking mingled within. Is it not certain?”

Beatrice: “Even Betty has never seen the Sacrament of the Immortal King realized, in fact! One cannot be so childishly irresponsible as to make a haphazard judgment on the basis of speculation, I suppose.”

Subaru: “Calm down, calm down! So, you don’t have any idea of the area of effect or where the magic is being used from?”

Beatrice: “…It’s regrettable, but it’s dependent on the user, in fact.”

Beatrice looked at Tanza in frustration as she replied, as if thinking that Tanza might be dismissive of her again. However, Tanza did not criticize Beatrice for admitting her inadequacy.

In that regard, Tanza did not demean even those with whom she did not have the best chemistry.

Subaru: “There’s no time for squabbling; besides, Beatrice, what you said helps. Thanks.”

Beatrice: “It was not a very praise-worthy response, I suppose.”

Beatrice’s cheeks puffed out as he patted her head while thanking her. It was tempting to poke her swollen cheeks with his fingers, but he also felt he was put in a difficult position.

Given the circumstances, this zombie attack was clearly an unusual situation.

Since the Imperial Soldiers were being attacked, it was certainly possible that there was a necromancer in the rebel army and that the unscrupulous and coldhearted Abel might have resorted to inhumane tactics; however, something was off about the implementation and how the zombies had appeared out of nowhere.

These zombies clearly gave off the impression that they did not invade the city from the outside, but rather that they had been created from within the city and were rampaging around.

If this was Abel's strategy, the best course of action would have been to start a war of attrition from the beginning. It might have even been plausible that there were some military techniques being used that Subaru was unaware of.

Subaru: "As expected, if they start using zombies, I'll have to think about how to deal with them."

Moreover, although it was ultimately a vague impression, he felt that while Abel would not use the actual "Dead" for military purposes despite resorting to "Death" for political purposes.

He suspected that Abel's view of life and death, or the general Vollachian one for that matter, would not allow for that.

Therefore—

Subaru: "The existence of this zombie Meister should be considered irregular. If the war doesn't end when we beat up the fake Emperor in the castle, then…"

Idra: "What now, Schwartz? We'll follow your lead."

Subaru: "Idra…"

Subaru put his hand to his chin as Idra turned only his head to him to utter these words of trust.

That was not a sign of him tossing the responsibility to Subaru, but rather a reaffirmation of his willingness to risk his life together with Subaru in a situation that might lead them to death once again.

Subaru achieved this position by his own will.

He absolutely had to fulfill that responsibility. And thanks to Idra and the members of the Pleiades Battalion, Subaru could reach out his hand even further than before.

Subaru: "I'm not entirely sure what to do in this situation, but after all… OWOWOWOW! OW, OW!"

Beatrice: "Subaru!"

Tanza: "Schwartz-sama!"

Subaru nodded at the realization of his responsibility, but screamed in pain from Beatrice pinching his thigh and from another pain, to which Beatrice and Tanza widened their eyes at him.

This time Subaru felt pain because his hair was being pulled.

And the one responsible was not Beatrice or Tanza, much less Idra, but—

Subaru: "What the hell, Louis! Don't pull my hair! It's a vital defense strategy to take care of it from a young age so that I won't suffer from baldness when I get older…"

Louis: "Uuau! Uu! Au! Auuu~!"

Subaru: "What?"

Louis desperately pleaded something to Subaru, who was protecting his pulled scalp.

She patted Subaru on the back, then pointed to the north side of the Imperial Capital—the direction where the Crystal Palace was located, but slightly off the beaten path, and continuously urged him.

Head there, he knew that was what she was saying.

Subaru: “Is there something over there?”

Louis: “Au!”

Subaru’s question was answered by Louis in a high-pitched voice.

It also needs to be stated that Louis seemed to be quite emotionally stable now that she managed to meet up with Subaru. Subaru himself was also genuinely relieved at her safety, despite their complicated relationship.

On top of that, if there was something that Louis was calling for so desperately, then that would be—

Subaru: “—Beatrice, let me ask you one thing. Is everyone still together?”

Beatrice: “…Everyone, is not, in fact.”

In response to Subaru’s quiet question, Beatrice avoided making a clear statement.

However, it was clear that Beatrice was not being evasive for the sake of putting on airs, but rather to spare Subaru from the shock. Understanding this, Subaru also realized why she had been ambiguous.

So—

Subaru: “Tanza, Idra! Also, Beatrice and Louis, change of plans!”

Concluding on what needed to be done, Subaru called to the members around him from the Galewind Horse.

Most likely, the battle centered around the Imperial Capital would not calm down, but rather intensify further. With the zombies and their Meister being unknown entities, preparations were in order.

Of course, he could put together such a theory, but—

Subaru: “First, we’re going to where Louis is pointing at! Let me pick up something important there!”

Beatrice: “If it’s Louis then… She will be there, I suppose.”

Subaru’s decision gave Beatrice a sense of the destination that Louis was indicating.

Nodding at Beatrice’s words, Subaru turned to Tanza and Idra, who were also looking at him, and continued.

That was—

Subaru: “—Pick up Rem and flee the Imperial Capital with as many people as you can! We’re racing against the clock!”

Thus, he mysteriously made a decision in the same direction as the man who was not present at this moment.

Chapter 2: Grudges

1

—Beatrice was at a loss as to how to handle the little girl known as Louis.

When the Magic Crystal Cannon fired from the Crystal Palace, their relationship allowed them to cooperate in sending it to another space.

Without Louis's mysterious teleportation ability, it would not have been possible to reach that place. Had they not arrived, many deaths would have occurred on the battlefield, starting with Zikr's.

This single act alone could not have dispelled the responsibility of Louis being the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony.

And yet—

Louis: "Aau!"

Beatrice: "Betty can trust that you have no animosity towards Subaru and the others, I suppose."

Sitting awkwardly on the shaking saddle, although only the size of children, three people aside from the primary rider rode the running red Galewind Horse.

On the back of the Galewind Horse, Beatrice and Louis sat with Subaru between them; unlike Beatrice, who was held in Subaru's arms, Louis dexterously stood up on the horse behind him, tapping Subaru's shoulder and pointing in one direction.

—From Beatrice's point of view, the situation in the Imperial Capital of Lupugana was a crucible of chaos.

Beginning with the clash between the regular army and the rebels, flying dragons that were being commanded and flying dragons that were not fought each other for the sky, a world of white and red trespassed on the normal one, a giant and a Dragon rampaged, and finally, the dead rose one after another, to ravage the city from the inside out.

Being inclined to isolate herself, not giving support to anyone, there were few occasions in which Beatrice had directly intervened, but this world's insane and inconsistent way of being reminded her of the chaotic times of four hundred years ago—.

Beatrice: "—Witches."

Thinking back to those bygone days, Beatrice naturally uttered that word.

If there could have been one thing that symbolized that era of four hundred years ago, it was unmistakably the Witches.

Echidna, Beatrice's creator, and the one whom she adored as her mother, was also one of those who were labeled as Witches.

Other than that, that era in which there were several Witches bearing the deadly sins; that era when everyone was struggling to survive, was a dark period that was like a child's nightmare come true.

The current situation in the Imperial Capital was a return of the same thing. —She wondered what could have triggered it, and her heart skipped a beat.

While Beatrice held those frustrations in her heart—

Subaru: "—Hang in there, Rem!"

Immediately behind her, she heard Subaru's panting, yet determined, voice.

Louis, voice sounding like a growl, and Subaru, hurrying the galloping horse in the direction she pointed, had no doubt that there was the waiting girl he was searching for.

As Beatrice thought of the results of the time that Subaru had spent with Louis, separated from her, her chest became a hazy mess, but she understood that there was trust between them.

Beatrice, too, had no doubt that Rem was there, in the direction to which Louis was pointing.

Looking back, Louis had spent a large amount of mana to extinguish the Magic Crystal Cannon and went straight to Subaru to try to save the disappearing Beatrice. She had the power to locate those she was looking for.

Whether that could be anyone, or only someone she knew, was unclear.

Subaru: “A huge mansion!”

Idra: “What do we do, Schwartz?! The walls are high! Do we go around to the front…?”

Subaru: “No, that would be a waste of time! Tanza!”

The exchange took place as they crossed a number of streets ahead of them and approached their intended building.

It was a mansion that took up an imposingly large plot of land in the northern part of the Imperial Capital, and its surroundings indicated that it was the residence of a person of high rank.

Naturally, the walls surrounding the mansion were high to ensure adequate security.

But—

Tanza: “I do not want to give you the wrong impression.”

Saying that, the deergirl, her voice as emotionless as her face, kicked the ground with the slightest hint of disapproval in her features and mutterings.

Tanza, the young girl plunging straight into the wall in front of her, continued.

Tanza: “I am not Schwartz-sama’s tool for breaking down walls.”

Right after her declaration, Tanza’s thick-soled shoes struck the mansion’s wall, which was likely imbued with the Divine Protection of Earth attributes. This impact caused the wall, which should have enhanced the mansion’s defenses, to cave in, be penetrated, and ultimately collapse.

Accompanied by a booming sound and a gust of wind, the small silhouette of a girl emerged from beyond the wall. As if diving headfirst into the billowing smoke, the Galewind Horse carrying Beatrice and the others leaped onto the property.

And then—

Louis: “Uau!”

Beatrice: “—Subaru, over there, in fact!”

Within the spacious mansion grounds, multiple buildings separated from the main house were lined up, causing them to, momentarily, almost lose their sense of direction. However, looking around just like Subaru, Beatrice opened her round eyes and searched for their target, before noticing a gathering of people.

At that same instant, Louis also looked in the same direction as Beatrice and shouted out, reinforcing her conviction.

Ahead of them, at the entrance of a separate building, there were several figures.

In front of the firmly shut door, all that could be seen was a back sporting the ragged equipment of an Imperial Soldier, and facing it were two figures, one of which Beatrice did not recognize.

—The other was a girl whom Beatrice recognized as well.

Subaru: “—El!”

Beatrice: “Minya!!”

A dull sword was raised, targeting the girl and her companion.

As soon as they noticed it, Beatrice and Subaru, holding hands, raised their opposite hands and chanted magic. The ensuing deep purple arrow captured the back of the pale-faced men, transforming them into crystals.

Enemies: “Gah.”

A bitter cry leaked out, but no further action by the men was allowed.

Accompanied by a high-pitched sound, similar to ice cracking, the men’s figures shattered and crumbled away.

The Galewind Horse reached the girl, who, narrowly escaping death, widened her eyes in surprise as Beatrice and Subaru landed on the ground together, her hand pulled by his.

And there—

Subaru: “—Kept you waiting, Rem! The real star has stepped on the stage!”

With one eye closed and teeth gleaming, Subaru made a pompous declaration.

Despite his childish appearance, Beatrice looked at her partner from within his arms, proud of his unchanging bravery in scrambling to help someone else.

The eyes of the girl whose life was saved widened as she met the gazes of Beatrice and Subaru.

As it were, the excitement and emotion quivered within her throat —

Rem: “—Who are you?”

She asked, in a dubious voice, with an atmosphere that was not very friendly.

Subaru: “No, it’s me, it’s me! I’m a bit smaller, I’m telling you, it’s me! You can tell, right?”

Rem: “…I’m grateful for the help, but you ring no bells at all.”

Subaru: “No way!”

Subaru waved his arms and sorrowed at that unexpected cold response from Rem.

He felt dejected by this reaction, especially since he thought that, after going through a hopeless experience, then having been saved from a life-threatening predicament, a deeply emotional meeting was surely awaiting him.

Of course, since Subaru, being Subaru, had gone and gotten himself shrunk while Rem remained unaware, he thought that asking her to be openly happy would also be unreasonable.

Subaru: “In that sense, setting aside Louis, who already knew me in this state, it’s quite something that Beatrice would just accept it right away…”

Beatrice: “It’s not really that Betty thought nothing of it, I suppose. It’s merely that whether you have shrunk or not, it will not change that you’re Betty’s partner, in fact. More importantly…”

Subaru: “More importantly?”

Lowered to the ground from the arms in which she had been held, Beatrice looked at Subaru and Rem, comparing them. Then, narrowing her peculiarly patterned eyes,

Beatrice: “That attitude is completely different from what Betty had heard from Subaru, I suppose. That girl… Rem was supposed to have been gentle toward Subaru, in fact. Was that a lie, I suppose?”

Subaru: “No, that wasn’t a lie! It’s just that she’s forgotten a lot right now!”

Beatrice: “Forgotten…”

Derived from Rem's cold treatment, Beatrice was made unnecessarily suspicious.

Likely, it was the doubt about whether Subaru had led everyone who did not remember Rem in her "Sleeping Beauty" state to believe a story that differed from reality.

It was an unthinkable misunderstanding. In the first place, something like lying about Rem's personality as she slept was beyond blasphemous, and it too also made Subaru miserable.

In response to Subaru's explanation, Beatrice silently turned back to Rem,

Beatrice: "You don't remember Betty, in fact?"

Rem: "…No, I believe this is our first meeting."

Beatrice: "—. I see, I suppose. I understand now, in fact."

Rem: "It seems that's persuaded you, but in the end, who are you guys? I appreciate the help, but…"

Beatrice's face showed that from Rem's reply, she accepted that Subaru had not just said whatever he wanted. On the other hand, Rem's doubts remained undispelled.

Even if Subaru and Beatrice were unilaterally convinced, Rem's questions would only continue to pile up.

Although his own internal sense of discomfort had relatively decreased, sure enough, Rem's attitude clearly conveyed that the large Subaru and the small Subaru were completely different.

Subaru: "Be that as it may, I'm me! Rem, in any case, let's ta…"

???: "Oh my?! I was wondering who helped us, but it's Husband-kun! It's Husband-kun, right! Thanks for rushing in!"

Subaru: "Ah, look, Flop-san understands… Eh?! Flop-san?!"

Saying that as Subaru was trying to somehow unravel Rem's incomprehension, he was taken aback at the sight of Flop, the blond-haired young man that suddenly appeared from behind her.

Having come to help Rem, he had not even considered that Flop would be with her.

Subaru: “Why are you here? Were you kidnapped along with Rem?”

Flop: “My oh my, it’s quite daring to come to Wife-san’s aid without knowing anything, isn’t it! But, on the whole, that understanding isn’t mistaken. More specifically, it would be correct to say that since I suffered a fatal wound, Wife-san accompanied me to give me treatment!”

Subaru: “A fatal wound… Uwah, you’re right! That’s a terrible injury!”

Flop was as cheerful as ever; but, ignoring that ridiculously bright personality, the skin visible through the gaps in his clothes was wrapped in bandages, and his complexion seemed somewhat pale.

Judging from his experience from the Gladiator Island, Flop was seriously wounded to the level where standing would have been greatly difficult.

It seemed like saying that he had received a fatal wound had not been an exaggeration.

Subaru: “But, then Rem also… Geez, you’re too gutsy.”

Rem: “Please wait. You’re trying to move the conversation along smoothly, but… Flop-san, by calling this boy that…”

Flop: “Ah, perhaps this kind of thing is all the more easier for a third party to notice? Like Wife-san is thinking, it’s Husband-kun. With just a bit more of a baby face!”

Rem: “…”

At Flop’s words, Rem stared down towards Subaru once again.

Faced with the doubt emerging within her pale blue eyes, Subaru adjusted the angle of his face to give her a better view, and flashed his teeth. The hue of doubt turned to dismay, which then quickly turned to surprise.

Rem: “I thought, I thought you were a very strange person, but… not only can you dress up as a woman, but you can even turn into a child?”

Subaru: “That’s wrong! This situation is out of my control! Isn’t that right, Beatrice?”

Beatrice: “Subaru, were you cross-dressing again in a place unknown to Betty and the others, I suppose…?”

Subaru: “Don’t get caught up on that right now!”

Both Rem and Beatrice looked at Subaru with doubt, overwhelming him. Flop, standing by the exchange, while holding up a finger to his own well-groomed face,

Flop: “Well, it wasn’t only Husband-kun who dressed up as a woman, myself and Village Chief-kun also did it after all. We really looked like girls all together, and our figures were lovely too.”

Subaru: “That’s because I put all my points into my charisma stat at that time. Anyways! I’m glad we were able to meet up.”

Patting his chest in relief, Subaru smiled at both Rem and Flop. Flop nodded frankly at the smile, and Rem, after contemplating every last possibility,

Rem: “…You went through all this trouble, to search for me?”

Subaru: “Well, of course. No, I didn’t know you had been kidnapped until I was enroute, but the moment I found out, my selfish feelings surged up. The only thing that made me certain you were here was…”

Louis: “Uu!”

And just then, while he answered Rem’s question, the reason for his certainty burst in.

Wedging herself in between Subaru and Rem, it was Louis who had jumped toward the latter. Louis's golden hair fluttered as she embraced Rem, and even though she was surprised and gave a "Uau", Rem accepted the young girl's hug.

With that face so close to her, relief emerged in Rem's eyes.

Rem: "Louis-chan, I see you're safe. I was worried that you might have been mistreated by him, since you went off on your own following that man."

Louis: "Aauu!"

Subaru: "No matter how you look at it, would I really treat her so poorly that you would be worried… Did I do that? I did, didn't I? I probably did do that. I regret that now, though."

Stroking Louis's head as she hugged her, Rem made such a comment to which Subaru pouted his lips.

In fact, if Rem and Louis separated at the time when Subaru and the others had set out to Chaosflame, then that was the point in time at which Subaru and Louis's relationship had been the worst.

It was not limited to the worry that along the way, Subaru may have taken the opportunity to abandon Louis in the fields. It could be said that Rem's worries were never-ending.

But then again—

Subaru: "Right now, I'm not thinking about doing anything to Louis. We've made peace."

Rem: "…Is that true? Louis-chan?"

Louis: "Uu!"

With a broad smile on her face, Louis nodded her head, and the question mark above Rem's head was finally dispelled by her response.

Since his body had shrunk, the circumstances which had probably been his biggest predicament were proceeding peacefully, so Subaru breathed a sigh of relief. Then, while gripping on to Subaru's hand,

Beatrice: "…Even though Betty intended on accepting it, it's still a scene that gives a very bad feeling, in fact. Such a thing like that girl and Rem being so friendly towards each other, it's a strange feeling, I suppose."

Even though Beatrice muttered this, Subaru made a wry smile within his heart.

However, considering that when he was first sent off into the Vollachian Empire, he was viewed with hostility by the newly awakened Rem, and was together in a situation with Louis, whose aims were completely unknown to him, Subaru was also in complete agreement with Beatrice.

After all, through some causality, a Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, the cause of Rem turning into the "Sleeping Beauty", was now spending time with her in the same place in such a friendly manner.

Subaru: "—. I still haven't found the proper answer for that yet, but…"

Rem's memory had still yet to return. Louis's origin, too, still remained unknown.

However, they were able to stay alive and reunite with Rem in this way, and Louis had also demonstrated as much of a friendly attitude towards them as she could. Thus, they should be able to find a solution.

Therefore—

Tanza: "—Schwartz-sama, I do not think we have much time to be so relaxed."

Witnessing the atmosphere of that reunion, the young girl interrupted with good timing and a good reason.

Upon hearing the intervention of Tanza, the little girl in a kimono, who had read the atmosphere, Subaru turned to her and said, “Yep”. Then, keeping up a vigilant watch out on the surroundings from horseback, Idra also entered his field of view, and,

Idra: “We found the person you’re looking for. By the way, there isn’t anyone else who has been taken, right?”

Beatrice: “As far as Betty has heard, there shouldn’t be anyone else, in fact.”

Rem: “I also haven’t noticed anyone else. Has Flop-san…”

Flop: “I don’t know of any other acquaintances who were brought in, either. Unless, carelessly, Medium has been kidnapped or something! How’s she, Husband-kun!”

Subaru: “She hadn’t been kidnapped at the time we were separated. …She’d been shrunk, though.”

Flop: “Huh? What’s that? What did you say?”

To Flop, who was concerned about his sister’s safety, Subaru withheld the fact that Medium had also shrunk.

Other than a shrunken appearance, she was in perfect health; surely Medium would have left Chaosflame safely and joined the group at Guaral.

There was not time to reconcile the details of the situation and to wrangle over this and that there.

In order to guarantee such a lively and cheerful time, they needed to move.

Subaru: “So, including Rem and Flop-san, I want to escape with as many people as possible, but is there anyone else in this estate?”

Rem: “There is a woman named Katya-san whom I met here. Then, there’s this detached building…”

Subaru: “Here?”

With a nod, Rem’s gaze turned to the tightly closed door beside her.

He had to defeat the enemy quickly, so he did not check it properly, but it seemed that Rem and Flop were trying to open this building,

Flop: “It’s said that inside are black-haired Crown Princes from various places.”

Idra: “Black-haired Crown Princes… Schwartz’s fakes.”

Flop answered Subaru’s inner questions, and Idra frowned upon its content.

The perception Idra expressed, that they were fake Schwartz’s, was generally shared by everyone in the Pleiades Battalion, and it was one of the big lies Subaru was telling them.

The black-haired Crown Prince, who was talked about across the Empire, was the illegitimate son of Emperor Vincent Vollachia, and all of those who had taken the name for themselves in various regions were nothing but fakes.

The real black-haired Crown Prince was none other than Natsuki Schwartz—.

Idra: “The ones who were used as justification here and there to start a rebellion? To be blunt, I don’t like this careless approach to things.”

Beatrice: “Betty agrees with Beardy, I suppose. The originator doesn’t like it either, in fact.”

Idra: “B-Beardy…”

Idra clearly expressed his displeasure at the imposter Crown Princes who seemed to be held captive inside the detached building, to which Beatrice nodded in agreement.

To be blunt, Idra’s words were painful for Subaru to hear as well. Beatrice’s added comment seemed to support Subaru’s guess as to whose scheme this was.

Frankly, it was difficult to distinguish whether some of the fake Crown Princes were good guys or if some of them were bad guys—.

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama, what would you like to do?”

Subaru: “Nah, isn’t there really nothing to discuss? If they’re left here, sooner or later the zombies are definitely going to kill them, so we don’t have a choice but to help.”

Tanza: “…”

With a hushed voice, Subaru replied to Tanza, who was asking for his decision.

Tanza’s eyes widened at the answer in regards to the black-haired Crown Princes—she was the only one who had been told ever since Gladiator Island that Subaru’s claim to be the successor to the Emperor was a lie spread for the purpose of creating a disturbance.

A huge reason why the comrades of the Pleiades Battalion trusted Subaru and were willing to participate in this battle for the Imperial Capital was because they believed that Subaru was the black-haired Crown Prince.

If the captive false Crown Princes were released, the chances of that lie being exposed would increase.

Subaru: “But, that is that and this is this.”

Even though he was aware of Tanza’s concerns, Subaru would not sacrifice human lives to protect a lie.

Of course, one would hope that this act of compassion would be returned, and that the fake Crown Princes would be quietly appreciative of the efforts of Subaru and his friends.

Beatrice: “As expected of Betty’s Subaru, I suppose.”

Beatrice looked at Tanza proudly while tightly holding Subaru’s hand. For a moment, there was a tingle flowing between them again, but Subaru put it aside.

Taking that into account, they faced the detached building’s door.

Subaru: “Does Rem or Flop-san have the keys to the entrance?”

Rem: “N-no, I didn’t know where the key was, so I thought I would pry it open by force.”

Flop: “You can trust in Wife-san’s strength. As you already know, my arms are as meager as they look.”

With Louis attached to Rem at the hip, Flop showed off his feeble biceps. Subaru scratched his cheek at the two’s replies, and pathetically turning to face Tanza,

Subaru: “Would you be the master key once again?”

Tanza: “…I am not sure what a mastur kee is, but I understand what you are trying to say. Schwartz-sama, I would like to reiterate this to you…”

Subaru: “You aren’t a tool for breaking open walls, right, Tanza? Forgive me.”

Towards Subaru, who meekly bowed his head, Tanza released a deep, deep sigh.

However, it was not just a sigh; with deep compassion Tanza softly spoke, “Please step aside”, to request that Subaru and Rem move away from the front of the door, and she gripped the large padlock hanging from it with both of her hands.

Then, with a sudden and strong jerk of Tanza’s slender hands, the lock twisted off.

It was quite the shocking sight, but Subaru and Idra had grown used to seeing it.

At Tanza’s unbelievable display of superhuman strength, Rem and Flop stared in wonder, and as Subaru saw those reactions to his side, he took a light breath and slowly opened the door to the solitary building.

And then—

Subaru: “I think that everyone has their own respective circumstances, but, for the time being, why don’t we put away our various grudges, and work together to get out of this place?”

Like that, being careful not to alarm the cautious inhabitants, Subaru entered the solitary building—Inside of which were lines of narrow jail cells, containing the fake Crown Princes which Subaru had greeted.

Fake Crown Princes: “…”

At Subaru’s call, the faces of fourteen or fifteen young boys turned towards him.

As they had been called the black-haired Crown Princes, and counting backwards from Emperor Vincent’s, or rather, Abel’s, current age, it was to be expected that they would be around the same age as Subaru was presently.

That said, the sight of the figures of these children that had been hidden from the gaze of the public inside of these jail cells was sickening.

Tanza: “However, each of their cells are spacious, and it looks thoroughly cleaned, so it does not feel like such a poor environment.”

Peeking inside of the solitary building from the side, Tanza added her own opinion on top of Subaru’s impressions.

As she had said, the space was cleaner than just the bare minimum. It seemed that the fake Crown Princes were being properly fed, and any who were suffering extreme weakness could not be found.

Tanza: “More or less, it seems like they were prepared in case one of them was the true Crown Prince.”

Beatrice: “Perhaps they also do not have a taste for taking the trouble to torment children, in fact.”

Rem: “…Given the temperament of the homeowner, it seems like it could be either.”

From Tanza to Beatrice, and then to Rem, each took over to share their impressions of the inside of the solitary building. At that description, Subaru thought that the owner of this large mansion— Most likely, they were an important figure in the Imperial Capital.

Considering these circumstances, the fact that they had captured so many candidates for the black-haired Crown Prince like this also indicated a rebellious spirit towards the fake Emperor, who understood there was no such thing as a fake Crown Prince.

Subaru: “That fact that his son is a fake, the man in question would know best… Wait a second? Is it possible that the fake Emperor doesn’t know? If Abel was the type of guy to be careless with his relationships with women, then…”

Rem: “I can’t say this for certain, but I can’t imagine that being a side of Abel-san.”

Subaru: “I agree. That guy, doesn’t he consider his own cross-dressed self to be the most beautiful woman in the world?”

Looking back on the time that he had called himself Natsumi Schwartz, Abel as Bianca, and Flop as Flora, Subaru spoke of such reminiscences.

At any rate—

Subaru: “I’m going to open the jail cells now. It’s going to be pretty busy outside, with all of the rumbling and shaking, you know. Let’s throw away our grudges, and all escape together!”

Fake Crown Prince: “…Escape? But all of the cells are locked.”

From inside, among the fake Crown Princes who came from different tribes and had different skin colors, someone said this in response, to which Subaru replied with an “Oh.”

All of them had black hair and black eyes, which was not very common in this world, and so with their physical traits being similar to Subaru, while feeling a certain sense of kinship with them,

Subaru: “Don’t worry about the lock. We have a solution right here.”

Tanza: “Right here indeed.”

Subaru pointed his thumb towards Tanza, and the little girl bowed as she showed the broken lock in her hands to the fake Crown Princes.

All of their faces looked surprised at this, their skeptical expressions disappearing. Instead, a sense of awe was directed towards Tanza, but,

Subaru: “It looks like getting you out won’t be a problem. Tanza over here will break you out… Rem!”

Rem: “Y-yes.”

Subaru: “Where’s that friend you met here that you were talking about just now?”

Rem: “—If you mean Katya-san,”

With her hand placed on Louis’s head, Rem’s expression stiffened as she turned around towards the outside of the detached annex. Judging from Rem’s reaction, this Katya was probably in the main building.

They succeeded in crushing the three zombies in the vicinity of the selfsame annex, but others had likely gotten into the mansion. They had to find a way to somehow get the girl in question out before she was discovered.

Subaru: “Does this Katya person have any distinguishing features?”

Rem: “She has brown, curly hair and deep eyes. And then…”

Subaru: “And then?”

Flop: “Miss Katya has bad legs. Because of that, while Wife-san and I headed here, we had her hide in the other building.”

Subaru: “Her legs are…”

Subaru put his hand on his chin in response to what Flop had answered in Rem's stead.

Fortunately, since they had the Galewind Horse Subaru and the others had rode in on, it could be said that this was the perfect situation for carrying someone with bad legs. Since their overall mobility would drop considerably anyway by taking the fake Crown Princes along, that would probably not be a problem.

Subaru: "I'm concerned that Tanza is our only decent fighter."

Beatrice: "The way Betty and Subaru are now, we would not be outdone by that deergirl, I suppose."

Idra: "Although I'm not on the same level as Weitz or Gustav-dono, I can put up a fight, too."

Subaru, concerned about their fighting strength, received reassuring answers from Beatrice and Idra.

Of course, they could not be overly reliant on Idra since they needed him to hold the Galewind Horse's reins, but Subaru's skill was to make full use of the cards in his hand to optimally adapt to the situation at hand.

Subaru: "If I assume the role of a fake Crown Prince, and at least one person could ride on the horse…"

Rem: "Uhm, I'm worried about Katya-san, so if it's possible…"

Subaru: "—My bad, that's right."

Looking impatient, Rem appealed to Subaru, who was trying to wrack his brain.

Subaru nodded back as he felt the need to quickly clear away the cause of her worries. For the time being, as long as Subaru and Beatrice were there, they could deal with the zombies.

Subaru: "Just in case, Tanza should come along too. In order to reassure this Katya person, if Rem or Flop-san could also come, then —"

Subaru was just about to say that they could get by without causing any unnecessary commotion.

???: "—You don't need to worry about that. I already got Katya out safely."

Subaru: "…"

Like that, Subaru's words were cut off by a voice from outside the detached annex. —No, merely being interrupted was not why his words were cut off.

It was because Subaru's heart was pierced by something cold in that voice he had heard.

Beatrice: "—Subaru?"

Since he held Beatrice's hand, she noticed something was wrong as his whole body instinctively grew tense.

But without responding to Beatrice's words, Subaru quickly headed to the entrance of the detached annex before Rem and Flop, who were already standing there, even had a chance to turn around.

To confirm who it was. —And then, to keep them away from Rem.

The one who was standing there and had called out was—

???: "I really have to say, this is some peculiar coincidence. How else could we end up in this situation?"

Subaru: "…"

???: "We probably all have our own respective circumstances, but… for the time being, why don't we put aside our troublesome grudges, and work together to get out of here?"

Thus, the man repeated Subaru's statement from just before, as if to ridicule it, and shrugged his shoulders.

—And so, the adversary with whom Subaru grew the most troublesome and fateful bond during his stay in the Empire, Todd

Fang.

Chapter 3:
Three Reasons

1

Jumping out from the entrance of the detached building, Subaru stood in front of a man who was giving a faint smile.

That petrification was perhaps the most foolish choice he could have made in the face of that man. However, even for Natsuki Subaru, who had experienced all kinds of hardships, even Death, over and over again, the indescribable eeriness of this man made his mind go blank.

A sense of fear that not even a Sin Archbishop could bestow, and a sensation of being ensnared.

In the face of Todd Fang, Subaru was made to feel that way.

Subaru: "…"

Bewilderment had arisen around Subaru, who stopped reflexively in response to the voice he had heard.

It was Beatrice, as she held hands with him, facing the same opponent as Subaru. Other than her, Tanza and Idra were also casting a dubious gaze upon Subaru, who was standing still.

Although his mind raced to the thought that he should immediately warn them to be cautious, but—

Rem: "—Katya-san!"

And, before Subaru could move his trembling lips, Rem shouted in a high-pitched voice.

When he looked, Rem's pale blue eyes, which had turned back towards Todd by the door—No, they were directed not towards him, but directly behind him.

It troubled Subaru to take his gaze off of Todd and shift his attention to that direction, but once he did, he understood the target of Rem's shout.

There was a wheelchair-bound woman hiding behind Todd's back.

The woman peeked at them as she grabbed the hem of Todd's clothes, with suspicious eyes that overlooked the world beneath curly brown hair; she was a perfect match for the features Rem had described.

That in itself was joyful—No, the fact that she was beside Todd would mean,

Rem: "Please stay away from her…!"

Louis: "Uu!"

Rem, who seemed to have come to the same conclusion as Subaru, raised her voice and glared at Todd. Louis, who was always close to her, also growled while looking at Todd, roused by Rem's fighting spirit.

Despite losing his trademark bandana and letting down his orange hair, Todd's cruelty and dangerous creativity had probably not been diminished.

Even in this situation, it was not difficult to imagine that he would try to use the woman—Katya, as a shield to manipulate Subaru and the others into doing his bidding.

Of course, it was obvious from Subaru's previous hostile encounters with Todd that the outcome of giving in and doing as what was told would ultimately result in Death.

Subaru: "…From this point onwards."

If I were to die, I can't be sure of how far back I'll return to.

Fortunately or unfortunately, depending on how one looked at it, during the entire series of events of intervening in the siege of the Imperial Capital, breaking through the city walls, and riding into the city, Subaru had never once lost his life.

Regardless of whether that was to thank, or to blame, Subaru did not know the starting point of Return by Death.

He was able to meet up with Louis and Beatrice, and was also able to reunite with Rem and Flop.

Honestly, the situation had been going well, almost too well. It was impossible to calculate how many retries it would take to reach this point.

However—

Subaru: "—I'll do what I must."

If he had decided whom to save, whom to let survive, and whom to move forward with, Subaru had decided with a steadfast heart to firmly grasp that outcome.

For that reason, he was able to rescue all the Gladiators concerned with the Gladiator Island, and fight alongside them as members of the Pleiades Battalion until today. —He would never give up, no matter what.

Not even if the obstacle he needed to overcome for that purpose was the very embodiment of a fear that caused his heart to freeze over.

Thus, Subaru moistened his dry lips with his tongue, and with a determined action—

Katya: "P-please wait! You've got it wrong! I haven't been captured, Rem!"

Rem: "Katya-san?"

Katya: "Misunderstanding… Yes, it's a misunderstanding! Todd is, he isn't your enemy!"

Katya tried to move forward, turning the wheels of her wheelchair while loudly insisting that it was a misunderstanding and that Todd was not their enemy. However, Todd put a hand on her thin shoulder, preventing her from moving forward.

Katya, pitching forward with vigor, glared at Todd with teary eyes, and,

Katya: “Wait, what are you doing! You are putting yourself in danger!”

Todd: “You’re the one in danger. Don’t move forward on your own.”

Katya: “Wh-Who do you think I’m saying this for…!”

Todd: “Of course, it’s for my sake. But that doesn’t mean I can overlook the woman I love putting herself into danger.”

Katya: “Ugh…”

Red-faced and having snapped at him forcefully, Katya was silenced by those words.

That was not because of embarrassment or shame, but mainly because his objection had conveyed that he was concerned about her.

Subaru found it difficult to believe that it was a perfectly honest statement without the intent of deception.

Rem: “Katya-san, could it be, that person is…”

With a small gasp, Rem asked Katya this with a fearful look. Although she did not clearly state the question, the intended point of the question was clear.

Whether it was a sign of her hesitation and anxiety, but Rem had put her slender hand on Louis’s shoulder. In response to this question of Rem, Katya nodded her head while biting her lip.

Katya: “I told you this several times already. …He is, you know, my.”

Rem: “Your fiancé.”

Katya: “That’s it…”

After her initially hesitant declaration, Katya responded clearly to Rem’s question as such.

Rem’s eyes wavered when she was told this, and she clearly was agitated. Subaru was just as shocked as Rem, and was also shaken to his core.

Subaru: “Fiancée…”

While not having the fondest memories of Todd following the events since their first encounter, the story of his fiancée left a different impression apart from his insanely cautious and unforgiving nature.

Todd, who had been deployed as an Imperial Soldier and was encamped near the forest where the Shudraqian village was located, frequently spoke of his desire to return to his fiancée.

But after a series of bloody encounters with Todd, his expectations for his humanity had faded, and it became a distant memory that merely lingered in a corner of his mind—.

Subaru: “They really did exist…”

And the words were so incongruous with Todd and his lovely fiancée that he had to let it slip.

Despite probably not even hearing Subaru’s monologue, Rem looked at Todd with suspicion in her stern eyes,

Rem: “Are you really Katya-san’s fiancé?”

Todd: “Yeah, it’s true. Like I said before, it’s an unconventional arrangement. I never thought that Katya and you would be getting along so well during your confinement in the Prime Minister’s mansion.”

Rem: “…”

Todd: “Don’t look at me like that. Of course, I’m not saying we had a good first encounter or a good relationship either, but this is the situation we’re in. We both have to let go of our grudges, don’t we?”

Shrugging his shoulders at Rem’s silent gaze, Todd spoke up brazenly. Then his gaze turned not to Rem, but to Subaru.

Holding his breath, Subaru met Todd’s gaze. Cold sweat ran down his back.

However—

Todd: “What the kid said is true, right?”

Subaru: “—Ah.”

There was no hint of hostility in Todd’s demeanor as he closed one eye and winked at him.

Staying true to his words, Todd had let go of his hostility and caution and was extending a hand, as if it was the obligation of the person proposing to cooperate with each other to get out of this situation.

Flop: “Husband-kun, Wife-san, who is Soldier-kun?”

At the sight of both Subaru and Rem going silent, Flop’s soft face took on a serious look.

In response to his question, Subaru could not speak carelessly, partly due to his current appearance. Instead, Rem continued with “That man”,

Rem: “I’ve had several encounters with him before. And, each time, my life had been put in danger.”

Katya: “Huh…”

While she looked at Katya, Rem tried hard to choose the right words while also telling the truth. Upon hearing this, Katya’s eyes widened and she looked at Todd who stood beside her.

Her lips trembled as she questioned her fiancé from his side.

Katya: “I-is that true? Todd, you, what Rem said…”

Todd: “If it’s about that young lady, it’s true. You said it earlier, that there are some grudges. I’m an army man. Sometimes I have to turn my weapon on someone. That kinda thing, I guess it’s just one of those unwanted situations.”

Rem: “To think it was “unwanted”, you went out of your way to…!”

Todd: “If it was in the Fortress City, it was because I saw your companion as a threat. If it was before that, I was just following orders like any other soldier. I have nothing personal against you.”

As he said this, Todd took the axe worn on his waist. For a moment, a tension ran through Subaru and the others, but Todd, keeping one hand outstretched, heaved it away without getting worked up.

A parabolic arc was drawn as the axe slid across the ground and came under the feet of Subaru and his team.

Louis: “Aau.”

Louis picked up the axe and alternated between looking at Subaru’s face and Rem’s.

It did not seem to be an axe-shaped bomb, but it appeared to be a pure act of disarmament.

Todd raised his hands and waved at Subaru and the others who had recognized that fact.

Todd: “As you can see, I’m not your enemy. Only, it would be regrettable for all of us if we wasted time glaring at each other like this, right?”

Flop: “…Wife-san, I too think we should talk constructively. What do you think?”

Rem: “…”

Squeezing her own arm, Rem glanced sideways at Subaru.

Only Subaru and Rem were able to share their wariness of Todd and the level of threat that he posed. As for their acquaintances themselves, Louis was also there when Subaru, Flop, and the others were attacked by Todd in the Fortress City, but none of that danger was shown on either of their faces.

Therefore—

Beatrice: "Betty will follow Subaru's decision, in fact."

As she held hands with Subaru, Beatrice gave him only the courage to make a choice, without influencing him either way.

She was not alone; both Tanza and Idra left the future to Subaru's choice. —Just the fact that these two and Todd were in the same place was enough to make his heart freeze.

If possible, he would have liked to get Todd's presence far away from them as soon as possible, but—

Subaru: "…Katya-san is a friend of Rem. I want as many of us as possible to get out of here unscathed. We don't have the time to squabble here, that's what I think."

Rem: "—. I, understand, but…"

Subaru hung his head and bit his lip, and Rem also stiffened her cheeks in frustration.

But, he also did not know what kind of action Todd would take if he refused him poorly. That was a concern that Rem also shared. Now that he was here, he could not let him go.

It was the same reason one could not leave a bomb unattended, not knowing when it may detonate.

Katya: "D-don't worry! Th-this guy is outrageously tenacious! I'm sure he'll be useful to help me and all of you escape!"

Todd: "Hey, come on, you shouldn't compare your fiancé to something like a Zodda bug.”

Seeing Subaru and Rem’s state of unease, Katya clumsily backed-up Todd. With a wry smile at Katya’s defense, Todd then ran his hand through his own hair, and,

Todd: “Well, since you’ve accepted me, I’ll have to return the favor. Thanks, I’ll also have to prove myself to Katya, who has treated me so lightly.”

With that, Todd spoke like a reliable, young man, and ignoring the feelings of Subaru, who had an inescapable sense of tension that made his throat growl, he joined the others.

2

—There were three reasons why Subaru could not reject Todd Fang’s presence in this situation.

The first was the presence of Katya, Todd’s fiancée.

Having apparently developed a friendly relationship with Rem during her time in the mansion, she appeared to be a good person, despite her sharp-tongued nature, having properly shown Subaru and company that she was not a nefarious sort of person. From all appearances, she did not have the slightest idea of who Todd was at the root of his character; but, whatever accusations Subaru and company made here, it would be a bad bet whether she would believe her fiancé or them.

If so, should one, due to disliking Todd, choose to separate from Katya?

Comparing it to the wheelchair Subaru had made for Rem, it was not inferior. Her leaning her weight on it looked so pitiful that he could not leave her behind.

As long as Katya and Todd were intimate to the point of seeming to be one, it was only logical that they could not refuse Todd.

The second was that Todd’s actions were all undone in previous attempts due to Return by Death.

With his ruthless nature and cool-headed judgment, Todd had on numerous occasions cornered Subaru, taking Subaru's life—Not just that, sometimes taking the lives of Subaru's cherished friends.

Now, Flop, who was accompanying Subaru, Tanza, Idra, and even others had once been killed by Todd.

Subaru's strong feelings of hatred and fear toward Todd were probably due to the fact that Todd had taken the lives of his friends right before his eyes more than any other person Subaru had ever encountered in this world.

However, since, as a result of Return by Death, these events had not actually occurred, even if Todd were to turn his blade against them, he would not have done any harm beyond that.

Neither the great fire in the Shudraqian forest, nor the unrelenting attacks in the Fortress City, nor the massacre of Gladiators on Gladiator Island, none of these had happened. —Only that it was possible for him to perpetrate them.

And the third and final reason—

Todd: "—Aim from the chest up! Anything below the waist will only buy you some time!"

Subaru: "Tsk, Beatrice!"

Beatrice: "Understood, in fact! Minya!"

At the sharp voice's instruction, Subaru and Beatrice simultaneously held their hands out in front of them.

Ahead of their palms, several pale-faced enemies—zombies were knocked down to the ground as the purple arrows were shot at them, causing them to crystallize and sending up a cloud of dust.

Some of them escaped being critically hit, however—

Subaru: "Sorry, but, even if their torso is in that state…"

Tanza: "Even if the head is intact, it will just be shattered."

The zombies that were not immediately incapacitated were hit by the heel of Tanza's falling leg. Their crystallized torsos were shattered, leaving them unable to do anything after their four limbs were blown away.

The head of the zombie rolled away, and without its regeneration process beginning, eventually, the still intact head lost its color and crumbled away like sand.

Though, it was not as though he did not feel heartache at the sight of it.

Todd: "Now, we should have eliminated the obstacles in the back streets. Your guys' magic, it's working extraordinarily well on these guys, thank you. How much power can you spare?"

Beatrice: "…There is plenty more, in fact. Ten-thousand or a hundred-thousand to spare, I suppose."

Todd: "That's reassuring. But don't try anything too rash. You guys are my lifeline."

Being praised for their successful elimination of the group of zombies that was blocking their way left Subaru and Beatrice with mixed feelings.

Unilaterally defeating the zombies was a sound choice, mentally. On the other hand, it was somewhat unpleasant that Todd was the one praising it.

Putting aside the sentiments of Subaru and the others,

Todd: "I had many encounters with those pale-faced guys before I reunited with Katya at the mansion. They didn't seem to be on either side, the regular army or the rebels, and you can't communicate with them."

Flop: "Oh, really? But we seemed to be able to talk to the ones that Husband-kun and the others took down in the mansion, though."

Todd: "Being able to talk and being able to communicate are similar, but they're not the same thing at all, are they? They won't listen to you, and they won't die if you crush their heads or cut them off. They're troublesome enemies to deal with."

Tanza: "Soldiers who do not die… just as Schwartz-sama's companion told us."

After being told of the zombies' formidable characteristics, Flop and Tanza contemplated.

However, they were considering Todd's opinion, and this was also a highly accurate analysis that Subaru could not ignore.

Todd: "To summarize, they can't be defeated by honest means. Swords, lances, and other weapons are only a temporary measure. The best way…"

Flop: "Is Husband-kun's and Dress-chan's."

Tanza: "Magic."

Todd: "I've also roasted some of them to charcoal with a Spirit I had in my care, and they didn't get back up. I haven't verified if it's effective with ordinary fire as well as magic fire, though."

Subaru: "…"

Todd: "Well, in case you're wondering, it takes longer for them to revive if you hit them above the neck than if you hit them in any other part of the body. The legs regenerate surprisingly quickly, so don't expect to take away their mobility."

Even Subaru, who knew his true nature, was impressed by Todd's willingness to give out such advice.

As soon as the matter of accepting them into the group was settled, Todd generously shared information about the zombies, giving out information as they went along.

Naturally, he, like Subaru and his group, had moved through the Imperial Capital, where numerous zombies roamed, to join up with Katya. Having done so, Todd likely had effective strategies against the zombies and knowledge that would help them escape.

This prospect was the third reason why Subaru had welcomed Todd.

Subaru: “That said, I had no clue how far it went…”

The zombie outbreak occurred shortly after Subaru and his group had climbed over the city walls.

For a moment, Subaru thought that they might have been the ones to trigger the zombie outbreak, but they decided to trample that down and move forward, as it was an unanswerable fear to consider.

Regardless, from the zombie outbreak to the present, even though the time for investigation should have been around the same for both Subaru’s group and Todd, the depth of the information Todd had gathered for survival was incredibly ahead.

It was that attitude of his, not just toward zombies, but toward anything, anyone, anywhere, that propelled Todd’s extraordinary decisiveness and ability to get things done.

Rem: “Katya-san, are you alright?”

Katya: “Y-Yeah, aside from being a little shaken up by all the unfamiliar people… What about you, are you fine?”

Rem: “I’m much more afraid of the likes of Priscilla-sama and Madelyn-san, I don’t have any chance against them.”

Katya: “Those kinds of people have nasty tempers…”

Rem and Katya slowly lagged behind Subaru and his battle group, trying to make their way ahead. Rem was pushing Katya’s wheelchair, and Louis was escorting the defenseless girls as they looked around restlessly.

Because of the poor footing and choice of route to bypass the group of zombies, combined with the speed of the fake Crown Princes led by Idra and the Galewind Horse, the speed of travel was not fast.

Still, steadily, they approached the ramparts of the Imperial Capital.

Flop: “Husband-kun, why the long face? Are you still concerned about Soldier-kun?”

Subaru: “Flop-san…”

The complicated expression on Subaru’s face, which was both happy and bitter at the same time, was seen through by Flop, who was still watching his surroundings closely.

Being the astute man that he was, Flop could see that Subaru was more wary of Todd than necessary—at least, more than was necessary with the amount of information he had at this point.

Of course, he could not reveal the fact that Flop had been killed before, because it would run afoul of the rules of Return by Death.

Subaru: “Flop-san, as I said before…”

Flop: “Pay attention to what Soldier-kun is up to, right? I know that, and that’s why Miss Tanza stays with him as much as possible, as you had requested of her.”

Subaru: “…”

Flop: “Although you have become smaller and your face younger, your way of thinking has grown more mature and cautious, Husband-kun. You always do your best to worry, and that’s a virtue. But you know, suggesting cross-dressing in order to conquer the Fortress City, I also like that side of you.”

Seeing Flop’s soft and gentle smile, Subaru looked embarrassed and then gave a wry smile.

Even without his current appearance, when compared to his original body, Subaru felt like he realized the older Flop’s proficiency as an older brother. It was no wonder that Medium had so much respect for Flop.

Beatrice: “—Hk, Subaru, look down at our feet, I suppose.”

Subaru: “Our feet… huh, Uwaah.”

When the conversation came to a close, Beatrice led Subaru by the hand, and at their feet—Soaking the soles of their shoes, they saw water flowing on the inclined ground.

Beyond the Crystal Palace, the reservoirs that held large amounts of water had been breached, and the volume of water flowing into the city was beginning to rise in earnest. The enemy was not only Imperial Soldiers and zombies, but the water as well.

If they took too long to withdraw, they would eventually be swallowed by the rising waters—.

Todd: “If we don’t get out of here before that happens, it’s over for all of us.”

Todd, who walked over to them, clearly verbalized Subaru’s sense of crisis.

Subaru stiffened slightly, and whether or not Todd realized his alarm, he pointed the tip of his returned axe toward the Crystal Palace.

Todd: “It looks like General First-Class Moguro doesn’t stand a chance against the Cloud Dragon. It’s only a matter of time before Moguro loses. It would be better if it were one-on-one, but two-on-one is fatal… After the General First-Class is defeated, how will the enemy proceed?”

Subaru: “How they will proceed, do you have an idea?”

Todd: “Regardless of the Cloud Dragon, the flying dragon rider cooperating with it looks to be a corpse. So far, all the corpses have been attacking as soon as they see us. In other words…”

Subaru: “The zombies are trying to kill the living.”

Todd: “It’s irritating, but that’s how it is.”

Todd tilted his head in contemplation, and Subaru understood what he was trying to say.

The objective of the zombies was to exterminate every last living person they came across. For that reason, if there was a way to kill a lot of people, it would not be surprising that they would choose it.

The stone giant clashing against the white Dragon right in front of the castle, if it lost, the zombies would completely destroy the walls of the reservoir, causing the water to ceaselessly flood.

If that happened, Subaru's group and the people of the Imperial Capital, along with the soldiers of the regular army and the rebel army who were fighting outside, would all be swept away.

Todd: "That's irritating. But, I do like the way you call them zombies. We need some kind of name for them. Let's just call them zombies from now on."

Beatrice: "What do you think about those zombies, in fact?"

Suddenly, Beatrice, who had been silent, asked Todd that question.

Todd, who muttered the word "zombie" several times to familiarize himself with the word, made a puzzled face at Beatrice's question,

Todd: "What do I think?"

Beatrice: "So far, the majority of the zombies we've encountered were Imperial Soldiers just like you, I suppose. I can tell by their appearance, in fact. How do you feel about killing your own allies…"

Todd: "First, they aren't my allies. They just wear the same clothes. If they're dead, they're not soldiers or anything. They don't need to be recognized as anything other than troublesome obstacles."

Beatrice: "…"

Todd: "Talking about whose pawns they are and what their goals are, I don't think that's important for survival right now. That's something for the big shots to think about and solve."

He gave a composed response, and Beatrice silently agreed to end the conversation.

Todd shrugged his shoulders at her attitude and looked at Subaru again,

Todd: “You’ve got a reliable partner, but it would be better for you to talk it out with her if you’re feeling worn out. Contrary to expectations, even just spitting out what’s on your mind can do some good.”

Subaru: “…I’ll keep that in mind.”

In response to Subaru’s gloomy answer, Todd left him with the words “Do it”, and proceeded forth.

Acting as a scout for the road ahead, Todd would find the positions of the zombies and make a plan for how to drive them back, to which Subaru and his team would then review and implement in order to secure their escape route. Currently, it was going quite well.

However—

Beatrice: “Subaru, if you are worn out, you can talk to Betty about anything, I suppose.”

As Beatrice looked into Subaru’s face, he looked to be mentally worn down.

That was partly because he continued to devote strong vigilance towards Todd, and partly because Beatrice’s magic was using his mana.

But the greatest psychological burden of all was taking down the zombies.

It was painful to destroy zombies that could speak and had something close to the will they had during their lifetime.

How much better it would be if, like Todd, he could simply dismiss them as scarecrows blocking the way.

Flop: “I think that’s also one of the virtues of Husband-kun, though.”

Subaru: “…I don’t know. Rem’s going to kick my butt for hesitating again.”

Flop: “Wife-san wouldn’t do such a thing.”

Subaru: “…”

Flop: “I don’t think she would.”

Strangely, Flop’s repeated words were persuasive.

Flop had survived in this merciless Empire with neither physical strength nor magic, but with words alone. Perhaps the single greatest weapon he possessed was his humanity.

Subaru: “Thanks to Flop-san, I’m feeling a bit better!”

Flop: “Thank goodness! I’m useless, so if Husband-kun were to get depressed, I wouldn’t be able to find a way to save us! Oops, but…”

Subaru: “But?”

Flop: “Thanks to me, I think I may have hurt Dress-chan’s feelings a bit.”

When Flop pointed that out, Subaru turned around and said, “Huh?”. There was Beatrice, holding hands with Subaru and glaring at him with her cute, round eyes.

Subaru’s cheeks stiffened at her reaction, and Beatrice’s cheeks flushed,

Beatrice: “Neglecting Betty when she worried about you, lucky you, in fact. There Subaru goes again, immediately befriending a handsome guy and ignoring Betty, I suppose.”

Subaru: “What incredible misinformation! No, I’m not ignoring you at all, okay? In the first place, though guys like Flop-san and Ceci are exceptions, Idra and Weitz are nuanced while not necessarily handsome… Hiain is quite charming, though.”

Beatrice: “There’s no need to make excuses, in fact!”

She suddenly turned her face away from him, and Subaru moaned in pain as if his chest had been brutally gouged out.

Beatrice was also worried about him. Although Flop had phrased his words more skillfully, he felt regret towards Beatrice from the bottom of his heart.

No matter what, after escaping from this place, he had to entirely devote himself to making it up to Beatrice.

Subaru: "For now, all I can do is caress you earnestly with my hand…"

Rem: "…What do you think you are doing in a situation like this?"

Subaru: "Wow!"

Subaru was surprised when someone called out to him from behind. Rem, who cast Subaru a dubious look, still had Louis clinging to her waist as she looked around the vicinity warily and said,

Rem: "Even if you take such a form, your personality surely doesn't change."

Subaru: "Oh? Does that mean that you know my nature well enough to understand who I am?"

Rem: "Correction. Now that your body has shrunk, your restraint has become nonexistent compared to before."

Subaru: "That's the part I'd really like you to laugh at and let slide, blaming it on the wild nature of a child."

Even Rem's harsh opinion was a pleasant stimulus for Subaru, after having been separated from her for some time.

Subconsciously, Subaru tightened his face and appeared to be happy, being careful to not make Rem uneasy.

In addition to that, speaking of someone that he did not want to make anxious, Katya: “Hey, is Todd bothering you? Is he properly being of use?”

Subaru: “…”

Katya, pushed in a wheelchair by Rem, hesitantly asked.

Compared to the fake Crown Princes who had been released from confinement and followed Subaru and his group on their own as they retreated, Katya was experiencing a considerable sense of helplessness in not being able to move on her own.

She seemed to be terribly worried about Todd as well as herself, and it was clear that she had a shy affection for Todd, her fiancé.

Seeing Katya’s genuine concern, Subaru turned towards the end of the alley where Todd was headed,

Subaru: “Yeah, he’s being useful. He has a good nose and good eyesight. His precise directions have really helped us avoid trouble.”

Katya: “I-I see. That’s good then…”

Katya, her eyes downcast, patted herself on the chest in relief.

As aggravating as it was, those were not thoughtless words said just to reassure Katya, but a fair assessment of Todd’s work up to that point.

In fact, as a soldier, Todd’s work had been impeccable. His scouting and route selection had contributed greatly to their survival in this current situation of having to flee, even with the hindrance of having to move a large number of people.

Todd did not have an effective way to strike the zombies, but he was outstanding at exposing them to the attacks of Subaru and Beatrice, who did have effective skills. —Except for Subaru suffering more mental wear due to the higher amount of loss than necessary, there were no disadvantages to Todd’s presence.

Subaru: “…”

—No, Rem, whose interactions with Katya seemed to be complicated, was also under the same mental strain due to Todd's presence as Subaru.

Subaru: "At this rate…"

Would they really all be able to escape out of the Imperial Capital together without incident?

While Subaru struggled with unanswerable questions about how he wished for things to proceed—

Todd: "—Katya, I told you to stay farther back, didn't I? Don't catch up to us."

Todd, who had been away scouting, returned and found Katya with Subaru and the others, and gave caution to his fiancée.

At Todd's words, an expression of relief for Todd's safety rose on Katya's face, then it quickly turned into a look of opposition towards the words, and then her expression changed once again.

She seemed to be a bit worried about Todd's appearance.

Katya: "Todd, did something happen?"

Todd: "…Good grief, she's so intuitive only at times like these."

As he said this, Todd ran a hand through his bandana-less hair and revealed what he had seen as he looked toward Subaru and the others.

That was—

Todd: "—There's a rather tough-looking zombie just ahead from here. A member of the Cyclops Tribe, he was probably the one who stood out the most in today's battle."

So he spoke.

Chapter 4:
Warrior's Instinct

1

—The "Giant Eye" Izmail, was a valiant warrior of the Cyclops Tribe and the hope of his clan.

In the center of his valiant face, a large blue eye fixed its gaze clearly on the future without hesitation. —No, it had once fixed its gaze.

Now, Izmail's single eye was as if a golden moon had emerged in an otherwise moonless night; the very manifestation of an evil omen.

Izmail: "…"

In order to bring fame and prestige to his tribe, Izmail resolutely threw down the gauntlet in the battle for the Imperial Capital, and entered the battlefield as a rebel aiming to take the head of the Emperor Vincent Vollachia. True to his reputation, he quickly broke through the defenses of the regular army and reached the city walls.

However, that was as far as Izmail's advance went.

The unleashed hellfire thoroughly burned down the "Giant Eye" Izmail, and all the warriors of the Cyclops Tribe who followed him. Despite surviving on the border between life and death, he ultimately lost his life by the pursuit of an emotionless assassin dagger.

Indeed, he had lost his life. —That was what should have been.

Izmail: "…"

His body, blown to shreds by artillery fire, certainly ought to have died.

Nevertheless, Izmail's body, hideously burned and blown asunder, grew new limbs and rose, and while carrying his weapon, his battleaxe, on his shoulder, he walked through the Imperial Capital, ravaged by war as it was.

Moving his cold, lifeless body with nothing more than fervently surging emotions of abhorrence and hatred—.

Izmail: "—Where are you, you damned repulsive beast?"

2

Todd: "Up until now, we've only faced small fries, and haven't come across anyone on the level of a former "General", but the opponent ahead of us will be more than a match for that. As such, he is quite troublesome."

Subaru: "When you say "General"…"

Todd: "There may be exceptions who are evaluated for their military tactics and strategic acumen, but in most cases, it's their own skill that counts. This guy is one of those… not comparable to a General First-Class, but he definitely has the potential to become a General Second-Class."

Subaru: "…"

Todd: "If we were to compare by simple ability, he could probably kill all of us by himself."

With a nonchalant attitude, Todd wrapped up his hopeless report with their annihilation.

Thus pointing out how deadly the formidable zombie that awaited them was to the group, and that the dumb luck that had protected them until now had run out.

Katya: "B-but, you're a cunning guy, you can figure something out, right? You've done so well so far, with the help of these kids."

Katya said, her voice had risen while her eyes clung to Todd.

The kids she referred to were Subaru and Beatrice, who were magically crystallizing zombies, and Tanza, who was destroying enemies who might have slipped through.

Fortunately, Louis had not had to step in to protect Rem and the rest of the followers so far, and the two main attackers, together with Todd's good judgment, had paved the way for the team's success so far.

However—

Todd: "When there is a certain level of parity in strength, brute force can be effective. However, when facing an opponent with a significant power gap, it becomes meaningless. No matter how hard the wind blows, it cannot bring down a castle."

Katya: "Ugh…"

Flop: "So, you think it's going to be tough going down this road, Soldier-kun?"

Todd: "Yes. —I'd say that, but we can't change our path so easily."

He nodded halfway through Flop's words, and then he shook his head. He then turned his head to the path they came from, the Crystal Palace.

Todd: "What's more, that side has finished their battle. The water will be arriving soon."

As Todd emotionlessly pointed out, a roar dominated the sky in the far distance.

As they looked in the same direction as him, they saw a huge humanoid figure that clashed with the Dragon near the Crystal Palace; both of its knees were destroyed and its crumpled body fell to the ground, breaking the castle's perimeter.

Behind the dense plume of smoke, the white Dragon that defeated the colossal god unleashed a battle cry.

No creature, zombies included, would not be able to comprehend that the sound that echoed loudly was that of a battle cry, given that scene.

Todd: “If our earlier guess is correct…”

Subaru: “I don’t know if we can make it in time to go back the way we came and find another route.”

Beatrice: “I suppose.”

It was a conclusion that could drive them further and further into a corner, but as they put into words the course of events that they had no choice but to consider, Beatrice, who had joined hands with Subaru, also affirmed Subaru’s thought.

Todd pulled back his chin in response, and Tanza raised her hand modestly, “Well,” she said.

Tanza: “Then the situation is deadlocked, correct? We have a powerful enemy in front of us, but even if we went back, time would not allow it.”

Flop: “Ha ha, Miss Tanza, that is a very scary conclusion. It’s true that if we only consider the information we’ve been told then it does feel like a deadlock which is really uneasing, but I’m sure there are moves left that we can take!”

Tanza: “For example, what?”

Flop: “That’s not for me to know, though! I’m sure someone is here who might, right?”

In response to Flop’s statement, Tanza, who had had difficulty changing her emotions, furrowed her round eyebrows and turned her gaze.

In situations like this, it made Subaru happy and grateful that people thought of him when the topic of someone they could rely on came up. There was pressure too, but it also made him feel like he had to meet their expectations.

Furthermore—

Rem: “Can you manage it somehow?”

Indeed, Tanza was not the only one who had high hopes for Subaru.

Subaru: "…"

Rem, who was pushing the wheelchair holding Katya and clutching the handle to the point that her fingers had turned white, asked him this question with shaking pale blue eyes.

Compared to the total trust that Katya, who was just in front of her, had for Todd, it was something as fragile as a sandcastle or thin ice.

Even so, Subaru's heart was excited.

Having been vigilant towards Todd, who was accompanying them, Subaru was able to pull his attention back to the task at hand and utilize his mind to its fullest.

Todd: "If we don't decide quickly on whether to go or return, we won't make it in time."

While Subaru was brainstorming, Todd had added requirements as if to remind him.

If they went, all they needed was strength. If they were going back, all they needed was luck and time. —If he assumed he would Return by Death, the latter might have a better chance of success.

Subaru: "No, I can't say that for certain."

If he kept repeating Return by Death and eliminated the wrong routes, they might eventually reach another way out by the shortest route, assuming that there was a goal.

If they could not make it in time by whatever route they took, they could not choose the latter option.

On the other hand, if the option to fight was chosen—

Subaru: "Whether we can fight a strong enemy or not is…"

Among the group fleeing with Subaru, only Beatrice with Subaru, Louis, Tanza, and Todd could have been counted as having decent fighting strength, with Idra as a backup.

Of these, Subaru was like a bonus for Beatrice, and wanted to entrust Idra with escorting non-combatants such as Rem and Katya, Flop and the fake Crown Princes.

In effect, there were four people who could serve as combatants—Beatrice, Louis, Tanza, and Todd—Magnificently, the only people he could trust were young girls, and he did not have the time to laugh it off.

That was what Subaru was just thinking.

Subaru: “…”

Subaru looked up with his hand on his chin in contemplation and his gaze met with Todd’s, who happened to look in Subaru’s direction at the same moment.

At that instant, lightning flashed in Subaru’s head, and the electrifying feeling of it felt very reliable and bitter.

The reason was—

Subaru & Todd: “—Let’s beat that zombie.”

—Because Subaru was acutely aware in his soul that they had both intuited their mutual conclusion at the same time and that what it would take to accomplish it would be a combination of strength and wisdom.

3

—Izmail turned himself around the moment he heard a loud noise, one unlike the others in his environment.

Izmail: "…"

His old, burned body was replaced by a brand-new, cracked one. Izmail, hero of the Cyclops Tribe, took a wide stance and lowered his posture to capture the approach of a large shadow in his single eye.

As Izmail stood in the street, flying parabolically above his head was, as if by some joke, one of the houses that made up the Imperial Capital that had been pulled out of the street in its entirety.

It was forcibly torn from the ground and thrown, spilling pieces all over the ground and walls, scattering like crumbs from a loaf of bread. In reality it was not that cute, and most people would certainly be crushed to death.

Even still—

Izmail: "—How slow!"

The "Giant Eye" Izmail, was outside the bounds of most people.

The flying house was on a trajectory to land in the center of the street, leaving only in front of and behind him as escape routes since the left and right sides were tightly blocked.

But, that they purposefully provided an escape route, meant he would have to play right into their hands.

Therefore, Izmail did not flee forward or backward, but raised his battleaxe instead.

It was a huge axe that would even be difficult for two strong warriors to lift, but Izmail easily maneuvered it and could cut through any obstacle with ease.

On this occasion, the same fate befell the thrown house.

At the moment of contact, the blade of the axe slashed directly up from below, entered the front edge of the house, and sliced the large house into two vertical sections with a slash like cutting a large man all the way across from the groin.

The severed house could no longer fulfill its role as a home as the furniture, dishes, and clothing left by the homeowners smashed into the streets, all without dealing any damage to Izmail's physical body.

However—

Izmail: "—Hk."

immediately after unleashing his spectacular move, a rock came right for Izmail's face.

Of course, this would not work against the Cyclops Tribe, whose eyesight was unparalleled compared to that of other races. As he tilted his head, dodged the flying projectile, and ducked into the swirling dust left by the house, Izmail squinted his eye.

The "enemy" was in the same direction from which both the house and the stone had been thrown.

—The pupil technique of the Cyclops Tribe allowed Izmail's view of the world to be switched.

Izmail's eye, which was capable of using color to capture the emotions of a target, saw multiple flickers of red coming from the direction of the thrown attack. —The color of the will to fight.

That in itself was desirable, and Izmail's whole body became filled with strength.

During this siege of the Imperial Capital, or in a battle against bandits or any other race, there was nothing more degrading than fighting those who did not bear the color of a warrior.

Warrior against warrior, fighter against fighter, it is only in such battles that there is value in a contest of skill.

The source of the animosity that drove Izmail's supposedly dead body was great towards those that had defiled the honor of such universal martial arts.

Izmail: "It's a fight—"

Stepping onto the dirt-strewn streets, Izmail's body advanced toward the enemy.

The same stone projectiles that were thrown from before tried to intercept him, and the next massive projectile—a house followed in a parabolic trajectory; although, he did not think it was cowardly or a weak man's tactic.

Only that it was a fine tactic. That he held respect for, and needed to destroy.

Izmail: "A warrior's death must come at the hands of a warrior."

The speed and accuracy of the incoming stones were quite high. Although he responded with a minimal amount of ducking and parrying with his raised battleaxe, it would be inevitable that his bones would be shattered if he were to receive a proper hit.

Needless to say, the massive house that was thrown into the air was a projectile with such force that it would immediately render its target incapacitated.

However—

Izmail: "Don't think it's your exclusive right to send something flying!"

The howling Izmail swung his battleaxe, blowing away the second house-cannonball, and drove the edge of his weapon into the street with such force that it ripped away the ground of the Imperial Capital.

Continuing to rip up the ground, Izmail swung his long leg around and launched a kick that blew it forward like a buckshot. Naturally, he did not expect this to be an effective strike against the enemy across the street.

Izmail: “It’s just a distraction, but…”

Unlike the Cyclops Tribe, other races that did not possess special eyes would be unable to see through a curtain of dust that danced around them.

Izmail hid within the dust and shattered street debris, which clearly lowered his chance of being hit by the stones being thrown at him, and had a reprieve to advance further.

Izmail: “A big man and a little girl—”

As Izmail peeked through the curtain of smoke, he could clearly see the other side and could make out that there was a man and a girl.

The man took the role of keeping Izmail in check with stones, and the small girl beside him pulled entire houses from the ground and threw them into the air as massive projectiles.

It was a well-coordinated effort, but at the same time, what was disconcerting was the inexperienced way in which they acted.

Izmail, who had honed his skills on the battlefield, understood.

Neither of the two, who had gone on the offensive, were genuine warriors. Nevertheless, they had somehow developed a warrior’s spirit, which Izmail, who was the target of the attack, indeed respected.

Sometimes, the battlefield could transform a non-warrior into a warrior in an instant.

The same thing was happening with that man and the girl.

Izmail: “Magnificent.”

Voicing his praise, paying them respect, he must kill them, no matter what.

With absolute perfection, with no hesitation whatsoever, without even the slightest of errors, he must thoroughly slaughter them. Eradicating every last part of their lives, he must choke the very life out of them.

He must tear them limb from limb, rip off their heads, and drink in the blood of their eviscerated hearts—.

Izmail: “…”

He could feel the fierce craving for death, blood, and lives flaring up within his own mind.

At the same time, as Izmail tore through the third house-cannonball, a shrill noise resounded as the window glass shattered, and he saw himself reflected therein.

Izmail was smiling.

The corners of his mouth contorted as if to applaud the malevolent heat that was flowing through his cold body, in which no real blood circulated. It was a heinous smile reeking of naught but blood, one that had never once been worn on his face when he was still alive.

Izmail: “Haha, hahaha, HAHAHAHAHA!”

Instead of feeling repugnance at that smile, a vehement exhilaration boiled inside of him, and erupted with the sound of laughter.

As he laughed, and kept laughing, he struck down a lucky shot from the stones that were flying in his direction. Plunging towards the next house-cannonball, he tore through it with his battleaxe as he made his suicide attack.

They continued to hurl things at him while they retreated back, and he leapt towards the two warriors—No, he leapt towards his prey.

Slamming his battleaxe towards the fifth building, which seemed to be their final resistance, Izmail would try to bless the applause of his boiling “blood” with real blood, and—

???: “—As expected, only having one eyeball really confines your vision, doesn't it?"

Izmail: "…"

The house flew in a parabolic arc, and, tearing down its front door with his axe, he would propagate that destructive power, and cause the entirety of the bending building materials to burst like a bubble.

Just before that could happen, somebody's ridicule struck Izmail's eardrums.

—No, no no no no no, absolutely not.

That was not the ridicule of just "somebody".

For Izmail, that voice was the utmost abhorrent, a symbol of malevolence, a target of detestation.

Izmail: "YOU—!!"

His raised morale from just before had vanished, and a chilly bloodlust dominated Izmail's entire body.

The one seen by Izmail's widened, black-stained, golden eye was a single orange-haired Imperial Soldier, lying flat on the floor of the destroyed house—.

—Undoubtedly, he was the sworn enemy who had brought about Izmail's Death.

Izmail: "—RAAAAAAHHHHHHHH!"

That instant, twisting his body in a burst of rage, Izmail's battleaxe changed its trajectory.

It changed from a vertical axe strike which would have split the house right in half, to a slanted trajectory in an instant, and was about to strike down upon the prone Imperial Soldier—

Izmail: "—Oh."

Just before he could drive all of his might into his sworn enemy, the Imperial Soldier suddenly vanished from Izmail’s field of view, as the latter rode the motivation of his own war cry.

It was not something of this dimension, like moving at an intense speed.

Quite literally, he had vanished.

Izmail: “…”

The next moment, Izmail’s thoughts were completely painted over by black and white.

The hatred that had burst out towards his sworn enemy had lost its destination, and his mind was dominated by the blankness caused by such a strange phenomenon. But, just before that moment, Izmail’s “Giant Eye” had perceived a discrepancy.

It had perceived a young girl of long, golden hair, clung to the leather belt of his prone sworn enemy’s detestable form.

Izmail: “…”

The reason and intention was unclear; however, he did not think that information was irrelevant.

Even though the time of contact was short, there was no way that the Imperial Soldier would thoughtlessly carry unnecessary things; such was the negative trust that stole Izmail’s thoughts away.

Thereupon—

Izmail: “—Gah?!!”

A piercing impact bore through Izmail’s left shoulder, and he released a cry of pain.

Within the house where the destruction had been interrupted, what pierced through the walls and struck Izmail, whether it was precisely aimed or just a lucky shot, was a stone fired at a high speed.

He thought his bones would break if struck by that, and in accordance with that belief, that force caused Izmail's left shoulder to violently explode, and as a result, Izmail's body would begin to scream—But that did not come to pass.

Izmail's body had lost the color of blood, and cracks had formed in several places on his skin. When the stone struck him, a terribly short sound rang out, and it shattered.

It was just as if Izmail himself was the same as the window glass of the destroyed houses.

Izmail: "…"

For a moment, as his left arm shattered, Izmail's thoughts came to a standstill.

However, while he was surprised, the absence of the expected pain prevented his thoughts from being shredded to pieces. Consequently, he was able to be at ease without overlooking the next change.

Izmail: "My arm…"

His arm, shattered at the shoulder and fallen to the floor of the inclined house, regenerated through inexplicable movements as if time was turning back; cracks were filled, shattered fragments returned, and it was restored.

In less than two seconds, it was as if the shattering had never even happened.

Izmail: "Hah—!!"

He promptly switched the battleaxe from his right hand to his freshly repaired left hand, and with the intention of ascertaining the feel of it, Izmail fired off an axe strike, this time blasting the half-destroyed house-cannonball.

Destroying the building constructed with a mix of stone and wood, Izmail bathed in the debris as he broke through to the outside—Then, he reached out his right hand towards the approaching sense of hostility.

He caught a flying fist-sized stone head-on with his widely opened right hand.

If he did not avoid the impact, the bones in his right hand would obviously be painfully demolished. But Izmail's body deviated from how a human body would be broken, and would break down like inorganic matter instead.

Then, it had been restored to its original state with higher regenerative ability than a human body's ability to heal.

Izmail: "This is, this is the true nature of this body…!"

Unconsciously averting his attention from the unnatural situation in which he was placed, Izmail moved with a burning hatred.

Granted to him via an incomprehensible resurrection, this repulsive body distanced Izmail from the concepts of blood, pain, and even that which was indispensable to life, the very concept of Death.

In that case—

Izmail: "—Hah."

Exhaling, Izmail saw below him the sight he desired.

The man and young girl who had been resolutely attacking Izmail for some time now, the one standing right behind them was his cowardly sworn enemy who had vanished just before his attacks could reach him.

With an unknown technique, the moment he vanished from Izmail's eye, he appeared behind those two, and the warriors joined forces with the coward.

At that moment, his admiration for the warriors from just before reversed, and transformed into a thick hatred.

Izmail: "All of you, pay for this mockery of war with your lives—!"

Kicking the fragments of the house that had been blown away, Izmail's body flew like an arrow.

As his body headed straight towards the villains, the young girl decided that there was not enough time to get to the next house, and so she began throwing stones like the bearded man standing next to her.

However—

Izmail: "—It's no use, no use, IT'S NO USE!"

Without wielding his battleaxe to hit them away, the stones caught Izmail at high speed; however, neither could they stop Izmail's actions, nor could they discourage his heart.

Even if a part was struck by a stone and shattered, it was instantly restored, and he suffered no damage.

With a new body that had relinquished the true feeling of life, Izmail tried to attain the true feeling of life from others by bathing in their blood, and so, towards the stiffened faces of his enemies—

Izmail: "…"

Trying to reach his hand out, he became aware of something.

The bearded man, the young girl in a kimono, the Imperial Soldier whom he had decided was his hated archenemy, none of their expressions had died.

The bearded man and girl appeared red, while his sworn enemy appeared blue once again; it happened at the moment he ascertained those colors.

—Izmail sensed the arrival of a presence behind him as he leapt toward his enemies.

Izmail: "—Hk."

Izmail's warrior instincts sounded an alarm, and he spun around in mid-air to look up at the presence.

With his “Giant Eye” opened wide, reflected in his golden eye was a person who had somehow managed to get behind him in an instant —No, it was not just one person. There were three figures.

A young boy with black hair, and held in his arms was a young girl in a dress.

And, the young blonde girl, who should have just been by his sworn enemy, was clinging to the boy’s back.

All three were small; however, burning with bright red fighting spirits, they raised their hands.

???: “El—”

At the murmured incantation, Izmail’s warrior instincts immediately tried to react by kicking off the debris.

However, restraining those instincts, Izmail stretched his arm in order to swing his battleaxe. Without dodging the attack of his enemies, without stopping it, he would bask in it as he performed his counterattack.

An attack that would have been impossible with his former body, was now a possible slashing attack that could slaughter his enemies, and—

???: “Minya—!!”

An amethyst glow was fired, and Izmail dared to catch it as it flew straight towards him.

He, who had planned to counterattack from there, had not even realized it.

—He had not realized that the hero of the Cyclops Tribe, the “Giant Eye” Izmail, would have never made such a foolish choice.

Chapter 5: Forgiveness

1

Todd: “—They’ve only recently turned into zombies. Some of them were alive just a few hours ago. Those who died in this battle are coming back to life one after another… But we can’t say for sure yet.”

Subaru: “But I understand what you mean about them having just turned into zombies. It’s like they don’t know what their own weaknesses are. We aren’t the only ones who don’t know much about zombies…”

Todd: “They themselves are the same. However, if they have a head to speak, they probably have a head to think as well. The more time we give them, the more they can fill in those unknown parts, and the more their possible weaknesses disappear.”

Subaru: “That’s why we need to strike before the enemy becomes fully prepared—oh.”

Todd: “What? What did you notice?”

Subaru: “…”

Todd: “Don’t be coy, just say it.”

Subaru: “I’m not being coy. It’s just that zombies don’t really understand their own bodies. So if we inform them instead—.”

2

He let Louis cling to his back and squeezed Beatrice tightly against his chest.

The same basic position as when they were riding on the back of the Galewind Horse; however, the situation they were placed in was quite extreme, and he did not have time to worry about the girls.

The surrounding scenery changed in an instant, and soon after, beside a house that was shattered by a furious blow, Subaru and his allies appeared in the air, taking the back of the hostile zombie.

Tanza, who threw houses, and Idra, who threw rubble, attacked in waves—it was a pretty funny warfare strategy when put into words, but it was not only the words that were funny, but the picture as well.

This was not about why the child was throwing the larger ones and not the adult. In the first place, the tactic of throwing a house itself was ridiculous.

Nevertheless—

Tanza: "Since I am receiving Yorna-sama's love, then I have to do at least this much."

Since she reliably accepted it like this, the impact of the scene could be shelved for now.

In fact, the mysterious enhancement of the entire Pleiades Battalion applied to Idra as well, but it was not as good as Tanza, who had stacked Yorna's as well. It was all about being the right person at the right place.

From that perspective, their opponent's attention was drawn by the wave attacks using big and small tools—once their focus was on Todd, Subaru and his allies made a surprise teleport attack.

Subaru: "…"

The zombie twisted in mid-air; the enemy, with his distinctive one-eyed face, blackened the white part of the large eye in the center of his face, while his golden pupil glowed brightly.

A terribly cruel, blood-scented evil sneer was etched upon his mouth, sending shivers down Subaru's spine.

Was he always the type of person who would laugh hysterically in the midst of battle? Or perhaps he had changed since he became a zombie; they did not know which one it was.

However—

Beatrice & Subaru: “El—”

Quickly, Subaru and Beatrice simultaneously held up their hands and pointed them at the enemy in front of them.

If their opponent showed a move to avoid Subaru and Beatrice’s attack with the utmost effort and no hesitation, then their strategy would fail.

In that case then perhaps, even with their best efforts, they would not be able to surpass this enemy.

But that would not happen. Because Subaru—no, because Subaru and his team forced them into this situation.

Izmail: “—Hk.”

Sure enough, the zombie turned around with a startling gait and, catching Subaru and the others in its large single eye, took a posture of swinging his battleaxe in his grip instead of taking evasive action.

It was a strategy that involved taking Subaru and crew’s attack, then defeating them with a counter attack—the traditional tactic of incurring damage so as to inflict greater damage on your foe, but the desperation put into the attack here was different.

The zombie’s body regenerated inflicted wounds in little to no time.

That was why the enemy thought that they could take Subaru and his team’s attack with no risk, and then use it to launch their own counterattack.

Unfortunately—

Beatrice & Subaru: “Minya—!!”

—Unbeknownst to them, that was the path to defeat that Subaru and his allies had carved out.

With his battleaxe swung to counter attack, the enemy took a serious hit from the purple arrows released from the hands held up by Subaru and Beatrice.

Three brightly shimmering, amethyst crystal arrows pierced the left half of the Cyclops' body.

Izmail: "Brilliant tactic, but—"

Without paying attention to the purple arrows that had pierced him, the enemy bared his teeth and howled at his prey, Subaru and his friends.

A zombie's body, oddly enough, broke in a brittle manner when it was shattered, much like pottery cracking, even though it retained some strength.

His broken body would then be repaired like a video played backwards, and the zombie would attack as if nothing had happened—

Izmail: "Wh, at…?"

—But he could not do it.

The amethyst arrows that had pierced the zombie's body did not shatter its body from there, but rather remade the body into the same amethyst crystals as the arrow. The crystallized part of the zombie's body then cracked, and this time the zombie's body shattered, but the parts did not regenerate.

The particular effectiveness of Yin Magic against zombies—that was the enemy's weakness that had been identified during their retreat up to this point.

—Although there was not an abundance of opportunities to check over a long period of time, several common characteristics were observed in the zombies.

For example, a zombie's fatal wound was closer to the heart than the head.

However, since piercing their chest would not kill them, fatal may not be the right word. Nevertheless, it was a fact that zombies, which regenerated wounds on their bodies with abnormal resilience, healed more slowly when the wounds were close to their heart.

Since blood did not flow when an arm or leg was lost, it seemed that the heart probably no longer served to pump blood to the body, but it had not lost its function as a vital part of the human body.

As those characteristics of zombies that could not be beaten were revealed, it was Beatrice's Yin Magic that was recognized to be effective at defeating zombies.

Beatrice explained that the Yin Magic "Minya" had the effect of freezing the time of the target, which was a kind of instant death magic, and it seemed to be especially effective against zombies, who relied on their regeneration.

According to Todd, if one burned a zombie's body down to ashes, they could stop the enemy from regenerating just as if they had hit them with Minya, but there was no use in asking for something one did not have.

Subaru: "This is the strongest use of the hand we have!"

Regardless of the strength of the enemy zombies, they could be defeated if they were hit with Beatrice's Minya.

In that case, the result of thinking about a strategy to hit it was to make the enemy, who continued to demonstrate its ability in life, understand the merit of becoming a zombie.

Beatrice: "They are not damaged by attacks. If one gets attacked and finds that they can heal quickly, anyone would contemplate relying on that power, I suppose."

Subaru: "Before he turned into a zombie, I'm sure he would have easily avoided that."

Louis: "Au!"

It was a declaration of victory for Subaru, Beatrice, and Louis—or rather, both admiration and pity for their enemy.

This warrior who came back to life as a zombie was undoubtedly quite the skilled warrior in life. Even as a zombie, there was no discernible change in his fighting ability, but there was a distortion in the ideology with which he approached battle.

If only he had not been so arrogant as to think that receiving an attack would not be a problem.

Subaru: “There was no way he could have seriously taken that shot.”

Izmail: “…”

The zombie’s eye widened as it spun with the shock of the magic he was exposed to.

The look in his eye was a whirlpool of mixed emotions, a mixture of astonishment and understanding as he realized his defeat; Subaru bit his lower lip and cursed the unreasonable fate that had befallen this warrior.

Even if Subaru was cursed at for crystalizing the left half of his body and making him taste death for the second time—

Tanza: “—Schwartz-sama!”

Immediately after a moment of sentimentality washed over his heart.

Subaru was called by Tanza in an urgent voice, and he suddenly realized the truth of the situation. Spinning in the air, turning away, and then turning back to face him, the look in the enemy zombie’s eye had changed color.

It was not as if the color of the dead’s distinctive golden eye had changed.

But the astonishment and understanding that had been floating in it had faded, and it had been replaced by an intense hostility.

At one point, the enemy almost accepted his defeat along with the impact.

That had changed the complexion of his eye. —Perhaps Subaru's last word was the catalyst.

Izmail: "Not yet."

Subaru: "—He's not dead!"

In front of Subaru, who gasped at the sight in front of him, the enemy, whose crystallization was advancing across the left side of his body, kicked something into the air.

It was a fragment of a shattered house-cannonball. Even though it was just a fragment, it was as big as a person's head. Kicking it into the air, the impact shattered the zombie's left arm from the shoulder and blew it away.

In return, the flying debris instead flew straight at Subaru's face—

Louis: "Uau!"

Just before he was hit, Subaru had a vision of his skull being shattered by the fragment.

It would have been a fatal blow, but it did not reach Subaru. Because a figure, Louis, intervened before it hit Subaru, and took his place.

Subaru: "Louis—!"

Clinging to his back, Louis forcefully pushed Subaru's body down, moving him out of the path of the debris and into the line of fire herself instead.

As a result, Louis caught the debris without protection, was torn from Subaru's body, and was blown away.

Beatrice: "Subaru, don't look away, in fact!"

Beatrice called out to the distracted Subaru as Louis was blown away. She kept her body in Subaru's arms and reached out her hand to attack the enemy.

However, the opponent was not so simple-minded as to be fatally struck twice.

Izmail: "—Hk."

With fragments of his arm flying through the air, the enemy skillfully read Beatrice's pursuit with Minya and used what little remained of his left shoulder area to receive it.

He took on the damage in areas that were already crystallized, minimizing the progress of damage caused by the progression of the cracks.

It was truly the skill of an exceptional warrior—.

Louis: "Ua-"

As soon as he was awed by his skill, Subaru's collar was grabbed by an outstretched arm.

He had abandoned his battleaxe—No, after losing the ability to wield the battleaxe, he displayed his obsession to not let Subaru escape.

Izmail: "Ooooh!!"

Subaru: "Gah!"

Subaru's body, which held Beatrice, was forcefully sent to the ground by the pull of the enemy's arm. Choking from the pain of his back hitting the hard surface, Subaru saw the form of the enemy up close and tried to quickly raise his hand.

But, however, the opponent's determined form met his gaze, and his movement stopped.

—The way he looked, full of ambition and the will to fight, it was hard to believe that it was from an already dead body.

Subaru: “—Hk.”

Beatrice: “Subaru!”

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama!”

Subaru’s neck was constricted and desperate voices struck his eardrums as he gasped.

Hearing those impatient voices and the sound of the bones in his neck fatally creaking, Subaru’s arms still did not rise. It was not that he was deprived of strength, but rather that his heart was no longer inspired.

Even though he knew that if he did not do it, he would die.

Even though he knew that if he did not kill, he would be killed.

Beatrice: “Minya!”

Subaru, unable to move, was supplanted by Beatrice, who had leaned in and fired her magic at the enemy.

Covering Subaru, resulted in also covering Beatrice, who was in his arms. Naturally, the magic reached the target from a distance that ought to have been called point-blank range.

However, the enemy endured. —The right arm that had tightened around Subaru’s neck was defended to the death, and even if its torso was crystallized, the enemy at least tried to take him along with them.

Todd: “It’s because you are being strangely merciful.”

Immediately after such nonchalant words were spoken, the head of the enemy, which was trying to kill Subaru with its burning eye, was severed at the neck.

Instead, emerging on the other side of the vanished enemy’s head was a stone-cold-looking Todd.

Subaru: “…”

Todd swung the axe in his hand and decapitated the zombie.

The head that was lopped off by Todd tried to turn its hatred toward him,

Tanza: “How dare you!”

And then Tanza’s diving kick ruthlessly blew its head away. As it was, the Cyclops’ head continued to bounce down the street like a soccer ball.

Then the torso, which was left behind by its head, slowly crumbled, turning entirely into deep purple crystals.

Tanza: “Are you all right, Schwartz-sama!”

Subaru: “…Cough, cough, I, I’m fine. Sorry, thanks for the help.”

Shaking off shards of the enemy’s collapsed torso, Subaru lifted his hand to Tanza, who was running toward him, assuring her that he was unharmed.

Tanza was relieved to hear Subaru’s response, and then Subaru’s face turned into an expression of sudden realization,

Subaru: “Louis! Where’s Louis? She covered me and…”

Idra: “It’s nothing serious, it seems. Although it looks like she got hit by a piece of debris and has a concussion.”

The hasty Subaru received an answer from Idra, who was crouched a short distance away.

At his feet lay Louis, her upper body propped up, blood streaming from her forehead, her head swaying unsteadily.

Subaru: “Her head isn’t looking good…! Beatrice, please!”

Beatrice: “—. Of course, I know, I suppose.”

Subaru: “Please…!”

Subaru took in Louis’s condition and rushed to his feet, pulling

Beatrice's arm. For a moment, there was hesitation in her demeanor, but Subaru did not notice it.

Beatrice was the only one currently present who could use healing magic.

The other user, Rem, was asked to go with the non-combatants to bypass the area of battle toward the inner city in order to avoid an all-out battle against a strong enemy.

The more they were able to pull the strong enemies away from beside the ramparts, the more likely it was that they would be able to get out of the city safely, but this is where the impact of the lack of possible healers came into play.

Subaru: "Louis, you're going to be okay…!"

Subaru crouched down beside Louis with Beatrice as she held her hand over the wound on her forehead; while Beatrice activated the healing magic, Subaru held Louis's hand.

Subaru's tight grip was returned weakly, and Subaru uttered a repeated "I'm sorry…"

All he could do was apologize. For it was completely Subaru's fault.

Todd: "So that girl can use healing magic, too? You've sure got a lot of people with rare powers around."

Todd then called out to Subaru, who was watching over Louis's treatment.

He carried the axe that had decapitated the enemy's head on his shoulder, fixing his gaze on Subaru's slightly tense figure,

Todd: "And yet, if you keep going the way you are, their talent is going to go to waste. You're aware of that, aren't you?"

Subaru: "Todd…"

Todd: "Those who place confidence that they will not die in anything other than their own strengths are weak."

Subaru: "…"

Todd: "This applies not only to the Cyclops we just killed, but to you as well."

The reason why he could not respond to those indifferent words was because they had unmistakably hit the mark.

That moment of weakness that passed through Subaru's mind as he saw his enemy shake off his looming defeat and grasped at victory. It was, as Todd said, the result of being overwhelmed by a thirst for life.

Subaru was not so naive as to dismiss it as a matter of course, but —.

Tanza: "Is it not rude to speak like that?"

Todd: "…"

Tanza: "Schwartz-sama is someone who was of great contribution to the current battle. The way you talk about him, pointing that out, is…"

Todd: "Don't snap at me. I acknowledge his contributions. It's just that I think they're insufficient. That, and the person who was of greatest contribution was either you or the girl that's collapsed over there."

Tanza's cheeks stiffened when Todd stated that, pointing his chin towards the girl.

The girl who had taken a major role against such a strong opponent upon herself, did not seem to care about the praise directed at her, but was rather worried about Subaru, who was hit with those heartless words.

She was a girl who scarcely altered her facial expression, but the feelings she kept hidden inside were rather strong.

Since the Gladiator Island, she had considerably deepened her relationship with Subaru, and so when he was insulted, she understandably displayed an attitude of anger on Subaru's behalf.

The absence of Todd's fiancée, Katya, from this situation also added to the intensity of her tone.

Tanza: "Do you consider yourself to be correct no matter what? In that case…"

Todd: "I said, don't snap at me. What I said is just a fact. That there are monsters out there who are so incredibly strong that they can be sure they won't die, and that there are others who think they won't die for an external reason to that. —Neither you nor I are either of those things."

Tanza: "That is…"

Todd: "If the former is an ally, things go easily, but I wouldn't want the latter to be an ally. If they're an enemy, you'll be able to take advantage of them, like we did just now. Your friend's plan was spot on."

Tanza: "—Hk, you do not…"

Speak for Schwartz-sama; Had she tried to snap at him with such words?

With her face slightly flushed with anger, Tanza tried to snap at Todd. But, quicker than Subaru could stop her, Idra intervened.

While he was supporting Louis's body, he called out her name, "Tanza," Idra: "That's enough. This isn't like you. Your inherent flavor is that you always keep your cool, right?"

Tanza: "…It is just that I am unskilled at managing the fluctuations of my emotions. Moreover, Idra-sama, you should also understand."

Idra: "By understand, you mean…"

Tanza: "After all, Idra-sama, you and I are both connected to Schwartz-sama. Whatever Schwartz-sama is feeling, it should be transmitted to us in no small amount.”

Idra: “…”

Idra frowned and kept his mouth shut at Tanza’s complaint as she kept her back turned. Seeing Idra’s expression directly in front of him, Subaru unconsciously gulped.

Although the Pleiades Battalion was graced by the exceptional strength they received from the effects of Subaru’s Cor Leonis, the members with whom Subaru had a close relationship—Idra and the others who had originated from the same Unit, and Tanza, who had a closer relationship with Subaru than the others, received his deficiencies.

Subaru felt a sense of relief that Tanza and others did not see that as Subaru’s failure or lack of virtue.

On the other hand, he felt sorry and that he was still lacking.

Indeed, it was at the time Subaru had thought that.

Louis: “Aa, uh.”

Suddenly, Louis squeezed Subaru’s hand back and let out a weak voice.

As usual, the details of what she meant, not having formed words, were not known. However, it was clear that she was concerned about Subaru. Even though she was in a situation where she was more injured than he was.

Beatrice: “If she can talk, there’s no need to worry, in fact. If the treatment is over, it would be best to take her outside and have Rem give her a checkup, I suppose.”

Subaru: “I, see. Yeah, that’s right. With great trouble, we’ve cleared the way. If we linger here…”

It’s not unlikely that other zombies will gather, making sure not to get those priorities backwards; it happened at that moment.

—Whoosh, he heard a strange sound, cutting through the wind.

Subaru: “…”

It sounded like the swinging of a rope with something light strapped to it, but the events that occurred immediately after he heard the sound of cutting wind, were not light whatsoever.

Tanza: “Kah”

A short groan spilled out, and Tanza’s body trembled.

Then, as she looked down at her shivering body, her round eyes widened. —Having pierced through her back and abdomen, something akin to a tentacle with a sharp tip protruded.

The tentacle, having pierced Tanza’s small body, extended from the direction of the street that had been destroyed in the aftermath of the battle, a long way from where Subaru and the others were.

Extended like a writhing serpent, the origin of that tentacle had been—

Subaru: “…Huh?”

A grotesque torso growing from the head that had been kicked away, extending tentacles outwards, was the figure of the zombie from just before.

3

Subaru: “…”

A momentary standstill, Subaru’s thoughts were dyed white by the figure that trampled upon his imagination and understanding.

But in order to avoid that moment from becoming fatal, a voice spoke up.

Beatrice: “Subaru!”

Beside him, Beatrice’s face had turned pale as she screamed, bringing Subaru’s attention back to reality.

A sound like blood rushing through his head echoed in Subaru’s mind, and he once again took in the scene before him—a one-eyed zombie standing on the destroyed street, its grotesque appearance caught in his gaze.

Their head had the same black eye with a golden pupil as before.

However, below the neck was not the sturdy body of a warrior, but a monster that could only be described as grotesque, with different thicknesses and lengths of paired left and right arms and legs.

From one of its arms, the monster extended a tentacle—No, that was not quite right. It was not a tentacle, but a finger, and it pierced through Tanza’s body.

Tanza: “—Ugh.”

The moment he saw it, the monster withdrew its long finger that had pierced through Tanza’s body, and her body trembled again.

Her body, which had been pierced through the torso, spurted blood and she collapsed onto her knees with a powerless thud.

Subaru: “Tanza—!!”

Idra: “—Hk! This is bad! Schwartz!”

Immediately after Subaru shouted, Subaru, who had reached out and began to run, was forcefully pushed by Idra’s palm, which had been thrust out from the side.

Subaru’s body easily flew through the air from Idra’s enhanced push. However, through his inverted vision, he quickly realized that Idra’s push was the correct decision.

The position where Subaru had been until just before, the monster’s shriveled fingers struck.

The pavement and buildings along the way were sliced vertically with terrifying sharpness, destroying the city; if it was not for Idra’s push, Subaru's body might have been sliced as well.

As it was, Subaru's body continued to fly through the air with great momentum—

Todd: "Tch! Don't tell me it regenerated from its decapitated head."

Todd grabbed hold of Subaru with his arm, reaching up from below.

Stiffening at the sound of Todd's voice coming from overhead, Subaru was shocked by the meaning of his words—to regenerate from a severed head, "You gotta be kidding," he muttered.

Todd: "Even though we crushed and crystallized its torso, it's still moving! How is this possible?!"

Subaru: "I don't want to admit it, but we have to face the reality that it exists. That eerie appearance of theirs…"

Beatrice: "That's because the formula for regenerating its body is bugged, in fact!"

Beatrice was the one who provided an answer to Todd's question, holding Subaru.

She was wearing a look of frustration on her cute face, staring at the grotesque monster,

Beatrice: "Perhaps it's the result of rejecting death from damage that should have killed it, I suppose!"

Todd: "—. In other words, it clings to its life even more than other zombies… No, since they already died, it might be more appropriate to say that they more stubbornly clinging to death?"

Subaru: "Ugh…! Beatrice! Idra! Hurry and save Tanza…!"

Idra: "I know! I know, but…"

In response to Subaru's desperate plea, Idra gritted his teeth and raised his voice.

He shared the same concern for the injured Tanza. However, if they acted recklessly, they would draw the attention of the monster. It was already evident that the monster's attacks could reach the Pleiades Battalion.

If even Idra fell, their chances of winning would vanish.

That was—

Subaru: "I mean, in the first place…"

Louis had been injured by the fragments, and Tanza also suffered serious injuries that were clearly life-threatening.

The zombie that they thought they had beaten not only was not completely defeated, but they had also transformed into a grotesque creature and stood in their way. This situation seemed as if they had entered a dead-end loop.

Subaru: "—Don't be ridiculous."

Subaru cut off the foolish thought that had briefly crossed his mind.

A dead end of fate, there were loops that could not be resolved no matter what one did. Todd, who carried Subaru, had even brought about such a situation before.

However, Subaru was there. —Moreover, Subaru had been saved.

Even if he had given up on himself, he could not give up on everyone else.

Todd: "—You have a disgusting look in your eyes."

Subaru: "Eh?"

Todd: "That's the look of someone who treats their own life and the lives of others differently."

Subaru switched gears with a loud sound in his mind. Todd muttered those words while looking closely at Subaru's expression, but Subaru could not understand what was going through his mind.

There was no doubt, however, that disgust must have been seeping through.

Todd: “Let’s go.”

After saying that briefly, Todd kicked the ground strongly while holding Subaru.

And then, unbelievably, he turned his back on Tanza, Beatrice, and everyone else and made a beeline for escape.

Subaru: “Wha?! What are you doing! If we separate from everyone…”

Todd: “You’re the one who needs to look closely. That thing’s aim is the two of us, both you and I.”

As he said that, Todd leaned his body and jumped into a side road.

In that moment, Todd’s afterimage was grazed by a finger that seemed to pierce through the pavement, and the smell of burning air tickled Subaru’s nostrils.

For a moment, something flashed before his eyes.

It was that monstrous creature, its single eye glowing ominously, chasing after Subaru and the others.

Todd: “That thing’s target seems to be me, who killed it first, and you, who killed it the second time.”

Subaru: “…hk! So you lured it away from everyone else?”

Todd: “When others are involved, you don’t think straight.”

Todd looked down at Subaru with his green eyes and said that.

Held by him, Subaru was shaken, and as he was stared at by those icy eyes, he felt a fear equal to or greater than the approaching grotesque figure.

Even in this situation, Todd’s gaze towards Subaru was nothing more than appraisal.

Todd: “Can you think of a way to take it down without your partner?”

Subaru: “If there isn’t one?”

Todd: “In that case then, although I hate it, we can do nothing but leave things to chance.”

Subaru understood that Todd did not really mean what he said.

Since they shared the same conditions of being targeted, Todd would use Subaru as a decoy and make a run for it if the situation turned unfavorable for him.

He was not doing it right now because the plan of using Subaru as bait to escape had a low chance of success.

Conversely—

Subaru: “—If there’s a way, you’ll lend me a hand, right?”

Todd: “…”

In response to Subaru’s question, Todd’s expression tightened again.

Todd skillfully used the obstacles to hide from the monster’s line of sight and evade his attacks. Meanwhile Subaru, while being carried by him, kept scanning his surroundings looking for a particular building inside the Imperial Capital.

It was the building that Idra had mentioned as they escaped.

He had come up with a plan besides the one to hit with Minya, but since he had no way to lure the enemy to the building, he had eliminated it as an option—.

Todd: “Can you do it?”

Subaru: “—I’ll do it.”

Todd: “…”

As soon as Subaru answered the question, Todd raised his eyebrows slightly in surprise, and then sneered with a cruel twist at the corners of his mouth.

And then—

Todd: “All right. —I’ll follow your plan.”

4

—As he chased after his fleeing targets, the “Giant Eye” Izmail’s thoughts had shattered to thousands of pieces.

Izmail: “…”

With flickering vision and scattered thoughts, his boorish movements were far from refined.

With limbs of varying lengths scraping against the ground, with instability akin to a newborn beast, as he was crashing into walls and against the ground, he stretched his hands, his fingers, out towards those backs that were growing distant.

The reason for his obsession over those two fleeing enemies, was something Izmail could no longer recall.

Already, with the fact that it had once been Izmail fading into oblivion, the grotesque monster grew new limbs from the cracks that it sustained every time it fell, continuously furthering its repulsiveness.

—That was undoubtedly the obstreperous behavior of the regeneration ability that Beatrice had pointed out.

However, after being resurrected by the will of another, those mutations occurring in Izmail’s body, which had been exceptionally estranged from the concept of death, were something that not even the caster would be able to control.

Achieving its goal, slaughtering the two targets of its obsession, what would become of the monster thereafter?

Izmail: “O̤̓͢O̸̖̗ͦ̿o̶̬͓̽ȍ̷̳̝͂o̸̪̳̟͛͑͡o̷͍̞͊...”

Eerily letting out hollow roars, that was something of no interest whatsoever to this monster.

Izmail: “…”

The larger of his two targets was carrying the smaller one as they fled, and as soon as it seemed like he could seize their backs, they would pull away, and so the situation that forced him to repeat his unsuccessful strikes continued.

However, his opponents could not keep fleeing forever. Through continuing his unshapely sprint, limbs had grown all over his fallen body, to the point that Izmail could no longer fall.

And since he would not fall, it stood to reason that the one with more limbs would run faster.

Therefore, to his targets trying to escape, little by little, little by little by little by little, Izmail shortened the distance, shortening it and shortening it and shortening it—.

Izmail: “B̸̗l̷̦͒u̳͆͝ĕ̸̹!”

With a short roar, Izmail’s finger gouged his fleeing target’s back and shoulders.

Blood spurted, and a heinous smile appeared on Izmail’s face as he heard the screams of his enemy. It felt good. With incredible enjoyment, more and more blood, more and more screams, he wanted to hear.

Recklessly taking a turn onto another path, his opponents, unlike how they had been up to this point, gave off a sense of desperation.

Chased by Izmail, being caught up to by the monster, hating the idea of being torn to shreds, his targets desperately fled. Aiming for their limbs, especially those on their upper bodies, he would wound them.

If he aimed for their legs, his targets would no longer be able to escape. If that happened, then this would come to an end.

If it ended, he would be lonely. If it ended, he would be disappointed.

That was why, forever and ever, in order for it not to end—.

Izmail: “OOOOooooon”

Raising a low war cry that caused the air to tremble, Izmail smashed into buildings and trampled the streets, kicking off the flooded ground in pursuit of his targets.

He closed the distance in an instant; perhaps the stamina of his fleeing enemy had finally been exhausted, and shedding blood, they clicked their tongue as they leapt into a nearby building.

With nowhere to run, they made the foolish choice to dive into a dead end.

Sensing the end of this hunting period, Izmail—No, the monster that had ceased to be Izmail, tore down the closed door and slipped inside.

His limbs had multiplied, his body had swelled, and with a frame incomparably larger than his original body, he became unable to easily open the door and enter the building.

Then, entering the dim building into which his targets had fled, the monster looked around inside.

The sources of light were meager, but even if he had transformed into such a grotesque state, his special eye alone remained unchanged. With a blink, he switched the way he saw the world, and searched for the figures of his hidden prey.

As he searched, the monster realized.

Izmail: “…”

—In the building it had entered, there was so much flour fluttering around that it was enough to stain the monster’s entire body white.

The darkness was not the only reason for his hazy vision, but also because the air inside of the building was filled with scattered flour. Looking around, he saw that the building was lined with shelves, and that each shelf had been lined with sacks filled to the extent of bursting.

Those sacks had been torn open and a large quantity of flour had been scattered throughout the building.

???: “The thing that beats you isn’t gonna be magic or a killer technique.”

At the same time the flour-covered monster had noticed the situation inside of the building, he heard that voice from behind. The monster turned around, and in his field of view, there was a small, bright-red silhouette.

It was one of the fleeing targets—No, at some point, the fleeing target had become just one person. Separated from the larger one, the smaller one that he had lost sight of now stood there.

And then—

???: “Eat this, the soul of science—Dust explosion!!”

Right after that shout, the small figure’s surroundings were also all dyed red in one fell swoop—

—A tremendous explosion blew away the flour mill, and the monster was engulfed by a bright crimson lotus.

5

Idra: “—Schwartz, look, let’s use that flour mill as a landmark. It’s the building with the waterwheel beside it.”

Idra, taking the non-combatants with him and staying vigilant of his surroundings while spurring on the Galewind Horse, was the son of a miller before he had been sent to the Gladiator Island.

Subaru had not known exactly what role a miller played, but he had been told that they used the power of a waterwheel to grind wheat into flour.

In other words—

Subaru: “If we use the ingredients in that mill, we can make a dust explosion.”

A dust explosion was a phenomenon in which flammable powdery materials were scattered in the air, and when kindled, fire would spread in a chain reaction, igniting and exploding all at once.

In addition to the enclosed space of the flour mill, with a large amount of wheat flour fluttering about, if an incendiary material was dropped in with definite vigor—

Subaru: “…I had no idea it would end up being this powerful.”

Leaning his back against the battered wall, Subaru muttered while coughing.

In front of Subaru’s eyes was the flour mill that had been blown to grains by the dust explosion that was triggered, and the charred remains of the monster that had been engulfed in it.

When he and Todd needed to bait and defeat the monster together, the plan that came to Subaru’s mind was to make a dust explosion using the flour mill.

Of course, a dust explosion was not something that was easy to pull off, and he had no confidence that he would be able to successfully lead his opponent there in the first place.

Therefore, it was not just Subaru’s strength that made the plan so successful.

Subaru: “…Are you alive, Todd?”

Blown away by the impact of the explosion, Subaru stood up, blinking his eyes while shaking his head.

After the division of roles, Todd took on the duty of drawing the monster’s attention and running away until the flour mill was ready while Subaru snuck into the mill and spread the dust aptly through the building.

Then, when Todd saw that the time was right, he burst into the mill, and threw an incendiary at the place where he guided the monster. It was also Todd who prepared that incendiary.

Subaru: “Todd, Todd…!”

Todd: “…You don’t have to call out to me so pathetically. I’m still alive.”

Subaru: “—Hk!”

Subaru, who had been calling out to the area around the epicenter of the explosion, evidenced by the many embers that remained, heard a slightly hoarse voice and turned to face in that direction.

Looking over, he spotted where the wall of the mill had blown down onto the destroyed street, and he saw Todd on one knee. When he saw Subaru walking towards him, he spat out the saliva in his mouth and said,

Todd: “You nearly got me killed there, man.”

Subaru: “…You’re making me look like the bad guy. After all, I told you it would be very powerful, yeah?”

Todd: “Occasionally, an accident like this happens, but when I heard the principle behind it, it made sense.”

As expected, Todd was breathing with difficulty as he fell back onto the street. Then, as he looked toward the blown-up mill,

Todd: “What happened to our opponent?”

Subaru: “He was blown away. Completely… Look.”

With that, Subaru pointed to a part of the blown-up monster that was just visible from their position. Then, a part that was seared by the embers crumbled like sand and lost its shape.

Like the dispersal of the other zombies, it was the result of completely crushing its regenerative abilities.

Subaru: “How’re your injuries?”

This time, confirming that they had defeated the formidable zombie, Subaru asked Todd a question.

When they were dividing their jobs, since they could not afford to be caught by the enemy, Todd, who could keep running away for a while, had no choice but to play the role of decoy. However, he had volunteered for the role himself.

It had defied Subaru’s expectations that Todd would absolutely avoid any plan that would endanger his own life.

Todd: “It wouldn’t be a good story if I easily lost my life while being unwilling to suffer fresh wounds. We both just did our required roles. Although…”

Subaru: “Uh…”

Todd: “I was gouged out pretty much everywhere. I feel like I’m missing a lot of blood.”

As he said this, Todd raised a hand, and it was clear that his injury was quite severe.

Although he had no wounds that could be called deep, his shoulders and thighs were soaked with blood, and his face was pale from the amount of blood that he had lost.

If left unchecked, it would undoubtedly endanger his life.

Subaru: “I’ll immediately—”

Go and call Beatrice, Subaru tried to move with such intentions.

With Subaru and Todd’s separation, Beatrice would have surely been left in a panic. But, he was sure that she would prioritize Tanza’s treatment.

Louis and Tanza's safety was also a concern, so they needed to hurry to meet up with Beatrice and the others.

And then—

Todd: "—After all, if we've done this much, Katya won't be able to complain."

Subaru: "Huh?"

Todd: "We talked about this at the mansion, didn't we? Because she seems to think I'm lazy. I helped us escape, defeated a really strong enemy, and even suffered honorable injuries. Don't tell me you're also going to take all the credit for yourself, huh?"

Todd said that with a shrug of his shoulders and a pale face that was drained of blood. For a moment, Subaru was taken aback before letting out a "Hah" and exhaling a weak breath.

Despite being in such a battered state, the one that still weighed on his mind was Katya. Perhaps he had also planned to untie Subaru's mental tension, but either way.

Subaru: "Katya-san truly is important to you, huh."

Todd: "That's a given. She's my fiancée. Katya is my very life."

Todd declared this without any shame.

Upon hearing that response, Subaru took a deep breath, held it momentarily, and then by saying "Alright," he fired himself up.

Even now, he was afraid of Todd. The things that man had done had left deep scars on his heart.

Still, the fact remained that they had cooperated to defeat that monster here. Even to the extent of getting completely battered, Todd had devoted himself to ensuring everyone, including Subaru and his friends, could get out of this alive.

If that was the case, then now it was Subaru's turn.

Subaru: "Wait here… No, someone who heard the explosion might come here. For now, just return with me along the way. Once we find a suitable place, wait for me there."

Todd: "Ahh, I understand. I'm counting on you, so please don't leave me behind."

Subaru: "I wouldn't do that!"

Todd made Subaru think that it may have been possible to finish things without doing that.

However, even if Subaru had been in an hostile position towards Todd, he was unsure of whether he could have left him there on the verge of death.

Subaru: "No, if I overthink it, I'll get stuck in a rut. Anyway—"

Even if he were to lend a shoulder to Todd, their height difference would make it difficult. Subaru looked around the blown-off mill, hoping to find something he could use as a makeshift cane.

Then, he found a support pole for a shelf that had been blown into the midst of the embers—

Subaru: "…"

—At that moment, a hard sound rang out.

Subaru: "…Why."

The moment the hard sound resounded, Subaru cast his eyes down and tightly clenched his fist. As his lips trembled, shoulders trembled in fear, and black eyes trembled, he muttered.

Subaru: "Why."

Todd: "…"

His question receiving no response, Subaru turned around as he exhaled.

Having turned around, before Subaru's eyes was the blade of an axe that had been swung down, stopped just a hair's breadth away from crushing his skull.

—For it was restrained by that which was visible to none but Subaru, the Unseen Hand.

Todd: "Tch, my bad, my bad."

With a small click of his tongue, Todd released the axe from his hand and jumped backwards. His swift movements showing no signs of blood loss or injury, Subaru grit his teeth.

Even that had been an act. The pain from his injuries, the plea for help from Subaru, speaking of his feelings for Katya, which had softened Subaru's heart, all of it was just an act.

Subaru: "WHY…?!"

Three times, Subaru had fired off the same question, glaring at Todd with a face that looked like it was about to cry.

While glaring at him, he felt tears welling up from the overwhelming frustration.

Subaru: "Up until now, you haven't done anything. You haven't killed anyone. I could have even forgiven you!!"

Todd: "Quietly, you've slowly damaged my trust in you."

Listening to Subaru's screams, drawing a knife in place of the axe he had released, Todd readied himself.

That had been the declaration of the irreparable separation between Natsuki Subaru and Todd Fang.

Chapter 6:
Won't Beg for Forgiveness

1

As blood was gushing from their gouged shoulder and thigh, rough breaths filled with a feverish heat and their blood-drained complexion made it evident that the countdown to their death was ticking.

Unless they received treatment immediately, their life would be in danger, as the countdown could not be stopped.

However, if healing magic were to be cast, they would definitely be saved. It was an absolutely treatable injury.

Subaru: "Even so, why…"

Next to the pulverized mill, amidst the lingering smell of burnt wood from the remaining embers, Subaru faced off against an "enemy" in the slowly swelling waterlogged Imperial Capital.

And yet, it was someone who no longer could be called an "enemy", Todd Fang.

—Calling Todd an "enemy" was not something Subaru wanted to do anymore.

Since their very first meeting, Todd continuously subjected him to all sorts of grief. He had been targeted and killed numerous times, with death and fear etched into his memories that fostered a deep-seated grudge.

Each time Subaru had Returned by Death and dealt with Todd's attacks, he ultimately undid each and every tragedy that occurred.

The forest that the People of Shudraq lived in was burned down, leading to their annihilation. In the surprise attack on the Fortress City of Guaral, Flop had been killed numerous times. During the operation to capture the City Hall of Guaral, Subaru had experienced the feeling of walking on a tightrope that was set ablaze.

The pinnacle of it all was the massacre on the Gladiator Island Ginunhive, where Tanza, Idra, Hiain, Weitz, Gustav, Old Man Null, and many other companions on the island were all killed. However, Subaru had even managed to overturn that outcome.

Subaru had no intention of pretending like Todd's actions had never happened.

It was just that through Subaru's struggles of protecting what was dear to him by Returning by Death, these actions by Todd had gradually been erased.

The reason why Subaru regarded Todd as an enemy was something that existed only within Subaru's mind.

And finally, now that an unprecedented disaster had struck the Capital and they were forced to retreat, Todd showed a willingness to cooperate with Subaru and the others to protect his fiancée.

Indeed, without Todd's cooperation, it would have been difficult to find effective countermeasures against the overflow of zombies, and it would have taken numerous retries to achieve an outcome where everyone escaped.

The same was true for the battle with that zombie, the one-eyed warrior.

In order to defeat that twisted enemy who had transformed into a monster, Subaru also required Todd's cooperation. They both knew that without each other, their lives would be at risk.

That was why they needed just one more step.

If only he had taken one more step, Subaru could have walked alongside Todd while bottling up his conflicting emotions.

And yet—

Subaru: “Why…!”

Todd: “Don’t speak so hypocritically. You averted this just now because you also had a slight hunch. It’s not like you reacted to my intent to kill, you were just wary the whole time, right?”

Todd closed his bloodshot right eye as Subaru spoke with a trembling voice.

With a face that seemed like he was dealing with an unreasonable child, Todd’s gaze fell on the axe floating in the air—or that was how it would have appeared to him as the weapon was grabbed by a black hand.

In Subaru’s mind, the axe was synonymous with Todd.

Subaru had experienced being struck in the head with Todd’s axe more than once or twice. Even though he had taken it away from Todd’s hand, just seeing it at the corner of his vision was enough to make Subaru’s teeth grind in unease.

Todd hit the nail on the head. Subaru had been wary of him all along.

So, when Subaru turned his back on the injured Todd, he activated Invisible Providence to protect his head since that would have been the surest way to kill him in case he was targeted.

However, he certainly did not wish for it to happen.

Nothing that occurred should have ever happened.

In that case—

Todd: “My bad, my bad. I fell right for your trap.”

Subaru: “That’s not true…”

Todd: “We’re separated from the others, so right after we took care of the enemy I thought that was my chance but… You’re quite the actor.”

Subaru: “You’re wrong…”

Todd: “Did you plan to blow me up with that explosion earlier? If that was the case, it’s too bad that your aim was off.”

Subaru: “No! I really wanted to cooperate with you…!”

Todd: “—Spare me with your lies.”

Subaru’s throat gulped as Todd’s cold voice hit.

With one eye closed, Todd looked into Subaru’s eyes with a gaze devoid of heat and humidity. His gaze did not contain any hint of evaluating Subaru, which it had just moments ago.

Todd had already finished appraising Subaru, and that was why he was like this now.

Todd: “You should get it deep down as well. We just can’t understand each other.”

Subaru: “…”

Todd: “I outwardly am suspicious of others, and you believe others to a fault. No matter how many words we exchange, our values are different.”

Slowly changing position, Todd cautiously watched Subaru, especially his axe that floated in the air. Subaru also bit his lip and glared at Todd with sorrow over the hovering axe.

They could not understand each other, Todd had said. Subaru continued to wonder if that was really the case.

He wondered if there really was no way to make it work.

Subaru: “If you kill me here, how will you handle the zombies and…”

Todd: “You don’t know when to quit. As long as I get out of the Imperial Capital, it’s all good. Thanks to your help, we were able to get Katya to the city walls. After that, I’m better off without you.”

Subaru: “Why! I have no intention to hurt Katya-san! I didn’t even intend to fight you! And yet!”

Todd: “—But you were willing to choose whether to save Katya or not, right?”

Subaru: “Huh…?”

Todd, standing in front of Subaru, who was raising his voice, said one cold comment.

Subaru’s cheeks hardened as he felt like he had been doused with cold water by Todd’s words.

He had no idea what he had meant.

To begin with, that was at odds with what Subaru was claiming. There was no need to choose as Subaru had no intention of harming Katya in the first place, so such an accusation was misplaced.

And yet, Subaru’s thoughts were frozen.

—Todd did not miss that moment.

Todd: “—I won’t beg for your forgiveness.”

Slipping through the opening of Subaru stumbling over his words, Todd lowered his stance and lunged at him.

The feeling of the shrinking distance between the two sides was so great that every cell in Subaru’s body screamed. Subaru immediately commanded his Unseen Hand, which was extended in the air, to throw the axe he had seized back at Todd.

However—

Subaru: “Kk, gaaahk?!”

Instantly, Subaru’s vision was dyed bright red by a burning sensation that pierced his right thigh.

In Subaru’s right leg, a knife was sticking out of his thigh.

It was in Todd's hand just a moment ago. Right before he leapt, he threw it into Subaru's thigh while Subaru was unable to think, and he unfortunately took the brunt of it.

Then, while he was distracted by the pain, the Unseen Hand that was supposed to have thrown the axe was disrupted—the floating axe was snatched back, and Todd's forward kick smashed into Subaru's chest.

Subaru: "Oof."

Subaru's body fell backward with a cry of pain, unable to put weight on his stabbed leg. He hit the back of his head and his back, and his scattered thoughts became even more fragmented.

His legs, chest, head, back, and then, the blade of the axe falling in front of him—.

Subaru: "Aaaaaa!"

He frantically shouted and forced the black hand to interrupt the axe in the midst of swinging down.

The overused Unseen Hand protruded from Subaru's chest to stop the axe that approached the tip of his nose, and he mobilized his own two hands to keep the trembling blade from falling, resisting the murderous intent with his three arms.

Then Todd, holding the axe, also pushed in with all his might to force down the jostling blade.

His leg that was stabbed hurt. His chest where he was kicked hurt. His back where he was hit hurt. His head hurt as well. If this axe were to go through his face, it would hurt more than all of that and would furthermore hurt to the point of death.

Todd: "You're, too tenacious… hk. Give up and die already…!"

Subaru: "No, way… Absolutely, no way…!"

With his hand on the ridge of the axe, Todd used his full weight to try to kill Subaru.

Subaru resisted with his three arms, including the Unseen Hand, but the child's two hands and Authority, which had little advantage other than being invisible, could not push Todd away.

From the outside, it would appear to be a very absurd and miserable deathmatch.

The battle between Subaru and Todd was crude and unceremonious at such a critical juncture in the battle for the Imperial Capital of Lupugana, where a multitude of soldiers and warriors competed with their well-honed skills and weapons.

They had no trained skills, no special weapons, nor trump cards that could overpower others.

By the standards of the Vollachian Empire, this was a low level battle of life and death—The decisive battle between Natsuki Subaru and Todd Fang, two people who could not understand each other.

Todd: "You're too damn inconsistent! Your eyes say that you're willing to die at any moment, you're willing to put other people's lives on a scale selfishly, but when it comes to this, you're desperate to resist. It's creepy!"

Subaru: "Don't say, something so unreasonable…! Like hell I think I'm ready to die whenever. I've also never put anyone's life, on a scale…! I don't want to die!"

Todd: "Die!"

Subaru: "No!"

Todd's eyes, chilled with a black, murderous intent, were about to freeze Subaru's racing heart. While the grinding struggle of the blade of the axe that was locked between the two continued, their fierce battle could not go on forever.

Because—

Subaru: "Guh, gee…"

Subaru stifled a grunt in the back of his throat as blood trickled from his earlobes.

It was the backlash due to the heavy use of the Authority of the Unseen Hand. This was a screaming warning signal from Subaru's eroding body. However, he had no choice but to rely on it. Otherwise, the falling blade would cleave Subaru's face in two.

Todd: "That strange trick seems to be nearing its limits."

The ghastly look on Subaru's face and the outpouring of blood helped Todd understand the repercussions of using the Unseen Hand. He knew that if he kept on going at this pace, Subaru would reach his limit first.

Whatever it took, before it happened—that was what he thought at that moment.

Both: "—Hk?!"

Subaru and Todd, vying for the deadly axe, were momentarily distracted by a tremendous roar.

It was something far away from the center of the Imperial Capital, far away from Subaru and his companions—the reservoir at the edge of the city, beyond the Crystal Palace, which held back a large amount of water, had reached its limit and was starting to crumble.

With a roar, cracks burst open through the entire retaining wall, and a tremendous amount of water surged into the Imperial Capital. It was like a giant wave was advancing into a world without any oceans and as the surging waves swept through the Imperial Capital, the aftermath reached all the way to Subaru and Todd's deadly exchange.

And then—

Subaru: "Uh, ahhhh—!!"

Todd: "—Hk."

For a brief moment, Todd's attention was diverted to the roaring sound, and Subaru gathered all the strength he could muster.

As his body laid on the ground, forgetting the pain of the knife buried in his leg for the moment, he turned over onto his side and pulled the axe blade with all the might of his Unseen Hand so it struck the ground next to his head.

Even Todd, who had been putting all of his strength into the axe, could not defy such momentum. The axe dropped right next to Subaru's head and Todd fell to the ground with it.

Subaru: "Haa, Haa… phew."

Subaru continued to roll sideways with his momentum to create distance between him and Todd and the axe.

The knife in his leg repeatedly struck the ground and caused him severe pain. He cried as he rolled over, enduring the agony since getting away was more important to him.

Eventually, after what felt like ten or twenty rolls, Subaru's body hit the remnants of a building, forcing him to stop. There, he somehow managed to get up onto his arms, bleeding from his cut forehead—and then he spotted it.

Todd: "…This guy is just utterly infuriating."

Todd rose to his knees, mumbling in anger. As he turned to face the distanced Subaru, he noticed the axe deeply embedded in his left shoulder.

Subaru: "…"

When Subaru had managed to avoid the axe in his desperate attempt, Todd had fallen on top of it.

The blade of the axe was buried deep, splitting his collarbone so far that it looked like it had reached his heart, but Todd, wiping his mouth and spitting out blood, showed none of the weakness of a dying man.

It was like he was almost too tough.

His body had been cut in various places due to his role as a decoy for the zombies, he had received collateral damage from the dust explosion, and to top it all off, he had an axe sticking out of his body, but he did not seem to be concerned about it.

The reason for Todd's nonchalance finally became clear to Subaru.

That was—

Todd: "—You noticed it? My bad, my bad."

There was a clear irritation in Todd's tone that lacked frivolity or leeway.

It was a voice full of excessive anger at himself rather than at his opponent for his own failure of letting something be seen that no one ever was meant to see and that he never wanted to reveal either.

While fully displaying his anger, Todd violently ripped the axe out of his own shoulder. The badly mangled wound spurted blood just once strongly—then stopped bleeding right away.

That recoverability was something that would have evolved in a species in order to prevent negative effects of injuries from being too great while in combat or while hunting. It was the kind of recoverability that Subaru had witnessed several times in this other world.

Although there was no discernible difference from Subaru in terms of appearance, there was definitely different blood flowing in his veins.

He was demi-human. And—

Subaru: "—Are you, half-beastman?"

Todd: "Correct. But by itself not entirely."

In front of the puzzled Subaru, Todd narrowed his eyes and affirmed only half of his suspicions. Todd answered Subaru's question with half an answer.

His cheeks contorted inhumanely, his eyes lit up with blood-colored fury—

Todd: “—I’m a werewolf.”

2

—In this world, there were certain things that were considered abhorrent just by their mere existence.

Half-elves stood out pre-eminently among such abhorred beings, possessing the disadvantage of being tied to the Witch who had once nearly destroyed the world. That reputation was shared across all countries.

Elsewhere, hairless demi-humans were considered to be an unlucky thing in the Kararagi City-States; and, in the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko, the closer the hair and eyes approached to black, the more alienated one would be, as they would be considered to be disliked by the Spirits.

Similarly, within the Vollachian Empire, where various demi-human races coexisted, there were two races whose existence was frowned upon—the molepeople and the wolfpeople.

In ancient times, these two races, the molepeople and the wolfpeople, were said to have been condemned for betraying the most beloved woman in the Vollachian Empire and putting her to death, a crime for which they would never be forgiven.

As a result, the molepeople abandoned their homeland and escaped out of the country by digging into the earth. And, the wolfpeople who did not know how to escape, were hunted down until they were eradicated.

The wrath of this Empire extended to neighboring lands, and if any molepeople or wolfpeople were found in another country, they would be deported across the border to the Empire to be executed. This was the history of the molepeople and wolfpeople—Hunts, as they were commonly called.

In modern times, it was said that the molepeople used their abilities to burrow under the earth to hide from the outside world. As for the surviving wolfpeople, they disguised their origins as dogpeople in order to hide their true identities, and only one person in the world—Halibel, the Admirer, the strongest in the Kararagi City-States, did publicly advocate himself as a wolfperson.

An Empire that relentlessly hunted wolfpeople, whose national crest was ironically a wolf pierced by swords.

The Sword Wolf was the most revered symbol in the Empire, whereas the wolf that ran away for fear of being pierced by a sword was the most despised.

Therefore, in this world, both the existence of wolfpeople and half-beastmen of wolfpeople blood—"werewolves" continued to bear a curse that could never be forgiven.

3

Subaru: "Wear… wulf…"

Subaru was absolutely stunned when Todd declared this, twirling the axe he had pulled from his own shoulder in his hand.

Knowing about the little-known secret of Todd, who was someone who had often clashed with him, and not knowing which emotion to feel, positive or negative, was one thing, but what he felt more than anything else was fear.

The sound of "werewolf" in his ears was a surprise to him. It was an instinctive aversion.

—Subaru had no knowledge of the history of the ostracization of "werewolves" in this world.

He knew nothing of the fact that both wolfpeople and molepeople were abhorred in the Empire, that the reason for this was the betrayal of a woman named Iris, that her true identity was Yorna Mishigure, or that her beloved Emperor was not Vincent Vollachia.

He knew nothing of any of the underlying circumstances.

Even without knowing anything about them, Subaru's soul understood. —How alien the existence of "werewolves" was in this world.

Todd: "That look of surprise is a little different than I expected. You looked surprised that I was half-beastman, but not surprised that I am a werewolf."

Todd looked at the silent Subaru and furrowed his eyebrows with a face that looked as if he was throwing away his expectations.

Todd: "But now we can do this without any strange reservations, right? Werewolves are meant to be hung. It's a curse that runs in their blood. You too—"

Subaru: "Why?"

Todd: "Hmm?"

Subaru: "Why, does it come to this? I have never…"

He could not say that he had never thought about killing Todd.

But this was not because of Todd's blood or his origins, but because his own actions were incompatible with Subaru's, and he had no choice but to clash with him.

And yet, the way Todd spoke now—

Subaru: "Don't act like blood is the reason you became my "enemy"."

Todd: "…"

Subaru: "You ran into me, many times, because it was a problem between you and me! Not because of who you are or because of your blood provoking me!"

Gritting his molars, Subaru pressed his fist into the ground and raised himself up.

The intense pain from the knife in his leg; it raced through his body at great speed, but it also clarified his consciousness and the anger that was seething in his chest.

Subaru: “You’re becoming a werewolf, all on your own…!”

Todd: “Oh, on my own? I won’t listen to this, coming from you…”

Subaru: “Shut the heck up! Why, why are you like this!”

Not a single thing went Subaru’s way, and when Subaru had positive feelings, it would cause negative actions, and when Subaru had positive thoughts, it would cause negative problems.

After helping Katya, saving Rem and Flop, and joining forces to defeat the formidable zombies, he had now tried to kill Subaru, choking on the idea, and to top it all off, he was a werewolf.

Subaru: “Why!”

Todd: “Don’t talk to me about the circumstances of someone’s birth. That’s the way it is. My mother might have slept with a dog. Come to think of it, there was always a big dog living in the back of the house, maybe that was my dad?”

Subaru: “No, I’m not! You’re the one who’s talking about someone’s birth!”

Todd: “…”

Subaru: “I’m not the one who’s looking at you like that… Hk.”

Subaru had no idea what kind of life Todd had as a werewolf.

Nor did he even want to know. If he knew, he would probably search for a reason to forgive Todd. Therefore, he did not want to know. Subaru did not want to forgive Todd for some unavoidable reason.

That was why—

Subaru: “—I’ve made up my mind.”

Subaru muttered, his voice strained, his head jumbled with anger and pain.

Hearing Subaru's muttering, Todd's eyes narrowed. Even without words, the silence prompted him to wonder what he had decided to do.

So prompted, Subaru announced his decision.

Subaru: "I'm not going to kill you. It's not going to go the way you want."

Todd: "…"

At Subaru's quiet declaration, Todd had nothing to say in return.

However, he did not remain silent. —He laughed.

Todd: "Ha, hahaha, ha! Ha! Ha! Ha!"

Ruffling his hair with his hand that was not holding the axe, Todd opened his mouth and laughed. Not caring that his hair and forehead were stained with blood, Todd opened his mouth wide and burst out in laughter.

Then, after laughing for a while, he gently shook his head,

Todd: "You're a monster. Much more so than that zombie."

More clearly than ever, he glared at Subaru with emotion visible in his eyes.

Subaru understood what it was, the emotion that was hidden behind that black murderous intent; this was the first time it was revealed. Many times before, he had seen it in the mirror.

It was fear. —It was the fear of incomprehensible things that brought Death.

Todd: "Lack of self-awareness is a bad trait. You're choosing between lives. Who to save, who to let die, you're deciding as you please. You show favor towards those who butter you up, but don't care about those who don't. Me, I wouldn't hesitate to butter anyone up, but…"

Subaru: "…"

Todd: "How could I go along with someone who decides who lives or dies based on his own fickle whims?"

—That was Todd Fang's ultimatum.

Subaru: "…"

Having spat that out, Todd's bones creaked as his form changed.

The wounds peeking through the tears of his Imperial Soldier's uniform were closed, and his skin was covered with animal hair that matched the color of the hair atop his head. His nose protruded and his mouth grew wide as if it were ripping open, and newly grown white teeth began to sharpen, transforming his appearance into that of a ferocious beast.

A werewolf, he looked just as he had declared.

He stood on two legs, handled his weapon with two arms, and would bite the life out of his opponent with his ferocious fangs. He had transformed into that type of existence—no, his true nature was revealed.

Todd: "Die."

Briefly, Todd stepped toward Subaru once again with that intention in his words.

His step was large, and the speed with which he kicked the ground with his hind legs exploded. His aim was to kill Subaru, the object of his unknown fear, not allowing his opponent who knew his true identity to live.

Subaru's fighting spirit exploded as he realized this.

Subaru: "—Invisible Providence."

Todd, now a werewolf, leapt at Subaru with an axe in his hand.

Before the axe could reach him, Subaru picked up debris with the black arm that extended from his chest, and knocked the axe away to the other side, past Todd's head.

Todd: "—Hk!"

But even if his axe was gone, Todd now had another weapon, his fangs.

Subaru had also used the Unseen Hand to block the axe and could not rely on his Authority to block Todd's fangs.

Instead, Subaru pulled out the knife that was stuck in his leg with his own hand.

Subaru: "Ghi, gaaa!!"

Screaming from the intense pain that he had never gotten used to, Subaru held the knife he had pulled out in both hands, and he clamped it in the gap between Todd's fangs as he bit down on it.

The closing, sharp fangs were stopped by the knife, and Subaru's face was pushed down again as drool spilled from the knife-biting werewolf's mouth, dripping onto his cheeks.

Todd: "—Oh!!"

Subaru: "Aaaaaah!!"

Like that, his fangs pushed forward, closing in on Subaru's neck.

While desperately trying to hold him back, Subaru screamed in pain.

Subaru: "I'm… not going to kill you…!"

He screamed as he was about to be killed, just before the tips of their fangs gouged into his neck.

The one who was about to take a life was being chastised by the one whose life was about to be taken.

Even if he was pushed to the edge and his head was bitten off, even if he lost his life, even if he was sent back to where he was in the middle of the battle.

For reasons unknown to Subaru, Todd felt a sense of grief and resentment for the world.

It was at that moment.

???: “—That’s enough.”

The sound of that voice caught Subaru by surprise, plucking resoundingly at his soul.

Every one of the beast’s breaths, every little rumble of the earth, every bit of ongoing chaos in various parts of the Imperial Capital, it was all a noisy hell where every sound was rampaging around as it pleased.

Even in such a world, nothing could impede that voice.

It was as if the very existence of Natsuki Subaru was made to resonate with that voice.

Todd: “Goh—”

Immediately after, as Todd’s body pressed down on Subaru’s, trying to bring his fangs down to end his life, Todd was blown away by a tremendous impact, slamming him from the side.

Subaru: “…”

In front of him, Todd, who became a werewolf, was propelled into open view, and reflected in Subaru’s eyes were shining and gleaming shards of raining ice. What scattered them was a hammer made out of ice.

With a full-power blow using a sizable ice hammer, Todd was sent flying.

And the one who had swung that ice hammer with both hands, making her long, silver hair dance, was a girl in a white outfit with a stunningly beautiful figure—

Subaru: "—Emilia."

Subaru's mouth unconsciously moved to trace the name that had suddenly passed through his mind.

The girl looked back, her amethyst eyes blinked, and they met Subaru's black ones. Subaru, captivated by the beauty of her eyes, involuntarily gasped.

Emilia: "You there, come here!"

Subaru: "Huh?"

He forgot to breathe, or perhaps he was holding his breath, but it was forcibly interrupted.

White fingers, reaching out with great strength, pulled Subaru's body up into her arms with a strength that one could not have imagined from her appearance. Without hesitation, the girl, Emilia, picked up Subaru who was muddied with blood as she bent her knees with an "Alright,"

Emilia: "Haa!"

With a shout, Emilia jumped and kicked the wall of a nearby building, and leaped up even higher onto the roof of a building. Subaru, wrapped in her embrace, was dumbfounded, but he soon understood.

Below them, the street below the building where Emilia had landed with Subaru in her arms was swept away at a tremendous pace by a muddy stream, engulfing everything in sight.

Emilia: "That was dangerous… You almost got swallowed by the water."

At that overwhelming sight, Emilia patted her chest in relief.

Emilia’s reaction did not convey much urgency or sense of tragedy, although the despairing scene was overwhelming as both the ruins of the grain mill that was blown up by the dust explosion and the street where Todd had dragged the zombie around until the grain mill was prepared were collectively engulfed in the flash flood.

If she had been a little slower, Subaru would have been swallowed by the current, just as Emilia had said. If that had happened, there was no way he could have survived—

Emilia: “—Hk, who was that guy?!”

Todd, who was on the verge of biting Subaru to death, was sent flying by Emilia.

If he had failed to escape, would he have been swallowed by the flash flood as well? If he had been swallowed by the force of the water, there would have been no way for Todd to have survived that strong of water.

Forgetting the pain in his leg, Subaru quickly looked around and searched for Todd in the muddy streets of the Imperial Capital that were swallowed up by the murky water. Subaru did not even know the answer to the question of whether he wanted Todd to be found or not.

Emilia: “Hey, relax! Who are you looking for… Oh! Looking closer, I see that you’re badly hurt! I need to get you treated right away…”

As Subaru looked around frantically, Emilia noticed the wound on Subaru’s leg, and moved to sit him down on the edge of the rooftop,

Emilia: “Hold on! A user of healing magic will be here soon…”

Subaru: “There’s no time for that! Leave me alone, and…”

Emilia: “You’re the one who needs to get on your feet…”

Emilia raised an eyebrow at Subaru as he tried to stand up, brushing off her words of advice. However, her scolding was interrupted before it reached its conclusion.

Her large, amethyst eyes opened wide, and he could see the scene behind him reflected in her beautiful eyes.

As Subaru sat on the edge of the rooftop, the werewolf came out from behind him as it broke the water and opened its gaping mouth to bite Subaru on the nape of the neck.

Subaru: "…"

Either the bite would pull him into the water, or it would mercilessly bite down on his jugular. It was a moment that even Emilia, right in front of him, would not be able to stop in time.

Todd's dogged determination defied even the flash flood and attempted to gnaw away at Subaru's life.

At that moment—

???: "—Don't touch."

The sound of a strong wind rattled as he heard footsteps treading on the rooftop.

Neither the exhausted Subaru, nor the too-distant Emilia, could stop Todd's attack.

Instead, it was a girl with angry, light blue eyes who leapt in.

???: "—Him!!"

At the same time as that yell, an axe was unleashed, swung with all its might.

@ddukae

Subaru had knocked away the axe as the werewolf pounced towards him. Somehow, it landed in the hands of the girl and was sent back to its owner, who was trying to bite Subaru.

Todd: "—Gah."

A second attack pushed through, overlapping with the wound on his left shoulder where the axe had once deeply pierced. The impact threw off the wolfman's momentum, and his huge body was knocked away, thrown into the muddy waters.

With a loud splash and a column of water, this time, the werewolf —Todd Fang sank below the surface.

???: "Haa, haa, haa…"

The girl who had swung the axe, breathing heavily with her shoulders heaving, held Subaru's head to her chest. As she did so, she dropped the axe from her trembling hands into the water and knelt down on the spot.

Then, the girl—Rem's light blue eyes and Subaru's black eyes met.

Rem: "It, seems like you're fine."

Subaru: "I'm not really fine, but…"

Subaru replied in a wavering tone to Rem as he lowered the corners of his eyes with a faint sense of relief.

Then, he looked behind him for Todd, who had been thrown into the water by Rem's blow. —He was nowhere to be found. There was no way he could be found. And even if he was found…

Subaru: "—Hk."

With frustration and bitterness welling up inside him, Subaru put his hand on his chest.

Subaru and Todd could not understand each other in any way.

What Subaru wanted him to understand, and that Todd did not wish to be understood, none of it.

That was what frustrated him. It was so frustrating and disappointing.

With that feeling of helpless frustration—

Emilia: “Rem! Thank goodness. Heal this boy’s wounds! Then, quickly, to Subaru…”

Rem: “Wait a minute! This is the child! This boy is him! This is the one that calls himself Natsuki Subaru…”

Emilia: “Huh! That kid is Subaru?! But he’s so cute…?”

Slowly, little by little, Subaru’s strength slipped away on the edge of the rooftop, and right in front of him, the two women who had helped him—Emilia and Rem were shouting this and that about Subaru.

Then, with those two in front of him, the thought of how long it had been since he last had seen them talking to each other passed through his mind, and faded—.

Subaru: “Todd, you goddamn idiot…”

With this sense of frustration and defeat as the final straw, Subaru’s consciousness abruptly faded.

Chapter 7:
Todd Fang

—Todd Fang was a soldier of the Vollachian Empire, Private First-Class his rank.

He was the fiancé of Katya Aurélie, the younger sister of his colleague, Jamal Aurélie. Starting with when he was dispatched to the Buddheim Jungle in the east of the Empire, by way of the battle with the rebel army in the Fortress City of Guaral, he had currently taken up the official position of subordinate to the Spirit Eater, General First-Class Arakiya.

The siege of the Imperial Capital Lupugana, commenced by rebels who all simultaneously rose in revolt.

In this battle too, he participated as a foot soldier, fighting hard, wielding his weapon as he valiantly fought the rebels in order to protect the citizens of the Imperial Capital—And above all, to protect his fiancée, Katya.

His true identity was that of an existence treated as abhorrent in the Vollachian Empire, that of a werewolf; subject to historic discrimination and persecution, he came to establish his own way of life as a being incompatible with others.

That was unmistakably the werewolf of the Empire known as Todd Fang.

—I have no intention of telling you anything more than that, man.

Chapter 8:
Future Prospects

—When the Cloud Dragon flew into the Imperial Capital, leaving Madelyn behind, Emilia decided to follow Cecilus, who was chasing after it, but she fell behind and chose to hide within the city herself.

Emilia: “Hey, you there! Take this girl and step back! I’ve frozen her limbs so that she won’t struggle, so please handle her gently!”

She did not forget to entrust the frozen Madelyn to the soldier that carefully examined the situation.

Madelyn, who was frozen in ice, showed no signs of waking up, and since her limbs were strongly frozen, there should have been minimal concern about her causing a disturbance in the headquarters.

Emilia: “…It feels like a reaaally unpleasant atmosphere.”

After leaving Madelyn in someone else’s care, Emilia created an ice staircase and climbed over the city walls. She felt a sense of unease from the atmosphere that pervaded the Imperial Capital.

The air itself should not have changed between inside and outside the city walls, but there was certainly a prickling sensation on the skin which threatened to unsettle Emilia’s heart.

However, she could not afford to be defeated by the prickling sensation in her heart and back down.

Emilia: “Mezoreia and Cecilus have both gone towards the castle.”

The battle with the Cloud Dragon Mezoreia would have ended in Emilia’s complete defeat if Cecilus had not intervened. Thanks to Cecilus, Emilia managed to hold on, but she was constantly reflecting on the fact that she had almost been defeated.

Emilia: “Even though I asked everyone to come all the way to Vollachia.”

Of course, everyone was worried about Subaru and Rem, who were sent flying. If she were to say something like that now, no one would blame Emilia alone.

Nevertheless, Emilia had a responsibility as the most important person in the camp.

Emilia had to be aware of Roswaal’s importance as her supporter, as well as another, different kind of importance. She needed to acknowledge the importance of everyone’s efforts in order to fulfill her own wishes.

Therefore—

Emilia: “Therefore—I have to work really hard to fulfill what I said I could do.”

After climbing over the tall city walls, Emilia finally entered the streets of the Imperial Capital and saw the cityscape.

Though quite different from the atmosphere of the Royal Capital of Lugunica, being the capital city of a major nation, the orderly and tidy layout of buildings as well as functional areas could be perceived as the result of well thought out urban planning, even from Emilia’s viewpoint.

The Emperor of the Empire must have had a clear vision for the future and worked hard to make this city and country a better place.

Emilia: “Even if you try so hard, this is how it turns out, huh…”

The impression someone would get from the cityscape of the Imperial Capital and its current condition, however, were strikingly distinct.

Regardless of what intentions the Emperor held when it came to governing the Empire, the answer that a part of the Imperial citizens came up with was this rebellion, and Emilia was on the side supporting it.

While one could say that it happened gradually or as a result of circumstances, Emilia did not side with them thoughtlessly; she listened to them, discussed it with her comrades, and made the decision.

Of course, she did not think it would be best to take the Emperor's life as many traitors wanted, but rather to capture him and negotiate with Abel and others.

However, Emilia's hopes and wishes were betrayed in a way she could never have imagined by the events that occurred in the Imperial Capital.

Emilia: "…What?"

In the far distance, near the magnificent building called the Crystal Palace located at the very back of the Imperial Capital, one could see a gigantic figure colliding with the Cloud Dragon that took off from the battlefield.

The collision between two giant entities further increased the danger of the siege of the Imperial Capital by one or two levels, but there was something else that surprised her even more.

—At the Crystal Palace, where a fierce battle was raging, and all over the Imperial Capital, pale figures attacking the fleeing people were appearing in large numbers.

Emilia: "I don't want to…"

The moment Emilia saw their presence, a chill ran up her spine.

The sensation that Emilia felt was not just a physical disgust, but it was probably her nature as a Spiritual Arts User that caused her to be repulsed by them.

Spirits were natural entities that, desired by the world, emerged into existence.

On the other hand, what caused her to shiver were unnatural entities, impure beings that the world did not recognize, and Emilia intuited that as a Spiritual Arts User.

At the same time, Emilia realized that the internal conflict of the Empire, which had been painful and sad, had transformed into a fierce competition for survival between not just humans, but also non-human entities.

Emilia: "…"

The moment she intuited such, the significance of that battlefield changed within Emilia.

To make the most of what was available, Emilia lifted both arms and created ice stairs haphazardly within range of the star-shaped city walls surrounding the Imperial Capital.

By creating ice stairs wherever she could, Emilia turned the situation of being unable to enter or leave without passing through the city gates into a situation where it was possible to enter or leave from places other than the gates, thereby increasing the escape routes.

Emilia: "Everyone! Run to the wall! You don't have to go to the gate, you can escape from there!"

Calling out in a loud voice, Emilia descended from the city walls into the city.

As soon as she did, a pale being appeared as if growing up from the ground and reached out to Emilia. Emilia mercilessly struck it down with a blow from an ice sword.

Emilia: "I think you guys also have your own goals, but…"

Emilia could not meekly be persuaded to sit down for a dialogue when she was being attacked by others without explanation.

The ones who stood in her way were all dressed in the military uniforms of the Imperial Soldiers, and when they were hit by Emilia's attacks as she broke through them, their bodies shattered and collapsed like pottery. However, their broken bodies immediately began to stick back together, and they returned to their original state, unable to be fully defeated.

Emilia: “If that’s the case, then—.”

Even at a disadvantage, Emilia showed her boldness by not retreating there.

Against an opponent who would get up even if they were crushed, Emilia steered towards icing the opponent with sword blows, rather than smashing them with sword blows.

Emilia: “Teya! Taa! Urya urya urya!”

Against the one, then two, then three, then four “enemies” that rose up, Emilia kicked the walls, the ground, and the streets of the Imperial Capital in all directions as she jumped around and laid waste with her assault.

The “enemies” who were attacked by Emilia and had their crushed parts iced over were, as one would expect, unable to have their wounds repaired to their original state. However, there were also some “enemies” who destroyed the iced parts themselves and overwrote it with regeneration.

Emilia: “Well then, I’ll take that approach away from them!”

If the opponent responded, then Emilia would further surpass their response.

If freezing a part of the body did not work, she assailed the “enemies” by freezing the entire body. Of course, the strength used against one “enemy” would be greater, but there was nothing she could do about that.

Her missing endurance was made up by determination, and Emilia cleared the streets of the whole area.

Emilia: “Go, quickly! If you go now, they won’t get in your way, run, run!”

Emilia guided the people of the Imperial Capital, who were slow to escape, by making the streets she had cleared easy to navigate. In the meantime, she herself ran in the opposite direction of those running toward the city walls and ran full speed on the road deeper into the city.

Emilia: “Someone is committing all this badness…!!”

The “enemies” appearing one after another were caused by an unnatural phenomenon.

Meaning, like magic or curse arts, someone’s will was involved in raising them. If the caster was there, there would basically be no resolution unless they were stopped.

There was a limit to the extent of what Emilia could freeze.

Fortunately, Emilia, who had a freakishly large store of mana, was still able to move, but with fighting Madelyn, Mezoreia’s participation, creating the stairway to the inside and outside of the city walls just a moment ago, and then battling “enemies” that appeared one after another, she was still feeling tired.

Emilia: “Even though being a little bit more energetic than others is supposed to be my strong point… hk.”

As she felt pity for her lack of strength, Emilia ran up the streets of the Imperial Capital.

She could move faster if she aimed straight for the Crystal Palace, but she had to protect the people who were being attacked by “enemies” along the way. This was the limit to her speed as she was helping them.

While she was thinking about this, she saw another group of people struggling to stay out of sight of the “enemy” on the street—

Emilia: “I’ll make a path, right away!”

There were four “enemies” who seemed like they would get in the way of the group going out into the street; the moment they turned their back, Emilia leapt down from the roof of the building, and before they could turn around to see her, her ice-blade flashed—.

Emilia: “…”

The bluish-white, glistening ice sword cleaved the atmosphere, transforming the four “enemies” who were hit by the slash into ice statues.

After making sure her “enemies”, frozen with a look of surprise on their faces, were properly iced, Emilia converted the ice sword in her hand to mana and turned toward the other side of the street.

Emilia: “You’re safe now! If you use the ice as a landmark, then you can make it out of here!”

???: “Th-Thank you very much. You saved us.”

Emilia called out to them, and a voice answered from the other side.

Emilia raised her hand in response to their thanks and thought about resuming going to the center of the city once the people had crossed the road safely.

That was what she had thought, but—

Emilia: “Wow, that’s a lot of children…”

Opening her eyes wide, in Emilia’s field of view a group of nearly twenty people had slipped out from the other side of the street. Moreover, most of them were children about ten years old, all with dark hair.

Emilia blinked her eyes at the very unusual group, as black hair itself was rare.

There were too many kids whose faces did not resemble one another for them all to be of the same family, which made her think that maybe that was not the case.

Then, one of the few adults in the group waved at Emilia,

???: “Hey, hey, you really saved us! At any rate, we’ve got our hands full just trying to run and hide. I was having trouble deciding whether to play the decoy myself or not.”

Emilia: “Is that so? In that case, I’m glad you didn’t. It should be fine from here, so everyone should work together and not be impatient.”

???: “Understood. Miss, I thank you from the bottom of my heart! Well then, Wife-san! Miss Katya!”

Katya: “D-don’t call out so loud… It’ll be bad if those guys show up again…!”

It was a woman at the end of the line who thus answered the call of the blond, young man with a cheerful smile. Emilia was slightly surprised when she saw a small woman riding in a wheelchair.

Emilia: “Besides the one Subaru made, this is the first I’ve seen.”

Wheelchairs were useful for transporting people with impaired legs, but that kind of tool was rarely seen. Emilia also knew about them because she had seen the actual wheelchair that Subaru had gone to the trouble of designing and assembling for the sleeping girl.

Now that Subaru and Rem had been sent flying, that wheelchair too had been left at the Roswaal mansion, but—

Rem: “Katya-san, please don’t be so angry… I understand your unease after being separated from your fiancé.”

Katya: “D-don’t go saying unnecessary stuff! You’ve been worried about those kids this whole time too…! Don’t only talk about me.”

Rem: “That wasn’t my intention.”

Emilia, whose eyes had been fixed on the girl in the wheelchair, was slow to recognize the sight of the girl standing behind her that was pushing the wheelchair.

Holding the handles on the back of the wheelchair and pushing it was a girl with blue hair—

Emilia: “—Rem?”

Rem: “…”

Involuntarily, Emilia's lips uttered that name, and her eyes met with the girl who looked up in surprise.

Emilia stared fixedly at the face of the wide-eyed girl who was looking back at her. It was the first time Emilia had seen her with her eyes open, but she looked exactly like a girl Emilia knew very well.

That, too, was expected, as Emilia had heard that this girl and the girl that she knew were twins. —From none other than Emilia's trustworthy Knight.

Rem: "Do you know me?"

Raising her brow, the girl—Rem looked at Emilia suspiciously.

Emilia gasped at that question from the girl with one hand on her chest. Stuck in the middle of the pair's conversation, the girl in the wheelchair looked back and forth between Emilia and Rem's faces.

And then,

Katya: "A-another one of your acquaintances? Just how many people are looking for you… Wah!"

Emilia: "Rem!"

Leaping over the woman muttering something with a sour look, Emilia closed the distance between them and took Rem's hand.

Rem's eyes widened at her movement, but Emilia was not composed enough to show consideration for her surprise. Still clutching her hand, Emilia teared up at the sight of Rem in front of her.

Emilia: "Awake… Rem's awake! Amazing! This is huge! Quick, I have to let Ram and Subaru know!"

Rem: "W-wait please, just who are you?"

Emilia: "Umm, there was a message from Ram saying to meet up outside, so maybe she's already outside? Geez! Why is Subaru missing at a time like this… Umm, umm…"

Rem: “Please listen to what I’m saying!”

With so many surprising incidents, Emilia’s head was a complete mess, and it was Rem who put the brakes on her thoughts.

She stared angrily at Emilia, who was still clutching her hand,

Rem: “You also called me Rem… Are you someone who knew me from before?”

Emilia: “Ah, no, that’s a bit tough to answer. I don’t remember you from when you were awake, either. So, it’s weird, but it feels like we’re meeting for the first time.”

Rem: “I-I don’t know what you mean…”

Emilia: “Umm, I’m not very good at explaining things, so I’m not sure I’ll be able to get this across properly…”

Emilia felt sorry and thought about what to say to the puzzled Rem.

It was a great feeling to be able to talk to Rem while she was awake, but to Emilia, she was Ram’s younger sister, and a girl who had been asleep for more than a year. She was also someone who had had her Memories from her time awake stolen by the power of the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony.

If not for what Subaru had said and Rem’s resemblance with Ram convincing her that her memories with Rem were truly stolen, Emilia herself would have held no particular feelings.

However, there were some things that could be discerned from Rem’s account and from what Emilia herself knew.

That was—

Emilia: “Rem, is it possible that you don’t remember what happened before you woke up?”

Rem: “…Well, I don’t really know how to feel about there being a before and after I woke up, but yes.”

Emilia: “…So. That’s how it is.”

She had a hope that perhaps when Rem had woken up, she would have the Memories of her time with Emilia and the others, and that she might be able to tell her about their previous relationship.

Unfortunately, that hope was not realized, but still,

Emilia: “But you don’t have to worry about anything. You may be reaaally worried because you don’t understand a lot of things, but I will help you, and Ram and Subaru will both be there for you!”

Rem: “—. What are you, to me?”

Emilia: “If I were to just state our relationship, I would say that we are guest and maid. But I don’t think that’s the only type of relationship I have with Ram, so I guess I want to have more than just that with you as well, Rem.”

Rem: “…”

Emilia: “Lending each other help when we need it, thinking together when we have problems, and facing difficult things side by side… Maybe I can’t explain this kind of relationship very well.”

When asked who she was to Rem, Emilia was unsure.

The reason for that was that her relationship with her had been brought down to zero and had to be reassembled from that point once again. So, she would only be able to convey how she wanted to reassemble it, and her prospects of it.

Emilia: “I want to get along with you, Rem. Let’s do our very best together.”

That was Emilia’s honest belief, and her future prospects.

Rem: “…”

Upon hearing Emilia’s answer, Rem’s eyes widened and her lips opened and closed several times.

However, her thoughts were not so readily put into words, and her lips opened and closed over and over again. Just like that the moment slowly seemed to slip away, but—

Flop: “Wife-san, I have a feeling she’s on your side.”

Rem: “Flop-san…”

Flop: “I’ve met many people as a merchant, but it’s rare to meet someone who is so straightforward. I’m sure she can be trusted.”

It was the blond-haired young man named Flop who said this to the stammering Rem.

At his bright and cheerful affirmation, Rem raised her eyebrows and then turned to look at Emilia again. Emilia met that gaze with pride in her chest.

At Emilia’s attitude, Rem let out a small sigh,

Rem: “…I believe that you are someone who knows me, and that you have no ill will.”

Rem’s hesitation to say so made Emilia’s heart ache for a moment. Emilia’s eyes widened, and Rem’s pale blue eyes narrowed slightly,

Rem: “Um, you mentioned the name “Subaru” earlier…”

Emilia: “Huh? Yeah, I did. Subaru is someone who reaaally worries about you and has always treasured you…”

Rem: “—. If that is true…”

Rem’s eyes lowered at Emilia’s answer, and her gaze glanced toward the end of the alley—the direction from which Rem’s group had just come from. It was not quite a glance into the alley, but more like a glance back along the path they had just taken.

Emilia thought about what it might mean, and leaned forward with a “By any chance,”

Emilia: “Were you with Subaru? Is Subaru okay? He’s not doing anything reckless, right?”

Rem: “So that’s your perception, too. That, that man is often reckless.”

Emilia: “Hmm, yeah. He’s a difficult boy and… Oh! Come to think of it.”

Rem: “What is it?”

Emilia: “My name is Emilia, just Emilia. Since you’ve forgotten, I should probably start by introducing myself.”

Even though Emilia remembered Rem’s name, Rem did not know Emilia’s, and no matter how much time passed, if she did not tell her, Rem would never be able to call her by name.

After hearing Emilia’s name, Rem’s eyes slightly opened in surprise.

Rem: “Emilia-san…”

Emilia: “Uh, yeah. So Rem, about Subaru, is he over there?”

Rem: “They’re over there, I’m pretty sure of it…”

Then, upon hearing Rem speak ambiguously and seeing her expression darken, Emilia raised her eyebrows with a bad feeling.

Looking at the state of the Imperial Capital and the fact that Rem, Flop, the girl in the wheelchair, and the children were the only ones on the move, it was not very Subaru-like for him to be separate from them.

Still, if Subaru was moving separately from Rem and the others—

Emilia: “Well then, he’s being reckless again… I’ve got to get to him quickly!”

Rem: “Since you immediately know what to expect, then he is that kind of person after all…”

Emilia: “Yes, Subaru has a habit of showing off, so I’m always worried about him.”

Rem: “So he is that kind of person after all…”

Rem nodded her head in agreement with Emilia’s assessment of Subaru.

Emilia was happy to exchange words with Rem like this, but the urgency of this situation did not allow for a lengthy chat.

What made that sentiment even more urgent was that—

Katya: “—Hk! Wh-what?! What is that?!”

Suddenly, a rather loud explosion echoed in the distance. The woman in the wheelchair, her shoulders jumping at the sound, looked around restlessly.

While it was hard to make out from her location, Emilia could see a red pillar of fire rising from the far side of the Imperial Capital, followed by a plume of black smoke.

It was a very big explosion.

The atmosphere did not seem troubled, so it did not seem to be an explosion caused by magic. Perhaps it was ignited by Fire Magic Stones or something.

Rem: “Over there…”

Emilia: “By any chance, is that the direction where Subaru is?”

Rem: “—. Yes.”

Looking toward the direction of the explosion, the choked-up Rem nodded to Emilia’s question.

The moment Emilia saw the explosion, she could not help but think that Subaru had something to do with it. She wanted to rush over there right now and join Subaru.

But, it was also a very difficult choice to leave Rem here alone, considering how Ram and Subaru would feel, and Emilia was almost overwhelmed with wanting to do both this and that.

Katya: "…A-are you going toward the explosion? Then, then, take that girl with you. She's useful."

Emilia: "Huh?"

Rem: "Katya-san?"

The confusion in Emilia's mind was brought to a stop by—Katya, the woman in the wheelchair who had been extremely startled by the sound of the explosion.

She timidly looked at Emilia, repeatedly making eye contact and then averting her gaze,

Katya: "Look, she can use magic to heal wounds. If you had that, you'd be okay, even if they were a bit reckless. Besides… It's been on your mind this whole time."

Rem: "…I think it's Katya-san who is concerned about these things."

Katya: "I'm fine! And Todd, you see, that guy, he stubbornly clings to his life. He's bound to come back with a calm and collected look on his face no matter what. But, those kids you know, aren't as tough as Todd."

Rem: "Yes, but…"

Katya's faltering speech, while blunt, was sympathetic toward Rem's feelings. Perhaps it was because that thoughtfulness was conveyed well.

Rem was unable to nod at Katya's words. When Katya saw Rem's reluctance, she raised her voice and said, "Forget it!",

Katya: "From here on, this person… you know, she took care of it already, right? This… What's with you, silver hair and long ears, that's a bad omen, isn't it?"

Emilia: "Oh, I didn't want to bring it up; it might trouble you, so don’t look at me right now.”

If people found out that Emilia was a half-elf, it might scare them away, even in the Empire. So, she hid both of her ears with her hands so that they might forget about it.

Katya looked at Rem again, wondering about Emilia’s reaction,

Katya: “If it’s about me, you worry too much. I’ll let the nice, scraggly guy over there take me. You do what you want to do, and do it properly…”

Rem: “…”

Katya: “A-and while you’re at it, make sure Todd hasn’t screwed things up. That’s all I’m going to say! Come on now, don’t dawdle…”

With that, Katya spun the wheels of her wheelchair and moved away from Rem. Rem let out a small “Ah” at Katya’s decision to go without her, and then cast her eyes down.

However, while she closed her eyes tightly,

Rem: “Flop-san, can I leave Katya-san in your care?”

Flop: “Yeah, she’s in good hands! Let’s just get through this last push with the fake Crown Prince-kuns we have worked so hard together with.”

Rem: “Yes. —Katya-san, thank you very much.”

Rem bowed deeply to Flop, who thumped his chest and was ready to take over. Katya’s cheeks reddened as she turned away with a “Hmph”.

While smiles were exchanged between Rem and Katya, Emilia looked at them fondly.

Emilia: “When we get out of here, please tell me what you have been doing up until today, Rem. I, Ram, Subaru, and everyone else would reaaally like to hear it.”

Rem: “I don’t even think it’s going to be an interesting story… But, I understand.”

When Emilia held out her hand, Rem hesitated slightly before grasping it back.

Emilia smiled at the touch and then gently pulled toward herself. Unexpectedly, Rem’s eyes widened, and she stumbled and fell onto Emilia’s chest.

Then, Emilia picked up Rem’s body and said, “Alright!”,

Emilia: “Sorry. We can’t afford to take our time, so let me carry you so we can go a little faster!”

Rem: “Y-you’re quite strong, aren’t you?”

Emilia: “Yes, I am. —Take care, everyone! We will meet again!”

With Rem in a princess carry, Emilia called out to Katya and Flop and the others around her. Then, with a “Yaa!”, she leapt from that spot and ascended up to the roof of the building.

Flop: “Wife-san! Miss Emilia! Please be careful out there as well!”

Katya: “Y-you better come back to us…”

With those cheers, Emilia looked down at Rem, who was in her arms,

Emilia: “Hold on tight. I’m going to run a little fast!”

Rem: “—. What kind of relationship did you and I have before?”

While tightly clinging, Rem muttered words as if she was wringing them out. At those words, Emilia did not have a clear answer to give, but,

Emilia: “I’d like to know about that as well!”

With that strong declaration, she started running again deep into the Imperial Capital, with Rem in her arms.

Continuing on, Emilia ran, and ran, and ran, with the feeling of Rem’s arms clinging tightly to her, and then—

Emilia: “That’s enough.”

—At that moment, the reunion had been made complete.

Chapter 9:
Deciding to Love

1

—Withdrawal from the Imperial Capital Lupugana.

Although it was judged to be a necessary decision, it was still a major incident in the history of the Empire.

The Imperial Capital, which was under the Emperor's direct supervision, not only allowed the "enemy" to advance to the Crystal Palace, but the Emperor was even forced to abandon both the castle and the city and flee. The decline of his authority was unavoidable.

However—

Goz: "Given that we do not know the intentions of those ominous guys, Your Excellency's judgment would be the best course of action."

Olbart: "Kakakakka! Ain't an Emperor abandonin' the Palace ta flee unheard of? At the very least, I've never heard anythin' like that 'til this age."

Goz: "Do not laugh, General First-Class Olbart! If you think about His Excellency's feelings… If you think about it, I! Damn! Without fail, under His Excellency's command, we will recapture the castle and the Imperial Capital!!"

Ubilk: "Waawaaaa~, are we running away? Your judgment is quiiite~ fast! As for me, I'm not into the mindset of fighting to the last breath, so I think that's the right decision to take."

At that moment, there was no one who opposed Vincent's decision.

This was because Vincent had assigned positions based on practical abilities rather than loyalty, which proved to be worthwhile. Although rebellion was also incited due to differences in opinions, ultimately, his closest and most trusted ally had betrayed him. Therefore, any differences in loyalty were merely a margin of error.

In any case, it was time to begin the retreat.

Vincent: “Olbart Dunkelkenn, buy us some time. If left alone, Moguro Hagane will be defeated quickly. We cannot let the reservoir be destroyed yet.”

Olbart: “Geez, it’s not good ta overwork the elderly. How ‘bout usin’ Goz instead?”

Vincent: “Agility and swiftness are the specialties of a shinobi. Fulfill your duty without indecision.”

Olbart: “…Just warnin’ ya, even I can’t catch him if he focuses on flyin’, y’know?”

Above, Balleroy Temeglyph, who had died, cut through the sky of the Imperial Capital as he flew. After listening to Olbart, who implicitly said that he still had his skills from when he was still alive as the greatest dragon rider from the Vollachian Empire, thus conveying the toughness of their opponent, Vincent, even so, entrusted the task to the monstrous old man.

As Olbart said, while there may have been some differences in aptitude, Goz could still fulfill the same role.

However, when speaking of differences in aptitude, there was a role that Goz must fulfill. This loud and overbearing General was exceptionally trusted by his troops.

Therefore,

Vincent: “Goz Ralfon, make use of your absurd volume. From now on, what we need to retreat from the Imperial Capital is manpower. Gather any scattered troops in the vicinity.”

Goz: “Yes! Leave it to me, Your Excellency! Right away!!”

Without hesitation, Goz nodded and jumped onto a nearby pile of rubble with his bare upper body. There, he took a deep breath and shouted to the world where the thunderous noise of the titanic Moguro's battle echoed.

His incredibly loud voice raised objections to the shaking air of the Imperial Capital.

Goz: "Listen up, Sword Wolves of Vollachia!! These are orders from the top of the Sword Wolves, His Excellency Vincent Vollachia! Follow my voice! Follow it!!"

When Goz's directive was issued, with loudness that sounded like the roar of a magic stone cannon firing, Vincent covered his ears and looked towards Olbart as if testing him. Olbart, who was also covering his ears, shook his head slowly and said,

Olbart: "I can't do somethin' like that. So yer just choosin' the right person for the task, right?"

Leaving only those words behind, Olbart's figure disappeared into the sky, leaving a trail behind him.

The monstrous old man climbed the cracked walls of the Crystal Palace left by the aftermath of the battle, using them as footholds. Halfway, he jumped onto the massive body of Moguro and intervened in the battlefield where the Cloud Dragon and the Magical Sharpshooter were cooperating. The Vicious Old Man demonstrated his power and began to manipulate the situation.

Olbart might have said something about being unable to keep up with his flying opponent, but, with his shinobi's gear and his hidden techniques, he most likely had countless ways to deal with the situation.

If the monstrous old man joined the battle, Moguro's disadvantage would likely be somewhat overturned.

Ubilk: "Your Excellency, is there anything you want uuus~ to do?"

Vincent: "—. How many of you Stargazers are there in the surroundings?"

As Goz was gathering the people, Vincent asked Ubilk, who had nothing else to do. Ubilk responded to Vincent's question with a "Weeell~" and placed the fingers of both of his hands on his cheeks.

Ubilk: "Let's see, within the range where our voices can be heard, there are twenty-seven of uuus~."

Vincent: "More than I expected. Then, go around opening doors in the residences one by one. Tell them that the Emperor and the troops will abandon the Capital, so even if they remain in the city, they will only be throwing away their lives."

Ubilk: "Understood! This is it, this is it! An all-out war… The united effort of the entire Vollachian Empire to resist the Great Disaster, this is what I've wanted to do."

Vincent: "Quickly, get it done."

Vincent let out a sigh as he drove away the excited Ubilk, who could not contain his excitement over being able to achieve his goal as a member of the Stargazers.

Vincent then looked at Berstetz, who remained silent so as not to disturb his thoughts and deliberations.

He was the individual who had joined Chisha Gold, the ringleader of the civil war, and caused chaos in the Empire by driving Vincent from the throne.

Vincent: "You are rather quiet."

Berstetz: "In the present situation, two heads giving commands can only sow seeds of confusion. If, hypothetically, a Sword Wolf were to be born with two heads, it would mean…"

Vincent: "That severing one of the two heads is your duty?"

Berstetz: "If so needed, this old man shall offer you his head with pleasure."

With his hands clasped behind his back, Berstetz calmly stated his resolve.

Although he was far from a man of military prowess, within him burned the pride of an Imperial man. Vincent did not believe that Berstetz had rebelled out of a lust for power, nor did he believe that the words he just uttered were a perfunctory excuse.

Plain and simple, a devout devotion to the Empire was Berstetz's driving force.

For that reason, when he saw a threat to the Empire, he would immediately drop his previous policies and plans, and stand on the same side as Vincent as he was doing now, without hesitation.

Vincent: "When Goz Ralfon, the Stargazer, and the others finish their preparations, we will begin our withdrawal immediately. Berstetz, your opinion. Be brief."

Berstetz: "—With all due respect, Your Excellency, if you are going to withdraw, please follow your own thoughts."

Vincent: "…"

To Vincent, who had asked for a concise opinion, Berstetz responded.

Although his words were enigmatic, Berstetz did not mean to mislead Vincent. After a moment of contemplation, Vincent understood the meaning of those words.

To follow his own thoughts, that was to say, the thoughts of Vincent Vollachia.

—That was the same mindset that Chisha Gold had been following up until now.

Berstetz: "If General Chisha had replaced you knowing the prediction, and cooperated with me to usurp the throne…"

Vincent: "—He must have guessed what the Great Disaster would consist of, and had prepared for it."

Berstetz: "It is as you say. And it is something that only Your Excellency the Emperor could notice, and anyone other than Your Excellency the Emperor would not notice.”

As Berstetz spoke, with one eye closed, Vincent contemplated.

The opinion expressed by the Prime Minister was understandable. —No, it was reasonable. Even without Berstetz’s advice, Vincent would have come to the same conclusion, but this had shortened time.

Chisha staked his life to remain in the form of Vincent on the throne. And what if he had left Vincent with more than just a “future” where he was supposed to have been cut off?

That was—

Goz: “—Your Excellency! The men have all returned, each one of them with the face of a soldier! What do you wish to do?”

The instant Vincent’s thoughts arrived at that conclusion, from a pile of rubble, Goz violently jumped down.

Looking around, one after another, gathering around them were the Imperial Soldiers who came with their equipped swords and armor clanging, a pack of Sword Wolves. In face of this unprecedented situation, they must have been confused and uneasy. However, following the call of the Lion Knight Goz Ralfon, they gathered together, and when they realized that the Vollachian Emperor was waiting for them ahead, they tightened their expressions and standings.

???: “…”

It was the terrible and loathsome way of being of the people of the Empire.

But in order to fight the coming calamity, a Sword Wolf must not forget its hunger. Spending years for that reason, recalling the times past, Vincent looked up at the sky.

To accumulate national strength, and to maintain the discipline and morale of the soldiers, for the sake of leaving behind an Empire that would be able to withstand the calamity. —That plan had gone awry, but there was no intention of leaving as a failure.

Vincent: “Moguro Hagane! Do not let these scoundrels use the Magic Crystal Cannon! As long as you uphold that, I will grant your wish!”

Moguro: “…”

There was no telling whether or not his voice, that he had pushed to his limits, had reached Moguro, who was in the midst of fighting what was the currently strongest creature in the world, a Dragon.

However, that noble Meteor listened to human words attentively. They looked as if they did not have ears, but they were reliable.

Then, having sent out instructions to the assembled Generals, Vincent lowered his gaze and surveyed the faces of the soldiers who had gathered around him.

Then, looking at those Sword Wolves, whose will to fight was undiminished, he continued.

—Chisha Gold, if he had truly embodied Vincent Vollachia,

Vincent: “We are withdrawing from the Imperial Capital! We are heading northwest to the Fortified City of Garkla!”

Then a plan to oppose the Great Disaster, should be in that land, such was what he loudly declared.

2

—Both the Imperial Soldiers and the rebels that were a part of the battlefield had begun to realize that the struggle to set the course of the Vollachian Empire had changed shape.

With the degree of confusion that spread everywhere, and the change in ambience, striking that it was, fully enthralled in battle, the Sword Wolves were therefore aware of such an atmosphere and sensed the interference of unsavory intentions.

Thus, with orders flying around from the commanding officers whose expressions had changed, the mindset of the two sides who were frankly crossing arms was changed by their slightly regained composure and battle intuition.

Due to that, the two sides that were fiercely fighting each other until only a few moments before ceased their hostilities, replaced the title of Imperial Soldier or of rebel with the title “citizen of the Empire”, and joined as a pack of wolves.

At that moment, Vincent Vollachia, at the center of the Imperial Capital, and Serena Dracroy, at the siege surrounding the city, had both just raised their voices as chief commanders.

Simply put, the changes that everyone from the Empire had sensed were circumstances that necessitated immediate action. Completely unrelated to these events, there was still a battlefield burning bright red that could reduce everyone else to ashes.

—The Spirit Eater Arakiya, protecting the first bastion, was being confronted by Priscilla Barielle and Yorna Mishigure, magnificent and bewitching women of strong character.

Yorna: “—Love me.”

As the world was dominated by red, radiant flames, Yorna gallantly kicked the ground with a fire lit in one of her eyes.

The hem of her kimono fluttered glamorously, and when Yorna’s long legs, which made her tall for a woman, touched the ground, the earth rose up the next moment and aided her sprint in both speed and momentum.

This was not the Demon City of Chaosflame, but only the land surrounding the Imperial Capital, the territory of the Emperor of Vollachia.

Long ago, beyond the memories of a past that had become distant for both Yorna Mishigure and Sandra Benedict, she had once desired for the Imperial Capital that seemed so out of her reach.

Though a place she could never reach through her own strength, as she held hands with a man who was so noble and of such different status that she was afraid to whisper that she loved him, there she stood.

Yorna’s Soul Marriage Technique could only be granted to those she loved.

—Then, with love for that man that could never fade, why did Yorna not love the very land that he loved?

Yorna: “—It was also stolen from me.”

The Emperor of Vollachia, who was known as the King of Thorns at the time, and Iris, the girl who had fallen in love.

She sheltered, supported and walked the same path as the Emperor who had been ousted from the throne. Seeing the courage and nobleness of the young girl, many sang the praises of the King of Thorns, wishing blessings upon their future together.

However, due to the molemen who had tricked them by manipulating them with adulation, and the wolfmen who had betrayed them through ambition and arrogance, that future had lost its perfect ending.

The paradise that the King of Thorns was supposed to build, the construction of that promised world was abandoned. The Emperor, who was controlled by delusion, bonded the soul of the girl, who was supposed to disappear, with the blood of the traitors to the soil of the Empire.

Since then, Iris had been reborn again and again, changing her name and appearance.

Loving someone, being loved by someone, she continued to live.

But at the same time, this Vollachian Empire, the Empire’s very land, was the only thing that she could not love. Perhaps she hated it because it was so distant from the dream she had once envisioned.

But, however, such things were trivial compared to what was truly important.

Yorna: "—Love me."

Whether or not she could love; she just decided to love.

It was not an Empire with only happy memories. Happiness and unhappiness had been two sides of the same coin, both when she was Iris and throughout her many lifetimes after she was no longer Iris.

The same was true for Yorna's beloved children in the Demon City—Sometimes she would be choked up with love, and sometimes she would be angry at their pettiness.

Yorna: "—All of it, I am happy with."

Yes, as the resounding "love" resonated within Yorna, the burning earth rejoiced.

The solid ground, which was only supposed to catch her footsteps, gleefully lashed out, and the bouncing earth served as a foothold for Yorna, sending her high into the sky.

Spinning around, Yorna's thick-soled heels fell on Arakiya in mid-air.

Arakiya attempted to let it pass through her by assimilating with the air surrounding her. However, Yorna's kick burst through the brown skin that it should have slipped through.

Arakiya: "—Ah?"

Her kicked shoulder exploded with pain, and Arakiya gave a small gasp at the impossible impact.

Arakiya's body, which had been assimilated with either fire, wind, or shadow exploded from the impact, and her expression, which had rarely displayed such fiery emotion, was colored with pain and surprise.

For Arakiya, who continuously took full advantage of the traits of a Spirit Eater to gain the upper hand in every fight against her enemies, this was truly a bolt out of the blue.

But Yorna was neither surprised nor satisfied with the fact that her kick hit. Using the heel she struck with as a fulcrum, she raised her upper body and swung the kiseru held by her slender fingers, unleashing a follow-up attack.

Arakiya: “Eh, ah, wah.”

There was a sound of something hard hitting her flesh consecutively, and Arakiya’s expression was continuously distorted.

Arakiya’s voice escaped from her throat as if she could not comprehend the sensations she was suffering. It was a manner of rejecting the fact behind it rather than the anguish itself.

“Why”, she asked Yorna. Arakiya’s eyes were widened, even the one that she could no longer see from.

Yorna: “If there is love there, then there’s no meaning in tactless hesitation.”

Arakiya: “Love…?”

Yorna: “You’re the foster sister of my ill-disciplined daughter, are you not?”

Yorna’s answer, with a beaming smile, filled Arakiya’s face with a look of incomprehension.

Even though she had received an answer, her cheeks hardened at the fact she did not understand it. Then, Arakiya freely flew in the sky at high speed to escape, causing cataclysmic waves of natural phenomena.

Yorna, who was in midair, had no way to avoid her onslaught of wood, fire, earth, metal, and water.

Yorna: “As it was the case even before I made peace with the Empire.”

Spinning those words from her loosened lips, Yorna ran through the air on the footholds of earth that rose up one after another.

While resentful in spirit, but also full of joyful emotional attachments, if she decided to love such a Vollachian Empire in its entirety, then the ground itself would respond and continue its ardent support.

Avoiding the rain of fire, the spears of water, the great waves of wind, and the slashes of light at every turn, Yorna once again closed in on Arakiya.

No longer did Arakiya have the advantage of being in the air since the ground reached wherever Yorna stepped, allowing her to reach the same height.

Arakiya: "—Ugh."

She assimilated with the Spirits in the atmosphere and became transparent to enemy attacks.

Since she had become overly accustomed to avoiding this way, Arakiya was slow to react to the approaching danger of Yorna and took a kick directly to her smooth-skinned torso.

The destructive force penetrated the back side of Arakiya's body, causing the gale she had enclosed herself with to shimmer through the world of red-tinted flames.

Arakiya: "—Hk."

Finally, pain was etched on Arakiya's face, overtaking her look of surprise.

This was definitely a sign that Yorna's attack was pushing Arakiya over the edge. Up until now, while the flow of events going in Yorna's favor had been something to be proud of, Yorna was still not optimistic.

That was because—

Arakiya: "You would never… hk!"

With her cheeks contorted in pain and anger, Arakiya grabbed her tree branch and slammed it into Yorna.

It was simply picked up and used as an ordinary item, and yet it had never been broken, even in the midst of these natural disasters. Like a great treasured sword, it showed its true value in the hands of the Spirit Eater.

Yorna caught the swinging branch with her kiseru that she held in her upraised arm. The edge of her mouth quivered slightly as the two glared at each other up close.

Yorna: “Ku…”

The power of the blocked tree branch made Yorna’s throat moan through her kiseru.

Yorna’s Soul Marriage Technique could transfer pain and wounds to her own treasured belongings. Naturally, this was a secret technique that required an appropriate level of attachment and dedication.

However, Yorna’s hairpins, earrings, and obidome, all of which had been donated to her by her beloved residents of the Demon City, were not consumed. In spite of this, Yorna herself was suffering pain.

The answer was simple and clear—love was never a one-way affair.

Yorna: “—Love me.”

Once she had decided to love the Empire in an intermingling of love and hate, as well as discipline Arakiya, with whom she had fallen into a hostile relationship, she needed to aim for compatibility instead of forcing one-sided love on her.

This was the exact opposite of how Yorna Mishigure’s Soul Marriage Technique was originally intended to be used.

3

Priscilla: “…”

In midair, Yorna and Arakiya faced off in a fierce battle.

Priscilla, holding the dazzling Yang Sword in her hand, with flames in one eye proving that she was loved, frowned at the sight of her mother and foster sister clashing without restraint.

As a user of the same Soul Marriage Technique, she understood the reasoning behind Yorna's actions.

However, because they were both users of the Soul Marriage Technique, Priscilla could understand the forbidden nature of what Yorna was doing.

Priscilla: "Focusing only on the strength of the technique, you have no regard for its weaknesses. You too, Dear Mother, are reckless."

Yorna figured out with only a glance how to ignore Arakiya's nature as a Spirit Eater and let her attacks flow through, but it required a precise handling of magic and the resolve to suffer wounds herself.

Both Priscilla and Yorna were no strangers to the Soul Marriage Technique, a secret art that required a talent so rare that it had no historical inheritors, and required a miraculous sense of balance to put it into practice.

In short, Yorna's efforts were a risky gamble that would not only prevent Arakiya's attacks from reaching her, but could even sever her connection with the loved ones who had given her gifts.

Priscilla: "…"

Priscilla was neither foolish nor heartless enough so as to not contemplate why Yorna would take such a risky gamble to face Arakiya and turn her head.

For the sake of Priscilla, Yorna embraced that taboo.

—Priscilla, in order to avoid a situation in which she would have to kill Arakiya.

Priscilla: "With mine Yang Sword, I shan't have to brave the same crisis as Dear Mother."

To cut what one wanted to cut, and to burn what one wanted to burn, was the true essence of the Yang Sword's properties.

When its true value was demonstrated, its white flame could deliver Priscilla's slashes without regard to Arakiya's characteristics, even if Arakiya had all natural phenomena as her ally.

While maintaining the effect of the Soul Marriage Technique, the attacker was able to reach their opponent.

This was exactly what happened when Priscilla and Arakiya met again for the first time in nearly a decade, and under these circumstances, Priscilla could obviously not entertain the notion of doing the same thing.

So, Yorna smacked Priscilla on the head, and fought on the forefront as such.

Priscilla: "To strike mine head like that…"

It was tempting to argue that she was a mother, but that was precisely the case.

Reflecting upon her feelings, she realized that before Yorna had struck her on the head with her kiseru, Priscilla had been uncharacteristically enthusiastic.

Upon arriving at this point, she felt that she had to deal with Arakiya herself.

However—

Priscilla: "—A Spirit Eater's karma, is it?"

It was inevitable that a manufactured species such as Arakiya would be endowed with particularly distorted characteristics.

To wield great power, one must pay the appropriate price. Not to mention Priscilla's Yang Sword or Soul Marriage Technique, the same was true of Arakiya's Spirit Eating powers.

Of course, Priscilla had heard of what kind of being Arakiya was born to be when she accompanied her. She even did her own research. However, she was not careful enough.

The result gave Arakiya, who could not stand without support, a pillar called Priscilla.

Priscilla: “If mine radiant sun were hidden, the world shall be cloaked in darkness.”

For ten years, Arakiya lived in a world cloaked in darkness.

Perhaps it was impossible for someone to fill Priscilla’s role, but would someone not have cast a ray of light upon the shadow?

When she decided that she could not bring Arakiya, she had thought Vincent would, but.

Priscilla: “That would be impossible.”

Furrowing her brow at her own thoughts, Priscilla dismissed the idea.

At the time, when she was still young and bright, Priscilla—Prisca, she was mistaken. She thought she could trust her older brother with such a task, but that was a miscalculation.

As the battle for the Imperial Capital took such a radical turn, and as she learned of the strength of the other Nine Divine Generals, besides Arakiya, gathered by her older brother, Vincent Vollachia, she noticed. She understood.

Vincent had intended to fight a very different and greater thing than a rebellion.

Moreover, he had no intention of surviving at the end of the battle. When the battle was over, to whom would he intend to entrust the throne he had lost?

Arakiya’s loyalty could not change for someone else.

Priscilla: “Nonsense.”

Just about everything was first fabricated as a board atop a desk, and the world was then constructed according to that as reality.

That was Vincent’s strength, but no matter how good his wits were, if his envisioned form of perfection was mistaken, the world as he envisioned it would be undeniably distorted.

He shall one day be rewarded for his lack of awareness. Or maybe he would receive it in this battle, however—.

Priscilla: “We have been apart for ten years. Enough, Elder Brother, you shall distance yourself from your little sister.”

Priscilla strode forward, casting dishonor on her counterpart, who was absent from the scene.

The sky was dyed red with flames, and the earth was raging at the behest of The Flamboyant. It was as if heaven and earth were all refusing the intervention of the sun, Priscilla.

However, to such a presumptuous world, Priscilla Barielle—or rather, the daughter formerly known as Prisca Benedict, had only one thing to say.

Priscilla: “—Everything in this world is made for my convenience.”

4

At that moment, it was wrong to express what Arakiya was feeling as humiliation or shame.

Humiliation means that there must be no name for the feeling of being lowered by regret.

Shame meant that there could be no sense of pride in being disgraced by falling behind.

Arakiya had no attachment to her name or pride of any kind.

The highest-rank of Second, excluding Cecilus, who was considered a completely erroneous presence among the esteemed Imperial Nine Divine Generals. This individual possessed unparalleled qualities known as The Spirit Eater, not only within the Empire, but also throughout the entire world, making her an absolute powerhouse.

Despite being blessed with the status and abilities that many people desperately desired, those things could not become the “pillar” that supported Arakiya as an individual.

Arakiya defined herself as a beast in the wild.

Beasts that lived by hunting other creatures had no pride in their fangs and claws. —No, Arakiya only thought so, but beasts did have their own pride and ways of doing things.

That being the case, Arakiya’s self-perception was far from even that of a beast.

Fire, wind, water, earth, light, shadow, untouchable phenomena.

There was no will that intervened, only the realization of what was desired.

Arakiya wanted to be a phenomenon, neither man nor beast.

She wanted to be a phenomenon that did not feel humiliated or disgraced.

If so—

Arakiya: “I am—”

Arakiya tried to turn into the wind to deal with the barrage of fierce attacks. However, she was unable to handle it completely. The wind was seized, and the blows left a pain and heaviness inside Arakiya.

A cry of anguish escaped, and Arakiya’s face contorted in distress. As a Spirit Eater, she did not often experience pain in battle, but she was by no means immune to it.

Arakiya had already experienced all kinds of pain as a child.

In order to obtain the qualities of a Spirit Eater, the adults around Arakiya tried every conceivable ritual and technique, repeating them over and over again.

Not afraid of pain. She would not cower in remembering the past.

However, the mere fact of being realized was greater than the pain for Arakiya.

Fire would not suffer pain, nor would it die if it was extinguished by water.

Was Arakiya nothing more than fire that would suffer pain and die when extinguished by water?

Arakiya was afraid of denying to herself that she could not be a phenomenon.

Arakiya: “I—”

Yorna: “—Silence, you.”

Driven by frustration, she tried to speak out, but her opponent’s slap landed across her face.

The power of the attack blew Arakiya away from the head up. Though she quickly recovered their original form, the pain remained, as did the damage to Arakiya’s psyche.

It was neither humiliation nor disgrace, but a seeming denial of her existence. As if clinging on for dear life, Arakiya raised the ground, with her palm toward Yorna, who leapt on her.

She did not know what was happening, but both Prisca and Yorna had somehow managed to escape Arakiya’s attacks at some point. As soon as Yorna had sealed her technique, their attacks began to reach Arakiya. At the same time, Arakiya’s attacks also began to reach Yorna.

Arakiya: “—Hk.”

Just one time, one shot, one hit.

Yorna herself had raised the level of her physical abilities, either through an unknown technique or magic. However, if she did not use that technique to escape damage, that meant Arakiya’s attacks would get through.

As long as she was able to hit—

Arakiya: “The Princess and…!”

If she could get rid of that annoying Yorna, she would be left alone with just Prisca and herself.

So long as that happened, surely everything would turn out well.

???: “If there’s something you want, it’s more constructive to go out and get it than to wait, right?”

Yes, Todd had said that, too.

Todd’s words strangely resonated strongly in Arakiya’s mind.

It was not because they conveyed convenient things or based on personal likes or dislikes.

Todd’s words were devoid of any emotion toward Arakiya. That was comforting. Just as one did not love fire or water, Todd had no feelings toward Arakiya.

Being treated so vacuously was Arakiya’s salvation.

That was why—

Arakiya: “…”

The tree branch in her hand burst into flames from tip to tail, turning into black dust.

The branch was just something she had picked up; it had no special power. It was merely a clear indicator that defined where Arakiya intended to direct her power.

The fact that she had burned that wooden stick was a sign that she was unleashing a firepower that did not need to be aimed.

The Spirit Eater, Arakiya, was regarded as one of the Empire’s strongest, and her greatest power was only ever unleashed once during a skirmish with Cecilus Segmunt.

Because the opponent was Cecilus, no damage was done, but Arakiya's outburst left the northern part of the Imperial Capital a burnt wasteland. The Emperor, Vincent, told Arakiya that it would not be tolerated a second time. Later, at Chisha's suggestion, the burnt land was reused as a reservoir, but the blow was powerful enough to redraw the map.

Priscilla: "—Everything in the world is made for my convenience."

—The slash issued by a dignified and confident voice drowned everything out.

A flash of the Yang Sword swallowed the flames that would have scorched the world black.

Prisca leapt to Yorna's side, her long, beautiful hair fluttering in the hot wind as Arakiya was reflected in her eyes, one lit by flames and the other not.

And then—

Priscilla: "Dear Mother."

The moment her lips moved, Yorna, moving from behind Prisca, unleashed a ferocious kick.

Prisca, who aligned her feet with the sole of the unleashed kick, converted the momentum of the kick into her own forward motion, launching herself and approaching Arakiya with a speed that could be mistaken for light.

Prisca then raised the Yang Sword in her hand,

Priscilla: "Arakiya."

With a flash, and a single word, Arakiya's movements were all sealed off.

The reflexive defensive action of Arakiya, an evasion that blended her with the atmosphere, was twisted and crushed by Prisca's flash, mercilessly piercing her entire body.

Arakiya: "…"

Arakiya's consciousness, was cut off.

Ironically, just like when she had turned the northern part of the Imperial Capital into a scorched field, Arakiya's most powerful firepower was unleashed, but right after that, she was struck by Cecilus's flash, and had her consciousness cut off in a similar way.

But, finally, in the end, she heard it.

Priscilla: "My Yang Sword cuts what I want to cut, burns what I want to burn. —And strikes what I want to strike."

As she said this, Prisca had swung the Yang Sword—While Arakiya fell, she had not realized it had not been the sword's blade, but rather the hilt, that had been pointed towards her.

5

—The boy smiled. No matter the time, he was always smiling.

Even if the color of the sky changed, even if these vast lands violently fissured, even if a natural disaster yet unseen by those blue eyes assailed upon the world, and unprecedented events tried to get in his way, he would smile.

Had he gone crazy? Yeah, he was crazy.

Had he been drunk? Yeah, he was drunk.

Not on battle. Not on alcohol. Not on love. Not on blood.

Absolutely, thoroughly, unquestionably, a maniac. Definitely, undoubtedly, unequivocally, a drunkard. That boy continued to smile.

If he did not do so—

Boy: "—Folk who are busy wouldn't perch their eyes on the stage of a boring actor, now would they?"

Even when nothing happens, tears could be spilled. But, was it possible that, even when nothing happens, one could smile?

If so, then smiling would be the beginning of something. Smiling, would signify that a tale was beginning to unfold.

Whether that tale had already begun, or was just beginning from here, he did not know.

That was to say, smiling was proof of one settling their resolve to rise to the stage; such was how the boy defined it.

Therefore—

Boy: “By all means, feel free to smile, how about it? You’ve gone through great trouble to get everything fully prepared up ‘till here. If possible, giving you a big laugh would feel just as good as defeating you!”

???: “…”

Boy: “Oh, is it possible that it’s strange for me to be here? If you perhaps think that one of your allies disobeyed you and spoke about it or something, that would be a needless worry! I don’t really know why, but I just came all the way here on a hunch after all!”

Cheerfully smiling as he clapped his hands, he firmly planted his zori on the ground and stopped putting on airs.

Behind him, the bulwark of the reservoir was fissured, water continuing to gush out, and standing in front of it, blocking the way, the boy—Cecilus Segmunt, saw the figure of an antagonist before his eyes.

That was—

???: “Whatever shall I do with you, how arduous. —Deliberation: Required.”

—With a great number of dead people following behind her, was a Witch of short stature.

Chapter 10:
No One Can Be Alone

1

—Fainting and sleeping, while both were the same disruption of consciousness, how were they different?

Surely, Subaru, who was probably one of the world's leading experts on fainting and loss of consciousness, did not understand how the two were different.

What he could say for sure, was that if both fainting and sleeping had the effect of resting the body, then it seemed to him that fainting had only about half that effect.

It may have been just a matter of feeling, but that was how he felt.

That was definitely because, unlike sleeping, in fainting, the feelings of the people around oneself were too different.

If one had no connection with anyone else, and no one was worried about them, maybe there was no difference between fainting and sleeping.

However—

Subaru: "—Ah."

His eyelids trembled, and a weak sigh leaked from his throat.

With such a frail and helpless gesture, while bringing himself back to reality, Natsuki Subaru slowly awoke from the darkness.

Subaru: "…"

Subaru raised his face from the shore of reality he had pulled himself to, and for a moment, he forgot to catch his breath.

What came into his view was an unfamiliar ceiling—how many times had he woken up in an unknown place like this and used his head to try to find out where he was?

However, what would normally be a solitary task was not so this time.

Beatrice: “…Oh, you finally woke up, I suppose. Subaru is such a hopeless oversleeper, in fact.”

Subaru: “Beatrice…”

A familiar, lovely face filled in Subaru’s view of the unfamiliar ceiling.

Beatrice, with her drooping eyebrows and pale-colored eyes, was looking at Subaru; she was the girl who had probably shared the most waking moments with him.

And, when Beatrice entered Subaru’s field of vision, he realized that his hand, which seemed to be lying in bed, was being held, and his lips loosened.

Subaru: “By some chance, did you hold my hand this whole time?”

Beatrice: “Of course, I suppose. Betty is Subaru’s partner, in fact. Besides, Subaru tends to go everywhere too much on his own, I suppose. If you don’t like being chained up, then holding hands is the most effective way to keep you in check, in fact.”

Subaru: “As expected, you really understand my personality well…”

Subaru could only chuckle at Beatrice’s pouting face, as he could not come up with a retort.

Subaru always found a way to do what needed to be done, even if he was chained up, but it was always heartbreaking to release a hand that had been held.

Subaru was sensitive to pain, so that was the most effective way to keep him from leaving.

Subaru: “Uh, so where are we? Right now, what are we doing…”

Beatrice: "Calm down, Subaru, I suppose. It is understandable that you want to be concerned about a lot of things but… more importantly, first, look around you, in fact."

Subaru: "Around me?"

Beatrice put her finger to her lips and feigned seriousness at Subaru, who wanted to know what was going on.

Subaru, who had been feeling restless and impatient, was stopped in his tracks and made to blink as he followed Beatrice's advice to look around at things other than her and the ceiling.

And then, he sucked in his breath.

—Around himself resting on his bed, he saw many people snoring.

Subaru: "…"

The cabin was not spacious at all. With only the one bed that Subaru was sleeping on, it took up half of the cabin's space. Within that cabin, there were more than ten people packed tightly into it.

In addition, it was an unthinkable assembly.

Subaru: "Tanza and, Garfiel? And, Hiain and the guys and Louis and, even Utakata…"

Beatrice: "That's not all, I suppose. Betty may have won one hand, but the other…"

Being told this, with Subaru not only having his right hand clasped by Betty, he turned towards his left hand and realized it was also being grasped. There they were tightly clutching his hand, sleeping with their upper body stretched out on the bed—

Subaru: "—Petra."

With a large ribbon fastened on her head, even the little girl's sleeping face was adorable.

Generally, how many hardships and rough patches had she overcome in order to hold his hand? He was not familiar with Petra's traveling clothes, which were covered in dirt, filled with the concerns that the little girl had about being stylish.

To be in that condition, it was proof that she had finally managed to arrive here.

Beatrice: "But the hardest thing that Petra had to do, it would have been seizing the chance to hold Subaru's hand, in fact. It was a struggle for everyone, I suppose."

Subaru: "Hey, hey, you're saying everyone wanted to hold my hand while I was sleeping? No matter how you say it, something that stupid is…"

Beatrice: "It is not stupid, in fact."

Subaru almost laughed at this joke, but Beatrice's quiet voice stopped him.

Subaru's eyes opened wide as Beatrice raised her tightly clenched hand and pointed it out to him,

Beatrice: "Everyone, we were all really worried about Subaru, I suppose. If holding Subaru's hand would help you, then even if it's just that, we're ready to do anything, in fact."

Subaru: "…"

Beatrice: "Just a little, Subaru should be more aware of how big his presence is, I suppose. For a long time, that's what Betty has been telling you over and over again, in fact."

Quiet, the tone of her voice sounded somewhat dismayed, but Beatrice's words were filled with far too much compassion.

To say something like that with those eyes and voice, it was impossible for him to disregard it.

Even Subaru did not presume to think he did not have an impact on everyone around him, nor that he should not be held dear, however —

Subaru: "…Just because I shrank, everyone's become too overprotective."

???: "I do not know about that. For me, rather than the overprotectiveness of those around him, should Natsuki-san not first reflect on his shrinkage?"

Subaru: "—!"

Suddenly, Subaru's shoulders jumped at the voice he heard.

The voice unexpectedly jumped in, coming from the entrance of the narrow cabin, and examining the expression of the one who slid the door open, his soft features were ever so great to see, goddamnit.

Subaru: "Otto?!"

Otto: "Yes, it is me, but… please be quiet. Please consider Petra-chan's and Garfiel's feelings."

Subaru: "Their feelings…"

Otto: "It was like this, they are waiting for Natsuki-san to wake up, you know? Of course, it was because they wanted to be the first to speak with the awakened Natsuki-san. But, if they found out that I showed up like this and took that privilege, how much would they resent me?"

Subaru: "Ho, you're such a bad guy."

Otto: "Even with Natsuki-san shrunken like this, you do not seem to talk any less."

Putting his finger to his lips and lowering his voice, the young man that had appeared—Otto looked around the cabin.

He made a troubled expression, the inside of the chamber was so crowded that there was almost nowhere to step. Otto looked annoyed, but somehow managed to find a foothold and walked over to the bed,

Otto: "Beatrice-chan, you too, thank you for taking care of Natsuki-san."

Beatrice: "There's nothing to be tired of, I suppose… More importantly, are you going to inform them, in fact?"

Otto: "Of course, I will make sure to let everyone know that Natsuki-san is awake, but…"

As Beatrice looked at him with a reproachful gaze, Otto spaced out his words while smiling bitterly. As he made those spaced out words sound more important, he looked at Subaru lying on the bed,

Otto: "Although it pains me, since I was witness to Natsuki-san's inopportune waking, before things become too noisy, I would like to raise a personal complaint with you."

Subaru: "Th-the nerve of you to act so nice…"

Otto: "Yes, I am a merchant after all."

Touching his hatless head, Otto laughed with a face free of offense.

That smile, it gave Subaru the same chills that the gaze of his enemies did, or the same chill he felt when he incurred Tanza's displeasure; while experiencing this sensation, Subaru took a deep breath.

Admittedly, partially because he was sent to the Vollachian Empire, Subaru believed that he was not as much at fault as he was for the ensuing troubles; however, it was true that he had made people worry.

No matter what kind of complaints he was hit with, he would take them in stride.

Subaru: "Okay, give me everything you've got. But, my mentality has also been suitably trained here. Don't think that you can destroy me with half-baked words."

Otto: "What kind of boast is that? Well, I do not intend on giving you a long lecture. Since I am not the only one who wants to say something to you, I will keep it short. —Natsuki-san."

Subaru: “Yeah?”

Otto: “—I am glad that you were able to safely reunite with us. Please, do not worry too much.”

Subaru: “…”

A hand reached out, plopping itself onto Subaru’s small shoulder.

Feeling Otto’s fingers, which were stronger than what the impression his features gave, they trembled slightly on top of his shoulder, and then Subaru’s throat choked up.

Firmly, Otto knitted his brows, his nose wrinkling as he let those words out; as he had always been one to look at himself from an unbiased view, Otto’s uncontainable emotions became loosened.

Subaru: “Gu…”

His trained mental resolve, and his readiness to accept any blow, all of it was for naught.

Those words that Otto had let out were a killing blow, mercilessly destroying Natsuki Subaru’s barriers, driving a fatal blow into the bare soul underneath.

In short, it was foul play.

Otto: “In any case, this works best on Natsuki-san, right?”

Subaru: “You, you, bastard… hk.”

In front of Subaru, whose whole body was trembling, tightening his expression which had just been on the verge of crumbling, a daring, calm, and implicative smile emerged on Otto’s face.

Having been completely led by the nose, Subaru could not help his face turning red from the sense of defeat. —No, there were other methods. As payback to Otto for being outwitted, though it was far from being a win, it was at least a way to not let him escape with victory.

That was—

Subaru: “Aaah! I’ve lost, I’ve lost, it’s a complete loss, Otto you bastard!!”

Otto: “Eh?!”

While his face was red, Subaru had a wicked smile as he declared his defeat in a loud voice. The second he heard this, Otto’s face turned pale and he shouted.

At that, with Subaru and Otto’s back-and-forth argument echoing within the confines of the cabin, naturally, one-by-one his sleeping companions heard them—No, rather the sleeping lion pack began to wake up.

And like that, with joy and reproach, there was an eruption of feelings of joy and sorrow.

Inside of that noisy cabin, beside the troubled Subaru and Otto, Beatrice watched it from beginning to end with her chin resting on her hands,

Beatrice: “Good grief… they all act far too much like children, I suppose.”

Saying this, with the attitude of a lone bystander, she looked over this scene with affection.

SETOWI

2

—The simultaneous evacuation of the citizens from the Imperial Capital Lupugana.

That was a matter of great importance that had begun while Subaru was unconscious, and among the large group engaged in that, Subaru had woken up in the cabin of a dragon carriage allocated to the transportation of important individuals.

Pulled by a great number of ground dragons, it was a mobile sleeping quarter, an extraordinary product that could be used for both evacuation and recuperation. With such august treatment, it seemed Subaru had been taken out from the Imperial Capital.

Hiain: “Bro! I’m real glad y’er safe! When the power left my body along the way, I got real damn worried! Not knowin’ what might’ve happen’d to ya!”

Weitz: “I wouldn’t care if the bearded bastard died, but if we lose you, the Battalion’d be finished… If you’re on the verge of death, use me or anyone else as a shield…”

Idra: “Weitz’s phrasing bothers me, but I agree. Schwartz, I am truly glad that you’ve returned. Both as a member of the Battalion, and as my own individual.”

Those were the reactions of the ones firmly within the group that had been waiting for Subaru to wake up, of the three in his Unit who had accompanied him since the Gladiator Island, comprised of Hiain, Weitz, and Idra.

Regardless of Idra, who had gone with him during the battle, Hiain and Weitz must have been especially worried, having gone off separately.

That was not the only reason that he had to apologize to those three.

Subaru: “My bad. Because I fainted, everyone’s strengthening must have come undone…”

Weitz: “Don’t worry ‘bout that… Luckily, that only happened when we were already startin’ to evacuate.”

Hiain: “That’s right! The only one who nearly died from that bein’ cut off was this skull-lookin’ bastard, he was in the middle of supportin’ a crumblin’ pillar. If the Governor hadn’t been there, he woulda been crushed to death…”

Weitz: “Didn’t I tell ya not to speak of that…!”

As usual, Weitz’s thoughtful concern for Subaru was ruined by Hiain’s uncalled for comment. Seeing the scenery of the quarreling duo, Idra shrugged his shoulders.

In the midst of the Imperial Capital, with Cor Leonis having come undone, he, who should have been exposed to danger as a result,

Idra: “As Weitz said, don’t sweat it, Schwartz. From the moment that we decided to follow you, whatever would happen beyond that point would be our own responsibility.”

Subaru: “But…”

Idra: “And even if I say that, I know that you’re the one who’s gonna be worried. —I’ll leave the rest of the discussion to those girls who seem to have known you longer than we have.”

As always, Idra was good at wrapping up the conversation rationally.

Thanks to this, Subaru, who could only make emotional objections, was silenced. Idra left the cabin with Hiain and Weitz, who were still grappling with each other.

Like that, as the three of them were leaving, a small figure was about to follow them,

Subaru: “Tanza.”

Tanza: “…I sincerely apologize for not being of use at such a crucial time. I am truly glad that you have been able to return, Schwartz-sama."

Despondently hanging her head, Tanza responded in a formal tone.

Thinking back to the time when they were separated in the Imperial Capital, he could understand Tanza's regrets about her own lack of strength. However, that did not seem to be the only reason for her dispirited expression.

Subaru: "What's wrong? If something happened…"

Tanza: "—. No, it is not something that I should talk to Schwartz-sama about right now. Please leisurely rest your body, and spend time with everyone."

After a moment's hesitation, Tanza also exited the cabin without saying anything more.

He tried to reach out towards her frail back, but both of Subaru's hands were occupied. Still, Subaru's heart appealed to him, not wanting to leave Tanza alone, having made such a face.

Within his heart, he firmly decided that he would definitely hear the reason for that face later.

Then—

???: "—Subaru."

After seeing off those who had left the cabin earlier, what formulated in this moment, as if it had been eagerly waiting to call out to him, was a lively voice in the tone of silver bells, tenderly striking upon his eardrums.

Subaru: "…"

A beat, was the time he needed to both react to that voice, and turn towards it.

The uneasiness of having caused her to worry, or the embarrassment of not being able to face her, or some petty pride; such things had not been the reason.

It was simply that Subaru genuinely needed to mentally prepare himself.

After all—

Subaru: “Emilia.”

Because, just by calling the other person’s name out, Subaru’s heart experienced a sweet, tingling sensation.

At Subaru’s call, filled with nervousness, the woman herself—Emilia smiled softly,

Emilia: “Mhm, I’m glad to finally see you again… Even so, even when you’re this far away, you’ve made lots of friends, Subaru. I’m reaaally relieved.”

Subaru: “Friends…”

Emilia: “Yes. After all, Subaru, everyone was reaaally worried about you, and never left your side.”

At Emilia’s words, Subaru lowered his head, remembering the state of the cabin up until a moment ago.

No matter how strong Subaru’s feelings about causing them worry had been, whenever he was told it was a bad habit of his, he felt bad about it, but.

Subaru: “I’m, such a lucky guy.”

Emilia: “That’s definitely true. But I want Subaru to be more and more happy, so this tiny amount is not enough at all.”

Subaru: “Even after all the good you’ve done for me?”

Emilia: “So, when Subaru does something for me, does he ever feel satisfied that it’s enough?”

Emilia tilted her head, and while she felt her beautiful, silver hair cascade down her slender shoulders, Subaru was at a loss for words, completely cornered.

She was right. When he wanted to do something for the people he loved, he never thought if what he was doing was enough, but rather he thought if there was more that he could do.

Seeing Subaru's reaction, Emilia smiled and said "Hehe",

Emilia: "What do you think? I'm not wrong, am I? My Knight."

Subaru: "…Yup. You've grown so much while I've been away, and I'm so proud of you, but I've missed you, Emilia!"

Emilia: "Emilia?"

Subaru: "…No, it's, Emilia-tan."

When asked again, Subaru recalled that long-forgotten name he called her.

Yes, that was what Subaru called the girl who was so important, so precious, so dear, and that he got his heart all messed up when he thought about her.

As soon as he called Emilia that name, a feeling of harmony quickly overcame him.

While Subaru was reflecting on that feeling,

Petra: "Emilia-neesama! It's about time we had a chat with Subaru!"

The long-awaited, tender mood between Subaru and Emila was interrupted by Petra, a young girl who asserted her presence by raising her small hand.

Woken up after the earlier commotion, and afterwards not able to calmly celebrate the reunion due to the chaos that had followed, Petra hungered for the chance to reunite while anger burned in her round eyes.

Petra: "We haven't been able to talk to Subaru properly yet. —

Except for Otto-san, who sneaked in."

Otto: "Ugh. That is not, I was not trying to sneak in…"

Garfiel: "Oh? Oh? Excuses, Ottobro. What kind of excuses is he gonna tell, ain't we all a lil' excited to hear? Ya sneaking in here hurt even my amazin' self, y'know…"

Otto: "Even Garfiel is snapping at me?!"

Garfiel dropped his shoulders in disappointment and made a sad gesture. When he stacked his attack on top of Petra's, Otto opened his eyes wide and shouted.

Then Beatrice followed up with, "That's right, in fact," as if to add insult to injury.

Beatrice: "Betty heard, I suppose. Otto said it himself, that he secretly came to talk to Subaru so that Petra and the others wouldn't find out about it, in fact."

Emilia: "Huh, really? Otto-kun, I understand how you feel, but we were all worried about Subaru, so you shouldn't cheat."

Otto: "I have no allies! Rather than incurring a terrible loss, this hurts far worse!"

Being called out by the backstabbing Beatrice and by Emilia, who were reacting to it honestly, Otto clutched his chest and was vigorously punished for his deeds.

While laughing at such a lively group of people,

Frederica: "Despite Otto-sama's bad habits, I am beyond glad that we were able to meet, since Emilia-sama, Beatrice-sama, and, of course, Petra were not in the least bit happy."

Frederica said this softly.

She, like Petra, was also dressed in a traveling outfit instead of a maid's uniform, which was a rare sight. However, Subaru was immediately surprised to see a sight even more rare than that.

The smiling Frederica had a tear well up in the corner of her eye, and it almost started to run down her cheek.

Petra: “F-Frederica-neesama, you’re crying!”

Frederica: “Huh? Ah, m-my apologies. I was just, you know, completely relieved… How indecent of me.”

Subaru: “…No, it’s not indecent or anything at all. That’s how worried you were about me.”

Frederica’s tears surprised him, but more than that, he was grateful.

As Frederica said, they had rushed to find the missing Subaru and the others, and the amount of trouble they had to overcome to get here was immeasurable.

They were in an Empire in a state of civil war, with borders that should not have been easy to cross.

They must have overcome a number of obstacles that could not have been overcome by proper means in order to reach Subaru.

Subaru: “Really, thank you, everyone.”

Garfiel: “Heh heh, it’s only natural that our amazin’ selves would come here. Without the Captain, we can’t get our amazin’ selves together in any way, shape, or form.”

Petra: “Yeah, Garf-san is right… I am surprised that you became so tiny, though.”

Garfiel rubbed the bridge of his nose, and Petra, smiling and nodding, chimed in at the end.

Certainly, this could not be said to be over just with all of them coming together—at least not with Subaru’s current condition. As expected, they did not intend to return to the Kingdom of Lugunica with Subaru in a shrunken state.

Natsuki Subaru would not be able to stand alongside Emilia unless he returned to his original age of eighteen.

Subaru: “Well, Beatrice… ahem! Beako, you don’t mind me lining up next to you?”

Beatrice: “Nothing wrong with being at the same eye level, I suppose. But Betty misses being up in Subaru’s arms already, in fact. That is why a big Subaru is preferable, I suppose.”

Petra: “Me too! I also think the big Subaru is better. I do think the current Subaru is nice and cute, but…”

Emilia: “Oh, you think he’s cute, too. I’m glad I’m not the only one who thought so.”

Emilia’s slightly off-topic response to the conversation caused a relaxed atmosphere to spread throughout the cabin.

Subaru could feel the nostalgia of the long-separated Emilia camp in this gentle, indescribable atmosphere, and his soul found a sense of satisfaction.

Having been thrown into the Vollachian Empire, he had spent time with the Shudraqian People, Flop, Medium, and later with members from Gladiator Island, all of whom had formed the Pleiades Battalion. However, the atmosphere of this reunion was different from any of them.

While everyone he had met was precious, the preciousness of this space, which had been kept away from him for so long, was something he took the time to appreciate.

Subaru: “But, as expected, guess Roswaal or Ram couldn’t come. No, it’s already pretty bad just to have Emilia-tan here.”

Subaru gave a wry smile when he mentioned the faces that he did not see in the cabin.

Meili was also not there, but it would be difficult for her to cross the border in order to accompany Emilia and the others due to her situation. In all likelyhood, she stayed back at the mansion with Ram and—.

Emilia: “Huh? No, you’re wrong there. Ram and Roswaal are here with us. They were reaaally worried about you, Subaru."

Subaru: "—What?"

Subaru's thoughts were shattered by Emilia's answer, who had a strange look on her face.

Subaru's eyes widened in shock as Emilia's beautiful voice resonated in his head. Saying Ram and Roswaal had come with them.

The presence of Roswaal was a tremendous surprise, but that was put aside for now.

Because, the problem was not Roswaal,

Subaru: "Ram, she's here, too?"

Petra: "She's here. Ram-neesama was also worried about you, Subaru… Ah! Just don't mention that to her, okay?"

Subaru: "I won't. I won't. I won't mention it, but that's not what I'm talking about…"

Shaking his head, Petra's words made Subaru's brain fire off.

What he was talking about, was that Ram being here meant—

Subaru: "Did, she already meet with Rem?"

Emilia: "Ah…"

As soon as Subaru asked the question, everyone's expression except for Subaru's suddenly became tense.

That reaction was what Subaru had feared the most.

Emilia and the others' reactions, which were of the "I forgot to tell Subaru" variety, told him that it had happened while Subaru was sleeping.

—The reunion of the separated sisters, Ram and Rem.

Subaru: “Waaah–!! I so wanted to be theeeere!!”

Emilia: “S-Sorry, Subaru, but we wanted them to see each other as soon as possible…!”

Subaru: “I know, I know, I’m such a damn idiot—Hk!”

Covering his face with his hands, Subaru exclaimed about his own stupidity for having missed the historic moment.

Emilia and others tried hard to comfort Subaru, but this was no one’s fault, and Subaru’s wounds would remain unhealed.

If pressed to say, it was Subaru who was the most at fault for having slept during such a critical moment.

Even so—

Subaru: “H-How was it? Both of their reactions…”

Emilia: “Um, well, they were a little hesitant at first… But it felt reaaally special! I even cried a little, too!”

Subaru: “Graaah!”

Beatrice: “Emilia! You need to elaborate more, in fact! Subaru is pitiable, I suppose!”

Emilia: “Huh, right! I’m sorry, I’m sorry!”

Even so, the frustration did not abate in the slightest, so Subaru’s frustration stayed in full.

As Subaru shed tears of frustration, he realized once again how much he hated the fact that when he was about to really cry, this childish body could not hold back the tears.

3

Rem: “…”

Right in front of her, from behind the door she was about to reach for, she heard a powerful, loud shout.

The bellowing voice and its contents stopped Rem from moving, and her mind was racked with hesitation, her shapely eyebrows furrowing together, wondering what to do.

Louis: “Uu, au?”

Rem: “…Um, I’m sorry, Louis-chan, I know you want to see him.”

Right beside Rem, Louis, hugging her around the waist, looked up at her curiously.

When the unconscious Subaru woke up, Louis wanted to talk to Subaru herself, but she held back and rushed to Rem’s side.

Then, she took her by the hand and led her to Subaru’s sleeping quarters—

Rem: “…”

The voices coming from inside the cabin belonged to Subaru and his companions.

Putting it like that, it may have sounded like an outsider’s matter, but it seemed that these friends were also closely related to Rem. —Like with Subaru, Rem did not really feel a connection with them.

Rem: “They’re not bad people at all, I know that.”

The group, led by Emilia, who was the first person she had met among them, had come in search of both Rem and Subaru, and they were clearly considerate of their companions, full of action, and above all, good people.

According to what she had heard, they came from the Kingdom neighboring the Empire, even though they were forbidden to cross over, and even participated in a civil war with which they had no connection.

All of this was done to save Subaru—or rather, Subaru and Rem, who had been caught up in the Empire’s rebellion.

In the same way that Rem could also not escape from this struggle in the Empire—.

???: "—You can hear Barusu's rapacious voice."

Rem gasped slightly as suddenly a voice called to her back while she was thinking.

Instead of Rem, it was Louis, who was hugging her around the waist, who turned around to look at the other party. They looked back at Louis, who was looking at her, and let out a small sigh,

???: "Stop glaring at Ram with such an accusatory look. This was a tough love lesson for Barusu… No, there's no love, so it's just tough. Yes, a purely tough lesson."

Rem: "…Does that mean you don't like him?"

???: "There's no hate, just many opportunities for disdain."

With that said, Rem also turned to the other party, who was slowly walking toward her, their shoes making a sound.

She took a beat to turn around to look in that direction, as she needed to muster up the courage to look at the other person's face directly.

After all, that face was familiar to Rem's, even though she had no memory of it.

It was—

Rem: "…Ram-san."

Ram: "What a cold way to address Ram, considering she's ready to be called older sister."

Rem: "For me, everything was so sudden that…"

The woman who stood in front of her, clutching her elbows and puffing out her chest—Ram, that was how she referred to herself, and that was how she was referred to by those around her, bore a lot of resemblance to Rem herself.

The differences were the color of her hair and eyes, and the overwhelming pressure of confidence overflowing within them.

It seemed that she was Rem's older sister, who had no memory of her.

To be honest, there was nothing to deny when one compared their facial features. The name of her older sister, which Subaru had told her many times before, must have been "Ram".

Above all else, what undeniably predominated Rem's mind was—

Ram: "Whatever you think, Rem's heart will feel it, because Ram and Rem are sisters… Synesthesia doesn't lie."

Rem: "Synesthesia…"

Ram: "A sort of connection of the soul between twins. All along, Ram has felt Rem's presence… Is Rem different?"

Rem: "…"

Rem closed her lips at Ram, who narrowed her light-crimson eyes as she asked directly.

If asked whether Rem was different or not, then no, not at all. While she did not understand well that thing called Synesthesia, inside Rem there was a very, very strong sensation that felt different.

That was an overwhelming feeling of safety towards Ram, whom she was supposedly meeting for the first time.

Rem: "…But I'm afraid."

Ram: "Afraid?"

Rem: "To have such feelings about you, with whom I have only exchanged a few words in a short time."

For Rem, who had lost her memory, Subaru and Louis were the only two people who were present at the moment her present self began. Due to the circumstances, she pushed Subaru away and kept Louis by her side at first.

After that, Rem got to know the Shudraqian people, Flop and Medium, Priscilla and Katya, and in Rem's own way, she established various relationships with them.

Even then, Ram's very existence overtook them all at once, and tried to stand at the top.

Rem: "That is what I'm afraid of…"

This inexpressible sense of security, it was the footsteps of the past approaching.

It was not that she did not wish to regain her lost memories. But, it also seemed as though many of Rem's problems would surely come back to her with the return of them.

But at the same time, she feared that when those footsteps caught up with her, everything would change.

If the way one saw, the way one felt, the way one thought, if everything changed.

Yes, firmly, intensely, Rem shut her eyes and clutched her chest.

And there—

Ram: "Yes. —What a relief."

Rem: "Huh?"

An unexpected voice was heard, and Rem opened her tightly shut eyelids to look up.

Ram, who was clutching her elbows in front of Rem, stared at her, lowering the corners of her eyes slightly, wondering what she had just said,

Ram: "Ram is thinking the same as Rem. Afraid."

Rem: “Afraid, you mean…”

Ram: “What if Rem naturally accepted Synesthesia and jumped into Ram’s chest as a given? —Yes, Ram was afraid.”

Rem: “…”

As she had a tender expression, but spoke about fear, Rem began to understand less how Ram in front of her felt. —No, that was not it.

Understanding what she did not understand, that was what confused her.

Louis: “U!”

Suddenly, instead of Rem, whose eyes were swimming with confusion, it was Louis who groaned as she hugged her around the waist.

Louis, glaring at Ram from below, was sensitive to the trembling in Rem’s heart and sharpened her gaze as if to scold Ram for causing it.

Meeting Louis’s gaze, Ram’s eyes narrowed slightly,

Ram: “Trying to stand between Ram and Rem? Of all people, you?”

Louis: “Aa-u!”

Ram: “So, you’re not going to back down. This is complicated, but not unpleasant.”

Just what history was there between them, that Ram had said such while showing signs that she also knew Louis, then looked into Rem’s eyes once again. When their eyes met, she could not separate them from hers.

Even though her heart felt like being burned by the intensity of that gaze, her soul was attracted to it.

Her anxiety grew stronger and stronger.

Just as equally strong as her captivation towards Ram.

Feeling it intensely, Rem bit her lip hard,

Rem: “You certainly must be my older sister. I can believe that without a doubt. It’s just…”

Ram: “Even if your heart is convinced, your mind is not?”

Rem: “…Yes.”

Ram: “Right. Then, that is fine for now.”

Rem nodded weakly, and Ram closed the distance with another step.

Rem’s shoulders tensed at the sight of her approaching, and Louis stepped forward to protect her. But Rem gently held Louis’s shoulder and said, “It’s okay,” stopping the gentle little girl.

Then, of their own volition, they directed their gazes directly at Ram.

With Rem’s gaze on her, Ram uncrossed her arms and held out her hand. The hand that was offered by the person whose heart had already recognized her as her sister.

Ram: “I am Ram. Your older sister, doubtlessly born to love you.”

Rem: “…”

Ram: “Though, there are other people just as important to this independent older sister of yours too.”

Rem’s eyes widened at the words spoken with such calm and confidence.

Then, as the meaning of the words began to sink in, a gasp escaped her lips. Rem just gave a little smile and laughed,

Rem: “It turns out, you are a frightening person. When I talk to you, I feel like my body just surrenders itself into this sense of security I feel.”

Ram: “It cannot be helped, Ram is the kind of older sister you just want to put all your trust and love in.”

Rem: “Yes, Ram-neesan.”

Ram proudly puffed out her chest, her hand being timidly grasped by Rem, who at last had addressed her in that manner. Upon hearing that, Ram raised her eyebrows slightly.

It had taken courage for Rem to address her as such, so that reaction was unexpected.

Rem: “Umm?”

Ram: “…As much as doing it like Barusu said annoys me, this sure doesn’t feel comfortable.”

Rem: “Errr?”

Ram: “—Nee-sama.”

Rem: “Huh?”

With Ram looking sour for an instant then continuing her few words, Rem widened her eyes. In response to Rem’s reaction, Ram repeated herself once more, saying the same thing again.

Ram: “Address Ram as nee-sama. That feels the most comfortable.”

Rem: “…Ram, nee-sama?”

Ram: “The name is unnecessary.”

Rem: “—Nee-sama.”

Doing exactly as she was told to, drawing ever closer to what Ram wished to be called, the latter shut her eyes tightly. Then, she pulled Rem’s hand, the one she was gripping, towards herself; Rem stumbled around a bit on reflex, but came to have Ram gently catch her body from the front, embracing her.

@ddukae

And continuing like that, Ram put her lips to Rem's ear, and,

Ram: "Now Ram can clearly feel it. —Ram is Rem's nee-sama."

Rem: "I feel, it too."

Thus, as soon as she was embraced by her arms, what she had been afraid of overflowed from her.

What she had dubbed a sense of security, was an attraction to her soul, a love for Ram. Firmly, gently, it engulfed even Rem, who was supposedly without memories.

Ram: "…As much as it pains Ram to say it, but are you ready for this, Rem?"

Rem: "Ready… for what?"

Ram: "Ready to go inside; we need to show it off to Barusu, not to mention show it off to Emilia-sama and the others. We need to boast our sisterly love, that will alleviate any lingering worries."

Due to Ram's words, Rem closed her eyes.

Even now, be it Emilia and everyone else or Subaru as well, how she ought to face them and what expression she should have were questions for which she had not found an answer.

But, at the very least, there were no doubts whatsoever about the feeling of Ram being her sister, about her feelings for Ram.

Rem: "Yes, nee-sama."

Ram: "Like I thought, perhaps we should put that off until you call Ram that a hundred times."

Rem: "Nee-sama…"

Ram: "It's a joke."

To the nodding Rem, Ram told a joke that had not sounded like a joke.

Seeing such a mischievous attitude from her sister filled Rem's heart with relief, even if for but a single moment, despite her own self's sense of urgency, despite the fact that they were in a situation that was otherwise a matter of the utmost urgency.

Louis: "Uau, auaaau~?"

Rem: "Yes, I'm fine. And thank you, Louis-chan, for your concern."

Louis: "Uh!"

Louis had been standing by Rem's side the whole time, caught in the middle of Rem and Ram's dialogue. Relieving her of her fears with a smile, Rem gently stroked the head of the kind little girl.

Then, with Louis in tow, Rem mustered up the courage to line up next to her sister, who had turned around halfway.

Without stopping, Ram and her shared glances and nodded, and the two of them reached for the door before them and—

Rem: "—Pardon us. I could hear you making a lot of noise, even from outside."

Ram: "It was a very Barusu-like yell, like many little animals put together, wasn't it?"

And so, the sisters both stepped into the cabin their companions were in.

4

Subaru: "Haa… Feels like a huge weight's been lifted off my shoulders…"

Keenly sensing that a huge load had disappeared off of his chest, Subaru muttered so.

That huge load on his chest, it had been the responsibility Subaru had needed to take upon himself—with nobody else around to protect Rem, he would see that duty through, and make it so Ram, Emilia, and everyone else could meet her.

In all honesty, however, upon learning that he had not been present for the reunion of the sisters, Ram and Rem, he had been struck with grief akin to that of the world ending.

Subaru: “If only I could’ve presented the two of them lined up side-by-side, like that…”

The demeanor of those two, visiting Subaru’s cabin together, made him believe that it had at least not gone badly, even if he did not know exactly what sort of exchanges the two sisters had had.

Once Subaru grasped this, the frustration he had felt just before vanished, and a sense of relief washed over him.

Finally, he had finally made it so that Rem and Ram could meet.

He had made it so that Rem could meet with Emilia, with Beatrice, with everyone else.

Just how much of that could be said to be due to Subaru’s contributions, he did not know, but it had been done regardless.

That Subaru himself had also been able to meet up with Emilia and the gang, was a matter of great celebration.

Subaru: “Although, I’m still small, and Rem’s Memories aren’t back yet…”

However, he could sense that the seeds of hope were budding.

As far as the matter of Subaru’s size went, it could be said that a way for it to be resolved could be seen in the near future; and assuredly, he would be able to find a way to restore Rem’s Memories.

So, what came next was—

Beatrice: “…Is it really alright if you don’t have Betty with you, in fact?”

Subaru: “No, I’m not that composed at all, but that guy won’t show his face with you around, Beako, so indulge my selfishness for just a while.”

Beatrice: “If anything happens, call for Betty right away, I suppose. Betty will come rushing with a zyoom, in fact.”

Subaru: “I’ll be counting on you.”

Until the very end, Beatrice wanted to avoid letting go of Subaru’s hand.

The deeply considerate girl tenderly detached her hand; once Emilia and everyone else reluctantly parted with him and exited the cabin, Subaru was left with nobody else in the cabin filled with silence.

Once the factors for it having been so lively up until this point had all left the cabin, Subaru was instantly overwhelmed by a myriad of misgivings.

The retreat from the Imperial Capital, on how large of a scale had it been undertaken? Had the origin of that horde of zombies been grasped? Was the relationship between the Imperial Army and the rebels improving? For what reason had Emilia and the others purposely only touched upon nothing but upbeat topics? What was the answer for Tanza’s somber expression?

And, the events that had occurred just before, when Subaru had gone unconscious, how had they concluded?

Subaru: “Even if you don’t answer everything, can you at least answer around half of them?”

???: “—That would depend on how much you are willing to compromise.”

In the sleeping quarters bereft of people, Subaru’s words, spoken as he raised his upper body from the bed, were answered by a figure that had likely been waiting for everyone to finish leaving.

There was the sound of shoes stepping firmly, leisurely, on the floor in a dignified manner, punctuated by a posture which lacked any hesitation to make their presence known to those in the environs.

Their deportment, the keen glint of their eyes, none of it deviated from his memory. And yet, they were markedly different in some way, that person—that black-haired man, Subaru fixedly stared at his handsome looks.

And then—

???: “How eloquently shall you speak, Natsuki Subaru? —O Stargazer of the Dragon Kingdom.”

And thus, his black eyes pregnant with hostility, Vincent Vollachia inquired so of Natsuki Subaru.

Chapter 11:
Shut the Hell Up

1

???: "—Are you going to see him, Abel-san?"

Stopping at the call from his side, Vincent turned around.

Multiple carriages were coupled to one another, treated as a single long dragon carriage, which allowed the Divine Protection of the multiple ground dragons to be applied to its entirety—Vincent batted one eye shut, upon witnessing a familiar blue-haired girl standing at the juncture he had crossed over.

Thinking back, it had been a long time since he had last exchanged words with her in this way.

Vincent: "Have the uninvited guests from the Kingdom achieved their purpose?"

Blue-Haired Girl: "Their purpose is not me, but…"

Vincent: "Cease. Do not take up my time with nonsense that even you do not fully believe. Time is precious. Especially under the current circumstances. As you understand."

Blue-Haired Girl: "…"

At the sound of Vincent's sharp voice, the girl lowered her head with eyes downcast.

However, she quickly raised it again, adopting Vincent's notion of time being limited,

Blue-Haired Girl: "Are you going to see him, Abel-san?"

And, she piled that very same inquiry onto him once more.

Vincent: "I am not Abel. I, am Vincent Vollachia."

To that question, Vincent replied without changing his expression.

Abel was a temporary name, which he had utilized for his own convenience during his escape and nothing more. He had taken it from Abellux, his family name from the time before his ascension to Emperor, a name he held no particular attachment to.

But, his displeasure towards being called that was stronger, right now.

Vincent: "—. It has been reported that that thing is awake. I must confront him."

Pushing aside his displeasure, Vincent answered the girl's inquiry.

Whatever she thought, it would not alter Vincent's decision. He did not think she had such thoughts or intentions to begin with.

Protected, displaced, distressed, and after a long period of time, she would come to a natural conclusion.

Like many others, she was merely a single ordinary person.

Ergo, Vincent attempted to cut that dialogue short.

However—

Blue-Haired Girl: "He is not your enemy, Abel-san."

Vincent: "—What?"

Upon receiving a reply from the girl he had expected to remain silent and downcast, a reply with contents contrary to his expectations, Vincent furrowed his brow.

The girl thus glared at Vincent, her pale-blue eyes containing a definite purpose.

There was a light that, as of their parting, had not dwelled in them; timidly yet boldly it penetrated Vincent, as if trying to intimidate him.

Vincent: “—. I am Vincent Vollachia. There shall not be a third time.”

Blue-Haired Girl: “I am sorry. But I do not have my memories, so I do not know much about His Excellency, Emperor Vincent. So there is nothing I can say to Him.”

Vincent: “…”

Blue-Haired Girl: “He is not your enemy, Abel-san.”

Without once averting her gaze, the girl yet again emphasized so.

Vincent had a good understanding of her based on the abilities she possessed: she was the reins with which to control Natsuki Subaru, and a valuable user of healing magic.

Supposing that she had taken that self-assured stance against Vincent while being aware of her own position, he would be compelled to do nothing but dub her as possessing considerable mettle. Yet, that did not seem to be the case.

And thus—

Vincent: “You, what did you say your name was?”

Blue-Haired Girl: “—It’s Rem. At least now I can definitively answer that.”

Vincent: “The girl who has no memories, making such a declaration?”

Rem: “It’s strange. Even though my heart and my mind don’t remember, there are things that your surroundings can teach you. I know that I’m Rem, thanks to someone who kept telling me that all this time.”

Whether it was gratitude or exasperation, the girl—Rem herself did not comprehend which of the two her way of speaking was conveying.

However, understanding that it was not connected to disgust or other loathsome negative thoughts, Vincent concluded that there was no need for further conversation.

Turning his back, he proceeded to walk away. And as he did so,

Vincent: “Rem, never again let mine time be so needlessly squandered. At your next act of disrespect, I shall lop off your head.”

Leaving her with those words, he ended his conversation with Rem.

And then—

Vincent: “How eloquently shall you speak, Natsuki Subaru? —O Stargazer of the Dragon Kingdom.”

2

While acutely sensing the hostility being directed towards him, Subaru stood face to face with the man.

In retrospect, his relationship with this man could be summed up with the word “enigmatic”.

At their first meeting, he had been a suspicious masked man camping out in a forest. On that occasion, he had been frantically searching for Rem and Louis, whom he had lost sight of; hence why he had not been desperate to probe deeper into that matter, but the man was far from just being a suspicious person.

The next time they met, it had occurred inside a cage in the Shudraqian village; Subaru could hardly explain why the man had acted so self-important despite his status as a prisoner. He would rather that there had been some means of escape, because after that he was made to take part in the Lifeblood Ritual, in which he had acted without a plan.

Thereafter, his help in retrieving Rem notwithstanding, he had come to part with Subaru on one occasion; however, he had known that Subaru’s group would have no option but to return. Not informing them of those circumstances had been a show of his underhandedness.

Immediately after, he had fully cooperated with Subaru's plan to capture the Fortress City of Guaral; as the dancers that went by Natsumi Schwartz, Bianca, and Fiora, they entered the enemy's stronghold together.

There were doubts regarding his unusual relationship with Priscilla; and after, in the Demon City, he was courted by Yorna; and without hesitation, he declared that Louis should not be allowed to live; thus was their relationship upon parting ways.

And even then, once Subaru had escaped from the Gladiator Island, and once he heard of the situation enveloping the Empire at large, he had held full conviction that said situation had been instigated by that man, the Emperor who had been ousted from his throne.

Abandoning the Imperial Capital of Lupugana, he took command of the great number of people making their retreat, of the great number of people evacuating the Imperial Capital. And once more, leading the people of the Empire as the one at their apex, the one regarded as the wisest Emperor—.

Subaru: "It's an honor to have Vincent Vollachia-san come and visit me. You arrived at just the right time; can you peel me an appa?"

Vincent: "Do not play games with me. In the first place, I am not one to do the likes of peeling fruit. Where are the appas, even?"

Subaru: "Where are…?"

At the question of the man who had set foot into the sleeping quarters, approaching him, Subaru's gaze turned to the side.

Even in another world, it was standard practice for fruit to be brought when visiting someone injured or ill; it was perhaps a bit of a cliché in situations of the sort. For that reason, there was a basket of appas next to his bed.

Naturally, his conversational partner should have been able to see it as well.

Subaru: "In that basket of fruits there. The red ones, don't they look delicious or what?"

Vincent: “Fool, are you duping me? Appas are fruits of white color.”

Subaru: “Well, they’re white inside once you’ve peeled them, but… Wait, this conversation, I think I recall having this very exchange, stored way way back in the recesses of my memories.”

Memories of it were rather faint, but he had the feeling he’d once had the same conversation quite some time prior.

The details of whom he had been talking to at the time could not be recalled, but he did have the memory of getting the same impression he was getting now, that those of nobility had reached an extreme to this point.

Either way—

Subaru: “I guess there are things you don’t know either. How unexpected.”

With that not-at-all-tense preface to their first mutual exchange of words in a while, feeling like they had not started off badly, Subaru stated so.

At Subaru’s words, the man—Abel, extended a hand to the basket, and split an appa in half with the knife left there. Naturally, a cross-section of its white insides was exposed.

Subaru: “…”

Laying eyes upon that undeniable result, did he have the mind to admit what was actually factual in their previous exchange? Abel put down the knife, and, leaving the fruit split in half in the basket, turned to Subaru.

Moistening those sable eyes of his still, was unmistakable hostility.

Subaru: “No way, you’re mad at me for embarrassing you about the color of an appa…? You’re the one who’s called me something weird just now.”

Vincent: “Stargazer of the Dragon Kingdom, it was.”

Subaru: “That was it.”

One more time being made aware of how he had been referred to, Subaru frowned, as he had no idea what he was on about.

That term was not one he had no recollection of. If he was not mistaken, from what he had heard, it was something like a term that referred to the fortune tellers that accompanied the Emperor closely, in the Empire.

Very much like the Dragon History Stone, the Kingdom of Lugunica’s tablet of prophecies, they were an existence that spoke of the future.

Subaru: “No, feels like you spoke of it in a way even worse than that… You put it like it’s like peeping into the near future.”

Vincent: “I recognize it as such, without a doubt. That is how I perceive those things.”

Subaru: “If that’s the case, you spoke of me as if I’m a peeping tom just now, are you aware of that?”

If times had not changed, would it not be that by normal standards, he would have the right to cut Abel down for the affront? Or, to put it into modern terms Subaru was aware of, he was prepared to fight for defamation of character in a civil court.

However, faced with Subaru’s reply, Abel’s countenance did not waver in the slightest. Those black eyes of his, the same color as Subaru’s own, but distinct in their depth, told Subaru that he had no intent to play along.

Of course, Subaru did not intend to mess about either—

Vincent: “You, just how much have you grasped?”

Subaru: “How much have I grasped, about the current situation? If that’s what you mean, I wasn’t told many of the details. Emilia and everyone were all worried about me right after I woke up… But I know we’re in the middle of evacuating.”

Vincent: "…"

Subaru: "The civil war has stopped for the time being, everyone's fleeing from the Imperial Capital right now… Though you'd think it would be hella chaotic, it doesn't seem like it's turned into a huge uproar."

The dragon carriages moved unceasingly, the night view outside the window shifted at a slow pace, but with the Divine Protection of Wind Evasion shielding them from the vibration and the howling of the wind, all was quiet.

One would think that the very quietude in the passenger cars of the dragon carriages as quite loud, but that the dragon carriages had not halted their march even once was evidence that no major troubles had popped up.

And that was in spite of the fact that a considerable number of people, most likely in the hundreds of thousands, were being transported.

Subaru: "The Nine Divine Generals and whatnot probably served as a unifying force, but that alone wouldn't be enough. As I thought, you're quite the big deal, man."

Vincent: "…"

Subaru: "Honestly, when I heard the story of you being betrayed by your right-hand man and retainer, being ousted from the throne, I really wondered if it'd be fine to have you back as Emperor, but, it turned out to be the right option."

Leadership and charisma, those were the so-called qualities of those standing above others.

These qualities were not simply the result of outstanding ability, and they could probably be acquired through blood, sweat, and tears, but the people who had these traits from birth were not few in number.

The royals of each country, the heads of many an organization, were such cases.

In that sense, Abel, who had had something to fall back on in times of emergency, still held the potential to be followed, to be looked up to by those around him.

Subaru: “It annoys me that rather than being on the fence about it, I was leaning more towards believing it. But I was right, you are the Emperor…”

Vincent: “—Is that as per your expectations as well?”

Subaru: “Huh?”

A quiet voice, however, it had certainly been laced with emotion. As it seemed way out of left field, Subaru’s brain refused to comprehend it.

As a result, Subaru did not dodge the hand that thus was extended, his forehead being pushed down onto the bed, his body following suit. And, before he could raise an objection as to what the hell was going on, he perceived the sensation of something sharp against his throat.

Which he immediately realized to be the tip of the paring knife with which the appa had just been split.

He had made that realization, yet he knew not the intent behind it. He knew not the meaning of Abel clasping that knife, and turning it towards Subaru in that manner, directing his hostility at him—Nay, directing his hatred, the same hatred his voice was rife with.

Subaru: “…”

From near proximity, within breathing distance of one another, Subaru and Abel shared mutual glares.

If Subaru were to carelessly raise his voice in a call for help at this juncture, Abel would not hesitate in slitting Subaru’s throat with the knife.

But conversely, that Abel was not doing so at once was because he had no reason to.

Subaru: “What, do you want… Hk.”

Vincent: “That ought to be mine question; what are your plans? To what extent exactly have you seen the current course of events unfold? Is everything up to this point in accordance with the picture you have painted?”

Subaru: “I told you already…! I told you, I don’t know what you’re talking about. What am I scheming…?”

Vincent: “—Why, did you leave me behind, and not Chisha?”

In comparison to the blade at his throat, the tone of his voice cut by far and away more deeply. It silenced Subaru, and Abel’s hand shook, trembling while gripping the knife.

As Abel gritted his teeth, as he glowered at Subaru from point-blank range, having asserted so.

That was not something Subaru was able to comprehend immediately.

Subaru: “Abel…”

Vincent: “Vincent Vollachia.”

Subaru: “…”

Vincent: “I, am no Abel. I am none other than the Seventy-Seventh Emperor of the Vollachian Empire, Vincent Vollachia. —That, is the course you have desired, is it not?”

Declaring such as if he were wringing the words out of himself, Abel—Nay, Vincent, gave his name with a hint of annoyance.

Not quite understanding the meaning of that attitude of his, an attitude as if he were cursing himself for giving his name as such, Subaru knitted his brows. Because, of course he would.

Subaru: “You… went to war so you could reclaim that name, and that crown, didn’t you…?!”

Vincent: “Incorrect. I was striving to fulfill my duty as Emperor. The Covenant with the People of Shudraq, the fall of the Fortress City, the negotiations with Yorna Mishigure, and the provocation of civil war were all for that purpose.”

Subaru: “Your duty, as Emperor…?”

Vincent: “While on the throne, Vincent Vollachia will be killed. With that as the starting point, the Great Disaster will attempt to destroy the Empire, the means to oppose it being left behind by Vincent Vollachia. That, is my duty.”

Subaru: “Hah…”

As Vincent enumerated the particulars of his undertaking to him for the first time, Subaru exhaled a hoarse breath.

That expression, “Great Disaster”, was one unfamiliar to Subaru’s ears, but what astonished Subaru even more than that was the very way Vincent had recited it all.

Per his words, upon the demise of Vincent Vollachia, the Great Disaster would commence.

Then, he had also stated that he would leave behind the means with which to oppose that Great Disaster.

Rather than searching for those means, he would leave them behind.

From how he had spoken, it was just as if—.

Subaru: “The way you spoke… It’s kinda like you knew you were going to die…”

While firmly sensing the cold tip of death trained on the neck, Subaru muttered.

With Death perhaps creeping closer to Subaru, before him, Vincent's sable eyes wavered with uncertainty. The vast expanse that laid beyond their jet-black coloration, he had a hunch on its true identity.

'Twas resignation, adorned with the will to resist.

Vincent: "Indeed. I have made mine demise a part of my plans. I left behind plans to ensure that the Vollachian Empire would not fall to ruin, even with mine passing."

And thus, none other than Vincent himself confirmed his intuition as correct; the very next instant, Subaru's mind was stained red, and his emotions burst out.

Subaru: "YOU BASTARD, STOP GODDAMN SCREWING AROUND!"

Teeth bared and eyes flaring up in anger, Subaru gave Vincent—No, the cowardly bastard before him the death stare, bellowing out. There was a flash of acute pain at his neck, but that could be postponed until much, much later.

Right here and now, it was much more important to just beat the living shit out of this wimp wearing a self-righteous face.

Subaru: "After manipulating so many people, after making them cross so many dangerous bridges, after making them take so many unnecessary detours with you, you planned to die at the end of it all? Don't joke around!"

Vincent: "As if I would do anything such as jest. Everything you have spoken of was done because it was the road that needed to be taken. At its terminus was to be mine death, a matter the importance of which cannot possibly be compared to the survival of the Empire which hangs in the balance."

Subaru: "That's not it! What I'm saying is, why is it that the first thing you do is give up on your own life? Some huge disaster? Don't know anything about it! Wouldn't it be better to just stay alive and face it yourself?!"

Vincent: "Do you lot not know any better but to chatter nonsense? While I live, the Great Disaster shan't come. That is the premise of this plan. It cannot be overturned—”

Subaru: “Who the hell decided it can’t be overturned? You’ve got a good head on you, so whether it be the Great Disaster or anything else, you could just deceive it and lure it out, and then…”

Vincent: “—Yet it was you Stargazers, who declared that it could never be overturned!”

Vincent, stifling his emotions, had been replying to a Subaru prattling on and on with sentimentality. But the former’s emotions had come to this point, and now exploded before Subaru’s eyes.

Just how unexpected had that violent outburst been from the standpoint of Vincent? Had he himself not seized the blade of the knife thrust towards Subaru with his opposite hand, who knew where the tip of the knife would have stabbed; such had been the torrent of emotions.

In drips, blood trickled from Vincent’s left hand, having seized the tip of the blade, staining the white sheets here and there.

However, neither Subaru nor Vincent paid any mind to the falling droplets of blood, instead focusing their attention towards each other’s eyes, towards the very essence of the other’s being beyond said eyes.

Yet again, Vincent had dubbed Subaru a Stargazer.

Therein laid the unmistakable reason as to why Vincent Vollachia hated, harbored hostility towards Natsuki Subaru, even going as far as to train a knife at him.

It was precisely because he happened to understand it, that those doubts could not be resolved.

Subaru: “The Stargazers… declared…”

Vincent: “—. The Stargazers hear the voices of the Observers from the heavens above, that exist beyond the framework. They speak of events that may occur in the far future, conferring us with the possibility of minimizing the damage. Still, that is but a matter of the scale of damages. Not of how to prevent it from happening beforehand."

In a disgusted voice, yet one attempting to stifle any emotion as much as possible, Vincent began to speak.

Subaru was reminded of one thing amidst the contents of his speech. If the Stargazers were truly able to foretell the future, from his experience, actually being able to change it would be no easy feat.

Whether it ought to be called the power of fate or the natural flow of time, it would stick to a predetermined path as much as possible; those who attempted to avoid impending tragedies would be brought to their knees.

The Stargazers' precognitions, they were akin to what Subaru knew from experience.

For example, were Subaru to Return by Death due to a natural catastrophe, even if he could urge everyone to take refuge in preparation, he would be unable to stop the natural catastrophe itself.

Whether that would prevent the destruction of houses and buildings, or even prevent the loss of human lives entirely, he would not know until he had a go at it, but he held no doubts that it would be difficult.

Vincent: "Many times in the past, the Stargazers have precluded correctly that perils would befall the Empire. Those crises were dealt with to the fullest extent possible, but some things could not be saved. Therefore, plans are necessary."

Subaru: "Plans…"

Vincent: "Plans with which to keep the damage at a minimum, and lessen those lost to as close to zero as possible."

—Calamities awaited in the future, doings could be done so that a greater number of people would be able to overcome them. Doings could be done so that a greater number of people would not be left behind.

If Vincent Vollachia had toiled, sparing no effort, for the sake of making that come to pass.

Vincent: “It was you, Stargazers, who whispered of mine death. How dare you, with that mouth, utter that my death must be defied? Are you toying with me… with me?!”

Subaru: “W-wait, wait a sec! For quite some time now, I’m not a Stargazer or anything like…”

Vincent: “—You see things that have yet to happen. Cease your deception, Natsuki Subaru.”

With those scant words, Subaru tasted the feeling of having his heart, within his chest, being stopped.

In the process of spewing out the recesses of his very own heart, the mask of Emperor had fallen away, and visible on the other side was not the face of Vincent Vollachia, but rather the face of a man rife with defects who went by the name of Abel.

And finally, once the man looked at him directly, once the man declared those words, Subaru finally comprehended.

Subaru: “—Ah.”

Vincent—Nay, Abel, had dubbed him a Stargazer, and Subaru had understood the reason for that.

Abel, had perceived Subaru’s Return by Death.

In precise terms, he had not perceived Subaru’s Return by Death, rather, the fact that via the loss of his life, Subaru had gone back in time, thus bringing back information from the future—he had perceived that Subaru held the means to know what laid ahead.

So then, he had comprehended that it was akin to the foresight abilities that Abel knew to be held by the Stargazers.

Subaru: “…”

If he gave it some thought, it was quite natural that a mistake like this would possibly occur.

Because of course it would. Subaru himself, in his pursuit for understanding and comprehension, had found in Abel's exposition about the Stargazers something in common with his own Return by Death.

Armed with the knowledge of the precedent represented by the Stargazers, if Subaru were to attain results beyond the capabilities he was possessed of, it was no surprise that he would draw a connection—No, that he would identify him as one in the same.

Abel's insight was a reliable one. His acumen would certainly scrutinize all things.

With that insight of his, he had immediately grasped that Subaru had not survived all the situations he had come across in the Empire through his unripe abilities and sheer fortune.

That was why, that was certainly why.

Subaru: "So, that's why you always tried to listen to my advice?"

If Abel interpreted Subaru's advice as a proposal that came as the result of selecting the most optimal move via seeing the future, then no matter how idiotic the proposal may have sounded to the ears, he would be unable to flat out discard it.

The refusal of allowing the Shudraqian village to go up in flames, the crossdressing performed with the purpose of capturing the Fortress City, the voyage to the Demon City of Chaosflame, the negotiations with Yorna, all of those had been so.

Abel had always explored the possibility of actualizing Subaru's proposals, earnestly scrutinizing them.

In this manner, Abel had attempted to drag Subaru, who he thought to be a Stargazer, into the struggle for the Empire's survival, employing him as a pawn on the board. —After he himself was lost, Subaru would be another one of the means of opposition.

Despite this—

Vincent: "…You, left me behind, not Chisha."

Subaru: "…"

Vincent: "Natsuki Subaru, you are a banal human being."

In a form different from the one just prior, the timbre of that voice was devoid of sentiment.

There was no attempt to repress emotions. If there indeed was such an attempt, those very real emotions would still eek out, able to be heard in their venture to appeal outwards.

Yet nothing was heard. They were not being repressed, those emotions had died.

And with that tone of voice killed of emotions, Abel let loose words bereft of hue towards Subaru.

Vincent: "A naïve, green, immature human being, holding on to plenty of bitterness. Neither do you possess virtue worthy of mention, nor do you possess viciousness worthy of mention. With neither of these, you would have accomplished nothing, and died an ordinary man."

Subaru's characterization, spoken so matter-of-factly, left absolutely no room for retort.

As per Abel's pertinent judgment, Subaru could not become anyone special. Even immersed in the lack of maturity of his body and mind, with his spirit returned to the days when he had believed himself to be a child prodigy, he also knew what he would eventually be in the future to come, a half-baked human being.

But—

Vincent: "You have been bestowed with an opportunity to surpass banal, ordinary men. By making perfect use of it, you have survived till this day. You have not been banal, you have not been an ordinary person, you have no strong disposition toward either virtue or viciousness.”

Subaru: “Abel…”

Vincent: “You… are a banal human being… If so, why.”

Firmly, potently, Abel tightly gritted his teeth, looking at Subaru.

He cast away his expression, his nobleness and his graciousness, his composure and his self-confidence and everything entirely, baring the true face visible behind the mask of Emperor that had been stripped away, his voice quivering.

And with that quivering voice as it had been, with that trembling voice as it was, he exclaimed.

Vincent: “Why, why did you leave me behind, Natsuki Subaru!”

Subaru: “…”

Vincent: “You have no bond to this Empire, nor any obligations. You could have been content with protecting the many you have come to know till this day, and nothing more. For what reason did you save me? For what reason did you think to try and save me, a man who does not get along with you…!”

Subaru: “…”

Vincent: “Why… hk.”

Due to his extreme emotions, his hoarse voice conveyed just how monumental was Abel’s desire to pose that inquiry of “Why”.

With more and more strength he grasped the blade of the knife, digging even deeper into his hand; more and more intense grew the flow of blood, so painful to gaze at that Subaru instantaneously attempted to release Abel’s grip on the knife and staunch the hemorrhage.

However—

Vincent: “Do not touch me!”

Subaru: “Agh!”

His hand was violently swatted away, and instantaneously becoming aware of pain in the hand he had outstretched, Subaru produced a grimace.

Upon taking a look, Subaru saw that the knife within the hand of that strikingly-different Abel had slashed his own hand, and drop-by-drop blood was trickling from it as well.

In the space between the two confronting one another, the sheets became increasingly sullied by their blood, blood that went on dripping away without efforts to stop it.

And thus, in that manner, paying no heed to the blood flowing out of them, to the soiled sheets and floor,

Vincent: “…Just now, when you reached out your hand to lend help, you did it again. That is what is most baffling, and what is most incompatible with me, in your way of being.”

Subaru: “…”

Vincent: “Every so often you leave it all to the emotions you feel at the moment, punting to the wayside all beliefs and ideas you have felt until then. You do not follow what you have decided upon, easily reversing whatever course you have concluded that you ought to be taking. You are unable to categorize what ought be saved or not, reaching out your hand indiscriminately.”

Subaru: “—Ah.”

His blood oozing out, faced with the glaring Abel’s insight and words, Subaru gulped down a breath.

Even the pain of the bleeding wound grew distant, with Subaru’s thoughts freezing over. Because what Abel had stated just now, held the exact same meaning as what had tormented Subaru in a recent occasion.

Todd: “—But you were willing to choose whether to save Katya or not, right?”

Subaru: “…”

Before he had regained consciousness, before he had even lost it, those had been the words hurled towards him.

That he and Natsuki Subaru were incompatible in every sense possible, that Natsuki Subaru was a monster that he could never understand, such was the blade of words that Todd Fang had trained upon him, decisively forcing their separation against Subaru’s will.

He too, though not drawing that conclusion about Subaru owing to Return by Death or owing to a status as a Stargazer, had seen through Subaru’s peculiarities, and defined him as such; perhaps it was through his power of observation, honed through his life as a werewolf.

Todd: “You’re too damn inconsistent! Your eyes say that you’re willing to die at any moment, you’re willing to put other people’s lives on a scale selfishly, but when it comes to this, you’re desperate to resist. It’s creepy!”

Subaru: “—Hk.”

Todd’s chilly gaze, his voice devoid of heat, overlapped with those of Abel before him.

Abel’s gaze, Abel’s voice possessed the fervor of rage; nonetheless, the two still overlapped. The reason for that, undoubtedly, was that both were attempting to part with Subaru.

A preface for ousting Natsuki Subaru, rejecting he whose way of being was incompatible with theirs, from their world.

Todd: “Lack of self-awareness is a bad trait. You’re choosing between lives. Who to save, who to let die, you’re deciding as you please. You show favor towards those who butter you up, but don’t care about those who don’t. Me, I wouldn’t hesitate to butter anyone up, but…”

Todd: “How could I go along with someone who decides who lives or dies based on his own fickle whims?”

Thus, what had driven Todd to commit the heinous acts he had committed, as per his words, had been Subaru's way of thinking and behavior.

Of course, Subaru had not just accepted it without questioning, and did not consider himself to be at fault. It was what he had always done and thought to be correct, in his own Subaru way. But were he to so easily change his ways, Subaru would be unable to show his face to the companions who had followed him, who had placed their faith in him till this day.

At the same time, however, there was a truth he could not repudiate completely.

—Subaru was choosing who to let live and who to let die, as he had indeed stated.

Through the Authority of Return by Death, Subaru had transfigured the fates of those precious to him.

Those who had no choice but to lose their lives, those who had no choice but to hurt him, those who had no choice but to struggle for what was dear to them, those who had no choice but to deprive themselves of the opportunity to reach a mutual understanding. He had distorted their fates, and kept them alive.

Through the decisions and actions Subaru had taken, assuredly, the number of people around Subaru who had been robbed of their lives or become sorrowful had diminished.

However, Natsuki Subaru had not been capable of saving every single person, either.

Whether he went without saving them, or without being able to save them, though those differed on whether he did it proactively or reactively, his decision had been thus. And so, without him turning back the clock, the onward march of reality imposed itself as immovable.

It was not as though he had destroyed all of his "enemies".

But, it was not that he had saved all of his "enemies", either. Just how had Subaru come to decide which to save, and which not to save?

That was possibly due to Subaru's personal likes and dislikes, such was Todd's fear.

Vincent: "No, that is not so, Natsuki Subaru. It is not even up to your like or dislike towards others."

Subaru: "…Huh?"

Shaking his head, Abel's words restrained Subaru, the latter having been made aware of the unbridgeable gap between himself and Todd once more.

With Subaru holding his breath and raising his face, Abel so relayed.

Vincent: "Were you to determine who to save and who not to save based on your subjective preferences of people's characters, that I would be able to understand. But, you save even those you loathe. Such as me."

Subaru: "It's not…"

Like that, so he wished to assert, yet Subaru's words did not continue.

Whether Subaru hated Abel enough to abandon him at the eleventh hour was something he would only understand were he to do some deep introspection, but it was true that he had reached out his hand to someone he loathed.

He had been unable to reach. In spite of that, Subaru had attempted to reach out to Todd as well.

Finishing things without letting go. Their conflict notwithstanding, Louis had remained alongside Subaru till this day.

Having been told that he reached out to those who he loathed, that was exactly what he had been doing.

Vincent: "—Take your people from the Kingdom, and leave Vollachia."

As Subaru reflected upon his prior deeds, aghast, those unforeseen words struck him.

Slowly raising his eyes, he came to lay them upon Abel, who had returned the knife his hand had been holding to the basket of fruits, that wrathful hue erased from his countenance, weaving words in tandem with what had been his facial expression until then.

He, towards a Subaru astonished at the change in demeanor and at the content of the words thrown at him, resumed.

Vincent: "From this point onwards, the Empire shall be plunged into battle against the Great Disaster. The board is different from the one I was attempting to arrange, but alas, a way through remains. Therein you are not required."

Subaru: "Wha…"

Vincent: "I have heard enough nonsense. Whatever your intentions may be, what you have already done must be considered definite. Questioning the merits of your reasoning for that, would be an act akin to futility of the utmost extremes."

Those were not so much words directed towards Subaru, as they were words directed towards his own self.

The exchange in which he had gotten emotional with Subaru, and the exchange in which he had bared all his emotions; Abel was about to unilaterally terminate the exchange that encompassed the entirety of both that had taken place here.

It had not been a behavior too uncharacteristic for him.

A topic mentioned both when things had gotten emotional, and when the emotions had died, the name "Chisha" was one Subaru had gotten an idea about.

Judging from how he had voiced it all, Chisha had apparently lost his life amidst the siege of the Imperial Capital; why Subaru had not saved him, to ask such a thing must have been Abel's true intentions.

Attempting to cover up those intentions, Abel would try to pretend that such things had never, ever truly happened.

Vincent: "Make preparations to return to your country. All necessary arrangements will be made for you to cross the border. Everything after that will be the Empire's problem—mine problem."

Thus, changing his way of referring to himself, and restraining all of his conduct as Abel, were signs of the resolution he had arrived at, to move forth as Emperor Vincent Vollachia.

And just how meaningful, just how heavy were the things he had been entrusted with, and if those had been the reasons for his decision, were all things Subaru could not possibly understand.

Natsuki Subaru could not understand Vincent Vollachia.

Likewise, Vincent Vollachia could not understand Natsuki Subaru.

And with that, this fruitless period was coming to an end, with naught more than both shedding the others' blood—.

Todd: "You're a monster. Much more so than that zombie."

That understanding one another was impossible, that the gap could not be bridged, that a separation was unavoidable; both had reached such a conclusion on their own, both had arbitrarily decided such things on their own, and both had ended things like that all on their own.

Don't you regret that it had to end the way it did, you goddamn idiots.

Subaru: "Hey, Abel."

Turning his back, his conduct indicating that the conversation had drawn to a close, the Emperor advanced towards the door. The slender back making its departure was called out to, and the Emperor, taking a calm, short breath, halted his steps.

And as he was, the Emperor, with eyes devoid of heat, turned his countenance over his shoulder, and spoke,

Vincent: “Do understand. I am Vincent Vollachia, any man that goes by Abel is—”

Subaru: “—Shut the hell up. Let’s see you grit those teeth!”

Making use of the bouncy springs of the bed and blasting off, Subaru at last charged towards that face.

At that profile, the profile of one deciding to end things all on his own, the pompous profile of one who had the nerve to selfishly tell him to hurry up and leave, that odious profile of one intending to take absolutely everything and anything upon himself; either way, already unable to stop himself from getting incredibly angry, irritated, and pissed off, Subaru drove his small, blood-soaked fist into that profile. Something he had been wanting to do for a long, long time.

Chapter 12:
Natsuki Subaru and Vincent Abellux

1

The moment he threw that punch, it was the moment he had been the most frustrated about having become smaller.

Even more so than the tragedy of the Gladiator Island, which he had been able to unite everyone in order to prevent; even more so than the Sparka used to win Gustav over to his side; even more so than his dialogue with Cecilus under the moon; at this very moment, that he could have punched him a just a little bit harder were he to have a larger body, made him frustrated.

Vincent: “You…!”

Taking the blow from the young Subaru’s fist on his left cheek, the Emperor, his face soiled with blood, widened his eyes.

His gaze was directed at his own feet, observing Subaru after the latter had failed to land, tumbling down onto the floor. However, though his face held shock, it was bereft of indignation. More so than the humiliation he felt, his astonishment had been stronger.

The Emperor, having been given more shock than pain from Subaru’s fist, while pressing his hand against where it had struck,

Vincent: “Do you not hold your life dear?! If I were to raise mine hand, the Flame of the Yang Sword would scorch your very being…”

Subaru: “Yup, it’s not dear to me! Compared to letting you go without giving you a wallop right here and now, something like burning to death isn’t scary or anything at all!”

Vincent: “Wha…”

Receiving a scowl from the Emperor, Subaru jumped up before his eyes, and riposted, firmly.

Just then, fatigue yet remaining in his body, he lost his balance and fell backwards, slamming against the door, but that was just right. Leaning against the door like that, Subaru spread his arms, thus obstructing the Emperor from proceeding.

That he did not hold his life dear to him, such a thing was a downright lie.

But, in this tit-for-tat, he did not want to show even a hint of weakness.

This Emperor was spouting everything he had to say without holding back, so whether it be with fists or words, Subaru would not be satisfied unless he fired back.

Subaru: “It’s just as you guys say. I think, I can’t be understood. After all, even I myself don’t really understand what my criteria is for taking action.”

Vincent: “…“You guys”, you say?”

Biting his lip, the Emperor frowned as Subaru glared at him.

Lowering his hand from his cheek, his face defiled with blood trickling from Subaru’s hand, the Emperor was at a loss from the fact that Subaru’s statement had been aimed at multiple targets, possibly being directed at someone aside from himself.

Though, no matter how much he pondered it over, there was no way he could understand. The man before Subaru’s eyes was the Emperor, the other man nothing more than a foot soldier without an officer rank.

And yet, the wounds that both had given Subaru, the scars they had both pointed out, were one and the same.

Subaru: “I want to prioritize the people I like, the people I hold dear, and protect them. Those are my honest feelings. But, even if it’s someone I hate or someone I don’t know, and they’re put into danger right in front of me, then I…”

Todd had said, that Subaru would choose who to save based on his subjective likes and dislikes.

Abel had said, that Subaru would recklessly choose who to save regardless of likes or dislikes.

Both of those were correct, and since both were correct, they were mistaken.

After all—

Subaru: “But… is that really such a bad thing…?”

Vincent: “What?”

Subaru: “Is that so bad? Without the resolve to try and carry the whole world on my back, and without any grand significance, is it really so bad if I save those who are right in front of me on impulse?!”

As Subaru rose his voice, violently stomping his feet, and the Emperor widened his sable eyes.

Though still amidst a rapid sequence of expression and demeanours uncharacteristic of him, Subaru yet pressed him for an answer.

Subaru: “It’s just as you said! I consider the things within my own range of vision, I reach as far out as I can, that’s what I’ve been doing until today. What’s so bad about that?!”

Vincent: “You dare now object?! What is so bad, you say? Is it not obvious?! For what reason do you focus not on the greater picture, and instead act upon your selfish emotions? The Authority bestowed upon you, for what reason do you not put it to good use?!”

Subaru: “I use absolutely everything! I’m standing here because I put it to good use! Don’t get emotional, huh?! Stop talking like an idiot! The way I choose to use my own emotions, is up to me!”

Vincent: “Then at least act in accordance with those emotions! If you are to decide between somebody’s life or death based on your likes and dislikes, do not deviate from that method in any sort of way. Your way of being, is riddled with distortions."

Subaru: "If that's your conclusion from me leading a righteous life, I'm all for having a warped personality!"

As the Emperor still continued to rebuke Subaru's attitude, the latter delivered a powerful kick as he replied. Kicking the Emperor's shin over and over again, his anger, too much to be contained, erupted in full.

As Subaru unleashed kicks charged with his foul temper, the Emperor contorted his cheeks, and,

Vincent: "We shall speak no further."

With that, he attempted to terminate the conversation one-sidedly. Once more, he did it one-sidedly.

Trying to leave behind the divide between their sense of values in that manner, the Emperor seized Subaru's shoulders. The Emperor tried to move him out of the way, and with the physical strength of a child, he could not go against an adult.

That was why, Subaru bit down on that hand with all of his might.

Vincent: "—Hk, You!"

Subaru: "Schtop beain sho selfesh!"

Biting down without restraint, he engraved the Emperor's right hand with a bite wound. His right hand, bleeding as he forcibly shook it free, together with the one bearing a wound from the knife, both of the Emperor's hands were shedding blood.

Causing the great and noble apex of the Empire to shed blood, Subaru would be unable to avoid the death penalty.

Subaru: "That'll only happen if the country still exists, you stupid idiot!"

Vincent: "What are you… guh!!"

The moment he had been shaken off, Subaru's small body grabbed the Emperor from the front, pressed his head against the latter's abdomen, and clipped his knees. A fighting style he had learned from Weitz, who had devised it himself.

Proceeding to apply Weitz's teachings even further, he took a mounted position, and attained dominance through street rules.

With the Emperor having fallen onto his back, sitting upon his chest as to weigh him down, Subaru grabbed him by the collar and slammed him into the floor. Were the back of one's head to be struck over and over again, no matter who it was, they would be knocked-out instantly.

However—

Vincent: "Do not get carried away!"

The first time, shock; the second time, confusion; the third time, although he had been successful in bringing the back of his head to the ground, he was stopped by a simple difference in strength. Furthermore, he was thrown off of the Emperor's body, having been grabbed by his hair.

Screaming out with a "Gyaaaargh!" as he tumbled to the floor, Subaru saw the Emperor stand back up in his peripheral vision, and once again, the latter attempted to head for the door.

Subaru: "Like I'd let you!"

Jumping onto the Emperor's knees from behind, by means of sheer force he halted the body moving towards the door. Due to Subaru's excessive momentum however, the Emperor was knocked over forwards.

The result—

Vincent: "Buh."

Then, with a dull thud, the Emperor crashed face-first into the cabin's door.

Vincent: "…"

A firm sound echoed, the sound of him placing his hands against the door his face had been pressed against, and thus the Emperor rose to his feet once more, after having fallen face-first onto it. Then, turning around, the Emperor seized Subaru by the collar with both his hands, hoisting him up.

The two's bodies spinning around to switch places, Subaru's back was slammed against the door, pressed against it with force, as he leaked out "Uah"s of pain.

Before his eyes, the nose and forehead of the Emperor were reddened; from point-blank range he glared at Subaru, the latter's legs suspended.

Vincent: "You, what do you want? What is your objective? What is it that you desire?!"

Subaru: "I want to hit you! My objective is to hit you! My desire is to hit you!"

Vincent: "You…!"

Subaru: "What about you, what do you want? What is your objective? Just what the hell is it that you desire?!"

Vincent: "…"

Caught by his collar, clawing at the Emperor's hands, Subaru's spittle flew as he shouted in reply.

Then twisting his head, he opened his mouth in an attempt to bite the Emperor's hand one more time, but no matter how hard he tried, he was unable to reach it. At the very least, drool amassed in the Emperor's hand as he spat.

In that way, while having his hand sullied by Subaru's saliva, the Emperor's cheek stiffened for a reason separate to that disgrace; he muttered.

Vincent: "My, desire…?"

Subaru: “That’s right. There’s gotta be something you wanted to do apart from spouting grandiose and meaningless words at me. If not, you wouldn’t go out of your way to come to me at such a busy time.”

Vincent: “…”

Subaru: “Aren’t you the one that doesn’t understand yourself the most? While you were talking just now, there was something you put the most energy into, something you put the most emotion into. That’s what’s most important for you.”

The topic of evacuating from the Imperial Capital, or the topic of suspecting Subaru being a Stargazer. The topic of dealing with Emilia and the others, who had hailed from the Kingdom, to the topic of the divide stemming from being unable to understand Subaru’s way of being.

Now that he thought of it, there had been no words expressing sympathy for Subaru after his recovery from having fallen unconscious; in the first place, this bastard had not said anything in regards to this being their first meeting after the Demon City either.

But putting all those numerous affairs aside, the one topic he was most passionate about was obvious.

Subaru: “—Chisha.”

Vincent: “…Why, Natsuki Subaru.”

The heat that had boiled over just before during their grappling match, disappeared, however, in its place was a cold heat, a heat set alight by that question, now uttered once more.

If that which accompanied violence was a scarlet flame, then that question had come accompanied by a flame of azure hue.

That azure glow blazing in his eyes, it scorched Subaru as he stood before the Emperor, while the latter posed his question.

Vincent: “I was the one who trained him. If it were him, he would have been able to do the same work as me without even the slightest deviation. It could even be said that he was superior in regards to military power, depending on the circumstances.”

Subaru: “…”

Vincent: “There was no difference between mine and that damned Chisha’s ability. Whichever of us remained would take over the fight to oppose the Great Disaster, seeing it through to completion. —Why.”

Staring directly into Subaru’s black eyes, the Emperor’s—No, Abel’s black eyes wavered.

The mask of Emperor, which he had likely worn alongside a resolve to never again remove it, was ripped off of him not long after he had steeled himself like so. And thus, Subaru gazed upon Abel’s face.

And finally, not as the Emperor of this country, but as a single person who had been bereaved of someone dear, Abel could not help but question Subaru.

Vincent: “Why, did you let me live despite loathing me, and let Chisha die, Natsuki Subaru.”

After gaining self-awareness of what he had wanted to ask Subaru himself, Abel hurled the same question towards Subaru as he had done before their scuffle had broken out.

The sorrow, the fragility contained within that voice, were incomparable to what they had been just before.

The Emperor known as Vincent Vollachia, utilized absolutely everything in his possession for the sake of the Empire.

Ruling over the great country that possessed the vastest lands among those known in this world as the Four Great Countries, Vincent Vollachia reigned as Emperor, an omnipresent and all-seeing existence.

For that Emperor known as Vincent Vollachia to issue that question not for the sake of the Empire, but rather as a mere single person, was evidence that this singular question carried a weight rivaling that of the Empire itself.

Perceiving that in his skin, his blood, his brain, his very soul, Subaru's heart trembled.

At the same time, in contrast to Abel's swell of emotion, Subaru's emotions were tranquil.

Subaru: "…"

Just why was it that the person known as Chisha had to die?

Unbeknownst to Subaru, Abel and Chisha had each been placed on different plates of a scale, and one of those two sides had fallen into a situation beyond saving.

Thus, Abel had intended to share in the fate of the scale as his own side tipped into perdition.

That envisioning had been painted over. —Most likely, by the deceased Chisha himself.

—Abel had likely prepared for his own death since long ago.

If one was born, someday, their life would assuredly reach its end. All were aware of such a fact. But it was just as if Abel's situation was completely different to the reality everybody unconsciously ignored.

Resolve towards destined death, that was no different from Subaru confronting the trigger of his Return by Death.

Always, Abel had been squaring off against his own forthcoming death.

With the same resolve as Subaru, who fought to the bitter end while believing that the arrival of Death was something that could be changed, that it was something that must be changed no matter what, Abel had continued to fight.

If Subaru were to go without dying, Emilia, Rem, and Beatrice would end up dying.

Otto and everyone else, Tanza and everyone else, all of the Shudraq, Flop and Medium, a great number of people would end up dying. In exchange for his own life, he attempted to allow everyone to survive.

If he had come to expend the entirety of his resolve for that purpose, then it must have been the same for Abel.

Vincent: “I completed all preparations with that end in sight. But even so—”

Emilia, Rem, and Beatrice, they had all taken Subaru’s place, permitting his survival.

In order to let Subaru live, Otto and everyone else, Tanza and everyone else, all of the Shudraq, Flop and Medium, a great number of other people, had become sacrifices so he could survive.

Even if nobody else was capable of understanding that despair, Natsuki Subaru was the single person who had to keep it in mind.

Nullifying that possibility, painting over that reality by means of his Authority, Natsuki Subaru was the single person who would not deny the despair that Abel was going through without paying any heed.

Understanding, gulping down, there was something he must say in addition.

Subaru: “—I’m not a Stargazer, Abel.”

Vincent: “…”

The words he spoke, they probably seemed like a betrayal to Abel, this late in the game.

This late in the game, Subaru had not returned the reply of Abel’s desire, instead keeping it to himself. But, however much Abel suspected Subaru, reality would not budge.

Perhaps Subaru was able to do the same things a Stargazer could.

Perhaps Subaru possessed means with which to intervene with fate to an extent greater than a Stargazer's own means.

Even so, he was not omnipotent. He could never be omnipotent.

It would be nice if he were omnipotent, he could never be sufficient as to aspire to be omnipotent.

Subaru: "That's why, I couldn't save this Chisha person you talked about. I wouldn't know how to save him, either. But, I'll just say this one thing…"

Vincent: "…What is it."

Subaru: "…Supposing I really did have a power like the one you speak of, even then, I'd choose to save you, who I hate, rather than someone I don't know. Without reasons like seeing ahead to what lies in the future, that's what I would do. That's what I will do."

Truly, even he himself thought his nature was a helpless one.

But, that was the result that Natsuki Subaru, by consulting with the abilities he possessed, within what he understood to be the realms of what were his own capabilities, had reached.

Vincent: "…"

Slowly, strength left Abel's hold on his collar, and Subaru's body was released.

While his back rubbed against the door, Subaru's body slid down. Even now, Abel's hands were holding on to Subaru's collar, but those fingers, white from the strength that had been put into them, now lost their pale coloration alongside said strength.

If he truly wished to remove those hands, he could have done it easily; however, Subaru did not do so.

With them still seizing his collar, Subaru merely called his name out with "Abel"—.

Vincent: “If you claim to not be a Stargazer…”

Such was the frail sound produced by Abel’s lips.

But, Abel himself had not been satisfied with the sound he had uttered, and continued no further. Abel’s black eyes began to wander, in search of the words he truly desired.

He would put his emotions into words.

Perhaps the Emperor of the Empire, who had not once done such a thing till this day, who had not once done something that even a toddler was capable of, would now do so.

Vincent: “You… would try and save me no matter what…”

Subaru: “…”

Vincent: “In a situation where the survival of the Empire is at stake, you occupy me with trifles of such insignificance…”

Subaru: “…”

Vincent: “I… I! Even since I laid eyes upon your way of being…”

Subaru: “…”

Each time, his words would get stuck halfway through.

No matter the words, no matter the emotions, they were not enough to express what Abel felt in his heart of hearts. Repeatedly, Abel ceased speaking, revised his words, and corrected himself; yet Subaru did not rush him.

Vincent: “You… detest me, view me as an enemy…”

His intelligent self realizing that the response of his desires laid not beyond his faltering words, Abel started the words he ought to say anew, over and over again.

He, known as the wisest Emperor since the inception of the Vollachian Empire, a man whose wisdom was respected by everyone, did so.

And thus, after repetitions upon repetitions, he finally managed to do it.

Vincent: “I…”

Subaru: “…”

Vincent: “I… had resolved myself for my own death… I had not resolved myself… to lose someone dear.”

Having only forged his resolve to be the one leaving the rest behind, his resolve for being left behind had not been cultivated.

Perhaps he had even gone as far as to think about what words he would leave behind in his final moments. There was even the possibility one would find notes here and there left for after his death, if they were to search.

All had been done for the sake of entrusting the matter to those who would continue forth, done with a resolve that had not even considered the possibility he would be on the side being entrusted.

Vincent: “Why.”

A quavering voice, questioned so.

While speaking in a quavering voice, Abel detached his hands from Subaru’s collar. Those hands, his own very blood-stained hands, he brought them to his face, and concealed his expression.

The Emperor, who would by no means even close both his eyes in front of others, covered his face with both his hands.

Vincent: “Why, did you leave me behind and die, Chisha…?!”

His face in his hands, his voice trembling, his black eyes potentially even tearing up, Vincent Vollachia fell to his knees.

Having lost a very, very important person, the man who had likely not had even the time to grieve, not needing to wear the mask of Emperor in front of a rude and disrespectful individual whom he hated, fell to his knees.

Witnessing just that, Subaru, taking a very long, and immensely deep breath—

Subaru: “—I’m sorry.”

With that, as a fellow struggler fighting against an unreasonable fate, he faced the fellow struggler who had been wounded while earnestly continuing to fight, and imparted words that would never be able to serve as comfort.

2

When swinging at Abel as he tried to leave, what came to Subaru's mind was the memory of the time Otto had once punched him in a similar manner.

Subaru: "You're incredible, man. I could never be as smart as you… I'll never say that to his face, though."

Since he would feel embarrassed and annoyed, he really did not wish to state so directly to that very person.

The most he was willing to consider was that one day, once Otto was dying of old age, he would sit at the side of the bed and say "To be honest, I thought you were incredible". If he were to really go through with it, he had faith that Otto, even in his dying moments, would retort with "Then why have you been keeping silent about it until now?!".

Anyhow—

Subaru: "…"

With a thud, Abel leaned his back against the wall of the cabin as he sat on the ground, observing the dim interior of the cabin as he hugged one of his knees.

Subaru, too, absentmindedly savored the silence while sitting next to him with legs crossed.

From the outset, Subaru's true feelings were undoubtedly feelings of gratitude towards Otto, alongside a wish to mess with him a bit.

Some time ago, at a time Subaru had been on the verge of buckling under the weight of attempting to carry anything and everything by his lonesome, Otto had given a wallop to Subaru's cheek, had lambasted him with words he needed to hear.

That he was keeping up useless airs in front of his friends, so he was told. —That experience had given Subaru the courage to spring off of the bed.

But then again—

Subaru: “Not like you and I are friends or anything.”

Vincent: “—. Of course. Speak not of such repulsive things. Being a friend of yours… No, I simply have no need for the likes of friends. Nor shall I ever want them.”

Subaru: “So your reasoning isn’t that you can’t make friends, but that you won’t make them? I also did that when I pretended to be a proud lone wolf, but it’s completely obvious to the people around you.”

Vincent: “Your disrespect knows no bounds, now does it?”

Seated close to each other yet without looking towards the other, Subaru and Abel exchanged words.

No longer were the heated emotions from their grappling scuffle present, but on the other hand, they were not vanished to the point that they would abort their conversation midway, nor were they able to feign civility.

Subaru’s face, clothes, and hands were stained with blood all over.

Of course, Abel’s face, hair, and clothes were also stained with blood all over.

Inside the cabin, the sheets were stained with blood, and the knife had fallen to the ground. Blots of scattered blood were present here and there, and evidence of damage and of blood having been shed was everywhere.

The amount of blood was not enough for this place to be dubbed a murder scene, but it sure was enough for it to look like a crime scene.

Subaru: “But, even if we thrash around, we could never destroy the whole cabin. That’s what our individual limit is, you and I.”

Even with Subaru and Abel having gone into a no-holds-barred rampage, the most they had been able to do was break the furnishings.

Were the ones to go on a rampage the truly dangerous people present in this world, the cabin would probably be destroyed in the blink of an eye, no traces of it being left behind. How much time would it take for Emilia, with that adorable face and those adorable hands of hers, to adorably dismantle this cabin.

Subaru: “Even if you and I throw down, it’s nothing so adorable, even.”

Vincent: “…Just what in the world is your problem?”

Subaru: “What about you, what the hell’s your problem? I’ll tell you what, your story’s all over the goddamn place, I can’t even tell what you wanna talk about.”

Vincent: “…”

Abel remained silent, and pondered.

The reason he had held his tongue was likely because he was made aware of how scattered the topics were. It was the result of plugging his ears to the appeals of his true intentions, and only choosing the topics that felt good to his ears, and flowed nicely; since he had been on edge, there had not been a single topic that was sincere.

That was the essence of Abel’s speech till just before, and he had also now become aware of that lapse of his.

Thence, how he would recover from that, Subaru waited to see—

Vincent: “Natsuki Subaru, is it the truth that you are not a Stargazer?”

Subaru: “…It’s true. I’m not a Stargazer or anything like that. Stuff like premonitions of the future, that fits the Witch Cult more than it fits me. I don’t really get along with those guys.”

Vincent: “I did happen to hear that you had felled two Sin Archbishops, in Lugunica.”

Subaru: “It’s not public, but it’s actually been three. Gluttony’s been as well… Nah, it’s kinda difficult to say whether Gluttony’s been defeated or not, so forget about that. Louis’s situation is also… AH!”

Vincent: “What is it?”

Subaru: “You didn’t do anything to Louis, right? After all, I still haven’t forgiven you for that time you said Louis was to be killed.”

In the Demon City of Chaosflame, Abel’s firm stance towards Louis had been what had triggered Subaru’s separation from Abel and the rest, going on to act independently.

When her identity as a Sin Archbishop came to light, Abel had declared that she would not be tolerated.

With that as the reason, Subaru had moved separately from Abel and the rest of their group; the pair of him and Louis isolated and without assistance then headed towards Yorna’s Castle—

Subaru: “Though stuff’s happened until now, I still won’t forgive you.”

Vincent: “Speak not of foolish things. Though, was it not you who thoroughly hated that girl?”

Subaru: “Before is before, now is now. To begin with, if you’ve kept your impression of me from our first meeting, you’d doubt my sanity considering the members I get along with.”

Vincent: “Your sanity is something I have doubted since the Shudraqian village. —Your concern is unnecessary.”

Subaru: “Hah?”

Vincent: “No harm has been inflicted upon that girl. After all, what I had been trying to say back then was not that we ought to execute someone whose apparent identity was that of a Sin Archbishop on the spot.”

Subaru: “Wha…?!”

Vincent: “You jumped to a hasty conclusion. Diligently reflect upon this.”

Having been told that his worries were needless, Subaru was at a loss for words. But, even supposing that were true, Abel’s coldhearted and indifferent attitude had been part of the reason for Subaru making a conclusion so hastily.

Adding up Abel’s attitude up until then had led to his distrust back then.

Subaru: “That… was an issue of your attitude…”

Vincent: “It was necessary. It was just in case, so you would not wish for my survival.”

Subaru: “…”

Vincent: “All grounded on the conjecture that you were a Stargazer, that included. You, who continues to produce results unprecedented within the Kingdom, have performed deeds no ordinary person would be able to.”

Subaru: “That’s…”

Vincent: “Although, there was no need for me to go out of my way to worsen your impression of me. Even if I did not act as such, you are the type of person who would detest me the most. Abhorrence and disdain, they both overflow from your heart.”

Subaru: “YOU! DAMN! BASTARD…!”

Whether it was a lie, the truth, good, or bad, Abel’s words caused veins to bulge in Subaru’s forehead.

But, as Subaru explored his relationship with Abel while treading on thin ice, Abel had come into contact with Subaru with a mental state akin to treading a tightrope.

With Subaru on ice, and Abel walking a tightrope, no interaction of the sort could ever proceed smoothly.

After all, each of them went without looking at anything but their own feet; they did not even regard the other's face.

Subaru: "…I, don't know anything about that Chisha guy. He kicked you out from the throne, and turned himself into you pretending to be Emperor. I only happened upon him in Chaosflame, when he was posing as Emperor."

Vincent: "…"

Subaru: "I don't get what that person was thinking, or what he had been scheming in driving you away from the Palace. But, you got frustrated in such a way because that person died, and if he really did die when you were supposed to, I do get that. Therefore…"

Falteringly, Subaru spoke of what he thought as he thought it.

Since they had an unspoken agreement to not face each other, Subaru could not see Abel's expression as he spoke those words. A tad frightening, that was.

That person was someone who Abel lamented losing to an extent such that he could not preserve the equilibrium of his heart.

For Subaru, speaking about that person while knowing nothing about them, his remarks could perhaps trample upon Abel's heart far too much.

But, he thought.

Though it had not been for a very long time, having been embroiled in a situation that concerned the survival of the nation, having been completely manipulated by this man who gave his name as Abel, Subaru, thought.

Subaru: "That Chisha person, he sure was incredible."

Though perhaps inappropriate, as he lifted his face, he produced a spirited voice.

It had been no forceful attempt to brighten things, it had been praise, praise overflowing from Subaru's heart.

In reality, just how many of them were there? People who could betray the predictions of the man renowned as the wisest Emperor since the inception of this Vollachian Empire, who molded just about every last thing merely within his own mind, who valued things proceeding as per his expectations; just how many people could go against that, and fulfill their own goals in such spectacular fashion?

Just that was more than enough to earn Subaru's praise.

Moreover, he had performed to the extent that Abel, having been left behind, was left hesitant and disheartened. He did not know if that was in accordance to the expectations held.

Subaru: "You said there wouldn't be a big difference whether you or that person was left behind. If that's true, then there's only one reason why that person made this situation."

Vincent: "…You."

Subaru spoke as he thought, and without facing him, Abel let out a muted voice.

He was not so sure if anger had been present in that timbre or not, especially because he went without verbally assaulting Subaru in the way the latter had grown familiar with,

Vincent: "You, are you saying that you understand? The reason why Chisha plotted against me?"

Indeed, it was rather something to urge Subaru to voice the conclusion he had reached.

Vincent: "…"

Abel desired an answer.

An answer that even his own, that even Abel's own clever brain could not come up with. For something like that to come out of the mouth of Subaru, who did not even know the person known as Chisha, even if Abel had no expectations, he had begun to have expectations.

He could not help but think of those expectations as added pressure, but,

Subaru: “Well, no matter what you’ll think of me, we’re already this far in…”

Once he had stood up in defiance, there remained no reason to hesitate in speaking exactly what he thought.

The reason as to why Chisha had left not himself, but Abel, behind, that Subaru had thought of.

That was—

Subaru: “With fate trying to kill you, you resigned yourself to the opponent that was fate. That’s gotta have irritated him.”

Vincent: “—Hah?”

Subaru: “There’s also a pattern of like, wanting someone to live even at the expense of your own life. But, I don’t think that’s the case here. After all, the way you live wouldn’t have anyone do anything of the sort for you.”

He could understand the feeling that one might want another person to live even if it meant they themselves would die.

But, in order to harbor a feeling of the sort, they must greatly think of the other person as dear, and they need a reason to be made to think that way.

Prepared for his own destined death, desperate to pave the path for the sake of those who would continue after him, it was implausible that Abel would have anyone think of him in such a way.

Therefore, Subaru’s answer was that.

Subaru: “Chisha got irritated because of you. After all, he even proved it.”

Vincent: “Proved it, you say? Proved what? …Proved that I was plotted against, and that I was a fool?”

Subaru: “Flop-san and Mizelda-san have probably also realized that you’re a moron with a good head on him. What I mean is… the reach of the thing known as fate.”

Vincent: “Fate…”

As though vocalizing that word for the first time, Abel’s tongue became acquainted with that unfamiliar concept, muttering so.

In reality, for Abel, who confronted everything head-on, who resisted endlessly armed with his own predictions, all impediments could be put into words. Likely, he had not realized his opponent was something so absurd, so formless as “fate”.

But, beyond all doubts, the enemy to which Abel had unconsciously accepted defeat was fate.

At the same time, Chisha had proved that very thing by using his own life, and letting Abel live.

Subaru: “Fate can be fought. —There’s no reason to give up, not even a single one.”

Vincent: “…”

Faintly catching his breath, Abel kept silent as if the words he had been told had struck his very heart.

Had he not believed his enemy to be “fate”, likely, he would not have thought to fight it, or to even resist it. It would not have been something he had even considered.

However, supposing he were to know just what exactly that “enemy” was, what could possibly ensue?

If he, the wisest Emperor since the inception of the Vollachian Empire, were to know the true identity of his “enemy”, just what would he do?

Subaru: “—Abel, I’m not a Stargazer.”

Vincent: “…”

Subaru: “But—”

Adjacent to Abel, who remained silent, Subaru spoke as he placed his hands on the knees of his crossed legs.

Upon being accused, he denied it, only to be accused again. Upon denying it, he was accused, only to deny it again.

Although explaining or affirming the matter of his own Authority, the matter of Return by Death, was something he was not able to do, Subaru had also resolved his heart on something, during this dialogue.

That something was that which would have been his likely answer to Todd Fang, who had cornered him with words completely, leaving him unable to riposte in clear terms before their parting.

Subaru: “I’ll save as many people as I possibly can, as long as they’re within range of my hand. Even so, if there truly are still lives I’m not able to save, that’s…”

Vincent: “…A defeat served to you by fate, would it not be so?”

Subaru: “—. I can’t get a complete victory. After all, it’s not just me who’s fighting fate.”

He had not been able to save everything.

Thus, Subaru was unable to declare that he was going to save everything, even from here onwards.

While roaring for that inevitable fate to bring it on, while vowing to continue fighting against fate, yet still being faced with the loss of lives, Natsuki Subaru would mourn and lament, only to then continue to declare such things.

And in that manner, for the sake of diminishing the chances for him to lament, for the sake of diminishing the chances for him to shed tears—.

Subaru: “Lend me your strength, Abel. If you do that, I’ll also lend you mine.”

Vincent: “…”

Subaru: “From this point onwards, I’ll cooperate in full…! That said, I won’t say selfish things without consulting with Emilia and the others, but that’s just how passionate I am. That’s why…”

Saying that, Subaru firmly clapped his knees, and stood up.

Then, without looking at Abel’s face, he slowly advanced to the middle of the cabin, to the side of the bed. With a sidelong glance to the disheveled and bloodstained sheets, Subaru reached his hand into the basket of fruits.

Inside, was the appa which Abel had abandoned after splitting it in half. The cross-section of its white insides were turning to a light-brown coloration due to being exposed to the air, but not concerning himself with that, Subaru picked the halves up.

Then—

Subaru: “Help me finish eating the appa you cut in half.”

Tossing a half of the appa over to Abel, he sunk his teeth into the half he held onto.

With a pleasant sound, the sweet juice of the fruit slowly filled his mouth, and Subaru looked into the face of Abel, still plopped down on the floor.

Having caught the appa thrown at him, Abel brought his eyes down towards it, and after a moment of hesitation, he bit into it.

With a similarly pleasant sound, the sweet and sour flavor ought to have filled his mouth as well.

Whether he liked it or disliked it, hated it or loved it, was completely unrelated to that flavor.

As fellow living beings, there would be no difference in the flavor of the appa that they shared.

Vincent: “Natsuki Subaru.”

Subaru: “What’s up?”

Vincent: “I am not fond of you.”

Subaru: “Ngh.”

Vincent: “—But, I require your strength.”

Declaring so, Abel slowly stood up. With the half-eaten appa in his hand, Abel trained his sable eyes upon Subaru.

Once again he hid all the hues of uncharacteristic emotions that he had displayed within the cabin behind his consciousness as the Emperor; however, while those yet revealed themselves ever-so-slightly via his eyes and voice,

Vincent: “Apologies for mine many acts of rudeness. O Knight of the Kingdom.”

With that, upon seeing the Emperor of the Sacred Vollachian Empire bow his head, Subaru smiled.

Smiling, while biting into what remained of the appa,

Subaru: “I won’t apologize for my many acts of disrespect, Emperor of the Empire.”

And with that, the first step to rectify the discrepancies in their relationship, which had been mistaken ever since its very start, was taken.

Chapter 13:
To Each Their Wounds

1

???: “—You also came, Rem.”

Rem looked up quietly, as a voice called out to her from her side.

At the coupling of the coupled dragon carriage, a silver-haired girl opened the door of the next car and called out to Rem, who was leaning her back against the wall of the car—it was Emilia.

She had a beautiful face with a soft look in her eyes, and a girl holding her hand by her side. It was Beatrice, who had rushed to Subaru during the chaos at the Imperial Capital.

It was a touching sight, but Rem’s feelings toward them were extremely complicated.

Of course, this was partly because these women were related to Rem’s lost Memories that she herself had no knowledge of, but that was not the only reason.

Unlike Ram, who she had instinctively known was her sister, and the other people who had called themselves her companions, these two people were special. —They were special in that they were deeply connected to Subaru.

Both of them felt a particularly strong connection to him during the situation surrounding the Imperial Capital, during the retreat, and afterwards when they were visiting Subaru while he was unconscious.

Rem did not know why it bothered her so much—.

Rem: “Emilia-san, and Beatrice-chan…”

Beatrice: “Rem is also concerned about where the discussion is going, I suppose.”

Rem: “Concerned… Yes, right, concerned I might be.”

When asked by Beatrice, who had addressed her by name, Rem looked down slightly.

The reason Rem stood in the empty passageway was to watch over the cabin a short distance away—the cabin assigned to Natsuki Subaru as his sleeping quarters.

Subaru and Abel were now confronting each other in a quiet cabin after the large crowd of visitors had left.

Abel had a grim face, and when he was seen, he was often wearing an oni mask, so it was refreshing for Rem to see his true face.

However, as far as Rem knew, Abel always had a scowl on his face when he was unmasked. But today, his already grim face looked even more stiffened than before.

Emilia: “Rem, you’ve been around Subaru and Abel… er, Emperor Vincent for a while, haven’t you? Are they good friends?”

Rem: “Emperor Vincent, I’m not used to calling him that. And I don’t get the impression that the two are very friendly with each other. I would say that even though they had agreed on some ideas, they didn’t get along…”

Emilia: “Ugh, that’s what I thought…”

Beatrice: “Well, that was predictable, in fact. Abel’s way of thinking is like oil and water with Subaru, I suppose. Betty prefers the sentimental way Subaru thinks, in fact.”

Emilia: “Jeez, Beatrice is so quick to spoil Subaru. You have to properly listen to Abel’s side of the story… um, Emperor Vincent’s side of the story!”

Emilia’s shoulders slumped at Rem’s answer, but her lips pouted at Beatrice’s subsequent assertion.

In front of Rem, who thought her expression seemed to change from one moment to the next, Emilia added a surprised “Ah” and looked at her.

Emilia: “Oh, and, Rem, since we’re in Vollachia, you have to call me Emily…”

Rem: “…Um, is there a point to that?”

Emilia: “Eh, of course there is. No one thinks I’m Emilia. Right, Beatrice?”

Beatrice: “Since Betty also spoils Emilia, to give no answer is a kindness, I suppose.”

Emilia: “Huh?! What does that mean?!”

Emilia’s eyes widened at Beatrice’s kind misdirection as she held her hand.

Rem felt that her feelings were at the mercy of the two as she saw their hard to dislike interactions, but she soon grew fond of Emilia and Beatrice.

In the first place, if what she had heard was true, they had risked a lot to come to this country to look for both Rem and Subaru. There was no way she could dislike them.

Rem: “Unlike with him, there’s nothing suspicious about them.”

Subaru carried a stench that inspired fierce, instinctive alarm. While a large part of Rem’s hostility was due to that, there was no sign of it in Emilia and the others.

So, like with Louis, the People of Shudraq, Flop, and the others, there was no reason to bother snapping at them.

Although—

Rem: “…That person’s smell suddenly becoming fainter is also scary.”

She was concerned about Subaru, who had lost his strong stench while they had been separated.

Since she did not know what exactly it was, and between it existing and not existing it was definitely better if it did not, she wanted to say that things had improved.

And, as she had been thinking that.

???: “Huuh? It’s Rem-chan, Emily-chan, and Beatrice-chan!”

The door of the carriage on the opposite side from where Rem and the others were standing was opened, and the other party who had appeared called out the names of the three in a loud voice.

Waving her hands vigorously, a tall woman strolled towards them—her long golden hair was freely arranged, her skin was exposed like a dancer’s, and above all, she had fully grown arms and legs appropriate for her age.

She was—

???: “—Medium-san.”

Medium: “Ya-hoo! Perhaps, are you all worried about Abel-chin and Subaru-chin too?”

Emilia: “Yes, that’s right. Medium-chan was as well?”

Medium: “Yeah, yes! See, I finally have a big body again, don’t I? Now, unlike when I was little, I can stop adults from fighting, so I thought I could be useful.”

With her chest puffed out, Medium answered as such—they had not seen her for long, but like Subaru, she was one of those whose appearance had changed from that of an adult to a child.

The childish Medium was also very endearing, retaining her lively personality, but her charm remained the same regardless of the length of her arms and legs, so the familiar figure calmed Rem down.

It seemed that Medium had also been very frustrated when she was little, and she seemed to be enjoying being back to her large body as much as she could.

In any case—

Rem: “To stop a fight… that is, between that person and Abel-san?”

Medium: “That’s right~? It’s been a while since the two of them talked properly, aren’t they going to go wild?”

Rem: “I don’t know… Setting aside that person, I can’t imagine Abel-san going berserk.”

With a stern face and a harsh voice, she had the impression that Abel was one who said painful things.

However, unlike Rem, who had frowned at Medium’s concerns, Emilia and Beatrice’s opinions seemed to be closer to Medium’s side,

Beatrice: “Betty agrees with Medium, in fact. At the very least, Subaru has a lot to say to that Emperor, so he will probably snap at him, I suppose.”

Emilia: “That’s true. I, Emily, am a teensy bit worried too. A fight, it’s not only about hitting each other, but also about hurting each other with words.”

Rem: “…Is that how it is?”

Certainly, it would not be a scuffle, since there was no indication that Abel would raise his hand, but it was quite possible that Subaru could become emotional and the argument could intensify.

Because Abel was rational, Rem felt that he talked circles around Subaru comparatively more often, but Abel may not have much leeway now. She had not exchanged many words with Abel, who had regained his position as Emperor, but she could understand the concern of Medium and Beatrice.

And that speculation was immediately verified to be correct.

Subaru: “—Okay? Anyways, let’s sneak over to Garfiel. If it’s him, he should be able to understand our unavoidable circumstances.”

Vincent: “What, the scandal of how a Knight of the Kingdom raised his hand against the Emperor of the Empire?”

Subaru: “Don’t forget, if that goes to trial, I’ll talk about everything you’ve been up to as a last resort…!”

And so on, the door of the cabin opened as they continued the hushed exchange.

The eyes of those in Rem’s group, who were waiting for the discussion to be concluded, met the black eyes of the two men as they peeked out to see whether there was anyone in the aisle.

Subaru opened his mouth with an “Ah”, while Abel frowned with a “Ugh”.

However, that was not the extent of the reactions of Rem’s group when they saw the state of the two of them. After all, both Subaru and Abel, who showed their faces, were covered in blood.

Rem: “Unbelievable…”

Medium: “You two were having a much bigger fight than I thought you would?!”

Emilia: “Oh, oh no! Beatrice! Quickly, heal him…!”

Beatrice: “It’s as you see, in fact! Betty should have been there, I suppose!!”

Subaru and Abel met their gazes at the group of women who had welcomed them with a flurried commotion. Then Abel sighed, and Subaru raised his hands in resignation.

After that,

Subaru: “Um, you’re definitely going to get mad, so before that happens I gotta tell you… We’ve made up.”

With a wry smile on his pitiable face, he said that as if he had at least some good news to tell.

—In the end, their injuries were just a small cut on their hands, nothing impressive.

Medium: “But, the cabin’s a mess now and… We don’t have another cabin that we can prepare.”

Subaru: “No, I’m not going to tell you something as self-important as to prepare another cabin. I’ve seriously reflected on what I… Ah! Medium-san! You’re back to normal!”

Medium: “Hehe~, that’s right, Subaru-chin! Ah, no, that’s no good! I’m happy that you said that, but I’m also angry at you. The two of you are hopeless~.”

Saying that, Medium put her hands on her waist and scolded Subaru for his poor attempt to change the topic of the conversation.

Subaru’s shoulders slumped in remorse; however, instead of the depressed Subaru, it was Abel, whom Subaru had fought with, that received the brunt of Medium’s scolding.

Medium: “Abel-chin as well, while Subaru-chin is small, you can’t act immature, okay?”

Vincent: “…You, do you understand what you just did? You raised a hand against the Emperor.”

Medium: “Because you’re so great and all that, and no one has ever scolded you, Abel-chin, you’ve grown up to be like this, haven’t you?”

Vincent: “…”

Abel frowned and crossed his arms, meanwhile Medium was giving him a reproachful glare. As one could understand from the exchange that had just happened, surprisingly, Medium had slapped Abel over the head.

Looking at the disastrous state of the cabin, it was reasonable to want to scold Abel for fighting with the young-looking Subaru, but Rem was impressed by the absurd act.

Rem: “If it’s okay with Medium-san, may I also hit him?”

Vincent: “Do not join her. We do not have the leisure to look over each instance of disrespect one-by-one at this time. Do not do something that would make me have to take my time after the war to decide whether I should punish you by comparing it to your achievements.”

Rem: “That’s a shame.”

Of course, she had not expected to receive permission, but for Rem, it was fruitful to hear the words “after the war” come from Abel’s mouth.

At least, Abel was looking towards the future. Although she did not know what had been said during their conversation inside, compared to before he had visited this cabin, it felt like the light and color within his eyes had improved.

Emilia: “—Okay, this is good. But, you need to change your clothes or else everyone will worry about you, you can go see everyone after you’re dressed properly, okay?”

Beatrice: “Truly, you’re so troublesome, in fact. You can’t allow Betty to have any peace of mind, I suppose.”

Subaru: “Sorry, sorry. But it’s been a while, it feels so fresh. For a while the only people who worried about me were, except for Tanza, all men.”

Having wiped off the blood on Subaru’s face and hands with the hand towel she carried, Emilia patted him on the head.

Beatrice, with her hands held out and seemingly trying to heal his wounds, shrugged her shoulders, appearing to feel not only a sense of relief, but also a sense of joy.

Both of them seemed to feel happy to be looking after Subaru.

Looking at this, for some reason Rem felt her chest tingle.

Medium: “Hey, hey, Abel-chin, do you think you can manage?”

Not having noticed that which occurred in Rem’s heart, Medium tilted her head as she asked Abel this question.

Abel narrowed his black eyes at her question, and then nodded his head after a moment.

Vincent: “There is no problem. In fact, it is foolish to point at me and question whether I can work hard. Ever since I decided that I would assume the seat of Emperor, I lost the right to act haphazardly.”

Medium: “—? Does that mean that you’re going to continue working hard as the Emperor?”

Vincent: “—. That is a foolish way of saying it, but roughly, yes.”

Medium: “I see! Then I also agree! Let’s work together~!”

Medium’s face suddenly brightened up and she held her hand out towards Abel. Abel glared at Medium’s hand, and proceeded to turn his face away.

At Abel’s cold attitude, Medium withdrew her hand and clapped her hands together, producing a snapping sound.

Medium: “Well, should we go to meet the others? Big bro also wanted to talk with Abel-chin.”

Vincent: “I do not have the time to talk with that thing, but Serena Dracroy’s flying dragon ship should also be back soon. Either way, I need to talk with the main players now.”

Rem: “—Ah, please wait.”

Towards Medium’s urging, Abel drew back his chin.

For Abel, who liked to take care of things quickly, she knew that from now on, important discussions would have to be held to discuss how to deal with the problems occurring in the Imperial Capital.

Naturally, as people who were important to that discussion, it was already decided that Subaru and Emilia would be present, but before that, Rem had something important to say.

Half of the reason Rem stood there was because of her concern about the twisted relationship between Subaru and Abel, but the other half was because of that.

Subaru: “Abel, I also have something that I want to do before I meet everyone… something that I absolutely must do. So, let me go do that first.”

Rem: “Ah…”

Stopping the exchange, Rem tried to tell them her reason for coming. However, Subaru interrupted Rem as he began to speak, turning his gaze towards her.

That gaze made her understand that what he absolutely had to do was the same thing as what Rem had tried to say. So, Rem pursed her lips, and nodded.

And then—

Subaru: “—Rem, take me to Katya-san.”

3

???: “What the fuck, brat? This ain’t no place for you.”

When he visited his intended cabin, Subaru’s eyes widened as he was greeted by a vulgar voice.

Standing behind the open door was a man with a rough greeting voice that matched his eye-patched face—for a moment, he had a difficult time opening his memory drawer, but then it hit him.

Subaru: “Jamal… right?”

Jamal: “Oh? How do you know my name? I don’t know you.”

Subaru: “You’re, alive…”

Jamal: “Aren’t you a damned rude little brat, huh?!”

The name of the man who had opened his mouth that had an unexpectedly clean set of teeth and made his throat growl, was Jamal.

When Subaru was blown away to the Vollachian Empire, he was one of the first Imperials he had encountered—and this was the man who had been Todd Fang’s companion.

As far as Subaru knew, it was certainly in the Fortress City of Guaral, when Todd helped a General First-Class, who had been previously captured, escape, where he should have been captured as a prisoner of war by the rear guards who remained.

Following that, due to Subaru going through a lot, his safety had honestly slipped his mind.

Subaru: “Why are you in this cabin?”

Jamal: “What’s so weird about me being in my little sister’s cabin?”

Subaru: “Little sister… ah.”

Hearing the sound of his suspicion melting away due to the answer, Subaru remembered.

That reminded him, Todd mentioned that his fiancée was Jamal’s younger sister. Meaning that, the people in front of him, Jamal and Katya, were actually siblings.

The delicate Katya and the thuggish and wild Jamal were siblings.

Subaru: “Well, both your hair color and frizziness are similar…?”

Jamal: “I don’t understand what you’re saying, but I do understand that you’re pissing me off. Brat, if you don’t want to get hurt you should…”

???: “—Nii-san! Stop it!”

Perhaps annoyed by Subaru’s attitude, Jamal rolled up his sleeves and showed him a gesture of trying to kick him out by force. But before he could do so, a shrill voice from behind called him to stop.

Looking into the cabin past Jamal's side, the layout of the cabin was similar to the one in which Subaru was sleeping, and a woman was lying on a bed at the far end of the cabin.

That woman was—

Subaru: "Katya-san."

Katya: "You, you're finally awake… You, you've been sleeping too much. Seriously, really…"

Katya looked at Subaru across from the body of her brother, who was standing in the way, and he saw her sit up on her bed. Then Jamal quickly walked over to her and said, "Oi oi,"

Jamal: "Take it easy! You don't know when you're going to die, so move slowly."

Katya: "I'm not that fragile! Don't compare me to a brother who doesn't even die when he's supposed to be dead…"

Jamal: "I didn't die in the first place, but you people would've selfishly killed me anyway…!"

Jamal, his concern flat out rejected, and now stigmatized as a dead man after so long, slightly shuddered.

It seemed like a lot had happened in the reunion of these siblings, but it was not Subaru's real intention to delve into that. There had been another reason for his visit.

Rem: "—. Are you all right?"

Subaru looked down slightly and saw that his feet did not move very far from the entrance into the cabin, and it was Rem, who was with him, who had asked that.

After apologizing to Emilia, Abel, and the others, Subaru visited this cabin with Rem.

As Katya's friend, Rem had every reason to be present here. —That was because she too had wanted to hear what Subaru was trying to do from here on out.

Subaru: "Yeah, I'm all right."

Nodding, Subaru stepped into the cabin.

On the bed, Katya and Jamal were still arguing about something, but when Subaru arrived with Rem, Katya was the one who had closed her mouth.

As she was, she kept her blue eyes, framed by long lashes, downcast,

Katya: "…Is your body doing better now?"

Even if it was just a prelude to the main topic, her concern for Subaru's body was kind.

Her tone was blunt and brusque, but there was no doubt that she was a lovely woman at heart, and that was why she had become close to the unreliable Rem.

To this woman, Subaru had to tell her.

Subaru: "Yeah, I'm all right. Thanks, for worrying about me."

Katya: "…I wasn't worried or anything. It's just that this girl seemed anxious."

Subaru: "…"

With a glance, Subaru looked toward Rem as she stood next to him, her expression stiff.

Knowing roughly what was going to be discussed, he did not overreact to Katya's words as he normally would.

Although it was something he anticipated, Subaru admonished his own weakness, which made him want to put off the main topic. Taking a deep breath, he exhaled.

And then—

Subaru: “I’m sorry. I, couldn’t bring Todd back.”

Yes, he informed her of the final parting between him and Todd in the Imperial Capital.

Katya: “…”

Squeezing his small fist tightly, overcome with grief, Subaru let the cruel truth be known.

At the end of the battle in the Imperial Capital, even though Todd had helped them break through the siege of zombies, their clash was all but inevitable.

Subaru decided not to kill Todd, a man who hated and abhorred Subaru’s way of thinking and who was determined to get rid of him, and they faced off against each other.

But in the end—

Subaru: “Um, he was washed away by the floodwater that swept into the city, but any more than that…”

Katya: “—Oh.”

Subaru: “It’s just that, in the fight against the zombies, he acted as a decoy and suffered a lot of injuries. That’s why…”

At Subaru’s report, Katya’s hoarse exhale escaped. As if to overlap with that breath, Subaru described what he saw to Katya in a way that was not exactly as he had seen it.

If he wanted to, Subaru could have given Katya hope.

The reality was that the last time Subaru saw Todd, he was swallowed up by that muddy current and disappeared. If his body had not been found, it should have been possible to show some hope for his survival.

But, Subaru did not do that.

Subaru: "…"

The last time Subaru saw Todd was when his figure was encompassed by the flood.

However, the exact description had been left out. To be precise, the last time Subaru had seen Todd, he was in the form of a Werewolf, taking a deep axe blow to his chest and tumbling into the rushing waters.

—He was severely wounded, unconscious, and swallowed up by the muddy current. He could not have escaped harm.

Jamal: "—Hk."

Upon hearing Subaru's story, the sound of Jamal gritting his teeth hard could be heard echoing throughout the cabin.

For Jamal, Todd was his companion, and, more than that, his future brother-in-law whom he had decided to entrust his sister Katya to.

It was a terribly odd feeling, but if possible, Subaru also wanted to hope that Todd had survived.

Having his expectations seriously betrayed, their relation was that of his life being targeted, and in the world where Subaru actually Returned by Death, Todd was an opponent that had taken his life multiple times.

However, since he had a history of dealing with Todd on many occasions, he understood.

Todd was just an ordinary person with no special powers. The fact that he was a Werewolf was not an advantage which could overturn that life-threatening situation.

In a helpless situation where Subaru would die, Todd would also lose his life.

Todd Fang, he was swallowed up by that flood and had perished.

As the person who, in the end, had been the closest witness to the final moment of his life, that was Subaru's conclusion.

Subaru: "…"

Silence fell upon the cabin.

Gradually, the silence seemed to burn his forehead and the nape of his neck. There was a heartache that he had to live with; it was something he had decided to take on by himself.

So, after a while, as he continued to experience the sensation of his skin being burned—

Katya: "…You, you didn't see the crucial part of it, did you? Then, maybe he's not dead."

Her voice, faltering and cracking, caused Subaru to look up.

Not only Subaru, but also Rem and Jamal, all looked at Katya in bed. She fiddled with her hair, her blue eyes quivering.

Katya: "What, what if, you know? If you'd seen Todd's head get smashed in, or his body cut in half, or burned to a crisp, or something like that, you know? If you'd seen it, you might think so, yes, but…"

Rem: "Katya-san…"

Katya: "But see, he really, really clings to his life. And besides, when we parted ways, he told me he would come back soon… Definitely, back to me… He would never lie. Even when he told me that my brother had died! He just misspoke, that's all!"

Rem: "Katya-san!"

Raising her voice, Katya started clawing at her hair. The sight of it made Rem call out to her, and she cuddled up on the bunk to hold Katya's head.

Cradling Katya's head in her chest, Rem caressed her back.

Rem: "Slowly, breathe slowly. I am right here beside you…"

Katya: “You’re, you’re wrong… he wouldn’t… that easily… right? Right, Rem…?”

Rem: “Katya-san…”

Large tears streamed from Katya’s eyes, soaking Rem’s clothes as she hugged her. Without minding that, Rem continued to stroke her sobbing friend’s back.

Subaru’s heart was intensely torn by Katya’s honest reaction.

He understood.

That Katya would be hurt this way by telling her about Todd. It was a really, really complicated relationship, but Todd’s feelings for Katya were likely genuine. Katya as well, was really cherished by Todd. That was why there were these tears.

That was why Subaru did not mention the crueler truth.

It was something that Rem was not even aware of. —It was Rem who had finished off Todd, who had turned into a Werewolf, with an axe.

In order to protect Subaru, Rem had put an end to Todd.

Since Todd was in his Werewolf form at the time, and since he did not undo his beastification until the instant he was submerged, Rem was unaware of this fact. Moreover, Subaru had no intention of enlightening her on the matter.

Subaru did not believe that the truth had any value here.

Todd loved Katya, and Katya loved him back. That was what mattered. There was no reason to destroy those memories and dwell on what really happened.

Subaru: “Todd truly cared about Katya-san. All the way until the very end.”

That was the only motive without any lies that Natsuki Subaru, the target of Todd Fang’s raw murderous intent, could convey to Katya Aurélie.

Katya: “—Hk.”

Katya, sobbing, wrapped her arms around Rem’s back as she hugged her, and one could see her nails digging hard into Rem’s back. It was painful, but Rem took it in silence.

In this cabin echoing with sobs, Rem glanced at Subaru, and shook her head.

Within that gesture, Rem conveyed to leave Katya to her, and her gratitude to Subaru who had come prepared for this outcome.

Jamal: “—. Sorry to make you have to play a nasty role, brat.”

Jamal said this to Subaru as they left the cabin, leaving Rem and Katya behind.

When Subaru raised an eyebrow at Jamal’s surprisingly straightforward words, he grimly wrinkled his nose with a, “Ya know.”

Jamal: “It’s a tough role to inform the family of the deceased. No matter how heroically and bravely the person died, there are still those who will want to cry.”

Subaru: “…How about you?”

Jamal: “Huh?”

Subaru: “Because to you as well, Todd is your companion, your sister’s fiancé, and he’s someone special, right?”

With cheeks contorted, Jamal pondered Subaru’s question.

After a moment of silence, he touched the eye patch that was covering his right eye with his finger,

Jamal: “I don’t know. If the bastard had survived, I would have laughed it off that we both failed to die, but that step completely disappeared. Well, if he died fighting, then he did his job as an Imperial Soldier. Even though he severely mocked that."

Subaru: "…"

As he said that, Jamal gave a small snort and laughed at the last part.

Subaru could not tell whether it was a laugh at the thought of Todd's uncharacteristic end, or whether it was a laugh based on some kind of Imperial way that Subaru did not understand.

Whichever the case may be, Subaru did not feel that he could laugh at someone's death.

Jamal: "It's just."

In front of Subaru, who was thinking that, Jamal suddenly followed up.

Subaru opened his eyes wide at the tone of his voice. For what was in Jamal's continued voice was not anger or loneliness, but something more akin to anticipation.

And that impression was correct. Jamal went on to say.

Jamal: "I don't think that son of a bitch would die so easily. What Katya said is true… I haven't seen him actually die."

Subaru: "That is… Yeow."

Jamal: "Shut it, brat. Regardless of what I think, that's hope for Katya."

Jamal's finger flicked Subaru's forehead as he was about to involuntarily object. Having silenced Subaru, Jamal jerked his chin toward the door behind him as he said that.

Subaru could not discern whether the hope Jamal spoke of was a bright one or a cruel one. However, he understood that he was not qualified to interfere.

Only those who were invited and allowed to participate in Katya and Todd's lives had the right to interfere with their feelings. — Subaru was not qualified to do so.

Jamal: "Damn, for a guy who hated to fight, he had quite the hot-blooded attitude. And because of that, he crossed a far more dangerous bridge than I did."

Looking up at the ceiling of the hallway, Jamal made that critique of Todd.

Even though Jamal did not show his face and his voice was shaky, Subaru was still not qualified to point this out.

4

???: "Heeello~, Subaru-kun, you're looking well, areeen't~ you? You've been looking more youthful, I wooonder~ if it's thanks to the food of the Empire?"

Subaru: "Amazing. The only person that could make such a gaudy joke after seeing me like this is Roswaal."

Roswaal: "Oh my, no one else was calm enough to do that, riiight~? By the way, for the time being, in this place I go by the name Dudley—From now on, let's get along, okay?"

With his blue eye closed, leaving his yellow eye winking towards him, an expression that Subaru had not seen in a while—Subaru broke into a smile as he came face-to-face with Roswaal.

As expected, Roswaal was unphased as he looked at the shrunken-down Subaru, but Subaru decided not to mention that his style differed from his usual clown costume. It was a little vexing, it reminded him of when he changed his tone of voice, and intentionally omitted explaining anything.

After Subaru had informed Katya of Todd's final moments, Subaru went to the middle of the coupled dragon carriages to a larger passenger car that had been prepared for him.

The coupled dragon carriages—According to Subaru's prior knowledge, they were similar in structure to electric and railway trains, the likes of which could only be found in the Vollachian Empire, which was flatter than most other countries.

Of course, when it came to who had the most earth dragons, that went to the Kingdom of Lugunica; thus, he decided he would keep in a corner of his mind that it would probably be possible to lay out something similar, provided he chose the right terrain.

Roswaal: "This coupled dragon carriage, I dare say that it appears to be one of the secrets of the Empire. From what I've heard, it was invented by a member of the Nine Divine Generals known for their wisdom…"

Subaru: "I knew it. I've never seen something like this in the Kingdom… Thinking about it, we've seriously seen a lot of the inner workings of the Empire."

Roswaal: "Hahaha, it would be disastrous if we're prevented from returning just because we peeked at the dark side of the Empire too much. From now on, I think it may be wise if we spend some time with our eyes closed."

Subaru: "That's, no laughing matter either…"

Roswaal gave a hearty laugh in agreement as Subaru grumbled this. Otto wore a dismayed expression as he overheard their conversation.

The passenger carriage in question was a dining car with a lot of tables, designed with enough space to accommodate roughly twenty people. However, the purpose for all of these tables was not for having a meal, but rather for discussions such as assemblies and war councils.

In fact, Subaru and Roswaal were not the only ones there; there were many other faces as well.

Of course, there was Emilia and Beatrice, who had come here earlier, sitting at the same table as Ram.

Ram gave a scornful gaze to Subaru, who had come alone.

Ram: “Little Barusu, what’s up with Rem? Shouldn’t you be together with her?”

Subaru: “You really didn’t need to use that prefix… Right now, Rem is with Katya-san. For this discussion, I don’t think we’ll be seeing her face.”

Ram: “—. Ah, yes.”

Spilling out a sigh, Ram did not dig any further into Subaru’s answer.

At last, Ram had managed to meet her younger sister, Rem, but apparently they were not as clingy with each other as Subaru had thought they would be. From the get-go, he had the impression that the two of them were quite close with one another, so Subaru had hoped that the two sisters would be constantly holding each other’s hands.

Ram: “Ram and Rem are both their own person. Don’t be forcing your own selfish feelings onto us, young Barusu. It’s disgusting.”

Subaru: “Don’t read other people’s minds! I’m not being disgusting!”

Ram: “While Ram couldn’t be around, it was the people around Rem that supported her. Don’t think of belittling those relationships. Shameless, undeveloped Barusu.”

Subaru: “Let’s see how long it takes for you to use up all of your variations of my nickname, Nee-sama…!”

As his cheeks twitched at the various things Ram said and did, Subaru took a deep breath.

Ram had a point; it would be no good to rush. First of all, the sisters had been successfully reunited, so they should not rush and should advance forward slowly.

There was no need to worry, as there was a bond between Ram and Rem that no one could get between.

He was able to believe this from the atmosphere that he had felt when they had come to visit Subaru together.

Subaru: “But, is this all of our members? What about Petra, Frederica, and Garfiel?”

Emilia: “Petra-chan and Frederica are taking care of the soldiers that are fighting. Garfiel as well, he’s also busy with the wounded.”

Subaru: “The fighting, that’s still ongoing?”

Emilia: “Yes, it is. Subaru, I think you saw a lot of them in the Imperial Capital…”

In regards to the whereabouts of the missing members, Emilia slightly hesitated with her answer.

What she was about to say, Subaru could guess what it would be.

Subaru: “The zombies…”

Otto: “Wh-What is that, that strange name?”

Subaru: “A dead person that can move around. In my hometown, we call them zombies. I thought it would be better if they had a name, so I called them that for the sake of convenience.”

Otto: “Do you not have way too many weird things in your hometown, Natsuki-san?”

Otto turned a reproachful look towards Subaru, whose mouth curved into a smile.

In this case, he thought about whether he should argue that this world in which zombies had actually appeared was the stranger one, or whether it was his world, in which zombies were the subject of so many works of fiction, but did not actually exist. Truly an incomprehensible matter of dimensions.

Roswaal: “I see, that’s good, zombies. At least, we can avoid calling them “corpse soldiers”.”

Then, Roswaal cut in between Subaru and Otto's conversation.

Subaru ruminated on the words "corpse soldiers" that came from his mouth.

Subaru: "Something like that, it seems like it's connected to some bad memories, huh?"

Roswaal: "That is indeed the case. It's one of the memories that I don't wish to remember."

Beatrice: "As discussed in the Imperial Capital, it's safe to say that this is the result of the Sacrament of the Immortal King, I suppose. According to the records, it was used most recently during the Kingdom's civil war, in fact."

Subaru: "So that's why it's a bad memory."

At Subaru's gaze, Roswaal gave a vague smile as he declined to say anything further.

Roswaal had a deep knowledge of the past. Even if he himself had not participated in the civil war, he still might have had a bad experience with the Sacrament of the Immortal King.

Beatrice: "But, as far as Betty knows, that secret art is meant to be an unstable product, I suppose. To create such a great number of zombies and reproduce it so well, it should be impossible, in fact."

Subaru: "But, they were actually moving and talking, so there must be some reason for it, right?"

Beatrice: "…Betty is also scratching her head, I suppose. Dudley, you shouldn't be slacking off, in fact."

Roswaal: "Oya oya, I'm upset that you think that I'm slacking off. Since this also involves me, there's no reason for me to cut any corners. Besides, all of your lives are also at stake."

Beatrice: "Betty doesn't know how much to trust you, I suppose."

Roswaal: "I understand. Because your life is also at stake."

Beatrice: “What do you understand, in fact! You are just joking even more, I suppose!”

Roswaal gave this answer with his chin resting on his folded hands, causing Beatrice’s face to become red as she shouted at him.

Beatrice exploded with frustration at the teasing Roswaal, but even Subaru was not sure what Roswaal was truly thinking. However, since Beatrice was Subaru’s partner, he pulled down his eyelid and stuck his tongue out at him.

Emilia: “Well, I’m not really sure of the details, but is it alright if I call them “zombies” like Subaru?”

Otto: “I see no problem with it? It is shorter than saying “corpse soldiers”.”

Subaru: “That way of agreement is just like Otto…”

And so, just like that, as Subaru’s conversation with the others came to a close,

Berstetz: “—Your Excellency, according to a report I received from General Second-Class Kafma, they will remain in the Gairahal Tropics to keep an eye on the stragglers as much as possible.”

Goz: “Also, from General First-Class Olbart, he is using delaying tactics with the shinobis under his command! However, he said that, since their opponent has no need to resupply water or food rations, it seems that what he can do decreases by about half!”

Vincent: “As for Kafma Irulux and Olbart Dunkelkenn, tell them to continue their operations as they have been doing. Serena Dracroy, what of your flying dragon ship?”

Serena: “They have not yet returned. Hopefully the fact that it’s taking longer than anticipated doesn’t mean that the Fortified City has fallen.”

Vincent: “…If it performs the purpose that it was built to do, the Fortified City should not be unprepared.”

And so, with the flurry of several footsteps and important talk flying around, Abel and three of his Imperial followers—an old man, a large man, and a beautiful woman arrived within the carriage.

Subaru did not know any of their names.

Otto: "The old man is the Prime Minister Berstetz Fondalfon, the tall man is General First-Class Goz Ralfon, and that woman is High Countess Serena Dracroy."

Subaru: "You saved me there… Goz, I think he's the guy that was arrested for letting Abel escape."

Otto guessed the reason for Subaru's frowning profile and made his comment… Among the names that Subaru had heard from him was that of one of the Nine Divine Generals whose survival was supposed to be in jeopardy.

He was someone who was said that he could be considered an ally to Abel if he had survived, so he was honestly happy to see him actually at Abel's side.

Vincent: "All of you are here? Good, then we can begin the war council."

Subaru: "Hey, what about Flop-san and the others?"

Vincent: "If there was a shortage of manpower like at the Fortress City, it would be a different story, but, what value would the addition of a peddler provide to this war council?"

Otto: "That is true. I wonder, why am I even here…?"

Beside Subaru, who had tilted his head, Otto also tilted his head at what Abel said.

But, the reason that Otto had tilted his head was not known by the Emilia Camp, Subaru included. It was only natural for Otto to be present here.

He was even laughed at scornfully by Ram with a "Ha."

Subaru: “And Taritta-san, Mizelda-san, and the others are positioned in the passenger car at the rear; so they won’t be here for this discussion, right?”

Berstetz: “Yes. That is what we have heard from the People of Shudraq. They have given me a really reassuring reply that when the time comes for them to utilize their power, they will do so with full force.”

Goz: “Certainly, I never thought that I would get the opportunity to stand side-by-side with the People of Shudraq, renowned for their bravery and courage! If this were not a struggle for the survival of the Empire, I would be all the more excited! Damn!”

Vincent: “You make too much noise. Keep your mouth closed.”

Abel silenced Goz, causing him to clinch his fists, which were the size of a child’s head, as he restrained himself. It was an inconsiderate remark, but since nobody paid it any attention, it was probably just a typical exchange between them.

At any rate, he now understood why Flop and the People of Shudraq were not present.

Emilia: “Subaru, your friends from the Empire are…”

Subaru: “I’ve already told everyone in the Battalion that I would speak as their representative. Um, there’s something I want to discuss with everyone. Especially with Beako.”

Beatrice: “With Betty…? This doesn’t feel like it’s going to be good, in fact.”

Subaru: “There, there, there.”

For the time being, he had asked his comrades from the Pleiades Battalion to refrain from attending this meeting.

After all, Subaru and Abel were both in the same cabin. With one wrong move, Weitz could have attacked Abel in an attempt to hand over the throne to Subaru.

The lie that Subaru was the illegitimate son of Abel—of Vincent Vollachia, that he was the black-haired Crown Prince, was still ongoing. He eventually needed to resolve that issue as well.

Subaru: “Though, it would have been nice at least if Tanza were here…”

Subaru was the only one who was attending the meeting as a member of the Battalion. He did not feel comfortable taking her out of her cabin, as she was not looking well.

As was the case when she visited him, he would definitely have to talk to Tanza later.

Subaru: “Also, I haven’t seen Louis around…”

Ram: “That girl is with Medium and Flop. You seem to have a lot of feelings for her, but what do you intend to do with her, Barusu?”

Subaru: “—. We can talk about that later, too.”

Ram’s light-crimson eyes narrowed, and Subaru felt compelled to reply.

Ram knew that Louis was present at the Pleiades Watchtower right before Subaru and Rem were sent to the Empire. Naturally, from Ram’s mouth and from Abel’s, Louis’s true identity would have been shared with everyone.

Still, she would like to know who, along with what kind of work and effort, had made it possible for her to be on board this coupled dragon carriage.

In addition, they needed to find the best compromise for Louis.

Vincent: “Now that you have finally caught up, we shall start this war council, Natsuki Subaru.”

Subaru: “You, don’t forget that I’m holding onto an enormous scandal, okay? I mean, I guess it’s like that, but not quite.”

Abel’s attitude had not changed on the surface, even though he vividly remembered him meekly bowing his head. Using disparaging words at his attitude, Subaru put a stop to him.

Still, there was a companion whose movements had not yet been confirmed.

That was—

Subaru: "—What about Priscilla? She must have been in Guaral, and wasn't she also at the Imperial Capital? Besides, Tanza mentioned Yorna."

Subaru asked this, as if he were saying "she should have been there" while looking at Abel's face.

Somehow, Priscilla and her merry band of companions had come to the Vollachian Empire. Al had even accompanied him to the Demon City of Chaosflame, so he was sure that they were involved in the battle for the Imperial Capital of Lupugana.

As for Yorna, Subaru and his group had also received information that she had joined the rebels. Tanza also felt Yorna's presence in the Imperial Capital.

Naturally, such faces must also be on board the coupled dragon carriage.

Speaking of a face he had not seen, he also had not seen Cecilus either, but Cecilus's moodiness was the same as it was before he left Gladiator Island, so he was not concerned about him—

Subaru: "—Hey?"

However, when Subaru asked him about them, Abel fell silent and closed one eye.

Suspicious of his reaction, Subaru furrowed his brows as he looked around to see that Abel was not the only one who had such a reaction.

For some reason, nobody was saying anything about Priscilla's group's movements.

If Priscilla and the rest of her group had heartlessly returned to the Kingdom before the siege of the Imperial Capital, then Emilia and the others would have been surprised to hear Priscilla's name.

That was not the case. And, the answer to this uncomfortable silence was—

Beatrice: "—Subaru, that was kept secret to avoid agitating you, I suppose."

Subaru: "Beako?"

Beatrice took action before he could react and squeezed Subaru's hand. Subaru's cheeks tightened at Beatrice's preamble.

Then, Emilia turned her attention towards Subaru, who unconsciously held Beatrice's hand tightly,

Emilia: "Stay calm and listen to me, Subaru. About Priscilla and Yorna-san…"

She paused for a beat.

Emilia continued with what felt like a drawn-out answer to the anxious Subaru.

That was—

Emilia: "When we were all fleeing together from the Imperial Capital, we didn't find those two. —But, I want to believe that they're safe."

—It was a definite proof of the wounds inflicted to their side during the siege of the Imperial Capital.

Chapter 14:
The Kingdom and the Empire

1

—Priscilla and Yorna had not returned.

The lack of disagreement from the other people in the cabin made it clear that he had not misheard the startling information that came from Emilia's mouth.

The siege of the Imperial Capital of Lupugana, in the midst of the battle between the regular army of the Empire and the rebels who had risen against them, one could only imagine the magnitude of the role that Priscilla and Yorna had played.

At the same time, Subaru's fists clenched tightly in the realization of one thing.

Subaru: "So Tanza's disheartened expression, that was the reason…"

Subaru had woken up in the bed in the coupled dragon carriage, and some members of the Battalion came to visit him. He was concerned that among them, Tanza had been looking depressed the whole time.

Subaru had planned to discuss the future course of action with Emilia, Abel, and the others, and then try to ask Tanza again once things had settled down. However, before Subaru could actually do so, the reason for Tanza's anxiety became clear to him.

Subaru: "So even though those two didn't come back, we still left the Imperial Capital?!"

Vincent: "—. There is no end to the list of those who participated in the battle and have not yet returned. Of course, the presence of her and Yorna Mishigure would be substantial, but they shall not be given special treatment."

Subaru: “But Yorna-san is…! Even then! You also should have had some sort of bond with Priscilla.”

Subaru appealed to Abel as he glanced out the window of the dragon carriage, seeing the scenery outside pass by as it rode forth, and thinking of the Imperial Capital that was moving away in the distance.

He had not known the full details of the situation. But Priscilla, who had rushed to his predicament in the Fortress City, had literally flown there, likely to protect Abel.

The exchanges that followed, while sharp as if they were pointing blades at each other, seemed to have a certain sense of familiarity between two people who knew each other well.

Abel must not have been at peace with the desertion of Priscilla.

Perhaps his earlier distraught reaction in Subaru’s cabin was not solely due to the person known as Chisha, who had died.

Goz: “You, how dare you speak so rudely to His Excellency!”

However, the one to raise an objection to Subaru’s attitude had not been Abel himself, but the large man beside him.

A scarred-faced man clad in golden armor, Goz Ralfon; while the volume of his voice erupted like a volcano, he looked down upon the boy who was hounding the Emperor that Goz had pledged his loyalty to.

Goz: “Looking at the particulars of the situation in the Imperial Capital, it would only be natural for His Excellency to abandon the Capital! The remaining generals, soldiers, and people will understand the validity of His Excellency’s judgment!”

Subaru: “I’m not talking about whether it was right or wrong. What I’m trying to say is…”

Goz: “YOU—!”

Vincent: “Cease this, Goz Ralfon. It is not in his nature to stay silent.”

Goz’s face turned red at Subaru’s insistence, but Abel stopped him with his hand.

At the sound of Abel’s calm voice, Goz closed his half-opened mouth, and he hung his head in respect. Subaru, on the other hand, looked at Abel with an embarrassed look on his face,

Subaru: “Sorry for all the fuss. But I’m going to repeat the same thing to you.”

Vincent: “It is as Goz said. Remaining in the Imperial Capital under the current circumstances is tantamount to throwing away one’s life. I could not make such a decision. Of course, there is fear regarding the safety of Priscilla and Yorna Mishigure…”

Emilia: “You know, Subaru, it’s not all bad news… Well, umm, it’s said that even amidst bad news, there’s also hope.”

In front of Subaru, Emilia placed her hand on Subaru’s shoulder with lowered eyebrows.

She, like Subaru, was very concerned about the safety of Priscilla and Yorna. If she said there was hope, it was for Subaru’s sake, as well.

Subaru: “By hope, what kind do you mean?”

Emilia: “Priscilla and Yorna-san are both reaaally strong, but not only that, they have the power to influence the others around them.”

Subaru: “Around them… that’s, yeah. Though I don’t know if that’s the case with Priscilla.”

Yorna, the ruler of the Demon City of Chaosflame, had enhanced the entire city’s power with her Soul Marriage Technique, an ability to connect the path of her soul with all the city’s inhabitants.

That also applied to Tanza, whose unparalleled power, despite her appearance as nothing more than a lovely deergirl, was something different from the Pleiades Battalion's overall enhancement.

It seemed to be a rather powerful supportive effect, and the effect persisted even on the Gladiator Island, far from Chaosflame, and even during the siege of the Imperial Capital—.

Subaru: "…Could it be that Tanza's enhancements are still in place?"

Beatrice: "In addition, the effect on those who have joined us from the Demon City remains in place, I suppose."

Ram: "Naturally, that means General First-Class Yorna, the wielder of that mystic art, is alive and well. That's why Emily, who is of a nervous disposition, is not panicking."

Emilia: "Yeah, I'm not panicking. And, Priscilla is the same way."

Subaru: "Priscilla, is the same?"

Beatrice and Ram corroborated Subaru's guess. Then, Emilia's follow-up statement that Yorna and Priscilla were the same caused Subaru to frown.

If he were to interpret that at face value, it would mean Priscilla was a user of the same technique as Yorna.

Subaru: "But, that doesn't sound like a Priscilla-like ability, and I thought Abel said the Soul Marriage Technique was really difficult to use. Was that a lie?"

Vincent: "Fool. What is in it for me to deceive you? I do not care what you think of me now, but there is no reason to recklessly provoke animosity here. Use your head."

Subaru: "If that wasn't supposed to provoke my animosity, you're not cut out to be Emperor."

Even if it was not this time, in the near future, this was behavior that would surely lead to a revolt.

When Subaru raised this point, Goz again became angry, but Berstetz, standing next to him, intervened and prevented a major incident.

Otto: “In any case, though I do understand Natsuki-san’s impression of Priscilla-sama, she is a user of this so-called Soul Marriage Technique. I have seen it with my own eyes.”

Emilia: “Otto-kun is right, I saw it too. However, unlike Yorna’s extraordinary use of it, in her case, it is limited to her favorite servant-kun.”

Subaru: “Her favorite, Schult…? Speaking of which, what about Al?”

In conjunction with Priscilla having not returned, when the conversation turned to her camp, Subaru asked about the man in the iron helmet, who had not been seen here or in the coupled dragon carriages.

Al’s position was that of Priscilla’s Knight, although both master and servant did not approve of it at all.

He, too, was easygoing and frivolous, but he was certainly loyal to Priscilla. Naturally, Al must have felt most responsible for Priscilla not returning.

Beatrice: “…That man, he didn’t get on the dragon carriage, and instead remained in the Imperial Capital, in fact. Just as Subaru thought, he is taking action to search for Priscilla, I suppose.”

Subaru: “That guy…! No way, all by himself?”

Ram: “He was of the opinion that by his lonesome, he would be quicker to adapt to changing circumstances. Ram is in agreement with that idea. It would not be a good idea to leave so many people in the Imperial Capital under those circumstances.”

Subaru: “Damn, so that’s why… hk.”

He received an answer about the absent Al, but it was a fact that made Subaru’s brow wrinkle.

Despite his appearance, Al was quite astute, and he was someone who specialized in surviving things beyond his capability. Still, there was no doubt that his strength was a step below from those who were truly strong.

Despite being aware of this, Al supported Subaru like a relative. Even in the Demon City, there were many times when Subaru would have lost his life if it had not been for him.

Otto: "As for Priscilla-sama's camp, Priscilla-sama is at the top. Al-dono, her follower, and Heinkel-dono, who accompanied her, are missing. Schult-kun is resting in a cabin."

Subaru: "Heinkel… somehow, that's a name that I have an incredibly unpleasant memory of…"

Otto: "He is a drunkard."

Beatrice: "That description fails to get the point across, in fact… He is Reinhardt's father, I suppose."

Subaru: "—! That shitty father! Why is that guy in the Empire?!"

Eyes opened wide, Subaru retrieved an unpleasant recollection from the depths of his memory.

In the Watergate City of Pristella, Heinkel was the man who ruined the atmosphere when they had all been sitting in harmony. On that subject, he had been with Priscilla and the others, but it was surprising that he was also present in the Empire.

Egotistical and self-centered, it seemed like he would never have wanted to come to the Vollachian Empire.

Emilia: "But, Heinkel-san is also missing."

Subaru: "Just like Priscilla and Yorna, he hasn't returned… Dammit, I don't know how to feel about this."

Of course, he did not want him to die, nor did he think he should die.

On the other hand, he was not a person whom he thought of fondly, so he had no reason to wish for him to stay alive beyond not wanting to make Reinhardt or Wilhelm sad.

But, he had a thought about the results of him participating in that battle.

Subaru: "…"

Heinkel, a man of the Kingdom of Lugunica and father of Reinhardt, the Sword Saint.

A situation in which that man, caught up in a battle of the Vollachian Empire, ended up losing his life; the thought of that caused even Subaru, who was not on friendly terms with him, to feel a bitter emotion.

Subaru needed to return to the Kingdom with all of his precious companions, no matter what.

And so, it happened at the moment when Subaru had just strengthened his resolve.

Otto: "The circumstances of Priscilla-sama and Yorna-san are as I have told you. On top of that, I would like to make a firm statement before we start the meeting going over the future course of action."

The one who began to speak after a heavy silence had fallen over the cabin, was Otto.

He stood up on the spot and held up one index finger to attract the attention of those around him, and,

Otto: "As I am sure you know, we are people of the Kingdom. Having acknowledged that we are responsible for crossing the border at a time when we were not allowed to cross, I will state this."

Vincent: "—State it."

Otto: "Yes. —We have accomplished our objective. Once we enter the Fortified City of Garkla, we will proceed to go northward through the Kararagi City-States, and then return to the Kingdom of Lugunica."

In the midst of this unprecedented crisis in the Vollachian Empire, in front of the Vollachian Emperor who was undergoing the emergency of his country being brought to ruin, Otto made a clear declaration.

2

Otto: "—Natsuki-san and Emily, please remain silent."

That was what Subaru and Emilia were told before they could even say anything, taking the wind out of their sails.

Without turning his gaze to them, Otto's statement had surprised Subaru and Emilia before they would begin to vehemently protest, and had successfully allowed him to make the first moves.

Though, Subaru's and Emilia's reactions were natural.

With the Imperial Capital in such a state of destruction, and with no knowledge of the safety of Priscilla and Yorna, it would be too extreme to make plans to return to their home country.

Ram: "You may call it heartless, but Ram is in agreement with Otto's plan. We retrieved Rem and, incidentally, the short-limbed Barusu. Those results are satisfactory."

Emilia: "Ram… hk."

Ram: "There's no use in giving those wistful eyes, Emily. You should also understand. It is merely that Ram's group unexpectedly accomplished this without losing anything. It's far too dangerous to go any further."

In place of Subaru and Emilia, who had been ordered to be quiet, Ram gave her opinion of approval of Otto's plan.

Ram, having given a cold answer to Emilia's imploring gaze, partially closed her eyes in her usual pose, sitting on a chair and hugging her elbows.

Unexpectedly, they just accomplished it without losing anything. — Ram was right to express it that way.

As a matter of fact, they failed to bring Priscilla and Yorna back to this place. There was no guarantee that that would not happen to someone in their camp.

Serena: "Dudley, do you agree with your wife?"

Roswaal: "She's not my wife, but I'm generally in agreement with both of them."

The one who brought Roswaal to this topic with that exchange was Serena, a beautiful woman with a conspicuous white scar on her face.

Was the one Serena referred to as "wife" meant to be Ram? While denying that allegation, Roswaal concurred with Otto and Ram.

Roswaal: "In fact, if you look only at our objectives, I'd say it was a perfect accomplishment. His limbs have become a little shorter, and the girl who was supposed to be asleep has become a tomboy, but the results are excellent. I guess withdrawing to the Kingdom here would be the decision with the least fear of losses."

Ram: "Even if Barusu's teeth haven't finished coming out, Ram says the loss is minimal."

Subaru: "All of my teeth have come out, damn it…!"

Hoping for no argument, Ram ragged on her impression of Subaru's size. Regardless, given the bad course the conversation was taking, Subaru's eyes wandered around.

Otto, Ram, and Roswaal were the three people in the Emilia camp who had a strong voice in policy-making meetings because of their practical wisdom.

Despite being the crown of Emilia's camp, it was not unusual for Emilia's and Subaru's opinion to not be accepted. Rather, it was quite common.

Subaru: “So the only one on our side is Beako…?”

Beatrice: “…Sorry Subaru, but Betty is more on their side, in fact. Isn’t it far too dangerous to associate any more with the Empire, given that Subaru has shrunk, I suppose?”

Subaru: “No way, even you!”

Subaru’s eyes widened in shock at his partner’s unexpected betrayal.

However, although she looked apologetic, there was no sign of Beatrice saying “It’s a joke, in fact.” She was saying that because she really cared about Subaru.

In short—

Emilia: “Subaru…”

Subaru: “…It’s just Emilia-tan and I.”

Squeezing her white hand tightly, Emilia’s amethyst eyes wavered. Subaru cleared his throat at her call and broke out in a cold sweat because he was so outmatched.

At the very least, if the others who were not there were present, it would be a different story—.

Otto: “Just for the record, Petra-chan agrees with us. Frederica-san is passive, but would prefer to return to our home country… Garfiel is the only one on your side.”

Subaru: “Only Emilia-tan, Garfiel and I?! Stop joking around!”

Emilia: “Uhh… somehow I’m feeling reaaally helpless…”

With their wishful thinking smashed by pragmatism, the helplessness of Subaru’s and Emilia’s opinion was strengthened.

If this were a meeting where decisions were made by fistfighting, the presence of Emilia and Garfiel would be an overwhelming advantage, but they were simply not suited to other kinds of meetings.

Goz: “God! What a farce! I cannot stand to watch this!”

It was Goz who said as much while snorting at the arguments within Subaru’s group.

For him, who had previously complained about Subaru’s attitude towards Abel, he must have felt that all the words and deeds of his faction were disrespectful to the Emperor.

Taking a large step forward, Goz picked Subaru up by the nape of the neck. He truly did, and when he plucked him up with his two thick fingers, Subaru cried “Wah!” in astonishment.

Goz: “This is a matter for the Empire! If you are citizens of the Kingdom and not of the Empire, then you should cross the border as soon as possible, as per the policy you have established! Your strength is not required!”

Subaru: “W-wait a sec! We’re not quite done with our side of the conversation yet…”

Goz: “Silence—!!”

With his legs dangling in the air, a tremendous voice had struck Subaru dizzy.

Even with his hands covering his ears, Goz’s voice penetrated his defense as if it were a weapon. However, his argument came from his pride in being an Imperial Soldier, and Subaru had no reason to follow suit.

Additionally, the same was true for outsiders other than Subaru.

Emilia: “That’s enough, Goz-san. First, put Subaru down, then we can talk about this properly.”

Immediately, stepping forward with her hands on her hips, was Emilia.

She looked up at Goz, who was holding Subaru in his hand, and communicated her firm will to him. Her attitude made Goz scowl deeply, and with his scarred face, he looked down at Emilia.

Goz: “And you, I see you share this boy’s opinion! But! The Sword Wolves of the Empire will accept no charity! Your help is unnecessary! Join your comrades and promptly…”

Emilia: “That! I have a reaaally strong objection to that!”

Goz: “What?!”

Emilia: “You say that our power isn’t necessary! But! I don’t think that’s the case at all!”

Beatrice: “Her voice has gotten loud in the heat of the moment, in fact.”

Not wanting to lose to Goz’s vigor, Emilia’s voice, akin to the ring of a silver bell, grew louder and louder.

The beauty remained intact, but Emilia’s voice sounded more like the toll of a large bell than regular ones, and when she challenged him directly, Goz’s expression twisted.

Thrusting her finger towards Goz, who wore a contorted expression, Emilia continued.

Emilia: “After all! Even in the battle for the Imperial Capital, if it weren’t for me, Priscilla, and the others, everyone would have reaaally struggled a lot more!”

Goz: “—Hk!”

Emilia: “All of us! We were very strong, isn’t that right, Berstetz-san?!”

Speaking with a loud voice, Emilia turned the conversation to Berstetz.

Eyes as narrow as threads, the old man was unfazed by the sudden nomination. “Yes, I suppose so,” he replied, wringing the mustache around his mouth with his fingers, Berstetz: “For my part, it was unexpected that the Generals of the First-Class would be unable to succeed in their battles. If that was the contribution of these women…”

Serena: “It feels strange to talk about things from our perspective, but the white light that was fired from the Palace… it was dispelled by that girl in the dress.”

Berstetz: “—My my.”

Cocking her chin, Serena mentioned Beatrice’s achievement. Upon hearing this, Berstetz’s expression tightened slightly as he wondered what she had done to the light.

Just before Subaru and his team arrived at the battlefield, a single shot very nearly decided the battle—Beatrice’s achievement in erasing that shot was mentioned, so, as her partner, he was proud.

Subaru: “Well, Goz-san, the prerequisites are different now, right? You say you don’t need our help, but without us, the situation would have been much worse.”

Emilia: “Yes! I don’t know specifically how, but I imagine it would have been a lot worse!”

Beatrice: “Emily, it’s time to turn down the volume, I suppose.”

Subaru and Emilia had attacked in waves, with Serena and then Berstetz also providing support, causing Goz’s lips to twitch.

It would be difficult if only Subaru and his team had insisted, but in this situation, to be acknowledged by Serena and her colleagues, who also participated in the top-level meeting, seemed to be highly effective against Goz, who gave off a strong sense of having worked his way up as a military man.

However—

Goz: “…I certainly acknowledge your contributions. But! In the first place, you have not concluded the most important discussions among yourselves!”

Subaru: “That’s…!”

Emilia: “That’s not wrong…”

He gave them a reasonable counterargument, and Subaru and Emilia were disheartened.

Here, even if they were able to overcome Goz, it only meant that they had defeated an easy opponent, but it did not mean that Subaru and his allies’ ideas would go unchallenged.

Rather, in comparison to Goz, there were more difficult people to convince.

Otto: “I know it sounds callous, but let me say this.”

As soon as Subaru recognized his adversary again, that opponent spoke up as if he had seen it coming.

Beginning to speak in way that gave off naught but a bad premonition, Otto looked between Subaru, who was being grabbed, and at Goz, who was grabbing him, and,

Otto: “As General First-Class Goz says, this is an issue for the Empire. Unlike the necessity of the situation that befell us, to get actively involved from this point on could become an… international incident, interfering in the internal affairs of other countries.”

Subaru: “Guh… hk.”

Otto: “First of all, why would you want to interfere so badly, Natsuki-san? Whatever the case may be, it is probably due to your obligation to the people you have come to know in the Empire up to this point, or some other such thing, correct?”

Subaru: “Don’t talk like you know what is going on! But anyway, is what I want really so wrong?!”

Otto: “Not wrong, but I also have this to persuade you. —Well, what I mean is, what if Natsuki-san takes all the people whom he cannot abandon out of the Empire.”

Otto was someone who aimed to solve problems through reason, so displaying that philosophy to the greatest extent, he caused Subaru's eyes to widen at the outrageous proposal he had just made. As if Goz was just as surprised, his fingers slipped as he dropped Subaru onto the floor.

Naturally, this also took Emilia by surprise. As she helped Subaru, who had fallen onto his butt on the floor, she looked over, saying, "Otto-kun?", and,

Emilia: "What do you mean by that? No way, are you really…"

Otto: "There is no twist, that is just what I am proposing. That even in these circumstances, we should perform the reckless action of taking the people who want to come with us. Fortunately, we have the right to make the decision."

Glancing over, Otto's gaze turned to Roswaal.

Roswaal was supposedly hiding his identity within the Empire, but it was true that he was the most powerful man in the Emilia camp. If Otto's opinion was accepted, Roswaal would be the one to guarantee the acceptance of those seeking refuge.

Then, at Otto's challenging manner, Roswaal shut his yellow eye,

Roswaal: "At the very least, I'm sure my employer wouldn't refuse. If it keeps them from taking a risk they don't have to take, then it's a necessary expense."

Ram: "Since you're referring to Barusu, with his immature way of thinking, the majority of the people he's latched on to are likely those who don't have the strength to fight. They would not be people that the Empire would regret letting go of."

While negotiations were happening at a daunting level, Subaru and company were left to the side as they were being talked about.

Neither Roswaal's overly broad sense of self-preservation, nor Ram's speculation based on her insight into Subaru's character, found room to interject, and the conversation proceeded in a muddled manner.

Otto: “What do you think, Your Excellency the Emperor? If we can reduce the number of casualties in your country as much as possible, our proposal is not a bad one, correct?”

Vincent: “—. A very well-thought-out proposal. The kind that is difficult to so easily dismiss.”

Otto: “Thank you for the consideration.”

Abel’s words affirmed that it was a shrewd proposal, and Otto bowed socially. However, for Otto’s part, it would not be surprising if he was imagining himself sticking out his tongue.

Imperialism and Otto were incompatible. Not necessarily in terms of ability, but in terms of character.

Like Subaru, it seemed Otto did not like the Empire.

They were of the same opinion on that. The only thing Otto was doing on top of that, was organizing things based on importance.

Subaru: “Guh…”

It felt as if he had gone and fixed a hole on the ship they were meant to ride on his own, but ended up remaking the ship into a different one entirely.

This ship sailed in a different direction from what Subaru had wished, but it flowed and drifted to protect the lives of Subaru’s precious ones, heading for a different shore.

Subaru knew that this was something that had been thought-out in consideration of him and his companions.

He knew that, and yet.

Otto: “How about it, Natsuki-san, this is the best I can do in terms of compromise and consideration.”

Rather than unsparingly dismissing Subaru’s opinions, Otto tried to accommodate Subaru’s opinions as much as possible and, at the same time, ensure their safety.

He thought he was a reliable guy, but he was far too troublesome an opponent when they had a serious disagreement. He was a man who should have been given a drink and left in a drunken stupor before this discussion had occurred.

To Otto's overpowered theoretical armament, how could Subaru, who only had a cypress stick—.

Emilia: "—Hey, Abel, I have something I want to ask you."

Subaru: "Emilia-tan?"

Suddenly, Emilia, who must have shared the same opinion as Subaru, while also feeling the same frustration at being pushed around, approached Abel with a remark.

Looking at her profile, Subaru's eyes widened.

Unlike Subaru, who was forced into silence as he looked frustrated and tried to find a way out of the situation, neither Emilia's eyes nor her profile showed signs of being outmatched.

At Emilia's dignified and brave call, Abel's sable eyes trained their gaze on her.

Prompted by his silence, Emilia's thin lips moved,

Emilia: "How many people are there in the Vollachian Empire altogether?"

Vincent: "—. The civil war this month has probably reduced the number considerably; but it was roughly fifty million or so before that."

Emilia: "I see."

With a furrowed brow, Abel answered Emilia's question. Hearing his answer, Emilia let out a short breath, then raised a finger to her lips and looked at Subaru.

And then—

Emilia: “You heard him, Subaru.”

Subaru: “…”

So said Emilia to Subaru.

For a moment, Subaru failed to catch the meaning of the words that she gave him, and then his eyes immediately widened and his cheeks stiffened.

Then, as he hesitated for a moment wondering what he should do with that which prompted such a reaction,

Beatrice: “Subaru, Betty has already voiced her opinion, in fact. But…”

Subaru: “Beatrice…”

Beatrice: “Betty will always be on Subaru’s side, I suppose.”

Holding onto Subaru’s hesitant hand, Beatrice snuggled her body up next to him.

Beatrice was almost the same height as Subaru, and her eyes were even closer than usual; as they stared at him, Subaru took a deep breath in, and exhaled.

Then, still under Emilia’s expecting gaze, Subaru looked at Otto.

Looking up at him, he spoke.

Subaru: “Fifty million.”

Otto: “…What?”

At that blunt statement, Otto asked this back as he raised his shapely eyebrows.

At that reply, Subaru’s chest heaved, his cheeks contorted into a smile, and then he repeated what he had said.

Subaru: “You, you told me earlier. You told me to take all the people that I can’t abandon with me to the Kingdom. In that case!

The ones I can't abandon are those fifty million people!"

Otto: "—Hk, Natsuki-san!"

Subaru: "I know! You're the one who's right! I'm the one who's spouting nonsense! I understand that everyone came to save me and Rem, and I get what you're saying! But!"

Subaru thrust his hand out at Otto, who had raised an eyebrow, and while Subaru mocked himself, he could not pull his own weight.

There was no way that he could have beaten Otto, Ram, and Roswaal if he had been forced to reason with them. So then, Subaru would do what he could with Emilia and Garfiel on his side.

In other words, when faced with logic, he had become unreasonable with an emotional argument.

Subaru: "It's a hell of a bad situation! If we leave and the Empire is ruined, then what? Just thinking about it is enough to make me not want to eat!"

Otto: "What about the risk that we will bear? If we save fifty million strangers but in exchange one of us dies or sustains a wound that cannot be healed, it will be much more painful."

Subaru: "I'm not gonna let any of us die or get into that kind of trouble. That's an absolute! That's an absolute, so what the hell even matters past that?"

Subaru retorted to Otto as he quietly cornered him. Then, he looked not at Otto, but at Roswaal, who was standing off to the side with one eye closed.

Subaru: "Roswaal! You should know. My absolutes, are absolutes."

Roswaal: "…I am Dudley, Subaru-kun, though it would be somewhat too dishonest for me to not nod my head to that question, given my high expectations of your absolutes."

Though a bit of a roundabout way of putting it, Roswaal put his hands up in response to Subaru's opinion.

Even if he did not know about Return by Death, Roswaal knew about Subaru's Authority. So, the part of him that had expectations of that Authority, would not allow for Subaru's mood to be harmed.

In the first place, if he were to fall for Roswaal's cajolery here, what would become of his Oath from back at the Sanctuary.

Emilia: "Ram, please…"

Ram: "…Emily, do you at least have something to convince Ram?"

Emilia: "I'm just trying to do my best and I just want to help everyone… So, please."

On the contrary, Emilia took a ridiculously brute-force approach and asked a favor of Ram.

If Subaru would have done the same thing, Ram would have mercilessly smacked him with a verbal slap, but she was unable to respond effectively to Emilia's forcefulness.

Then, Ram let out a small sigh.

Ram: "Ram would have been fine as long as Rem could be brought home. But the way that Rem is now, she's become so close to the people of the Empire… If that was to be ignored, it would be harmful to Ram's dignity as an older sister, which she has only now finally realized."

Emilia: "Ram…!"

Ram: "Stop, it's irritating."

Emilia hugged Ram, who had closed her eyes and found her own reason for compromise. Ram responded to Emilia's embrace with an unpleasant look on her face.

And so, Roswaal and Ram caved in a way that could only have been achieved by some hard work.

However—

Subaru: “Otto, please…!”

Otto: “Are you going to use the same persuasion by tears as Emily did? Sorry, but I am not like Ram-san. I am not foolish enough to sign a contract when I do not know what the price that I will have to pay is.”

Subaru: “Beako is also begging you…!”

Beatrice: “B-Betty is also begging you, in fact.”

Otto: “Even if you have two or three people, I will not budge.”

Subaru urged Beatrice to join him, but Otto preemptively stopped Emilia, who was hugging Ram, from joining in again.

Otto’s face showed that he was completely determined to not let his decision be swayed by emotion, his stubbornness akin to the difficulty of when Subaru faced off against the maniacally-obsessed Roswaal. However, even if he conveyed that slanderous remark to Otto right now, he would not listen.

Otto: “We would only be taking a risk; there would be no advantages in going along with the thinking of Natsuki-san and the rest of you. You do not even satisfy the conditions to persuade me with tears. Ram-san, and Dudley-san as well, please do not go so easy on them.”

Roswaal: “Oya, I’ve been scolded.”

Ram: “For someone of Otto’s social standing, you’re quite impudent.”

Otto spoke sternly, Roswaal shrugged his shoulders, and Ram frowned. But, they did not hold an opinion different from Otto’s, so the two did not argue any further.

In reality, if the fortress known as Otto could not be conquered, they would not be able to push past this situation.

After all, merely imposing circumstances that everyone did not agree on from above, was something that neither Emilia, nor the Emilia Camp, could deem as acceptable.

Then—

Vincent: "—You said that there would be no advantages. In that case, the conversation would change if there were to be advantages."

Otto: "…"

It was neither Subaru nor Emilia, but Abel who had interjected.

At the Emperor's intrusion into the conversation, Otto's gaze sharpened. Unlike Subaru's flippant way of talking, Otto turned his disrespectful gaze towards the Emperor.

Otto: "If there is any advantage, that is. What in the world do you intend on? I will say this in advance, there is no possible compensation that could make it worthwhile for us…"

Vincent: "—Towards a Royal Candidate of the Kingdom of Lugunica, I formally request assistance."

Otto: "—Hk."

At Abel's proposition, Otto's expression tightened, and he made a sound with his throat.

At the same time, several expressions began to violently tremble, and more so than those of Subaru and his companions, it was those of the ones on the side of the Empire. Serena laughed at those words while Berstetz's slitted eyes widened.

Then, with astonishment plastered on his face, Goz spread out his hands, and as if it were the very end of the world,

Goz: "Please wait, Your Excellency!! A request for the Kingdom's assistance… Such a thing! It is completely unprecedented in this Sacred Vollachian Empire!!"

Vincent: "What matter is it if there is a precedent or not? If you say that, what precedent is there for an unsightly Emperor to lose the Imperial Capital to such an impudent bunch? Such a foolish fixation."

Goz: "BUT! The soldiers and generals and citizens will lament that you have made a decision not worthy of the Sword Wolf if you choose to rely on the aid of another nation! I say this respectfully, but a shadow will be cast over the authority of Your Excellency the Emperor!"

Vincent: "A shadow cast over my authority… Such a foolish concern."

Towards Goz's loud complaint, Abel shook his head as he supplied that reply.

At this declaration, Goz froze as his eyes widened. Looking back at Goz, Abel called out "Goz Ralfon", the name of his retainer.

Vincent: "Currently, is hollow authority without any substance what we need? —That is not so. Right now, the Empire desires to be victorious. To bite off the throats of our enemies, to bathe in their blood, to gorge on their lives; before any of that, the victory we obtain will be what shapes the Empire's tomorrow."

Goz: "Y-Your Excellency…"

Vincent: "Those who sink their fangs in and become a hindrance, they are all enemies of the law of iron and blood imposed by Vincent Vollachia. Answer carefully, Goz Ralfon."

Goz: "…"

Vincent: "—You, are you my enemy?"

As he was asked this question quietly, Goz's entire body began to shake.

Showing no signs of his struggle with Subaru back in the cabin, standing upright, there was power in Abel as he displayed his might as Emperor.

There was a dominant power in his gaze, in his voice, and in his very being itself, and Goz had to face that power up close and head-on, all by himself.

Then, after a period of careful contemplation that must have lasted less than five seconds, Goz—

Goz: “I beg Your Excellency’s pardon for taking up so much of your time. —I am Goz Ralfon! The warhammer that will shatter the many obstacles that stand in your way! Never! Never will I be your enemy!”

Vincent: “If that is the case, then so be it. I am relying on your work. Strive to do better.”

Goz: “Yessir!! …Yessir?!”

Nodding to Goz’s boisterous answer, Abel responded with his expectation that his subjects should work at their best. After accepting it emphatically, Goz let out a thunderous sound.

Perhaps it was the words that Abel had added that caused his surprise.

Goz: “—Hk, I shall give my utmost efforts!”

Goz wiped his face with his thick arm and pledged to Abel again in a trembling voice, while tears streamed down his face.

Looking away from him, Abel glanced at Serena and Berstetz,

Vincent: “You two also have no objections?”

Serena: “No. You have a look that I like, and I now feel more loyalty to His Excellency than ever.”

Berstetz: “No, not even from me. Except that I am more than a little surprised.”

Vincent: “Hmm.”

Serena smiled, and Berstetz once again narrowed his eyes. After letting out a snort at their demeanor, Abel then proceeded to go forward and stand in front of Emilia.

Then, he looked at Emilia, who was blinking her eyes,

Vincent: “You have heard me correctly, candidate for the Royal Selection. The Vollachian Empire formally requests the assistance of the Kingdom of Lugunica to put an end to this situation. —Lend us your strength.”

Emilia: “…You know, Abel. I would certainly like to help you, too. But, I reaaally don’t know what you’re talking about with this Royal Selection candidate stuff.”

Subaru: “Emilia-tan, no! This is one of those times where you don’t need to keep it secret!”

Emilia: “What?! Are you sure?!”

Emilia, who looked really distressed by Abel’s offer, widened her eyes.

Both Subaru and Beatrice nodded back at her repeatedly, and Emilia looked at Ram, who was still in her embrace, seeking further confirmation.

Then, Ram shook off Emilia’s arms and pushed her away from her.

Ram: “Yes, of course. —Do what you wish, Emilia-sama.”

Emilia: “—Ah.”

When Ram called her “Emilia”, Emilia was surprised as her eyes lit up. She blinked to hide her joy behind her eyelids and then turned to face Abel once again.

As Abel waited for her to resume, a slight frown on his brow, Emilia cleared her throat with an “Ahem”,

Emilia: “I am Emilia, just Emilia, a Royal Selection Candidate for the Kingdom of Lugunica to decide who will become the next king. And one who wants to help the Empire that is currently in danger.”

Vincent: "—. This is a formal request; the Vollachian Empire would never ask for the cooperation of a person from another country, even one in such a position of great responsibility. Therefore, if this fact became public, it would serve as a tailwind for you, who is fighting for the throne in the Kingdom…"

Emilia: "Jeez! That kind of stuff can wait! What I want to do now is this!"

When Abel tried to lay out some solid logic, Emilia puffed out her cheeks. With that cute puffed-up face, Emilia presented her hand to Abel.

Slowly lowering her lifted hand, Emilia offered it to Abel,

Emilia: "Allow us to help your Empire."

In the end, it conversely seemed as if Emilia was the one who broached the subject. Looking down at Emilia's outstretched hand, Abel glanced toward Subaru for a moment.

Subaru smiled and nodded with a wicked look on his face at the faint bewilderment arising in Abel's black eyes.

Subaru: "By all means, Your Excellency the Emperor. I allow you to hold my Emilia-tan's hand."

Emilia: "And that's why I say Subaru is mine."

Emilia wryly responded to Subaru's light-hearted comment, to which Abel closed one eye and sighed.

Then, his hand slowly grasped Emilia's proffered hand,

Vincent: "—Very well. I shall accept your aid."

Again, in the end, this was a very Abel-like thing to say, in establishing cooperation between the two countries.

3

—And thus, Emilia and Abel shook hands, and an historical moment between the Kingdom of Lugunica and the Vollachian Empire was engraved.

Subaru: “Umm, Otto-san, any opinions on something of that sort…?”

That event with the Subaru and Emilia party and the Abel plus Empire party had come to a climax, their exchange ultimately reaching a handshake, yet Otto, the one who had first suggested something of the sort to begin with, had been left by the wayside.

A compromise with Roswaal and Ram had been found, but since Otto, for whom that had not been that case, had been left behind as the matter progressed, Subaru had been filled with trepidation.

Since he was aware that he had been way out of line, he subconsciously asked Otto for his opinion, buttering him up with formal language and a polite demeanor.

Otto: “…”

And to that inquiry posed timidly by Subaru, Otto went without replying.

Too scared to look at Otto’s face, Subaru found being answered with silence greatly troubling. Thoughtlessly, he hugged Beatrice to his side, their cheeks coming into contact,

Subaru: “Wh-What should I do, Beako… Otto won’t talk to me…”

Beatrice: “Betty understands that feeling, I suppose. From Otto’s perspective, he must feel like you’ve played him for a complete fool, in fact. You ruined his idea, and made him look like a complete clown, I suppose.”

Subaru: “A clown, even if he doesn’t resemble Roswaal that much…”

Beatrice: “Stop it, in fact! An insult that massive will only make him angrier and angrier, I suppose!”

Flustered and panicked, Subaru and Beatrice fumbled for a way to break the impasse, together.

He wished to make amends for making Otto lose face, but just what should he do?

Subaru: “Shall I give you a foot or a shoulder massage…?”

Beatrice: “It’s like, you’re apologizing for angering your parents, in fact…”

Subaru: “Because I can’t think of anything else! Otto, I’m begging you… hk!”

With Subaru unable to come up with a decent enough proposal, Otto, having stood in silence until then before the former, abruptly pulled a chair, then sat down on it with a plop.

Surprised by that sudden action, Subaru and Beatrice jumped back while still embracing one another. Certainly it was not that he had sat on the chair to have Subaru give him a shoulder massage.

And, before the panicky duo of Subaru and Beatrice, Otto brought a hand to his forehead—

Otto: “…Well, have you calmed down and settled for my desired compromise?”

Subaru: “Heh…?”

Letting out a long and deep breath, Otto massaged the skin around his eyes. Taking in the words he had declared, Subaru was left stumped, and blinking his eyes alongside a “No way”, he spoke.

Subaru: “No way you thought this would happen from the beginning…”

Otto: “I did not think it would turn out this way, but I was eager to do something this big. Because, I did not know just how many concessions Emperor Vincent would present. But, since you and Emilia-sama would not change your opinions anyway, Natsuki-san, I needed to devise some compromises.”

Subaru: “Ah, oh, uh, eh, ah, oh, uh…”

Faced with that nonchalant response of Otto’s, Subaru’s mouth was left agape. In disbelief, Subaru turned around; however, his eyes met those of Roswaal and Ram.

Then, those two also wore looks on their faces that said that for the most part, they had generally understood everything.

Subaru: “You guys, you guys, are SCARYYYYYY—!!”

Otto: “How upsetting! First and foremost, it only happened because you guys were so stubborn, Natsuki-san!”

Subaru: “Uwaaah, I can’t trust anyone besides Beako and Emilia-tan anymore… And Rem! And Louis! And Tanza and everyone from the Battalion, and Flop-san and Medium-san, and Mizelda-san and the People of Shudraq!”

Beatrice: “There were still a lot more, I suppose!”

While squeezing Beatrice tight in a hug, Subaru could not help but feel fear towards the meticulous mental preparation of Otto and the others of the brainiac squad. Perhaps Abel had paid some extent of heed to their plans, but even so.

Subaru: “No, scary scary, I really can’t handle this. From now on, I’ll be taking the emotional approach.”

Beatrice: “Betty does not understand that conclusion, but she thinks it would be better if Subaru took a route in which he was honest with himself, in fact. If that route is the emotional one, then Betty likes it, I suppose.”

Subaru: “Yeah, I love you too. Geez, really—”

Finally, the shock of the Otto from earlier began to wear off, and Subaru was relieved.

And, it happened just as his feelings were simmering down with that exchange.

—Unexpectedly, the clapping of hands rang out within the cabin.

???: "—Deary me, feels like I've just stumbled upon somethin' incredibly delightful. So darn amazin', it's quite a big deal."

Loud applause had been produced, and reflexively turning around as to see who had clapped their hands, Subaru held his breath upon spotting an unknown figure present.

In a corner of the cabin, where no one had been, a tall figure now stood before anyone had been able to notice. Clapping their hands together, that person had been watching the exchange taking place until then.

—Without anyone in the cabin having noticed their presence.

Goz: "Who are you?! How in the world did you get here…??!!"

???: "Ah, darn. Well, I accidentally clapped even tho' no one called for me. This won't do, this won't do, it's a bad habit of mine to unconsciously be praisin' any praiseworthy children that I find."

That instant, protecting Emilia and Abel behind him, Goz adopted a fighting stance.

And before Goz, his expression having become bloodcurdling, that person kept their indifferent attitude, as if everything were unrelated to them, biting the golden kiseru they had retrieved from a pocket, donning a shrewd smile.

That figure already was terribly out-of-place, and even more conspicuous was their outward appearance.

Nearly two meters tall and sporting black body hair, their blank, smiling countenance had some charm to it, and alongside their unkempt fur, they gave off the impression of a gentle black dogperson.

Dressed in a kimono and biting on a kiseru, having had appeared unnoticed in the coupled dragon carriages where many key figures of the Empire had assembled, that existence naturally attracted the attention of all those present.

???: “My my, y’all do seem to be quite curious ‘bout me, don’t’cha?”

Emilia: “Who are you? Why did you come here?”

While turning their gaze, the dogperson scratched their head with their finger. And Emilia, protected by Goz’s back, inquired so of the dogperson.

In response to that query, the dogperson tilted their head. The shape of their mouth, lined with fangs, broke into a smile, and thus spoke.

???: “Well, the name’s Halibel, but mind if I pop in to give a quick howdy?”

Thus he declared.

Chapter 15:
Admiration

1

Speaking in a carefree tone, the beastman scratched his head, giving a large grin as he gnawed on his golden kiseru.

He had moderately long black fur and a countenance that gave off quite the affable air. Neither did his gentle way of speaking feel like it contained any malevolence, nor did his relaxed posture seem to harbor any sense of wariness as he stood.

Nevermind the fact that among these coupled dragon carriages, in the cabin where a conference between important figures from both the Kingdom and Empire was taking place, nobody among those powerful individuals included had noticed his presence.

Goz: “Halibel, you say…?”

Indeed, with shivers of fear mixed into his stern voice as he muttered thus, Goz had been the one to issue the strongest level of vigilance towards that presence as he protected both his lord and his new ally behind him.

He himself was one of the Nine Divine Generals, a military man whose name was among those of the strongest rank within this Empire riddled with warriors, that of General First-Class. That very Goz had not perceived the invisibility of the beastman who now stood before his eyes.

But, that fact alone was not the entire reason for the stiffness of his voice.

Vincent: “—The Admirer, hm? What business does the cornerstone of the City-States have here?”

Shielded by Goz’s back, staring beyond that large body and fixing his eyes on the beastman—on Halibel, Abel inquired so.

Perhaps it was the well-known alias of this dogperson that he had uttered before he asked his question. For some reason, Subaru felt like he had heard it somewhere before, and in his surprise, he fumbled around for it within his box of stirred-up memories.

Thereupon, as Subaru knit his brows, Halibel, displaying his smile, shifted his thin eyes towards him.

Halibel: “If ya hafta think about it that hard, then the name ain’t too much of a big deal. Well, that’s just what they be callin’ me since I like ta give lotsa praise, and somethin’ like the “cornerstone” can be chalked up to ‘em overestimatin’ me.”

Subaru: “Overestimating…”

Halibel: “Yep yep. It’s just ‘cause ‘n Kararagi, there ain’t nobody stronger than I am.”

Halibel gave his response in a calm manner, as if he were simply discussing the weather.

Subaru gazed in wonder at those words of his; the instant his mind processed the word “Kararagi”, that which he had been stuck on just a moment ago was suddenly ignited with understanding.

The Admirer of the Kararagi City-States, the meaning of that nickname was—

Goz: “The strongest shinobi of the Kararagi City-States! For what reason have you boarded this dragon carriage??!!”

The next moment, stepping down on the floor of the dragon carriage with enough force to cause an explosion, Goz thrust his weapon, his mace, towards Halibel as the latter stood still.

Goz’s weapon was a mace of peculiar shape, something like a long spear with a spiked orb attached to its tip in order to strike. It was similar to the Morningstar that Rem had once loved to use, but its size and weight were overwhelmingly disposed towards an item that belonged to Goz.

Anyhow, upon the sudden appearance of the City-States’s strongest, the Empire's military man took the stance of thrusting his weapon forth.

Perhaps it may have seemed that at this rate, things would be plunged into an explosive situation.

However—

Halibel: "I was the one who caused all this stir, so maybe it ain't my place to be sayin' this, but come on now, can't we all just sit 'round and chat without gettin' all fired up?"

Goz: "Ngh, guh…!"

Nimbly tilting his head as the mace was thrust towards him, Halibel began to speak. Goz's face stiffened upon hearing Halibel's words, and the arm that he had funneled power into trembled.

Against the edge of the golden mace wielded by Goz, Halibel held his kiseru of similar golden hue. With just that, Goz's weapon became unable to make even the slightest of movements.

Goz: "…"

Likely, Halibel had exquisitely controlled the balance of power that he put into the kiseru and suppressed Goz's mace from moving up, down, left, right, and of course, from thrusting forward.

No matter how Goz tried to move his weapon, the kiseru would apply pressure from the opposite side to prevent it from moving. It was not simply brute strength; rather, it was the utmost pinnacle of technique to perfectly control the flow of his strength.

Goz: "You… hk!"

Goz's face reddened, and the sound of his grinding teeth could be heard reverberating throughout the cabin. But, even when compared to Goz's teeth grinding, the series of deeds Halibel was carrying out was far too quiet.

At that point in time, the existence known as Halibel was wrapping up his evaluation of this place.

Vincent: “Cease this, Goz. Besides, if he had the intention to harm us, he would have lopped the heads off of everyone here long before making his presence known through the likes of applause.”

Emilia: “Since you didn’t do that, that means you’re not our enemy… right?”

Witnessing Goz and Halibel’s quiet offense and defense, both Abel and Emilia interjected.

Just as both had said, in reality, if Halibel had felt like it, it would not have been strange for everyone inside the carriage to have been killed before they had even become aware of his presence.

With that pointed out, Halibel’s large mouth relaxed into the shape of a smile, and,

Halibel: “Yep yep, I’m delighted that yer able to understand. Regardless of Emperor-san, a half-devil child bein’ so upfront, ya must be quite the good lassie. Even tho’ yer hated by others just like I am, you’ve been raised to be honest… yer folks must’ve been quite the admirable people.”

Emilia: “Thank you. I also think that I am quite fortunate to have been raised by Puck, Mother, and Juice.”

As Emilia placed her hand upon her chest and spoke her thanks, Halibel nodded and retracted his kiseru. That instant, Goz’s specialized weapon was released, but he did not then do anything reckless such as swinging back at Halibel.

Although he was frustrated, Goz kept firm vigilance on Halibel, and,

Goz: “If you go against those previous words, I will defeat you, even if it costs me my own life. Remember that.”

Halibel: “I ain’t gonna do such a thing, really, I ain’t. Lookie here, I’m sittin’ all nice and well-behaved after all.”

Waving his hands about, Halibel pulled up a chair next to him with his tail, and then hugged one of his knees as he sat down for a bit.

He was someone around as tall as Goz, but when he curled up his slim figure like that, his impression of being a large breed of dog became stronger. It did not seem like his statement about good behavior was sarcastic.

Roswaal: “Be that as it may, I did not expect Kararagi to intervene heeere~. Even if not to the same extent as the Kingdom and Empire, I haven’t heard that the City-States ever got along well with the Empire. Much less, when considering the matter of your officially disclosed position, in particular.”

Halibel: “Oh, do all y’all know ‘bout me? Gosh, it’s embarrassin’ since it kinda feels like I’m a celebrity somehow.”

Subaru: “Roswaal, when you say that person’s “officially disclosed position”…”

Ram: “Barusu is as ignorant as he appears, so Ram will inform him. The Admirer, Halibel, is a wolfperson.”

A wolfperson; upon receiving that information from Ram, for an instant, Subaru’s heart and body trembled.

However, that was not in response to Halibel, who was in front of him; rather, the reason he trembled was a separate matter. That which Ram had informed him of in itself did not really help Subaru to suddenly understand anything, either.

But, without paying heed to Subaru’s lack of understanding, the conversation continued as common sense would have it.

Vincent: “You ought to be aware of the Empire’s attitude regarding wolfpeople. To then cross the border and set foot in here, you truly appear to be considerably reckless.”

Halibel: “‘Course I knew that, tho’ I ain’t got all too good a feelin’ ‘bout it. But, y’all should also know the reason that I ain’t hidin’ the fact that I’m a wolfperson, ‘cause ain’t nobody’s able to kill me. From the looks of it, seems like Cecilus ain’t here either.”

Subaru: “—! Hey, do you know about Ceci?”

Halibel: “Hm? Oh, I do know him, yeah? After all, he came to try ‘n kill me once. Tho’ for some reason, after throwin’ down for a bit, he said somethin’ like “Seems like the conclusion shall not be now!” ‘n he went back home.”

Though the topic of the conversation had deviated from the matter of wolfpeople, Halibel answered Subaru’s question without modesty.

It was an unexpected response, and an unexpected point of contact. Cecilus and Halibel had once fought in a deathmatch, and judging from the current conversation, it seemed like Cecilus had been the one to pick the fight, but that was also easy to believe.

Moreover—

Berstetz: “In the Vollachian Empire, which exemplifies its resolute stance towards wolfpeople, appears the most well-known, most powerful individual from the Kararagi City-States. In addition, he has discourteously done so inside the very cabin where His Excellency Vincent is present.”

Serena: “If I may add, he has grasped the contents of an important conference between our country and the Kingdom. Oh my, is this not a situation that warrants a decapitation, even if it means kindling the Blue Lightning?”

Roswaal: “…Serena, could you not put everyone currently present in danger with your poor tastes?”

Taking advantage of Berstetz’s summary of the situation, Serena added on her dangerous opinion with good humor. The extremity of her words was to the extent that Roswaal reflexively cast a warning true to his feelings.

With that, the initial surprise and fervor from Halibel’s sudden appearance had more or less faded, and the original question was then returned to.

Vincent: “There shan’t be a third time. On what business have you come, Admirer?”

Regardless of whether or not Halibel was intimidated by the armed might of those present, the word “flattery” would not exist in Abel’s lexicon. Witnessing the owner of a dictionary who had intentionally blotted out all words of humility and modesty, Subaru gulped as he wondered how Halibel would respond.

But, contrary to the rising tension, Halibel remained seated as he rested his chin upon his hands on the table, and,

Halibel: “There ain’t no need to be so tense, I said what I came to do right back at the start, didn’t I? That I was just wonderin’ if it woulda been okay for me to pop in to give a quick howdy.”

Subaru: “By that “howdy”, do you actually mean something like ripping out all of our hearts instead of actually greeting us…?”

Halibel: “Zoinks! Ya sure think up some frightenin’ stuff kid, now don’t’cha? I wouldn’t do such a thing.”

Beatrice: “In that case, you’re saying that your objective really was to just say your greetings and make your appearance, I suppose?”

Halibel: “That’s right?”

Protesting Subaru as he fearfully tried to probe into the shinobi-style of greetings, Halibel also gave an indifferent reply to Beatrice’s question after she had continued for Subaru.

Having come this far, it truly seemed like Halibel had no intentions of engaging in violence.

Otto: “In the first place, he is someone who can kill us without needing to take roundabout means. Would it not be in bad taste to do something like taking our lives after toying with us up until here?”

Subaru: “I was also scared, but you shouldn’t pull that kind of opinion out of people… But, if that’s so…”

Emilia: “If that’s so? Did you think of something, Subaru?”

Gulping down his saliva, Subaru had imagined something frightening upon understanding Halibel's attitude.

Having been questioned about that by Emilia, assuming his mental image of Halibel's character was as the person himself had answered—

Subaru: "If both Reinhardt and this person are truly upright, then that predicament with Ceci was…"

Vincent: "Cease this, Natsuki Subaru. Your cooperation may have been requested, but I have no memory of permitting you to investigate our country's scandals."

Berstertz: "Scandals… Personally, I would be unable to list all of the cases with General First-Class Cecilus, either."

Regarding the matter of Cecilus's humanity, not only Subaru and Abel, but even Berstetz, all saw eye to eye. Although he was not present here, Cecilus was being spoken of disparagingly; but most likely, if he was here, Subaru had confidence the same things would still be said about him.

In reality, it was very Subaru-like to have the fantasy that the strong would show appropriate behavior, so in that respect, the conduct of Reinhardt and Halibel was ideal for him.

On the other hand, he also believed that if Cecilus had not been present on the Gladiator Island, things would not have gone so well, so it was a tale of how everything has its pros and cons.

Emilia: "So? In the end, what was the objective of your greeting? This dragon carriage is going north, but the Kararagi border is still further ahead… That shouldn't be enough to incur your caution, right?"

Halibel: "Mm-hmm~, it'd probably be a whole lot faster if ya ask my employer 'bout that instead of me. Things've gotten a lil' complicated since I messed up by carelessly clappin' my hands… Ah, seems like it should be any time now, tho'."

Emilia: "Any time now…"

Halibel's eyes had looked pleased with a hint of embarrassment; however, he lifted his face upon realizing something, and drawn in by that, Subaru followed his gaze.

His wolf face had turned towards the door connecting to the adjoined carriage. Exactly one beat later, someone knocked on the door from the other side.

???: "—Excuse me for interrupting the meeting. There is something I need to report."

With that, a voice that he had heard before declared thus, and Abel silently commanded him to "Enter". The door opened, and in came the figure of a small man with fluffy hair.

The instant that Subaru saw him, his eyes widened.

Subaru: "Zikr-san! Thank goodness, you're alright!"

Zikr: "Indeed, there is no need to worry. It is most wonderful that you are also safe and sound, Miss Natsumi."

Subaru: "To still refer to me like that even when I'm in this form…"

Both when they had met and when they had parted, the man had given a smile to the cross-dressing Subaru, and upon seeing the Imperial General Second-Class Zikr Osman alive and well, Subaru patted his chest in relief.

Then, Zikr's smiling expression tightened up, and,

Zikr: "Your Excellency, there is something I must report… But, that individual over there…"

Vincent: "Ignore him for the time being. Likely, he is not unrelated to your report."

Abel was unkind to Zikr's concern about the presence of Halibel, who was in the corner of the cabin. But, Zikr was accustomed to the Emperor's suppression of words, and nodding with a "Yessir", Zikr: "High Countess Dracroy's flying dragon ship has returned.

With them were brought leading figures from the Fortified City of Garkla, as well as visitors from the City-States."

Vincent: "—Visitors from the City-States."

Abel muttered thus as he directed his sable eyes towards Halibel.

Since the destination of these coupled dragon carriages was the Fortified City of Garkla, it was natural that the relevant people there had come here via flying dragons. If they were accompanied by people from Kararagi at the same time, it would likely be impossible for that to be unrelated to Halibel.

In other words—

Emilia: "Halibel-san, did you come ahead of those people?"

Halibel: "Well, I ain't too good with heights."

Regardless of whether his cute words were meant to be a direct answer or not, Halibel had affirmed that the information Zikr had brought was connected to himself.

Even if Subaru could understand that Halibel was bad with heights and hence had not boarded the flying dragon ship, he felt like he could not understand how Halibel was then able to arrive faster than the flying dragon ship; but there was no point in saying something like that to the superhumans of this world. Even Cecilus could run faster than something flying in the air, so it was kind of the same thing.

In any case—

Serena: "They even took the trouble of getting on my flying dragon ship. Then, shall we be expecting some very influential people to come bringing some very important things to say?"

Zikr: "At the very least, the pretty visitor said so herself."

Vincent: "Judging from how you speak, it is a woman?"

Zikr's report was easy to understand, that a woman had come from the Kararagi City-States.

Subaru tilted his head in puzzlement at the matter, but for some reason, his friends reacted differently. Beatrice tightened her grip on his hand, looked over towards Emilia, and,

Beatrice: “Emilia, it’s the subject of visitors from Kararagi, in fact.”

Emilia: “Yes, indeed. Perhaps, that could be—”

Subaru: “Eh? Eh? Do you two happen to…”

Know something? It happened right as Subaru had tried to finish his question.

???: “—Somehow, even tho’ people have gone thru’ the hardships of hurryin’ all the way ta tha Empire, aren’t’cha sayin’ some rather heartless things, Natsuki-kun?”

Subaru: “…”

Unexpectedly, a voice interrupted, its elegant timbre coming from behind Zikr.

It seemed like that visitor was waiting on the coupler of the adjoined carriage, but they must have had quite the sharp ears in order to participate in this conversation. But, he was satisfied with those sharp ears.

After all, merchants were people who always had to be straining their ears for chances to make profits.

Berstetz: “Your Excellency, what shall be done?”

Upon the reality that that voice had heard the matters being discussed, Berstertz asked for Abel’s opinion. At that question, Abel glanced towards Subaru, and ascertained his expression.

Then, Abel looked towards the door from which the voice had been heard,

Vincent: “Somehow, it seems that you are not merely a boorish and presumptuous fellow. Present yourself.”

Visitor: “Then I ain’t gon’ refrain.”

Gaining the permission of the Emperor, the owner of the voice gently responded. And, before anyone could notice, Halibel, standing upright next to the door, opened the door of the carriage with his hand, showing the visitor inside.

Seeing Halibel’s consideration, the person, now visible, smiled with a “Thank ya”, and then—

Visitor: “Been quite a while since we last came face ta face, but I’m real glad ta see yer doin’ well.”

Subaru: “Oh…”

Visitor: “Even so, Emilia-san and the rest of y’all are quite the experts at happenin’ ‘cross troublesome situations. Looks like yer gon’ need our strength yet again.”

With an informal tone and wearing a smile, and having given a merciless evaluation, with her light purple hair all tied up, and her arms through the sleeves of her kimono, it was a woman clad in a fox-scarf—Anastasia Hoshin.

By her side followed her attendant, a young man dressed in Japanese-style clothing.

Subaru: “Anastasia-san and… Julius?!”

Two people who he had never thought he would meet here, Subaru was taken aback upon seeing them.

Upon Subaru’s capsized voice, Anastasia placed her hand over her mouth and smiled, and the young man whose name was called out —Julius, traced the fierce scar underneath his left eye with his finger, and looked at Subaru.

And then—

Julius: “—I had wanted to say that I am glad for your safety, but why is there always something up with you?”

Subaru: “Don’t say stuff like I’m always causing trouble on the level of turning small!!”

Upon their reunion, instead of joy, it was an angry voice that had erupted.

2

As all strength vanished from his knees, he fell forward and collapsed onto the ravaged plain.

Lacking even the willpower to support his body, the ground mercilessly crashed into his face. He felt the pain of his nose being crushed as blood flowed out from his busted lips.

Taking that blood upon his tongue, the bone-dry interior of his mouth was ever so slightly moistened.

???: “…”

Not even the slightest bit of strength remained in any part of his body.

If he had lost all willpower, then his physical strength would not take long to vanish entirely, either. And now that both had completely run out, he would probably rot away and die upon the very spot on which he had collapsed.

Absolutely everything, absolutely anything and everything, had been in vain.

The things that he had tried to do, the things that he had been enraged that he needed to do, the things that he had continued to do purely out of habit, absolutely all of it had been in vain.

In the end, he could not possibly be anything other than himself. The thing called hell, was something that existed within him.

In that case, there was no way that he could ever escape it. There was nobody who could escape it. Nobody could escape from the hell bearing the name of oneself.

???: “God… damnit…”

Vexation leaked out in a parched voice from his lips.

At this point, not even tears would well up anymore. Neither did he have the passion, nor the qualifications for such a thing.

Everything was so damn bizarre. It was not a place that he could reach. Reaching out toward a place he could not reach, that had been the biggest mistake of his life; and yet, he did the exact same thing again.

There was no introspection. That was why he could do nothing but regret.

There was no chance that he would ever be able to like somebody like himself, so he could do nothing but hate who he was, until finally, he grew to utterly loathe his very being.

He was not even able to continue to love those whom he loved. Enough already; failures who were as fucking worthless as himself should just hurry up and—.

???: “—Oh? Thought I’d just strip all the possessions off a dead body, but to think ya still got some breath in ya. That deserves a bravo, bravo.”

Suddenly, above the head of the collapsed body, somebody’s voice could be heard.

His body lacked the energy to make even the slightest of movements, but the owner of that voice reached out their hand and rolled him over. Instantly, his vision was plunged into the glare of the clear blue sky, and he groaned with a “urhhh”.

The tears that had not emerged from his disgrace and repentance, now gradually began to well up.

That was overwhelmingly frustrating.

Absolutely everything, every last inch of this body, would they really only function for the sake of himself, and nothing else?

Stranger: “Are ya frustrated about something, Mr. Collapsed? Buddy, with yer whole body still alive and well, it’ll be nothing more than a blink of an eye.”

???: “To think… I’m still alive…”

Stranger: “Woah there, so it’s the type where you’ve gotten fed up with living? My my… as far as I’m aware, there’s only one way to fight off those kinds of gloomy thoughts.”

???: “…”

He felt the owner of the voice give a smile, and their upside-down face cut into the clear blue sky reflected in his own vision. He had a hard time seeing the face due to the glare from behind, but he understood that the person was smiling with a broad grin on their face.

Although, that grin was not something that was ridiculing him, and therefore it was a smile which he was unable to comprehend the reason behind.

However—

???: “What… are we going to do?”

If he could not find the answer within himself, he would inquire about the thoughts of the person who was incomprehensible to him.

At the very least, while cursing himself for still wanting to be saved, he inquired to see if he could hear an answer that was much more respectable than he was.

Hearing that question, the person deepened their smile as if to say he had hit the nail right on the head, and then,

Stranger: “Isn’t it obvious? —We’re off to drink tons of booze, enough that we could bathe in it.”

Right after answering, the person grabbed him by the collar, and began dragging him along through sheer force. A man, stretching out both of his legs, quickly moved across the wasteland.

Using the fact that he was unable to resist as an excuse, the man hummed and sang while he pulled him along, and,

Stranger: “I’m Rowan, the stingy ronin. What about you, buddy?”

???: “…”

Rowan: “Buddy, you’ve gotta at least have a name, right? It ain’t gonna get any worse even if ya tell me.”

Easygoing and over-familiar, witnessing the attitude of the man who gave his name as Rowan, he took a long breath.

He had no obligation to answer, but neither did he have any special reason not to answer. A man, while thinking that he no longer cared about what became of himself—

???: “…It’s Heinkel.”

Thus, with neither of them realizing the position of the other, Heinkel Astrea gave his name.

He could not have known. —That coincidence and predestination were some old tricks that fate always liked to make use of.

Bonus Short Stories

The Land of Wolves:
Death unto the Weak, No Mercy IX
(LQ AI Translation)

1

???: “If that is the case, how about something that compiles Vollachia’s ethnographic history?”

???: “Close! Not bad! However, since it is “not bad” merely on the point of comparing it to others, please regard it as the kind of praise that by no means deserves to be lauded!”

As he was about to knock on the door to the office, such voices could be heard through it.

He recognized both voices, but, drawn by the latter one that was always noisy, he stopped in his tracks, thinking it rare that the former voice had also become loud.

If some troublesome discussion was unfolding, it might be wiser to make time, and, after it ended, to choose the right moment to—

???: “Ah— Your Excellency, Chisha’s just arrived in front of the room! Since we’re at it, let’s have Chisha listen as well. I’m sure Chisha will, just like me, cover his face and lament Your Excellency’s idea!”

???: “That one’s irreverence is little different from yours, but he shan’t go so far as to be that blatant. In the first place, the very assumption that he and you will share the same opinion is premature. —Chisha, enter.”

Chisha: “…Pardon me.”

Irritatingly, having had his presence through the door noticed and deprived of any escape, the man—Chisha Gold—suppressed a sigh, and, obeying the summons, opened the office door.

Within the Abellux residence, the second finest room was the young head's office. The most finely appointed room was unoccupied, regularly made to look as though someone spent time there, and those ignorant of the circumstances mistook that room for the head's own.

It was a way of thinking befitting the Vollachian Imperial Family, constantly exposed to the danger of assassination and intrigue and obliged to be vigilant.

At any rate—

Chisha: "Cecilus, it does not do to trouble His Excellency overmuch. His Excellency is a busy man, unlike you, who idle the livelong day."

Cecilus: "Wait, wait! You're jumping to conclusions! True, it is a fact that I usually stay His Excellency's hand from work, but this time is different! Yaay, Chisha's jumping the gun!"

Chisha: "…Your Excellency?"

???: "On this occasion alone, this fellow's wording is not mistaken."

Glancing over, the black-haired boy facing the office desk answered solemnly, and at that, "See, I told you so!" the blue-haired boy in kimono waved both hands, dancing and chanting.

For the time being, Chisha smacked the dancing boy on the head with the documents he had been holding, made him say "Ow," and then,

Chisha: "Then what is it? I believe I heaped a mountain of documents upon His Excellency—cases I wished processed."

???: "Fool. I do not push back my official duties to amuse myself with trifles."

Cecilus: ""Trifles," you say! Chisha's whacking me, His Excellency's being offhand with me—my treatment's what's trifling here! Besides, those "trifles," this time the topic was one Your Excellency brought up!"

Chisha: “Hm. That is rare.”

While the boy stomped his feet ba-da ba-da and aired his grievance, raising a brow at Cecilus’s remark, Chisha began checking the large sheaf of documents thrust out upon the desk.

Setting aside the outlandishness of his conduct, Cecilus did not lie. If he was not suited to lying, it was because he felt no need to; such was his nature. On the other hand, the other party—Vincent Abellux—if one looked at the documents, one could tell there was no lie in his saying that he had finished his work.

In short, putting the two opinions together, it seemed he had happened upon a scene worthy of remark—Vincent, who seldom did so, had broached casual conversation with Cecilus.

Chisha: “So long as it does not impede your official duties, that is well enough, but what sort of discussion were you having?”

Cecilus: “Well now, this is quite the masterpiece, you see.”

As usual, but more than usual with his cheeks grinning, Cecilus’s shoulders shook.

That said, should he hear it from Cecilus’s mouth, there was a high chance the answer would come back twisted and imprecise, so Chisha awaited Vincent’s reply.

Perhaps because of Cecilus’s preamble, Vincent, though a little slower to part his lips, spoke—

Vincent: “—We were selecting the book that ought to be presented to the Benedict Family’s younger sister.”

Chisha: “…I see.”

At those words of his master, which furrowed his brow in a way hard to notice to the onlooker, Chisha nodded quietly.

Then, glancing at Cecilus, who was flaring his little nostrils beside Vincent, he inwardly concurred with the boy taking that ridiculous attitude.

—Surely, this was a situation that ought to be called quite a masterpiece.

2

At the age of sixteen, Vincent Abellux is a member of the Vollachian imperial family.

The Emperor of Vollachia takes many wives from various lands and sires many children. As a result, Vincent had many brothers and sisters both above and below him. However, even among blood siblings there is the problem of whether personalities match, and Vincent, in general, is the type who chooses people.

Consequently, there is no one among his other brothers and sisters with whom he is friendlier than necessary.

Chisha: “At most, would that not be Lord Barthroy, who has a pleasant manner with people?”

Vincent: “Elder Brother is without malice and not the sort to turn his thoughts to scheming. At the very least, at present I feel no need to make him an enemy. …We are straying from the topic.”

Chisha: “Yes, it was a present for the younger princess… for Her Highness Prisca Benedict, was it not?”

Rolling the words on his tongue, Chisha deeply felt anew that this was an unexpected worry.

By his position, it is not rare for Vincent to present something to someone out of social obligation, but in those cases the meaning lies strongly in the negotiations with the other party, and the fact of having given the gift is more important than the gift itself. For that reason, he does not end up fretting over the contents of the gift—but,

Chisha: “That you are troubled over the contents is proof that you are thinking to present something that will truly be to the recipient’s benefit… Your Excellency is growing day by day.”

Vincent: “There remains no sign of respect sprouting within you. If all you can offer are counsels akin to Cecilus's, then, lacking his skill, know that you will be the one unable to escape the reproach of incompetence."

Chisha: "How cutting."

Chisha shrugged at Vincent's harsh phrasing. However, if one thinks this is also a kind of bashfulness, then charm outweighs fear.

It was only natural that Cecilus was enjoying himself.

Chisha: "Even so, it is rare for you to be so undecided. Lady Prisca is at an age still young… would not glittering jewelry, or a beautiful dress, do?"

Vincent: "For other sisters I would make do with such things. But for that one, it would be a waste."

Chisha: "A waste, you say. Your true intent?"

At Vincent's voice, which had lowered ever so slightly, Chisha asked what lay in his breast.

The expression "a waste to give" can be taken to have two meanings. One is that one finds no value in presenting jewelry to the other party.

But, given the way Vincent was speaking now—

Vincent: "That girl is a rare talent. Rather than delighting in jewels and dresses and the like, there must be something more fitting."

Chisha: "For Your Excellency to say so much?"

To the surprised words that slipped out, Vincent quietly nodded.

It was an evaluation worthy of surprise. Vincent has an eye for people—in the sense of seeing through to ability; self-praise mixes in, but it is the truth. Chisha and Cecilus, and the many talented personnel the Abellux domain has taken on, can be called people who passed Vincent's scrutiny. For Vincent to say this much—

Chisha: “However, even if she is excellent, if she is your younger sister then…”

The fate of the Vollachian imperial family that awaits is far too dark, and one cannot blame the stance of not fraternizing with other members of the imperial family.

Thus—Chisha was about to say something in the vein of admonition, but,

Cecilus: “If what is to be lost in the end has no value, then it had no value in being born. All living things, without exception, die eventually. By that logic, Chisha, Your Excellency, and I would have no value, would we?”

Chisha: “Cecilus…”

At Cecilus’s phrasing, which precisely cut open the words he had left unspoken, Chisha knit his brows. Ignoring that, the childlike man-slasher stamped the floor hard in his zōri and said,

Cecilus: “Isn’t it fine! Let His Excellency do as he pleases. He wishes to give a gift. Splendid! If possible, to give something beneficial. Also splendid— As retainers taken into His Excellency’s service, let us devote ourselves to realizing His Excellency’s wishes as much as we can.”

Chisha: “…From anyone else I might accept it, but when it’s you saying it, it becomes hard to nod along.”

Cecilus: “It’s uncool to swap in and out what’s right and wrong depending on who the speaker is, you know?”

Tilting his head, Cecilus, with each and every remark, grasped the essence of the matter.

Thanks to that, the correctness of Vincent’s eye in having discovered him was once more proven.

Chisha: “And so… I see, Your Excellency chose a book.”

Recalling the conversation between Vincent and Cecilus he had heard through the door at the outset, Chisha at last caught up to the core part of the pair's topic.

Rather than gifting jewels or dresses, if one has struggled to find something to match Princess—Prisca's—talent and to cultivate it further, it is understandable to arrive at a book.

When Chisha too was first taken into Vincent's service, what most stirred his heart was the number of volumes in the Abellux family's collection. It is certain that many books satisfy curiosity and polish the intellect.

To Chisha's understanding, Vincent nodded with a "Indeed," and said,

Vincent: "No talent, of whatever sort, can show its true worth if it is not honed. To sharpen a sword one needs a whetstone; to polish intellect, books are essential."

Chisha: "Hence, books. I am in agreement on that point as well, but —what is the problem?"

Vincent: "—That one there loudly declares without compunction that what I chose does not suit."

Cecilus: "Yes! It is wholly insufficient!"

Hands on his hips and leaning back, Cecilus looked around at Chisha's and Vincent's faces.

Watching those eyes of his, which were shining terribly brightly, Chisha could only tilt his head at Cecilus's argument. He thought Vincent's aim was not mistaken, but—

Chisha: "Why do you say that will not do?"

Cecilus: "In the first place, the thinking of narrowing it down to a single item is far too small. It's fine to present a book on the grounds that it will surely be beneficial— But what is the reason to hesitate over presenting jewels or a dress? Yes! Aren't you saying it based on the mood when there's no particular reason!"

Vincent: "—But in what way would those be of use to her?"

Cecilus: "To be surrounded by fine things cultivates an eye for fine things. Please look, Your Excellency—at this sword I pestered you to obtain for me."

Saying so, Cecilus thrust out the sword he wore at his hip. Just as he himself said, it was a famed blade, a masterpiece Vincent had bestowed upon him.

Cecilus drew the sword, showing the bared blade, and said,

Cecilus: "You may think that a master does not choose his weapon, but that is wrong! It is precisely the master who cuts people with skill who should be given a weapon that can cut without skill. The ones we should be dealing with are not a single person but many—For that, we must cultivate an eye for the weapons we handle."

Vincent: "…It galls me, but it is infuriating to find myself nodding along to talk like this."

Chisha: "Indeed. Ah, Cecilus, please do not carelessly draw a blade in His Excellency's office. Next time it will not be settled with only a warning."

Finding no points at which to rebut Cecilus's argument, Chisha for the time being cautioned him about his behavior, and, while Cecilus hastily put the sword away, Chisha turned to Vincent and nodded.

Chisha: "I imagine it sticks in your craw to follow Cecilus's advice, but I have concluded there is reason in it. Let us prepare those as well… As for the book, what will you present?"

Vincent: "That too is a matter for deliberation. This impudent one kicked aside my opinion as trifling… you will, no doubt, betray that expectation?"

Chisha: "—I cannot help but tilt my head at how this course lays a great burden upon me."

In short, because Cecilus had said whatever he pleased and denied his thinking, the sulking Vincent was poised to dump it all on

Chisha.

If this were personnel appointments or flood control and the like—affairs of state—that would still be one thing, but trying to curry favor with a younger princess whom he had never actually met made Chisha's extremes of predicament extreme indeed.

Even so, when his master sought his opinion, Chisha would not be fit for his post if he could say nothing. Turning over the matter in his mind, drawing together his black brows, Chisha suddenly voiced a thought.

It was—

Chisha: "—Then, rather than a book that sets down knowledge, I am of the opinion that you might present a book of stories."

Vincent: "What?"

Cecilus: "Oh! Stories!"

To Chisha's proposal the listeners' reactions were polar opposites. Vincent was dubious, and Cecilus, eyes shining, leaned in.

Chisha was not among those who read in great quantity, but he had also enjoyed stories. On the other hand, Vincent should have had no familiarity with such made-up things, with fiction.

Chisha: "Precisely because of that, it may also strike her as fresh. As I surmise it, if what Your Excellency favors is the case, then is not Lady Priscilla also a person who, like Your Excellency, polishes her intellect? If so, I think Lady Priscilla will in time reach, on her own, the books Your Excellency has read."

Vincent: "If it is a path that will come in due time, I think there is meaning in a forerunner showing a more efficient road, and yet, over and above that, you recommend something lowbrow like stories. Why?"

Cecilus: "Wait, wait—deciding that stories are lowbrow, even for Your Excellency, is mmmph!"

Chisha: “You have already spoken enough. Let us make this the scene where I set forth my thinking.”

Covering Cecilus’s mouth as he sprang out, Chisha faced Vincent’s gaze head-on.

At the stare that peered in to probe his intent, Chisha began, “Now then,” to don his theoretical armament in his head. That said, even if it was a sudden idea, it was not a random proposal. Just because its origin was such, there is always a foundation to the thought.

There was, for Chisha Gold to arrive at that idea, such a foundation.

Chisha: “Indeed, Your Excellency called it lowbrow, but how much experience have you had in savoring stories? To speak categorically without that, I fear, would rightly be judged as having ‘told’ about a thing with no basis.”

Vincent: “A slick tongue. Then, even if I withdraw the judgment that it is lowbrow, what meaning is there in making me and Prisca read stories? What sort of knowledge would be gained?”

Chisha: “—In all likelihood, reading stories would serve to polish the spirit.”

Vincent: “What?”

Lowering his voice, Vincent spoke, and Chisha, considering the raison d’être of “stories,” expounded.

Vincent had said: to sharpen a sword one needs a whetstone, and to hone intellect one needs books. If so, then are stories not there to polish the heart?

Chisha: “Just as one learns from history, people can learn from stories. There is a faculty by which, knowing another’s feelings to be another’s, one can think of them as one’s own. When a flood occurs in the neighboring town, is the lesson to be gained only the damage caused by the flood? Is there not also something to learn in the fact that someone was lost?”

Vincent: “…If one reads stories deeply, such knowledge can be gained?”

Chisha: “As it is, Your Excellency is one who can live only as a member of the Vollachian imperial family. All the more so then, I humbly think that as a guide to knowing the thoughts of others, stories may at times prove useful.”

As he spoke, he was surprised to find that it had become a far more reasonable argument than he had expected, and was impressed with himself for, at this late hour, arriving at his own intent.

In fact, perhaps because Vincent too had something to think about, he fell silent and seemed to be considering the matter seriously. It was not that he had any particular fixation on making her read stories, but—

Cecilus: “Nice, Chisha. Surely, this foreshadowing will pay off.”

Slipping cleverly free from the hand that had covered his mouth, Cecilus said so with an easy smile. At the word “foreshadowing,” which seemed to be the trend in him of late, Chisha also smiled wryly.

And then, as Chisha was shrugging at Cecilus’s rare praise,

Vincent: “It is a way of thinking I did not have. But it sits ill to present one without reading it myself.”

Cecilus: “Great! In that case, I like “The Rose Knight of Tireos”!”

Chisha: “I am of the opinion that beginning with something well-known, like “Iris and the King of Thorns”, would be good.”

To Vincent’s forward-looking statement about reading, Cecilus and Chisha each raised a book title. Both were famous works, but Vincent’s reaction was meager; it seemed truly to be a weak field for him.

It felt bad, as though they were using the younger princess as a stepping-stone, but Chisha thought it not a bad thing for Vincent, at times, to show age-appropriate reactions and take an interest in other things like this.

Incidentally, this inspiration of Chisha’s at that time pierced the brother and sister, Vincent and Prisca, beyond expectations, and thereafter the pair would enjoy all manner of stories and, at times, eagerly await new releases from favored authors, becoming a pair of literary siblings—but that is foreshadowing for another, far-off “story.”

END

Provisional Rem's Paranoia: Even Oni Shed Tears

1

"—Katya-san, what was your relationship with your fiancé like?"

"What?"

Katya couldn't hide her perplexed look towards Rem's words as she asked a question wrapped in innocence.

Rem, who had chosen to push the wheelchair through a less bumpy road, was cursing her own lack of touch as she thought about how she had failed to make a segway that felt even a bit natural.

But, no matter how much she cursed herself, what was done was done.

"No, like I said, I wondered what your relationship with your fiancé was like, so…"

"I heard you the first time! Wh-Why now, all of a sudden, is what I mean…!"

"Was it weird?"

"Of course it was! T-Take a look at the situation…hk."

Katya became angry, with a voice that was quiet yet angry to the point that it could be thought of as a special skill. she was looking around with her blue eyes filled with suspicion, and it was as she said. This was not the time for gossip.

Since currently, Rem and Katya were in the middle of evacuating together with a group of dozens of people—In a turn of events after the fight between the rebel army and the Imperial Army, they were now right in the middle of aiming for the outside of the Imperial Capital now that the situation had changed.

—At the mansion of chancellor Berstetz Fondalfon, where they had been taken prisoner.

Some time had now passed since someone came to their aid just in the nick of time when that place was attacked by a mysterious group of people. This aid was troublesome; the one who helped Rem and the one who helped Katya as well, both of them disturbed Rem's inner mind for extremely complicated reasons.

One of them, was the person who had been by Rem's side ever since she woke up without her memories, Natsuki Subaru. He appeared with a different look to him to get Rem, who was captive, and rescued her from peril.

That fact, and also that he had shrunken down while he was out of sight, were things she had reservations about, but still, that would seem insignificant when compared to the complicated situation she had with the other one.

"Todd…"

Moving her lips so, with an anxious expression on her face, Katya's pale skin turned a shade paler.

Holding tightly onto the railing of the wheelchair, she tried to hide her shaking. As if she were relying on it during this unstable situation, she mouthed that name, seemingly unaware of the fact.

But, to Rem, that name was, the person with that name was quite important.

"…Todd Fang"

As with Katya, Rem mouthed that same name, as if trying to make sure nobody heard it.

It wasn't a name she would say she relied upon, or even one she held much goodwill for. That would be the case, since, to Rem, Todd was someone who was tied to some very dangerous memories.

From the point of view of Rem without Memories, Todd was the first one to have threatened her life—if she closed her eyes to various conditions, it wouldn't be an exaggeration to call him that.

Of course, the person in question said that it was on the army's orders, and he was not doing it of his own will, but…

"…You worry too much."

"Eh?"

"You're getting some unnecessary ideas, like, if you bring up Todd in this situation and make me talk about him, that would help me relax, right? Y-You're so obvious…"

Without turning to meet eyes with Rem who was pushing her wheelchair, Katya told her her understanding of the intentions behind the question she had given earlier. At that understanding, which was very like Katya, Rem closed her eyes.

However, the way Katya took it and the way Rem thought about it were practically completely opposite.

The reason Rem asked Katya about Todd was because she expected to find a way she could get an excuse to separate them directly from Katya's mouth.

If she could get Katya to become suspicious of Todd's words and actions, and get her to feel more like Rem and the others do about him, then she could get Katya to separate from that dangerous person.

No matter how much, that's right, no matter how much she tried to paint him as a good guy, Rem did not feel like giving the human known as Todd even an inch of trust. And as Subaru found him convenient, he must be quite exceptionally skilled. She understands that, and even then trusting him is difficult.

Since Todd, never once tried to learn the names of the people around him.

And, when Rem had begun to consolidate her complicated state of mind.

"—Katya, stop"

Like a sucker punch, she heard the voice of the man himself, and Rem's shoulders jolted reflexively. In Rem's stead, Katya's voice unconsciously called on the owner of that voice, "Todd-…"

That man, from which not a smile rose up at Katya's relief—Todd, shrugged his shoulders.

"Everything's been going fine until now, but a bit ahead there was a bit of a nuisance. There's enough zombies to make me reconsider changing our route, but, unfortunately…"

"There's no time to search for a different route."

Todd pointed at the road with an ax in hand, and the one to draw the conclusion of his explanation, was a young figure holding hands with a girl in a dress, Subaru.

Rem and Katya, as well as the about twenty boys with black hair and eyes that were imprisoned in the mansion. Due to the fact they're taking those burdens with them on their escape, Subaru's group went ahead to secure an escape route, with the whole group aiming to get to the castle walls and get to the outside of the Imperial Capital.

However, this meant a shadow has finally fallen upon their so far successful.

"So… There's a strong enemy, and we have no time to find a different path?"

"W-We're completely cornered! Wh-What do we do…!"

"Let's see. How about giving up and joining the dead? Doing that with you might not be so bad."

"Stupid! I-If you're gonna die, go die by yourself! …Ah."

Having unintentionally spat that out, the color swiftly drained from Katya's face.

She heard the urgency of the situation, and she bit back at those biting words with her statement, but immediately fiercely regretting the words she said in the moment was Katya's bad habit.

Of course, understanding that, Rem tried to rebuke that statement and…

"—Don't make that face. You didn't really mean that, I at least know that much."

But, before anything could come out of Rem's mouth, Todd said that gently while stroking Katya's frizzy hair.

Todd's speech and mannerisms, and what's more, Katya's relieved face, struck Rem in the chest.

The confidence Rem had as someone who had become Katya's friend, her feelings as she pretended to be someone who understood her, were overturned. Having lost on that point, Rem's heart became greatly upset.

"I talked with these kids as well. We don't have the leeway to change our path right now. Which is why, with everyone that can be counted as a fighter, we'll wipe out the enemy. In the meantime, you try to get to the castle wall from the neighboring street."

"We've made a plan for victory, so the detached team is a just in case kinda thing."

Leaving Rem's inner thoughts aside, Todd and Subaru explained the course of action for now.

Apparently, they seem to be saying that while Subaru and the others face off against the enemy awaiting them, Rem's group should circumvent the battlefield.

"Please wait. If you mean anyone that could be counted as a fighter, then I as well."

"A fighter? You, girl?"

"…Any complaints?"

Naturally, Todd made a perplexed face towards Rem who had protested her exclusion from the people who could fight. With what had occurred before, Rem's voice went lower, and she glared at Todd, but he shrugged his shoulders with a "Nah" and…

"Your gait, it has an odd quirk to it because you have a limp leg, right, girl? If I recall, last time I saw you, you were using a cane. You're not aware how well you can move, are you?"

"That's-…"

"We can't call someone who doesn't have a complete grasp of their own mobility a fighter. Besides—"

Without replying to any of Todd's harsh remarks, Rem grinded her molars from the frustration. Todd acted pompously on his last words he gave towards Rem, and turned his gaze towards Katya.

Seeing Katya muttering "Wh-What…"at the gaze of her fiancé, Todd laughed.

"—It looks like Katya trusts you. Pretty rare for someone as shy as her."

"Wha-…?!"

"That's why, I want to leave Katya in your hands. How about it?"

Side eyeing Katya, whose face went bright red with teary eyes, Todd threw a question at Rem.

Rem noticed her own complete defeat with that cowardly question. At being counted out of the fighters, and Katya's new human behavior, she had been completely trapped.

At the very least, if Rem's own counterattack would not come to pass, then trying to turn her gaze to Subaru,

"I agree with Todd. Rem, take care of Katya-san. Let's all meet safely, outside the walls."

"—Understood."

Hearing those words from Subaru, the one who had the probability of backing her up, Rem powerlessly nodded.

This was something she had already understood. To Subaru, it was hard to agree to having Rem jump into danger. Just as Todd kept Katya away from danger, he as well-kept Rem from danger.

And as one would expect, he had properly prepared an excuse that would be hard for Rem to decline.

Then…

“Katya, mind your manners. I’ll definitely come get you later.”

“…D-Don’t make a mistake. Your strong point is being witty and tenacious, so make sure to properly make use of th-that strong point of yours…”

“I know. —I also treasure you above anything else.”

With that exchange of words between Todd and Katya, Rem saw them off with an indescribable feeling.

While also hesitating on whether she should also give similar words to Subaru…

2

—However, the irony of fate would bare its fangs not towards Rem but towards Katya.

“Huh…?”

At Katya being frozen stiff, with her blue eyes stuck open, Rem bit her lip and hung her head. Rem’s hands tightly held onto the hem of her own clothes, and her chest was filled with a feeling of uselessness.

This was a role she took on herself. In which case, could I have done better? she wondered. The delivery of this information from Rem’s mouth to Katya—of this terrible news.

Because of that, Katya's eyes swam, and after that, she once more asked Rem.

"Wha-, t… did- you- just- say, Rem?"

"Todd-san…He, could not be found."

"Liar!"

With her head still hung and without looking at Katya's face, Rem repeated the same information, and was torn apart by a sorrowful voice.

The wheels made a rattling sound as they turned, and Katya, who moved forward, grasped Rem's hand. Katya's nails dug in unconsciously, but pain like that was trivial.

When compared to the pain Rem, and also Katya, were feeling in their hearts.

—In order to face off against the strong enemy that stood in their way, Subaru's group separated from Rem's.

Thanks to that plan, Katya and the captive children safely escaped to the outside of the Imperial Capital.

After they separated from them midway,

However, Subaru's group had pushed itself to death in the exhausting fight against the strong enemy, especially Subaru, who, when Rem reached him, was on the brink of death.

She had just barely made it in time and managed to save Subaru, but…

"…"

She gripped Rem's hands painfully, and Katya's already pale and sickly skin drained even more blood.

The figure of him, Katya's fiancé, who was fighting together with Subaru against a strong enemy, was nowhere to be seen. Beatrice and the others as well had separated from Subaru and him in the middle of the battle and could not reunite their battle concluded with that strong enemy.

Therefore, they didn't know how Subaru and Todd's battle reached its conclusion.

"There's still, still, that, that kid that came to get you, right…?"

"…That person, yes"

"If he was, with Todd, then… We still, can't know for sure. Maybe, just maybe he knows what happened to Todd, what happened to him…"

"Katya-san…"

"—Why-"

The trembling Katya's eyes gazed at Rem, and the pained emotions behind those blue eyes, wavered for a moment.

Most likely, the words she had cut off were meant to be blame thrown at Rem.

Whether that be blaming her for not bringing back Todd, or perhaps, for only bringing back Subaru. It was Katya's own conscience that made her not say it.

While feeling that she would rather let her shout at her, Rem was also at a loss for words.

No matter how earnestly he showed his cooperativeness, Rem's suspicion towards Todd never cleared. The relief Rem felt now that Todd was gone, was not insignificant. While that was not something she was able to say to Katya, it was undoubtedly the truth.

"It's not true, he, he couldn't, Todd, not like that…"

Katya, who remained unable to accept the reality told to her, said so weakly. She would have liked to have a heart-to-heart with her, and give her time to calm down, but they didn't have that privilege here.

The walls of the reservoir had been broken, and the Imperial Capital was sinking under a great quantity of water. The evacuated imperial citizens, soldiers, and rebels had begun to move towards a northern city, and Rem and her could not delay further.

At the very least, Rem's healing magic should be put to good use. But, it was hard to leave Katya's side.

And, when Rem was wavering like that…

"—Katya? Hey, Katya! If it ain't Katya!"

Around them were many refugees, pieces of cloth spread on the ground, and a tent erected to make a rudimentary break room.

A voice with seemingly no consideration or care to it, Rem was surprised when it called Katya's name, but the person in question's reaction was much more dramatic.

As if pulled back to life, Katya raised her face, turned towards the voice, opened her eyes, and then said,

"…B-Brother?"

"Ooh, there you are, Katya! Thank goodness, you managed to get outta there, huh! I was about to go dive back in myself, but there were so many people getting in my way that I was having a hard time"

Pushing the crowd aside, this imperial soldier with an eye patch walked up to Rem and Katya.

For a moment, she felt like she remembered him from somewhere, but Katya's reaction overshadowed Rem's thoughts.

"Is that, your brother? But, I heard Katya-san's brother was supposed to be dead…"

"I, wha-? Who th'fuck's dead! Wait, are you her caretaker? Good job bringing Katya here. And I am definitely getting some payback from you for—”

“—Todd is-”

His face with a roughness like that of a bandit turned to a scowl, and the man Katya called brother began meaninglessly threatening Rem. However, he was stopped by a few words from Katya.

Her brother turning wordlessly towards her, Katya released her grip on Rem’s hand and instead took the hand of her approaching brother.

“Brother…Todd, he, he-…He’s-…hk.”

“—. Tch, that motherfucker.”

Suddenly she exploded in emotion, and Katya clung onto her brother’s hand with her voice trembling. Big blobs of tears dropped from her eyes, and her brother clicked his tongue, pulling the head of his sister close to his chest.

His body was that of a man covered in blood, dripping in sweat and mud, but Katya didn’t pull away. She couldn’t pull away.

Rem could not do that; Katya’s emotions burst out, and her weeping began spilling out.

Even with her brother, who was thought dead, back, she still couldn’t think that it was fine that Todd’s well-being remained unclear. Katya simply broke into tears without restraint in front of Rem, who was at a loss for words.

Hearing her suffering, anxious, crying voice, Rem felt a prick in her chest, and for some reason, felt heat from the back of her eyelids.

“—Why me.”

Tears welled up, yet Rem questioned whether she herself had any reason to cry.

She made Katya cry. It was her fault. That feeling of powerlessness continued to torture Rem very, very strongly.

The powerlessness of not being able to at least let her cry within her arms, also continued to torture her.

“Todd…Tooodd…hk.”

Having lost a precious someone, sincerely grieving, the loving girl suffered greatly.

She prayed in her chest that, at the very least, her fateful reunion with her brother gave some salvation to Katya’s heart.

—Soon after this will it arrive for Rem, a verily unavoidable fated reunion of her own.

The time for the great desire of those who came to get her from a country far, far away was before our eyes—And the readiness to come to terms with it was something Rem still had not prepared within herself.

END

The Dragon Kingdom:
Meili's Witchbeast Observation Record III

1

The sky gleamed white. And it was in that moment of realization that a portion of the desert vanished into oblivion.

"…"

A tempest of wind-swept sand soared skyward, only to descend back down from the clear, blue sky like rain. Their vision blurred in a yellowish haze as the fine grains of sand permeated the air, threatening to contaminate each and every breath.

"Cover your mouths tightly!" Reinhard yelled. "The sand is infested with Miasma! Be careful not to accidentally breathe it in!"

"I can't bear the taste of this sand anymore," Flam moaned.

"The taste of humiliation," Grassis concurred. Pulling their anti-sand cloths over their mouths, the petite figures sitting side by side on the driver's seat hollered with all their might as Meili clutched her own mouth shut, stifling her own cries. She felt the crimson scorpion that had made her hair its nest pop out and start snapping its pincers in alarm. Meili could totally understand how the excited small crimson scorpion was feeling, but no matter how it protested this small witchbeast…no, everyone there including Meili, could do nothing. Except for one person.

"Reinhard!" she cried out to the Sword Saint, whose name resounded, who was the reason they hadn't turned to dust.

"…"

The red-headed knight, descending from the dragon carriage that traversed the sandy terrain, stood at the brunt of the swirling light. Raising his sheathed sword, housed in a white scabbard engraved with the claws of a dragon, he gazed intently over the expanse of the desert. A moment later, another burst of light surged forward as the swinging sword met it head-on, cleaving through its attack.

The severed light emitted a splashing sound as it dispersed, demonstrating its destructive force in the distance, missing its original target and creating yet another massive crater in the great sandy plains of the Augria Sand Dunes.

The second blow, following closely behind the first, held the power to vaporize not only Meili's petite form but the dragon carriage that carried her, leaving no trace behind should they be struck directly by the light's tremendous force. Yet it was nothing more than a mere act of exhaling for their opponent.

"It was the same with Naked Ladyy. But why is the reception soo extreme?!" Meili said through a stifled scream, voice brimming with indignation.

Despite having painstakingly overcome the challenges of Sand Time, as Meili and her party ventured toward the tower beyond the desert, what had awaited them was a rough greeting from Shaula, the self-proclaimed Star Keeper of the tower. They had barely survived the previous encounter thanks to the strenuous efforts of Emilia, Julius, Subaru, and Beatrice. And with the loss of Shaula, they never expected such a situation to arise again. However…

"What did you say to that dragooon?!" Meili cried. Far, far away, a breath of light radiated from the tower of sand in the distance. The source of the light was a massive, blue-scaled Dragon, perched atop the tower as a proxy for the absent caretaker.

"The Divine Dragon, Volcanica," a voice muttered from inside the dragon carriage as the menacing sound of a little red scorpion snapping its pincers rattled in their ears. Such was the rough welcome to Meili as she made her return to the Pleiades Watchtower.

2

The time was two days before facing the tumultuous welcome of the Divine Dragon, Volcanica.

“Got it? You must never open your heart so easily,” warned the younger Annerose, as Meili’s lips twitched in response to the seriousness in her face and voice. Annerose carried a strong sense of responsibility and was keenly aware that she had been entrusted with Meili’s safety by someone important. So, I get why she’s so anxious, but…

“I’m still a former assassiin…” Meili started.

“Regardless of your past, it’s evident that you’re currently captivated by Emily, are you not? So nothing you say grants you the power of persuasion. Persuasion is something achieved through action.”

“Hmph…” Annerose stood there with her hands on her hips lecturing Meili, who was unable to come up with a rebuttal. In truth, Emilia and Subaru played crucial roles in her backstory. After becoming acquainted with those two naive characters, it’d be absurd to continue playing the role of a ruthless assassin. Annerose should understand more than anyone.

“I’m somewhat thankful to them, you knoow,” Meili acknowledged.

“Yes, I know,” Annerose replied. They were both moved by similar people, so Annerose understood her feelings and nodded. “So I won’t say any more. Not to you, at least.” However, as expected from her, Annerose added a cautionary note.

As if to back up the slight worry Annerose had…

Felt came towards them flashing her fang with a smile and waving her hand. “Yo, you ready to go? We’re all here.”

Felt, another royal selection candidate and one of Emilia’s rivals, was accompanied by her knight, Reinhard, and three other attendants: a small boy and two girls, equally petite. Those girls look so much alike, they’ve got to be twins…

“This little guy over here is Ezzo. He’s my strategist. And these twins are Flam and Grassis. They handle the food and cleaning and stuff,” Felt explained, introducing her companions.

“Miss Felt, that’s a bit of a sloppy explanation. First of all, your strategist is Sir Rom,” Ezzo pointed out.

“Old Man Rom says he doesn’t need a fancy title,” Felt clarified. “So he’s my advisor, and you’re my strategist. Flam and Grassis are my caretakers. Reinhard’s the violent one.”

“Lady Felt, you’re rather harsh on the young master,” said Flam.

“But it’s true,” said Grassis.

“If you had at the very least said ‘powerful’ instead of ‘violent’, it would have been easier to process…” Reinhard lamented.

The exchange of words left Meili feeling dizzy.

Annerose appeared to share the sentiment as she let out a small sigh, then clapped her hands to get their attention. “Alright, alright,” she started. “Lady Felt, thank you for introducing your companions. As Meili is an important member of our camp, we couldn’t entrust her to someone whose identity is uncertain,” Annerose expressed with concern in her voice.

“If we’re talkin’ identity, I’ve gotta be the most suspicious of all of you,” Felt said, laughing heartily, while Reinhard and the rest of the people around her sighed.

“Lady Felt…” Surprised at Felt’s nonchalance in describing her own upbringing, Meili surveyed her camp once more. She wanted to take a better look at the members who would be heading to the Pleiades Watchtower with her.

Accompanied by Annerose, Meili had an audience with the Council of Wise Men at Lugunica Castle. There, she used her ability to manipulate witchbeasts as a bargaining chip, requesting indemnity for her past crimes. The Council of Wise Men agreed, but with a condition: Meili had to prove her usefulness.

In other words, Meili must prove that she could traverse the Augria Sand Dunes with her power, and in order to prove that, the ones who had volunteered to accompany her were…

“But are you certain about joining us, Lady Felt?” Annerose questioned.

“It was I who provoked them,” Felt insisted, confidently pointing her thumb at herself. “And it was probably fate that I was there. On top of that my testimony holds more weight since I’m from a different camp, wouldn’t ya say?”

“You do have a point,” Annerose said, nodding reluctantly at Felt’s suggestion. As Roswaal’s appointed representative, Annerose herself couldn’t accompany them on their return visit to the Pleiades Watchtower. Thus, she had no choice but to entrust Meili’s care to Felt and her companions, which must have been embarrassing for her to be clearly indebted like that. However…

“I won’t get into the details of who owes who what for something as small as this. I’m also thinkin’ of doing something about Priestella,” Felt declared.

“Understood.” Annerose bowed to her as if in resignation, as Felt offered a wide smile. “I appreciate your kind offer.”

With that, Meili’s well-being had been securely entrusted to Felt and her companions.

“By the way, about the Divine Protection of Witchbeast Manipulation. Sir Reinhard, do you not have the same Divine Protection?” Ezzo asked curiously.

“Unfortunately,” he replied, “only one of her Divine Protection can exist at a time.”

“I see. That makes the responsibility heavier and heavier for us, doesn’t it?” Ezzo pondered.

“It’s quite the tough role, isn’t it?” Flam commented.

“A pain,” agreed Grassis.

“You two, please don’t talk about it as if it were someone else’s problem; I expect you to give your best, too,” Reinhard chided with a wry smile. The twins nodded at his words with emotionless expressions.

Beside them, a boy called Ezzo approached Meili. “I am Ezzo Cadner,” the diligent-looking guy introduced himself, adjusting his cloak and bowing respectfully. “I have had the honor of serving Miss Felt ever since a particular incident, and am delighted to accompany you on this intriguing journey. Let’s fulfill our roles together.”

“Yes, let’s do that…” Meili said. “So what can you doo?”

“I’m a magic user. I’m the second best in the kingdom, much to my annoyance,” Ezzo replied, irritation mixed into his otherwise intelligent countenance; it seemed that he was in a complicated situation. Despite the small stature of the boy, he had a certain air about him that could not be underestimated…and he wasn’t the only one.

“It seems those twins have more to offer than caretaking, hmmm?” Meili commented.

“You have a good eye,” complemented Flam.

“You know too much,” muttered Grassis.

Flam and Grassis, along with the members of Felt’s camp, each had their own unique quirks and idiosyncrasies. Particularly noteworthy were the sly royal candidate and her first-ranking knight, the Sword Saint, both of whom found themselves entangled in unexpected circumstances. Subaru and Emilia sure have their fair share of challenges awaiting them, Meili thought.

“So weiiird,” Meili muttered, wondering why she felt anxious at their problem as if it were her own.

“Lady Annerose, everything is in order. Ready,” Clind, Annerose’s butler, interjected in his typically subdued manner. Clind played an important role in Meili’s trial, which encompassed this journey to the Pleiades Watchtower and overcoming the Augria Sand Dunes. He would transport them all the way from the royal capital, Lugunica, to the dunes in a single bound.

“Miss Meili, good luck to you. Expectation.” Clind bowed deeply, surprising Meili and Annerose.

“I wouldn’t be so afraid of you if you’d just say one word to cheer me up like that,” Meili jested.

“Clind always has much to say, doesn’t he?” Annerose chimed in. She took Meili’s hand again and continued, “Meili. I wish you the best in winning back your future.”

“Yes, thank youu. I’ll do my beest,” Meili replied with her usual light-hearted tone at the younger girl’s—Annerose’s—sincere words. No matter what grand schemes lay ahead, the girl closest to Meili remained unfazed. She’s the strongest person I’ve ever known, always standing her ground. That’s why I believe that the most powerful thing one can do is always be true to oneself.

3

Through Clind’s enigmatic power, Meili and the members of Felt’s camp were instantly teleported from the royal capital to the entrance of the Augria Sand Dunes. Boarding the dragon carriage prepared for their journey, they moved the witchbeasts out of their way using Meili’s ability, then slowly but surely made their way towards the Pleiades Watchtower, visible in the distance, without any hiccups. It was when they had somehow managed to survive the difficult Sand Time that they got a violent greeting from the Divine Dragon mentioned at the beginning.

“Geez, why are we in such a mess?!” Meili lamented her bad luck in frustration with a high-pitched voice inside the violently shaking dragon carriage. As far as she knew, the Dragon, which had resided in the Pleiades Watchtower for a considerable amount of time, was at Emilia’s beck and call. If she remembered correctly, then it had been asked to protect the tower on behalf of Shaula. This can’t be happening. Was it Emilia’s typical vague remarks that drove the Dragon to commit this heinous act?

“He’s most likely just been startled by my presence,” Reinhard explained as he fended off the overwhelming onslaught that greeted them.

“Huh?” Meili exclaimed, her eyes widening in disbelief, when she realized that he was replying to her scream. She couldn’t believe her ears that Reinhard had the leisure of having a conversation in a situation like this as he leaned forward.

“Ezzo, I’ll leave you in charge here. I’ll handle the Divine Dragon!” With these words, the red-headed knight swiftly departed a great distance, the sound of his footsteps like the firing of magic stone cannons. Beneath his feet, a massive crater formed in the sand, an impossible feat for anyone with mere human leg power. Reinhard’s prediction appeared to have proven true as he was propelled into the air.

The emerging light from the distance changed course, moving away from the dragon carriage carrying Meili and the others, and began to chip away at the desert in pursuit of the airborne Reinhard.

“The light appears to be targeting the young master,” Flam observed.

“Caught in the middle,” Grassis added.

“Don’t be so blunt!” Ezzo scolded. “Oh, this is a disaster! Miss Felt! I don’t want anything to happen to you! Stay close to me…”

“Don’t be ridiculous!” Felt retorted, brushing off a hand reaching out from the driver’s seat. “How am I your top priority now? Now that that damn Reinhard flew off somewhere, your duty’s to protect Meili!”

As it was, Felt embraced Meili protectively, who was curled up in a seat on the dragon carriage. She glared at the little crimson scorpion clacking its pincers atop the startled Meili’s head. “I’m not tryna hurt your master!” she scolded. “Hey, Meili!”

“Wh-What?”

“Don’t lose focus. If you mess up, we’re all in trouble!” Meili paused momentarily, and Felt continued. “Show us just what you can do. You’re the only one with the map to this maze. We can only follow you.”

Felt tightened her grip on Meili's shoulder, her eyes radiating determination. Meili gulped, feeling her powerful gaze. The situation was just as urgent to Felt as it was to Meili, yet despite this, Felt remained unflinching, reminding Meili that she, too, possessed her own exceptional qualities. She, too, possesses unwavering values. A special quality, similar to Subaru and Emilia…and Elsa.

"Well? Ya gonna answer?" Felt snapped.

"I don't need you to remind mee," Meili retorted. "It's my job to do thiis."

"Heh, well said. Ezzo! Flam! Grassis!" Felt called out the names of the three in the driver's seat with a wide grin showing her fang. They turned toward her, silently awaiting her command. "Reinhard will secure the victory! We need to make sure we don't lose! So buckle up!" Felt's voice rang out with fiery determination, igniting sparks of fervor in the eyes of her three followers. Everyone in the camp, including Reinhard, who was unable to hear what she just said, sought the best outcome.

Witnessing their dedication, Meili couldn't afford to lag behind. "Pleease, just stay stiiill…!" she pleaded. Despite the tower guardian's absence, the intensity of the Miasma in the dunes showed no signs of diminishing. The violent nature of the witchbeasts that abound in the Augria Sand Dunes and their unnatural, undeterred willingness to fight, even to the death, remained strong due to that. Had Meili not ordered them to stand by, the bloodthirsty witchbeasts would have swarmed in on them.

However, unlike the climactic battle at the tower, the current scenario had the witchbeasts entangled in a fierce struggle against the forces of nature. Meanwhile, the battle between Reinhard, the Sword Saint, and Volcanica, the Divine Dragon, intensified.

In the midst of the chaos, the two tasks at hand were protecting the dragon carriage from the shockwaves from the battle and protecting Felt and the others from senseless danger. Not only must we reach the tower, but I also have to prove that I'm capable of saving someone.

That alone held the key to a new life for Meili Portroute.

“You know your role, don’t you?” Felt asked, a mischievous smile playing on her lips as she glanced at Meili, fully focused and oblivious to her surroundings, sweat glistening on her forehead. Her gaze extended toward the decisive battle exploding over the expansive desert. “I’ll bet the girls who went to the Empire haven’t the slightest clue that we’re here fighting the Dragon,” Felt said, wetting her lips with a flick of her tongue.

Meanwhile, to the complete ignorance of Felt and her camp, Emilia and Priscilla had simultaneously clashed with a Dragon in the fortress city. Thus, each royal candidate was in the midst of their own intense battle.

END

Volume 35

Chapters 16-28

Chapter 16:
The Undead Cataclysm

1

—Pale skin drained of complexion, and golden irises housed in the center of dark eyeballs.

With the sudden appearance of undead forces, both the Imperial Army and the Rebel Army had been doused with literal cold water as they fought a battle for the Imperial Capital of Lupugana.

Before anyone could notice, the battle between the living vying for control of the Empire had transformed into a struggle for existence between the living and the dead, and it was becoming increasingly severe.

???: “URAAAAAAH—!!”

Raising a loud voice, he brandished his two-handed sword and slammed it into the enemy in front of him.

In an attempt to block the strike, the enemy raised a battered sword that they had picked up from somewhere, but that blow smashed the brittle sword nevertheless, cleaving straight into the enemy’s skull.

Their cranium shattered, and yet what followed was not a spectacular scene of blood and brain matter spewing out, but a scene of fragments scattering about, as if a ceramic pot were smashed; an utterly unthinkable way for a human to die.

The things were not only inhuman in appearance, but even the way they died ran contrary to the path of humanity.

As somebody who lived in the Empire, there were opportunities to lay eyes upon races that possessed extravagant features in their appearance, but even if it was an opponent with a different number of arms or eyes, the way they died would remain constant.

It was only logical that those with life should experience their lives come to an end in a manner befitting that quality.

But, these undead did not have that. Perhaps that was why he still felt such a strong repugnance towards them.

Even in the Empire, where life was even said to be cheap compared to other countries, they did not trample upon life itself in the way these undead did.

General: “Keep the front lines at bay! Let His Excellency the Emperor and the civilians escape!”

Soldiers: “OHHHHHH—!!”

When one of the Generals shouted a command, the soldiers around him roared as if they were in a fever.

As a result of the undead forces, the rampage of the Cloud Dragon, and the bulwark of the reservoir in the northern part of the Imperial Capital approaching destruction, His Excellency the Emperor made the decision to abandon the Imperial Capital, and withdraw all troops.

The Imperial Army united all of its efforts to assist in the evacuation of the Emperor and the citizens of the Imperial Capital. Ironically, with the advent of this third faction, the battle against the Rebel Army had gone undecided. No distinction remained between the regular army and rebels, and with the living and the dead divided into friend and foe, the fierce battle raged on.

Just now, the Imperial Soldier who had just destroyed a single undead was one who held their ground. He and the soldiers around him were fighting with all their might to stop as many of the undead as possible, even if only one, and see if they could take them down to meet death together.

Soldier: “No idea what those things are. But…”

Soldier: “If it is His Excellency the Emperor!”

Soldier: “He will absolutely find a way to eradicate you lot!”

No matter who the enemy may be, their faith in the apex of the Empire, Vincent Vollachia, would never waver. That was the greatest reason why the soldiers were able to hold their ground without a hint of fear.

Vincent had continued to deliver results. The amount of spilled blood and piled up corpses of Vincent's enemies was the foundation of the Imperial Soldiers' faith in him.

Considering the absoluteness of his reign, his fighting spirit was of a different purity from that of those who so casually plotted insurrection.

And thus, his fighting spirit directed towards the undead shaking the Empire was precisely the same.

General: "—Hk! All troops, bring that one down!"

The General cried out once more in response to the onslaught of an undead with a massive body.

A bald undead of large build swung their arms about, and the Imperial Soldiers who stood in their path were blown away like scraps of paper. If they were to permit the large undead to do as it pleased, a hole would open in the front lines, and the defensive position they had gone through so much trouble to form would likely crumble.

In order to stop it, the soldiers obeyed the General's order and leaped towards the huge body at once.

Soldier: "Uu, OOAAAAAAAAAAAAAAHH!"

The soldier who leaped first was struck, crushing his head; evading that carcass as it flew towards him, one Imperial Soldier kept close to the ground as he slashed at the legs of the huge undead.

The attack connected, and his opponent's stance collapsed. But, having perpetrated such an impudent act, the Imperial Soldier's eyes met golden irises looking down on him, and witnessed the dim gleam of a sword that had been plucked off somebody else.

Just before he was impaled by its tip, the figure of a person wedged their way in front of the Imperial Soldier.

General: “Finishhhh… iiiit… hk”

Pierced through the chest, the General cried out as blood frothed at his mouth.

Shielded by the General, the Imperial Soldier gulped down, and immediately jumped out from behind the General’s back; swinging his sword with all his might, he smashed the gigantic undead’s head in.

The sword broke in half upon impact, but without any counterattack, the large undead’s whole body shattered.

And so, just as the General collapsed to the ground on his back, the large undead was struck down.

His chest pierced, the General had met his end, and as the Imperial Soldier admired that bravery, he borrowed a replacement for his broken sword from the General’s hand.

Then, twisting his head around, he tried to search for the next enemy—

Imperial Soldier: “Fucking hell…”

The Imperial Soldier muttered, his cheeks contorting as he lowered the helmet he was wearing with his fingers.

Having just evaded death, the Imperial Soldier looked as the next undead entered his field of vision—The General who had just died protecting him, his same equipment and face were worn by it.

The corpse of the General was lying beside him, and he himself was gripping the General’s sword.

And yet, standing in front of him with a pale face and golden eyes, was that very same General.

Imperial Soldier: “Fucking hell.”

A battlefield where even one’s comrades-in-arms could become undead, turning into enemies as soon as they died.

Upon these flooded lands which he wanted to curse, where death was near certain, the Imperial Soldier raised his sword, and continued to fight until his life no longer allowed.

2

—The coupled dragon carriage retreated from the Imperial Capital of Lupugana and headed towards the Fortified City of Garkla.

The historical alliance formed between the Emilia camp and the Vollachian Empire’s leadership within that carriage had unexpectedly encountered interference in an unforeseen manner.

Although, as for the cause of that interference—

Anastasia: “What’s wrong? Even tho’ we were so worried about Natsuki-kun… it’s distressin’ to see ya lookin’ at us like we’re uninvited guests.”

Subaru: “I’m not making such a face! I’m happy that we were able to meet properly. It goes without saying for Anastasia-san, but even if it’s Julius with his stern expression, I’m glad about both.”

Anastasia: “Well, it ain’t exactly a stern expression, but it’s all ‘cause of yer appearance.”

And so, the two people, Julius and Anastasia, who had suddenly boarded the interconnected dragon carriage, looked down at the shrunken Subaru from head to toe with keen interest.

Naturally, for Subaru, encountering the two of them there was like a bolt from the blue.

The level of surprise was comparable to when Priscilla had suddenly descended from the sky in the Fortress City.

However, why those two had ended up in the Vollachian Empire, Subaru did not consider himself so naive as to be unable to guess the reason.

Subaru: “Even so, I understand that Emilia-tan and the others were looking for us, but for Anastasia-san and Julius… to go out of your way through Kararagi just for me?”

Anastasia: “Yep, exactly. Was a grand adventure, traversin’ through three countries. Crossin’ the border to Vollachia ain’t somethin’ that can be done easily, and the journey was quite costly, to say the least.”

Subaru: “Urk.”

Anastasia: “I hate to come across as countin’ every penny, but I’d be happy if ya won’t forget about the costs we broke our backs for.”

Being sent to the Empire was beyond Subaru’s control, but when he heard about the concerns that were expressed for him, his heart felt heavy. Under Anastasia’s gaze and words, it seemed like Subaru was about to be burdened with a tremendous debt of gratitude.

However, at that moment, a voice calling her “Ana” could be heard near Anastasia’s neck,

Echidna: “You shouldn’t bully Natsuki-kun recklessly. Considering his current appearance, no matter how you look at it, Ana, you seem like the villain bullying a child.”

Subaru: “Ah…”

When Subaru raised his eyebrows at that voice, the other party responded by wagging a white tail.

It was the fox scarf that Anastasia, who was dressed in a kimono, had draped over her shoulders. In other words, it was Echidna, the Artificial Spirit, whom Anastasia was carrying with her.

Unlike the Witch with the same name, Subaru had a recognition of Echidna as a companion whom he had gone through the ordeal of the Pleiades Watchtower together with. Hearing her voice, Subaru also felt relieved and at ease.

With this, among the companions who had gotten separated in the Pleiades Watchtower, once Subaru showed his face to Patrasche, who was outside, only Meili would have yet to see that he was safe.

Anyway—

Emilia: “Anastasia-san! Julius, too, you made it to Vollachia safely!”

Anastasia: “I’m relieved that Emilia-san ‘n the others are safe too. As for the hardships durin’ the journey… I couldn’t find Natsuki-kun before Emilia-san ‘n the others did, so it’s a bit embarrassin’.”

Emilia: “No, that thought makes me feel reaaally happy. Thank you.”

Emilia also welcomed Anastasia’s appearance with a relaxed smile on her face.

Indeed, the situation in the Vollachian Empire already tense, and on top of that, there was the undead disaster following the civil war. Inadvertently, she could say that she was very grateful that she did not cross paths with Anastasia and the others in the Imperial Capital.

And with the joy of such an unexpected reunion coming to a pause —

Vincent: “Are you quite finished rekindling your old friendship? Whether you know it or not, the time for the military conference is limited.”

The one who dampened the mood with those words, with a cheeky attitude and arms crossed, was Abel.

With an unusually tolerant demeanor, he had been trying to gauge the atmosphere, but it seemed like he could not remain silent any longer. Making a sarcastic remark, Abel glanced sideways at Subaru and then said,

Vincent: “Another of your acquaintances. How unexpected, to think your influence has spread as far as Kararagi.”

Subaru: “As for that, it’s a bit complicated. Anastasia-san and the others are on the Kararagi side, but not exactly on the Kararagi side… So, what's the deal with him?"

Subaru's puzzled question stemmed from the presence of Halibel, who stood beside Anastasia and the others. Halibel, the wolfperson who was known as the strongest in the Kararagi City-States, demonstrated his existence while shaking the kiseru he held. Subaru wondered what position Anastasia and her group held, given Halibel's title and affiliation.

Julius: "I will handle that explanation. I will give a firsthand account of the particulars that allowed us to get on that flying dragon ship."

In response to Subaru's question, Julius brushed the scar beneath his left eye with his finger and began to answer.

The new white scar on Julius's profile, combined with his unfamiliar appearance in a traditional Japanese outfit, emphasized his dignified and handsome aura, giving Subaru a strange sensation.

It was not to say that the influence of "regression" had not affected Subaru's perception, but it was probably more due to the changes on Julius's side that caused this sensation.

Somehow, it felt like the current Julius had more composure than before.

While there was elegance in his previous demeanor as the "Finest of Knights", it seemed to be different from his current composure. It might have even been considered something that stood in stark contrast to it.

His attitude, which seemed like he had discarded long-worn armor, was it a result of the experience in the Pleiades Watchtower, or was there some other reason behind it? That remained uncertain.

Julius: "—Your Excellency the Emperor Vincent Vollachia, I am relieved to see you safe and well. It is an unexpected honor to have the privilege of an audience with you once again."

Ignoring Subaru's impression, Julius, having taken a step forward, bowed as he elegantly spoke.

Abel, protected by Goz's large build as he stood, raised his shapely eyebrows at Julius's greeting. Subaru, too, harbored a sense of unease with Julius's "once again" part.

Vincent: ""Once again" you say, hm. But, neither do I remember granting audience to a swordsman of the City-States, nor do I recognize your face. What prompted you to say "once again"?"

Julius: "With all due respect, I once received the opportunity to have a glimpse. However, at the time, I was not a swordsman of the City-States, but a knight of the Kingdom."

Vincent: "The Kingdom—"

Upon hearing the response of Julius, who did not show fear even when addressing Abel, the Vollachian Emperor, Abel's black eyes narrowed in deep thought, but he could not seem to find any memory of the occasion.

With such a dignified demeanor, there was no way that Julius could possibly be telling a lie. As such, even though the two were actually acquainted with each other, Abel had forgotten it.

In other words, it was evidence that the effects of Gluttony, which caused those around Julius to forget him, had yet to be undone—.

Vincent: "You are deceiving me, and thus I do not understand your behavior. —Berstetz."

Berstetz: "Yes. I, too, have no recollection of ever seeing this person."

Vincent: "It would be rare for Berstetz to not be present at an audience. That is to say, it is not an issue between you and I, but one of a larger scale."

By merely questioning the presence of Julius within Berstetz's memories with a single word, Abel detected that extraordinary circumstances were entangled in the discrepancy of perceptions between himself and Julius.

Witnessing Abel's speech and conduct, Subaru could not help but mutter “Is this guy for real?”

Subaru: “Is it really normal to accept that so easily? Something that’s so absurd…”

Vincent: “We are in the midst of an emergency, in which the dead have risen, and the Emperor is being driven away from the Imperial Capital. Speaking of the grand scheme of things, the fact that your body has shrunk does not make much of a difference either. What matters is whether or not it can be conceived as possible.”

Subaru: “I wouldn’t say that me shrinking is something that happens every day either though.”

No matter what kind of profound mysteries this world held, even if those were deemed as plausible theories just because they could be conceived, it did not make them things that could be so easily accepted with an “Ah yes, I see.”

As Subaru’s brow wrinkled, Beatrice, holding his hand, rubbed the wrinkle between Subaru’s brow with her other hand.

Beatrice: “Don’t overthink it too much, I suppose. It’s much more convenient if they have the tolerance to accept it, than if they were to be obstinate about it, in fact.”

Subaru: “…That’s true. Also, that feels good, please keep doing it a little longer.”

Beatrice: “Roger that, I suppose.”

While Subaru continued to receive an eyebrow massage from Beatrice, Julius, with the questions that arose from the first act of his greeting canceled, he returned to the main topic.

That was—

Julius: “First of all, the lady present here is Anastasia Hoshin-sama… I presume you have already been made aware of Emilia-sama’s identity and status, but Anastasia-sama is also of the same status.”

Serena: “Hoho, the same as Miss Emilia. In other words, candidates for the next king of the Kingdom are together in a foreign country. My goodness, that’s quite the amusing and rare situation.”

Serena contorted her facial scar in amusement, and Julius nodded silently at her words. At his affirmation, the gazes of the Imperial camp members turned towards Emilia, and meeting those gazes, her lips formed a smile.

Emilia: “Yes, Julius is telling the truth. Anastasia-san and I are both candidates for the Royal Selection, and we’re friends.”

Anastasia: “Tho’ for the time bein’, the thing ‘bout bein’ friends is an agreement for after the Royal Selection is over. —Followin’ that introduction, I’m a representative of Kararagi’s Hoshin Trading Company ‘n one of the candidates for the Royal Selection in the Kingdom of Lugunica.”

Vincent: “In addition to that impressive title, you are yet another person of the Kingdom?”

Anastasia: “I feel a lil’ sorry if my title happened to surprise ya, but to tell ya the truth it ain’t the only title I got right now. That’s the reason we went out of our way to ride that flying dragon ship, ain’t it?”

Just a short while ago, Abel had formed a friendly alliance with Emilia as the head of the Empire. As Abel expressed his disapproval at the fact that another person from the Kingdom had now become involved here, Anastasia put a stop to that.

As Anastasia noted that she had a title that had yet to be disclosed, Emilia put her finger to her lips with a puzzled look on her face.

Emilia: “But, Anastasia-san is a representative of the Trading Company, a candidate for Royal Selection… and there’s still more? Oh, maybe the employer of the mercenary group that Mimi and the others are a part of?”

Anastasia: “The Iron Fang’s under the jurisdiction of the Hoshin Trading Company, so I don’t bother to add it to the title of Trading Company representative. Still, it’s a separate matter from that.”

Emilia: “Separate…”

Told that she was incorrect by Anastasia, Emilia muttered in an adorable, troubled voice.

And beside Anastasia as she smiled at Emilia’s behavior, Julius gestured to her with his hand,

Julius: “On this occasion, Anastasia-sama is acting on behalf of Kararagi’s League of Cities—Appointed as an emissary, she has made her way to the Empire.”

Otto: “—The Kararagi League of Cities?!”

Hearing Julius’s reply, it was Otto whose voice had capsized.

Otto broke his silence with an uncomfortable expression, to which Subaru thought was the right opportunity to ask “What’s the League of Cities?”.

Subaru: “I’ve heard that Kararagi is known as the City-States, a country with many cities joined together.”

Otto: “—. That understanding is correct. The Kararagi City-States are, roughly speaking, a country composed of ten large cities. Each city has its own mayor, who is the representative of the city, and there is a council formed by these people, which is the League of Cities.”

Subaru: “Huh… It’s like the Council of Ten in Pristella.”

Otto: “Rather, Pristella’s Council of Ten is probably inspired by the League of Cities. As is the case with the Water Plumage Pavilion, there is a large influx of Kararagi culture in Pristella along the border.”

Subaru: “Oh, come to think of it…”

The Water Plumage Pavilion, where they had stayed at the invitation of Anastasia and her companions, was said to have wafustyle both inside and out, which had been introduced from Kararagi.

Going further back, Subaru believed that Kararagi's Japanese-style itself might be knowledge that was brought from his world, but he put that aside for the time being.

In any case—

Subaru: "It's not a peaceful situation when you're not only a candidate for the Kingdom's Royal Selection, but you've also entered the Empire at the behest of the League of Cities as an emissary."

Anastasia: "You're right. Tho' not as bad as with Lugunica, Vollachia ain't on the best of terms with Kararagi. I mean, the Empire is basically hostile to everyone."

Subaru: "It's probably because the Emperor is so sharp. It's possible his corners will be a little rounder from now on."

Vincent: "Silence."

When Subaru joined Anastasia's brazen and blunt comments, Abel, without changing his expression, hurled an admonishment at Subaru.

Subaru stuck his tongue out at that, and Julius was taken aback by this exchange with Abel.

Right after, he looked at Subaru in surprise, but since it would have been a long story if he were to explain, Subaru covered it up by simply sticking his tongue out at Julius as well.

Anastasia: "We heard about the mess in Vollachia while we were in Kararagi, but we didn't come here to take advantage of it."

Vincent: "That is very auspicious. However, it is not as if you have no intention of doing so."

Anastasia: "Well, you've gotta be tough to get by. Wouldn't it be more uncomfortable for ya to be helped for free?"

Vincent: "—. But of course."

At that mischievous look in Anastasia's eyes, Abel's gaze briefly turned toward Emilia.

As for Emilia, she looked at them curiously, but from Abel and Anastasia's points of view, Emilia's good intentions were probably way more unexpected.

Even Subaru would not go so far as to say that they should help Abel and the others without compensation, and if he did, Otto would give him a thousand hellish sermons.

Then, a hoarse voice asked for a chance to speak.

When Berstetz received Abel's silent affirmation, he turned his narrow, nearly thread-like eyes toward Anastasia and Julius, while saying,

Berstetz: "I am wondering, may I ask why the City-States have sent an emissary to the Empire in its current state? Perhaps, you suspect that the problems of the Empire have come to your country, and you are pursuing them?"

Anastasia: "Even Kararagi, which believes that "time and money are of equal value", certainly wouldn't come to talk about money in the middle of such a busy day. Besides, interference in internal affairs will only cause loss if you're not prepared for it."

Vincent: "You are being evasive. Did I not say that time is limited."

Anastasia: "You're impatient, aren'tcha? All right, all right, all right. —Halibel."

Halibel: "Hm? Yer fine with me talkin'?"

Anastasia called Halibel to her side as the Imperial leaders were eager to proceed.

Leaning against the wall of the dragon carriage, Halibel, who was making a ring with the smoke from his kiseru, stroked the fur on his chin as the gazes gathered from around him.

In Subaru's eyes, his fur was really nice, lush, and a full coat.

Halibel: "Then I'll go for it… Actually, somethin' strange has been goin' on in Kararagi for a while now. Well, the League of Cities've been urgin' me ta figure it out."

Subaru: "Something strange?"

Halibel: "Y'all can imagine what I'm talkin' 'bout, right? —The Hotoke-san have been movin'."

Emilia: "Ho-toe-keh?"

Subaru gasped at Halibel's easy-going, slightly pretentious words. But, Emilia, Goz and others tilted their heads at the unfamiliar word.

Seeing that reaction, Halibel gave a wry smile as he said "Sorry, sorry", and,

Halibel: "Righty right, that phrase is Kararagi dialect so none of y'all woulda understood. In Kararagi, when ya say Hotoke-san it's got the meanin' of a corpse. I'm tryna say…"

Subaru: "—Are you saying that the City-States also suffered harm from the undead?"

Halibel: "Somethin' like that."

Halibel calmly nodded, and the same shock that Subaru had just received spread to Emilia and the others anew.

Given the undead forces that had come out of left field to interfere with the battle for the Imperial Capital, if the same thing had happened in Kararagi, it would mean that the large incident was not a matter confined only to the Empire.

Subaru: "Th-Then, this could be happening on a global scale if we're unlucky, right? What happened to that zombie disturbance in Kararagi?"

Halibel: "Zombie?"

Subaru: “The moving dead people! It’ll be easier to understand if we have a name for them.”

Halibel: “Hahaa, I see, I see. For some reason, even tho’ I dunno the word, it sure rolls off the tongue.”

Gathering Subaru’s response, Halibel gnawed on his kiseru and replied in somewhat of a good mood. But, frustrated by Halibel’s reply, Subaru hastily shouted out “Halibel-san!”.

With every passing moment, if the undead cataclysm was continuously expanding—.

Subaru: “That would mean we don’t have a moment to waste. For you to have come to the Empire is…”

Halibel: “Don’t’cha worry, I done tidied up the zombie disturbance that happened back in Kararagi. So ya don’t need ta get all worked up ‘bout Kararagi.”

Subaru: “Ah…”

Halibel: “Yer such a sweet kid, how ‘bout some candy…? Ah, I ain’t got no candy on me.”

Without doing anything like feeling around in his sleeves, Halibel soothed Subaru with a lighthearted tone. Involuntarily, Subaru pouted his lips, feeling rebuked for his hasty attitude.

Julius: “According to Mr. Halibel’s investigation, the undead in question… No, the zombies, following the flow of where their damages have been incurred, it seems that they have gradually been proceeding towards the Empire. Therefore, in order to investigate the emergency that occurred within their country, and to issue an alert for caution to your country, the League of Cities has—”

Anastasia: “We done employed Halibel since he was fully informed on the situation, ‘n I’ve taken on the role as an emissary for the League of Cities. It was also quite the help for crossin’ the border.”

That was how Anastasia promptly summed up the details of how she took on the role of emissary for the League of Cities.

She may have taken care as to not sound too serious, but unfortunately, no matter how much care she took, the contents of this matter were such that there was no way it would not become heavy.

In particular, the fact that the undead cataclysm had occurred earlier in Kararagi was—

Vincent: “The incident that occurred in the City-States preceded the Empire. If that is the case, it could be said that the current undead catastrophe was brought to the Empire from your country, is that not so?”

Anastasia: “I guess that’s possible, but we got a different view.”

Vincent: “Ho. If this is not an attempt to avoid responsibility, let me hear it.”

Anastasia: “It seems like Kararagi was the first place where the Hotoke-san… where the zombies, caused damage. —But, I think the main target was Vollachia, ‘n Kararagi was used as a practice ground before that.”

Anastasia replied to Abel’s snide remarks with an unchanged attitude.

Contrary to her elegant demeanor, the hypothesis she posited was a rather extreme one. The view that Kararagi was the practice ground, and Vollachia was the main event, was far too harsh.

Emilia: “Why does Anastasia-san think so? That the thing with Kararagi was not serious, and that Vollachia is the real objective.”

Anastasia: “Well, the scale of damage.”

When the question Subaru had in mind was spoken by Emilia, such was Anastasia’s response. While the gaze of her pale turquoise eyes clashed against Emilia’s amethyst eyes,

Anastasia: “The account was convoluted, but Garkla received the first reports of damage to the Imperial Capital. Even if it ain’t fully accurate, it’s true that zombies done captured the Imperial Capital, ain’t that right?”

Julius: “It is unusual for the Imperial Capital at the center of the Vollachian Empire to be captured, and for its citizens all to be evacuated en masse. Henceforth, I have no doubt that the intentions of the “enemy” who brought about this situation lie in the Empire.”

Vincent: “Your reasoning is sound.”

Hearing the deductions posed by Anastasia and Julius, Abel gave a brief response.

However, deep in thought behind his tranquil sable eyes, the Emperor, prefacing his speech with “Incidentally”, turned his gaze toward Halibel.

Vincent: “The damages you said you suppressed in the City-States, what truly happened there? Despite the state of the Empire, I have not heard anything of the City-States being destroyed by undead.”

Halibel: “Righty. I done stopped it before that happened… tho’ even if I’m sayin’ that, seems like their goal wasn’t ta make a mess of Kararagi, but just ta warm up like what lil’ Ana said.”

Vincent: “What does that mean?”

Halibel: “Puttin’ it simply, the zombies I happened across had entirely replaced all the people in the city, ‘n were livin’ the same lifestyle as if they were still alive. Seemed like they didn’t want us ta know that they had swapped places.”

Subaru: “Wha…”

As Halibel revealed the truth, Subaru became lost for words.

And it was not only Subaru who was surprised. This group of wise people all had thoughtful expressions on their faces, and everyone who was surprised like Subaru was speechless.

That was probably to be expected. Just now, Halibel’s story was far too different from what had been assumed.

Goz: “You, you are saying that those undead are going as far as to disguise themselves as the living?! It is true that Her Excellency Lamia spoke in the same manner as she did then when she was alive…! But even so!”

Serena: “If you see them as the living, then that destroys the perception of them being an opponent who attacks indiscriminately. It’s already troublesome that some of them are intelligent, but if that happens, the way we deal with them as enemies will need to change quite a lot. This has become excessively amusing.”

Goz: “Just what is so amusing, High Countess Dracroy! Even your impudence ought to have its limits!!”

Goz and Serena’s views were pitted against each other as a shocking embodiment of that misconception.

However, that reaction from the two was natural. In fact, Subaru had the same opinion. These were not opponents which could just be fought, it had become a matter of exploiting their weakness.

Even still—

Emilia: “Hey, Halibel-san, you said that everyone in the town was turned into “zombees”… But in that town, how many people were living there?”

It was a question that someone needed to ask.

Subaru regretted that instead of himself, he had let Emilia do it. That regret grew deeper and larger after hearing Halibel’s answer.

That was because—

Halibel: “—Roughly, somewhere ‘round two thousand people.”

Emilia: “That many…”

Halibel’s answer clearly quantified the scale of the damage.

One could only imagine that drastic scale of damage; that made Emilia’s expression severely darken, and drove a cold, sharp thorn into Subaru's chest.

However, there were not just people who were hurt by Halibel's answer, there were also those who looked ahead.

Vincent: "If that many disguised themselves to be the living, I have no choice but to say that it is troublesome. What caused them to be exposed?"

Anastasia: "The reason they were discovered was the amount of supplies that were goin' in n' out of the city. They disguised themselves to some extent, but the numbers between the livin' and dead people didn't match up. The Hotoke-san don't need food or drinkin' water, so that's where the discrepancy came from."

Vincent: "The boundary between the living and the dead. —It appears it can not be crossed."

Unlike Subaru, whose emotions halted him, Abel and Anastasia did not stop.

While he felt frustrated by that difference, he also did not want to forget what he had told Abel, that it was necessary to not throw away this frustration.

Vincent: "Berstetz, you had an army stationed in the western part of the Empire, correct?"

Indifferent to Subaru gritting his teeth, Abel posed a question to Berstetz.

Berstetz nodded briefly with a "Yes" to the Emperor's question, and,

Berstetz: "We have received reports of unrest along the national border with Kararagi in the west. It was before the signs of civil war had expanded, but we feared counter-moves and polarization of the rebel army, so we kept it maintained to keep them in check. —You do not mean."

Vincent: "The one entrusted with that army, it ought to have been Groovy Gumlet, was it not?"

His narrow thread-like eyes opening slightly, Berstetz laid bare his astonishment. As if agreeing with the Prime Minister's realization, Abel let out a small sigh.

That which the sigh spoke of, was certainly one of the Nine Divine Generals—he was supposed to be the First-Class General whom Subaru had never had a chance to meet face to face.

The reason why Abel narrowed his eyes languidly when he said that person's name was—

Goz: "Your Excellency! Surely not… Surely not! General First-Class Groovy is!"

Vincent: "Keeping the unrest on the national border with the City-States in check… If that is why they did not participate in the great battle of the Imperial Capital, and if it has reached a state that we are not even able to meet with them, then there is no other recourse but to assume the worst."

Serena: "Assume the worst, hm? Even I would have a hard time calling that amusing."

Goz's face flushed red, and Serena erased the thin smile on her lips.

Giving a nod at these leading figure's reactions, Abel spoke.

Vincent: "—Groovy Gumlet and his army have already fallen into the hands of the undead. If they fail to unite with us in the future, we ought to operate under that assumption."

Goz: "—Hk!"

In response to Abel's words, Goz's entire body trembled and he gnashed his molars.

It was not a metaphor, he really ground his molars. As an immense amount of indignation ran through the body of the warrior named Goz Ralfon, the possibility of having lost his comrade was hitting him hard.

Even for Subaru and the others, who did not know him personally, it was a silent blow.

Berstetz: “Your Excellency, as per your speculation, if an undead can pretend to be alive, then…”

Vincent: “Indeed, the reports from various regions, on their own, have lost credibility. Without increasing the accuracy of the information, to engage in the battle for the recapture of the Imperial Capital will be next to impossible.”

Which of the delivered reports were from their living allies, and which ones were from the undead enemy, was not known.

Presented with such a frightening possibility, Subaru gasped.

Subaru: “In other words, that’s the reason why the League of Cities entrusted Anastasia-san with being their emissary…”

Anastasia: “The sense of crisis, y’all feel it too, don’t’cha? It absolutely mustn’t be allowed to spread. Therefore, we were allowed to go as jus’ a small group of reliable people.”

Anastasia spoke while nodding, to which both Julius and Halibel also expressed agreement.

Due to the commencement of the opposition against the undead, they were two trusted people chosen for their individual war potential.

Subaru: “What about Ricardo, Mimi, and the others?”

Anastasia: “They’re buildin’ a united front with the League of Cities at the border. Basically, they won’t be enterin’ the Empire. If it doesn’t stop with the Empire, Kararagi will have to be prepared.”

Halibel: “That ain’t a good omen, but gimme a break. Well, at this point it’s too late ta do anythin’ ‘bout lil’ Ana’s sharp tongue.”

Anastasia: “Halibel.”

Anastasia, who had answered the whereabouts of the absent Iron Fang, looked at Halibel with a smile. She put her hand on her cheek in a soft gesture, and kept her gaze fixed on Halibel,

Anastasia: “I overlooked it the first time, but can ya stop callin’ me lil’ Ana? I ain’t a kid anymore, and I’m also a representative of Kararagi.”

Halibel: “Tho’ ya say yer not a child, ya don’t look any different from when ya were a wee lassie. Yer character hasn’t changed from the ol’ days when ya were such a rascal together with Ricardo…”

Anastasia: “Halibel.”

Halibel: “Alrighty alrighty, my bad.”

Waving his hand, Halibel raised the white flag to Anastasia.

The seemingly familiar relationship between the two was intriguing, but compared to the pressing issue at hand, it could only be considered a trivial matter.

Indeed, from the point of view of having to defend against the unprecedented undead cataclysm—.

Julius: “Once again, I would like to convey the intentions of Kararagi’s League of Cities. In order to contain the damage caused by the undead… the damage caused by the zombies, the City-States will extend as much support as possible to the Empire.”

Vincent: “—. Regarding the support, we can work out the details later. Do you people have any ideas of means to stop this situation?”

Halibel: “‘Bout that, it ain’t a natural phenomenon that the Hotoke-san wake up, right? No doubt, it’s the result of some fella’s gaudy intentions. In other words—”

Anastasia: “—The mastermind, the caster, the ringleader, or whatever you wanna call it, they gotta be subdued.”

A huge problem that could plunge the entire world into crisis, and the plan to overcome it.

Stopping the entity responsible for this problem, the unseen “enemy”, was the highest priority of the Kingdom of Lugunica, the Vollachian Empire, and Kararagi’s League of Cities—.

Subaru: “—The unidentified “enemy”.”

Thinking of the “enemy” whose true nature was unknown, Subaru murmured softly.

What did this “enemy” look like, and just what were they thinking when they made preparations to commit such terrible barbaric acts?

The mere thought of the hardships and obstacles that awaited them in their quest to defeat this yet-to-be-seen “enemy” sent cold sweat down his spine.

However—

Subaru: “—With this many members gathered here.”

Subaru’s heart, seized by fear as it was, was nevertheless encouraged by the presence of those around him.

The Emilia camp, who had even come to the Empire in search of Subaru and the others, the leaders of the Empire, who hardened their resolve to unite for the sake of protecting it, and the reliable reinforcements from Kararagi.

Subaru: “No matter what the “enemy” is planning, there’s absolutely no way that we’re gonna lose—!”

That was Natsuki Subaru’s sincere declaration of war against the “enemy.”

3

—Indeed, it was around the same time as Subaru’s surge of enthusiasm from within the coupled dragon carriages.

Ferociously, the reservoir’s water gushed forth from the destroyed bulwark, engulfing the Imperial Capital.

As the muddy torrent swept away buildings and tore people and trees asunder indiscriminately, the blue-haired boy, having escaped to a high vantage point, used his hand as a visor as he gazed over the view.

Boy: “Oh dear I tried to buy as much time as I could but I wonder if everyone was able to successfully escape. Hopefully Boss and the others didn’t let the blood rush to their heads and mess up the decision to retreat.”

Lightheartedly muttering so, clad in a kimono and wearing zori was Cecilus.

In this grand battle for the Imperial Capital, as the most difficult problem in all aspects concerning the complete change in the situation was identified by his natural intuition and drama-geek mindset, the leading actor of the world rushed to the scene.

In fact, if Cecilus had not taken such a selfish and arbitrary action, the Imperial Capital would have been engulfed by water much sooner, and many more people would have failed to escape, resulting in an enormous amount of casualties.

In that sense, Cecilus’s actions, beyond anyone’s expectations, coincidentally brought about a fortunate outcome for many.

However, that was not the case for Cecilus, as the person concerned.

With the sudden appearance of the undead forces, the state of the battle for the Imperial Capital had changed, and trying to surprise the third “enemy” who was attempting to snatch victory through a boorish intervention, Cecilus had leapt forth.

Undoubtedly, he was in a state where he could sing his own praises of it having been a performance meant to enchant the world.

And yet—

Cecilus: “Even so, this was completely unexpected.”

Within the Imperial Capital engulfed by the muddy torrent, Cecilus murmured so, scratching his cheeks at the sight of undead who had all fled to higher ground like he had, still maintaining their fixation over those who yet lived.

There was no doubt that they existed outside the natural order, resurrected by a technique unknown even to Cecilus.

In fact, he had also encountered the being that had made them into such things.

Even though everything up to that point had proceeded in accordance with Cecilus's intuition—

Cecilus: "—Unbelievable, who could've imagined that the situation wouldn't be settled even when the caster is defeated!"

Collapsed at the feet of Cecilus as he raised his voice, was the caster who had resurrected and commanded the undead.

With beautiful pink hair and long ears, the young girl appeared to be around the same age as Cecilus—Having confronted the Blue Lightning, Cecilus, she was a Witch whose life had already met its end.

Chapter 17:
A Magical Approach

As much as it was necessary, the certainty that this was an unprecedented situation only grew deeper.

Among the events that had taken place in Lugunica recorded in the history books, was a case resembling this unusual situation, but in that sequence of events, the case was not treated as anything major.

—The Demi-Human War.

It was a mass-scale civil war that occurred in Lugunica's past, and much like the current situation, it was the only recorded instance in history where the dead rose as enemies.

However, the main focus of the history books were more on the friction between the human and demi-human tribes, and the extraordinary attacks carried out as part of the civil war had not been recorded in detail.

That was regrettable. Had the details of that time been recorded in more depth—

???: "I'm not gonna fall behind these guys!!"

With a roar and a swing of his fist, a group of Imperial Soldiers, each pallid in complexion, were blown away all at once.

Riding off the energy that had been vigorously drawn up from the ground he firmly stepped on, he unleashed a blow with all of his might, one that was perhaps closer to a cleave than a punch.

In quick succession he repeated the attack a second, and third time, with each blow knocking down the enemy's formation. —No, it was not anything impressive like a formation.

At first glance, the silhouettes of the enemy approached side by side, but they had no such thing as tactical leadership, coordination, or strategy. If that were the case, they were simply a cluster of individuals.

If they were merely a cluster of individuals, Garfiel would not be caught lagging behind.

However—

???: “Zeh-ah! Zuah!”

With a sharp lunge, a double slash grazed Garfiel’s neck.

Feeling his hair standing on end, he glared at his opponent; having suddenly appeared kicking away the fragments of a shattered undead, was another undead clad in an air different from the others.

Garfiel: “Tch.”

With a click of his tongue, he raised his shoulder and checked his neck, where the tip of the sword had slightly grazed him.

The extent of the slash was about a finger’s length difference between the first and second blows. It was the technique of a master who deliberately demonstrated a dodgeable blow, then tried to cut off the opponent’s head with a second.

They were nothing more than a cluster of individuals without any formation, but occasionally among them, there were those who had this level of skill.

As a result, it had become a bit more troublesome than expected, and he assumed that there was one skilled undead out of every twenty. Because of this, he could not carelessly support his allies by saying that they would be fine as long as they worked together.

Based on one assessment of the situation, it was quite possible that a formation of a hundred men could be destroyed by a single skilled undead.

Skilled Undead: “Zeh-ah! Zuah—!”

Garfiel wrinkled his nose, whereupon the undead again unleashed the same double slash.

Contrary to what had just been shown, the range of the technique had changed to be more daring. Earlier, the difference was a fingertip's worth, and now it was a fist's worth. A deep cut the size of a fist would be fatal, no matter how shallow the cut was.

However, the undead who had unleashed the technique widened his eyes, a face in stark contrast to that of one confident in victory.

The reason was simple—their right arm, which had been holding the sword, had been shattered at the wrist.

Garfiel: "No matter how many obvious tricks ya play, yer grip on the sword is always in the same position when ya slash. "The Three-Headed Valgren has but one body"… Hah!"

He switched over to shatter the left hand, and then drove his fist into his opponent's astonished face.

As soon as the impact of the blow passed through to the back of its head, the undead's head was blown away as if it were a fruit bursting open. As its head crumbled, fissures went through its torso and legs, and its whole body shattered.

Garfiel: "This ain't to my liking."

Looking down upon the wreckage of his vanquished foe, Garfiel voiced those words.

What irritated Garfiel was the way the undead were defeated and destroyed. Since these things were dead, it would not be appropriate to describe it as a way of dying, and more than anything else, the very way they shattered deprived Garfiel of the feeling that he was fighting against something that had life.

All that remained was a faint cold sensation, questioning just what in the world he was fighting against.

Garfiel: "…"

Garfiel wiped the sweat from his chin with his arm, and when he looked around, he saw an incessant stream of undead soldiers on the night plains that had become the battlefield.

In order to combat them, a tactical delay force, which included Garfiel, was in the midst of fighting hard.

Initially, Garfiel had been assigned to a medical unit in order to make good use of his healing magic, but the policy of preventing people from getting injured suited Garfiel's nature better than treating the injured.

Petra: "Garf-san, your fidgeting is worrisome! If you're so restless, go help the people fighting yourself."

So said Petra, who was working hard in the same medical unit as Garfiel.

Though it was not because she had insisted, Garfiel rushed outside. In reality, as a volunteer, he thought he was producing some good results.

However, he was not so conceited as to say that he was doing the best work here.

The reason was—

???: "Do it—!!"

A sharp yell echoed in the black of the night, immediately after which the sound of drawn bow strings firing rang out in succession.

In accordance with the yell from Taritta, the chieftain of the People of Shudraq, a tremendously dense hail of arrows was fired.

Rather than as individual arrows, they fell as a single cluster that left no means to dodge; the only way to evade them was to either catch or repel all of them. In fact, the undead, having no choice but to suffer the attack, each tried to utilize their weapons and shields.

However—

Kuna: “I see it!”

Holly: “Go for it!”

The undead, focused on the sky overhead, were struck by a heavy duty arrow fired from a strong bow by an assertive voice.

Literally, to say that they were shot through would be an understatement; that absurd impact was like being rammed by a full speed dragon carriage. The undead that assumed a defensive stance were blown away along with the group behind them at the same time.

Garfiel: “My amazin’ self ain’t s’pposed to lose to ya, but that’s fuckin’ insane.”

The undead who were weak were eradicated by the rain of arrows which dominated the area, and the undead who were strong and survived that attack were sniped by the strong bow. The rhythm of the coordinated hunters greatly impressed Garfiel.

Even for Garfiel, his movements would halt if he was turned into a hedgehog from getting pierced by arrows, and then in addition to that was the huge damage from the strong bow which he could not dodge. He considered it a relief to have those tactics on his side.

Garfiel: “Well, I got no idea what’s happenin’ ov’r there…”

In contrast to the great strength of the Shudraq, another group won Garfiel’s admiration in a different way—they accompanied Subaru who should have fought alone in the Empire, they were a group who all looked rough; the self-proclaimed Pleiades Battalion.

Pleiades: “LET’S GO LET’S GO LET’S GO LET’S GO—!”

Pleiades: “STRONGEST! INVINCIBLE! BRING IT ON! BRING IT ON!!”

Pleiades: “UOOOOOOH—!!”

They were abnormally loud in the midst of a nighttime battle, and Garfiel’s eye could not spot anyone as being exceptionally skilled in martial prowess. Of course, many of them seemed to have refined their techniques to the level of an Imperial Soldier, at any rate.

It was hard to say if the majority of them were trained, but they were good at giving into their instincts and the way they raged about.

But even so, they were strong. Already, the difference in physical strength was like an adult compared to a child.

???: “It’s beautiful. Their strength is refreshing.”

A voice reached Garfiel, who was staring at the way the Pleiades Battalion fought. When he turned his head, lined up next to him was a woman with dark brown skin and dyed red hair—Mizelda.

Mizelda, who had a single wooden leg, wore a smile the color of blood towards the Battalion’s violent fighting style.

Garfiel: “I don’t get it, but they have somethin’ to do with Captain. I do wonder what they’re doin’, but I ain’t worried that it’s bad.”

Mizelda: “Captain… Subaru, is it? Emilia and the others, they put great faith in him.”

Garfiel: “Ha! Faith? A word like that is an understatement. Captain’s a man, a man who gives back my amazin’ self’s expectations and faith a hundred times ov’r!”

It was neither an exaggeration nor a bluff; from the bottom of his heart, Garfiel held zero doubt in praising him in such a way. At Garfiel’s answer, the quality of Mizelda’s smile changed.

From a mask of war, to something that was somehow calmer and harbored a sense of understanding.

Mizelda: “I also understand that feeling. In the Lifeblood Ritual and in all the subsequent battles, Subaru continued proving himself to us. He has the soul of a warrior. Though he may not have a good face for a man, he’d make a good husband for Taritta.”

Garfiel: “Stop talkin’ ‘bout his face! The Captain also worries about tha look in his eyes! Besides…”

Mizelda: “Besides?”

Garfiel: “No matter how charmed someone gets by Captain, there’s someone that he’s already decided to fall for.”

Mizelda: “—I see. That’s right.”

Garfiel rubbed his nose with his finger, and Mizelda nodded profoundly.

He was unsure to what extent were her words a joke and to what extent were they genuine praise, but the fact that Subaru was also valued within this Empire made Garfiel proud.

Wherever he was, Subaru involved the people around him and brought about great results.

However, though Subaru could get on exceedingly well wherever he found himself, it was the wish of Garfiel and the collective will of the entire Camp to have him stay with them.

It was for this reason that everyone went through great lengths to rush to the heart of the Empire.

Garfiel: “And yet, they had the nerve to get in the way of our amazin’ selves reunitin’ with the Captain… Hk.”

Garfiel was a military officer, one who loved to compete against the strong. But, he was not a battle junkie who chose to fight anyone and everyone, no matter the time or place.

To reunite with an important companion, to be in a situation in which that delightful reunion time was interrupted by constantly appearing enemies filled his heart not with happiness, but solely with hatred.

Garfiel: “But, they sure are a weird ass lot, ain’t they?”

Mizelda: “The dead coming back to life is unnatural. I understand what you’re saying…”

Garfiel: “Ah, that ain’t what I meant.”

Mizelda: “—?”

His fangs creaked as he bit them together; Mizelda raised an eyebrow at Garfiel’s mutter.

In a purposeful response to her doubt, Garfiel jerked his chin, directing his gaze towards a group of undead that were still being targeted by the Shudraq’s arrows.

Garfiel: “Look closely ‘n ya can tell… There ain’t a surefire way to kill these guys. Some break with one arrow, while others don’t, even with five arrows in ‘em.”

Mizelda: “There are also some tough beasts. Just like people. Isn’t it the same thing?”

Garfiel: “I know the difference between strong ‘n weak. This ain’t like that…”

He could not explain it well, but from Garfiel’s view, even among the undead appearing roughly equal in strength, he sensed a difference in their level of toughness.

Whether an arrow hit a vital spot or not seemed to have little relevance. Some seemed to be unaffected even when an arrow pierced an eye, while others shattered from a single arrow lodged in their shoulder.

It felt as if simply gauging them by the strength or weakness of their life force—.

Garfiel: “Damn it! Jus’ thinkin’ ‘bout it hurts my head! It’s “a Guiltilaw that fell one step short.” If we jus’ crush ‘em all, it ain’t matter anyway…”

???: “—That is exactly how “a Guiltilaw that fell one step short” would think, iiisn’t~ it?”

At that moment, Garfiel’s shoulders jolted in response to the voice descending from above his head.

When he hastily looked up, there was a silhouette leisurely approaching from the thickly clouded night sky. It steadily grew into the shape of a man that Garfiel could not stand.

And then—

???: “Since you are struggling, let me give you a haaand~.”

Garfiel: “Dudley, you bastard…”

???: “Oops. I feel bad saying this after you had finally gotten used to my alias, but after the meeting we had earlier, there’s no longer a need to hide my naaame~. So, as usual, you can…”

Garfiel: “Fuckin’ Roswaal…!!”

Roswaal: “While there is an unnecessary prefix, but you can call me that, I don’t miiind~.”

Indeed, Roswaal, who had landed on the ground, was laughing, provoking Garfiel’s irritation.

Since infiltrating Vollachia, he may have concealed his facial makeup and outlandish costumes, but his unique manner of speaking, which likewise should have been sealed away, had returned.

Hearing that the pseudonym was also lifted, it could be inferred that the discussion in the dragon carriage had probably been settled.

The negotiations that Otto, Frederica, and the others had mentioned before, to reach a consensus regarding their involvement with the Empire—without twisting Subaru and Emilia’s feelings.

That in itself was a joyous thing for Garfiel.

Garfiel: “If ya finished talkin’, I’d like to hear how it turned out… Beatrice! Have ya changed sides? It’s rare to see ya to be with that bastard.”

Beatrice: “It’s out of necessity, in fact. If possible, Betty would rather not leave Subaru's side for even a second, I suppose. But, it can't be helped but to be relied upon, in fact."

With that said, Beatrice flung herself out of Roswaal's arms.

Since it was for just one month, Beatrice being active even in Subaru's absence was still fresh in her memory, so now that she somehow managed to reunite with Subaru, Garfiel thought that she would have been resolved to never leave his side again.

In fact, just before everyone was about to smother the awoken Subaru in the coupled dragon carriage, the girl had been mumbling along those lines with a completely determined look in her eyes.

For her to leave Subaru's side, and come to the battlefield with Roswaal—

Beatrice: "Garfiel, Betty is here to ascertain the origin of that unease you felt, I suppose."

Garfiel: "The origin, of the unease?"

Roswaal: "If you go into a battle without knowing your enemy, the results will amount to less than half of what you expected. You compensate for this by knowing your enemy. Especially this enemy, who is shrouded in faaar~ too many mysteries."

After letting go of Beatrice, Roswaal swung his arms as if feeling somewhat lonely. At the words of those two, Garfiel felt optimistic about the outcome of the conversation, and his fighting spirit surged.

Even though the bearer of this message was the despised Roswaal.

Mizelda: "Not Dudley, but Roswaal… That's your real name then?"

Roswaal: "Yes, Miss Mizelda. Due to certain reasons, I had to falsify my name. I do apologize. Not only I, but also Emilia-sama, who you knew as Emiiily~, had to do the saaame~."

Mizelda: "It was done by a man with a nice face. So you are forgiven."

Beatrice: “What an outrageous basis for a decision, in fact…”

Mizelda digested the issue of the pseudonyms with her own peculiar sense of values.

Beside her, Garfiel gazed towards the pair of Roswaal and Beatrice, and,

Garfiel: “So, the fight’s gonna continue in the Empire, and the reason you two came is…”

Beatrice: “Events outside the realm of reason are best identified by magicians who have the ability to interfere with reason, I suppose.”

Roswaal: “This is a historic collaboration between Lugunica and Vollachia. The most valuable thing the Kingdom can offer in return to them is a magical approach to determining the caaause~.”

If the knowledge of a mage could help to identify the cause of the endless stream of undead, then surely there was no one in Emilia’s camp better qualified to help than Roswaal and Beatrice.

Emilia was a Spiritual Arts User, Ram was the type to rely on her senses, and Petra was still in the process of learning.

Roswaal: “How has it been actually fighting them for a prolonged period? Have you grasped anything?”

Garfiel: “—. I don’t really get the difference between the ones that’re easy to beat ‘n the ones that’re hard to beat. I think there’s a reason apart from whether they’re strong or weak, but…”

Roswaal: “Hmm. So the survivability and vitality of each individual is different?”

Garfiel inwardly clicked his tongue at Roswaal, who was in thought with a long, slender finger on his chin.

It was true that he did not like Roswaal’s every move, but the tongue click just now was not due to irritation with him, but rather for the fact that he was counting on his thoughts and knowledge.

Because, he honestly thought that Roswaal was reliable in this situation.

Beatrice: “Roswaal, looking at it in a daze won’t lead to the answer, in fact.”

Roswaal: “Agreed. Well then, if it comes to this… Beatrice, how much mana do you have left?”

Beatrice: “After having met with Subaru, perfectly full, I suppose.”

Roswaal: “Very well. Theeen~—”

Suddenly smiling, Roswaal’s heterochromatic eyes narrowed, and soon after, four different colored lights, mana, floated in the air around him.

Roswaal snapped his fingers, and the four colored lights raced through the darkness of the night at arrow-like speeds, piercing into the distant group of undead, each light displaying their own powers.

One of the undead burst into flames, and another was encased in ice. One had its limbs severed by a blade of wind, and one was pierced through the groin by a block of rock that rose up from the ground.

All of them were fatal wounds, a destructive force that shattered them into infinitesimal pieces with a cracking sound a second later. Garfiel, and even Mizelda, raised their eyebrows slightly in surprise at the result.

Roswaal: “As it was reported, it’s the fire attribute that works the most effeeectively~. Wind did poorly, and earth is treated no differently than a physical strike. Freezing seems to be inefficient with its mana consumption.”

However, to Roswaal, the executor of the attack, it was not the fact that the undead were defeated, but rather how the strength of the attacks affected the defeated undead.

And then, Beatrice had also begun the same examination, but in a different way than Roswaal.

Beatrice: "—Vita."

Beatrice held her hand up to the night sky, and her chanted magic meddled with the rain of arrows, which was released by the People of Shudraq, as the arrows tore through the sky.

Innumerable arrows poured down upon the undead, their weight multiplied several times by the effects of Beatrice's Yin Magic—magic that altered the weight of its target.

The increase in their power could be gauged from the spectacular sound that came from each undead as they were pierced into the ground.

Beatrice: "As Garfiel said, there is no explanation for why some zombies crumble, and others don't, even though the arrows are of different weights and have different power, in fact."

Garfiel: "If ya make all the arrows heavier, won't it be hard to tell the difference?"

Beatrice: "Don't think so lowly of Betty, I suppose. Instead of making all of the arrows the same weight, each arrow was tested differently, in fact."

Beatrice appeared angry, puffing out her cheeks like a little girl, but her reply in an effort to not be treated like a fool was even more foolish.

Garfiel, as a person who could use magic, albeit specializing in healing magic, understood the precision of the magical manipulation that Beatrice was doing.

One could see that what she had just done with magic was of equal difficulty to threading many needles at once without using one's hands.

Moreover, Beatrice and Roswaal were—

Roswaal: "The cause of their crumbling is not the loss of their liiimbs~. Some of them are still alive even after having their vitals gouged out. Although they are humanoid in appearance, it is better not to think of them as living creeeatures~."

Beatrice: "It's not easy for anyone other than you to treat them like they're not living creatures when they're laughing, angry, and even talking, I suppose. —Maybe it's contingent on the accumulation of a certain amount of damage, in fact."

Roswaal: "That's quite an insulting assessment. I've spent a lot of time with all of you, and I think I've regained a lot of my humaaanity~. Some of them can be taken down with just one leg blown off. If it's a condition of damage accumulation, it doesn't add uuup~."

Beatrice: "It's a ridiculous argument to settle it as a simple difference in individual endurance, I suppose."

Roswaal: "What other reason could there be? The flow of mana is uniform."

Beatrice: "Indeed, it is uniform… Wait, in fact. It's way too uniform, I suppose."

While exchanging banter with each other, Roswaal and Beatrice's investigation of the enemy progressed.

Surprisingly, as they discussed, the two of them checked the disposition of the undead who attacked them, using their respective areas of magical expertise.

Fire, wind, and purple arrows raged, and the undead were unable to get close to the two as they fought back to back.

Of course, Garfiel and Mizelda also attacked the undead to keep them away, but even without them, Roswaal and Beatrice would not be deterred.

Although he would not say it since Beatrice would absolutely hate it —

Mizelda: "Those two couldn't be more in sync."

Garfiel: “We absolutely can’t let them hear that.”

As with Garfiel’s thoughts, Mizelda gave the exact same assessment.

While showing off coordination that could only be described like that, Beatrice, unaware of what they were thinking, lowered her eyebrows and called out “Roswaal!”

Beatrice: “Going to touch them just once, in fact.”

Roswaal: “—How reckless.”

After saying this, Beatrice lightly kicked the ground with her foot and jumped forward.

With a flutter of the hem of her dress, Beatrice’s small body soared like a feather. This was also an unnatural jump, her own weight eliminated by using Yin Magic.

As it was, Beatrice was headed for a single undead who had its back to her—sensing Beatrice’s approach, it turned around to face her.

Roswaal: “Jiwald.”

A moment later, the undead’s right hand that held a sword was vaporized as it was about to strike Beatrice with it.

Roswaal was pointing at the undead. A white light that had emitted from his fingertip had burned the opponent’s arm. The undead was stiffened in astonishment, and Beatrice placed her hand on its forehead.

Then Beatrice’s distinctive patterned eyes widened,

Beatrice: “As expected, I suppose.”

Beatrice grumbled as her body was pulled away by an arm around her slender waist.

Holding Beatrice’s body close, Roswaal exchanged places with her and delivered a sharp fist with the arm opposite the one holding her, shattering the undead’s head before it could regain its composure.

Roswaal: “Good grief, I’m the one who is going to get scolded by Subaru-kun.”

Beatrice: “And it’s Betty who will get all the praise from Subaru, in fact. —It’s Restoration Magic, I suppose.”

Roswaal: “—So that’s the reason.”

Roswaal, who had complained about Beatrice’s recklessness, closed his yellow eye at what he was told instead of an apology.

The current interaction with the undead gave Beatrice some kind of certainty. It seemed that Roswaal understood this in a few words, but unfortunately, Garfiel had no clue what it meant.

Garfiel: “Oi, I don’t understand at all! Explain it in a way that even Emilia-sama could understand!”

Beatrice: “Essentially, Emilia and Garfiel are about the same in terms of their comprehension, in fact. —Now we know the structure of the zombies’ bodies and the mechanism behind it, I suppose.”

Garfiel: “Like I asked, what the hell does that mean?”

Garfiel asked the question with gnashed teeth.

Garfiel was already aware of the existence of Restoration Magic. It was a magic that could restore damaged objects, and he heard that the best users could even restore burned books from ashes.

However, it was said that there were few users, and that there were also noticeable shortcomings, such as the need for exquisite magical precision and the tendency for restored items to deteriorate in quality.

And above all, life could never be restored. —This was not restoration nor repair, but the forbidden realm of something like the Sacrament of the Immortal King that had been brought up a few times already.

Roswaal: “Teacher chose mana for her vessels, and I chose blood for mine. —But, this enemy chose earth for their vessels, are they not bothered if the contents overflow?”

Roswaal, covering his mouth, spoke of the revelation that Beatrice had given him.

Even then, Garfiel’s understanding fell short of theirs, but he could intuit that it was a path that would lead to answers that were terribly disturbing and unpleasant even for Garfiel.

Disregarding Garfiel, Roswaal looked at Beatrice with a grim expression on his face.

Roswaal: “Beatrice, this isn’t the Sacrament of the Immortal King, right?”

Beatrice: “…The basis is the same, but the approach is different, in fact. For the Sacrament of the Immortal King, the vessel comes first, and the soul second, I suppose. However, as for these zombies…”

Roswaal: “The soul comes first, and the vessel after. —The body changes form to suit the soul.”

At Roswaal’s comment, Beatrice nodded deeply.

As usual, Garfiel could not understand the crucial part of the exchange between the two. Garfiel, holding back his bitterness, suddenly could not believe his eyes.

Garfiel: “…”

Roswaal was there with an expression that reflected even more anguish on his face than Garfiel did.

He had never imagined he could have this contorted expression on his face. —Nay, Garfiel had hoped to punch him in the stomach someday, wanting to bring about an anguished face, but for a reason unrelated to Garfiel’s desire, Roswaal was in agony.

With that agony reflected in his eyes, Roswaal opened his mouth.

Roswaal: "—I think I might know who this "enemy" is."

Garfiel: "—Eh, for real?! Then…"

Roswaal: "But, wait. That can't be. After all, by my hand, she was…"

Gone was the composure he had just prior, and Roswaal's voice was filled with hesitation and doubt.

At his demeanor of not stating things clearly, Garfiel blinked and then immediately bared his teeth. If it had been Garfiel himself, it was possible that some absurd idea would have popped up.

However, it was Roswaal, not Garfiel, who had come up with the thought.

Garfiel: "Bastard, this ain't the time to be utterin' such weakness."

Roswaal: "…"

Beatrice: "Roswaal, clarify one thing, in fact."

Garfiel leaned forward as if wanting to grab Roswaal by the collar. However, before his hand could stretch out in aggression, Beatrice's voice struck the silent Roswaal.

Beatrice fixed her eyes on Roswaal, and after waiting for him to meet her gaze,

Beatrice: "The cause of your hesitation, is it related to Mother, I suppose?"

Roswaal: "…Am I that easy to read?"

Beatrice: "Only matters related to Mother can upset you so much, in fact. Also, more recently, about Ram, I suppose."

Roswaal: "I'm confident I'd be overcome by emotions if something happened to you as well."

With that, Roswaal, who had responded with a wry smile, closed his eyes firmly and tightened his cheeks. Then, having pushed aside the hesitation and weakness from before, he opened his eyes and nodded.

Roswaal: “Beatrice’s observation is correct. The mechanism by which the zombies are revived without the original corpse is an application of Restoration Magic. The prerequisite for this is the invocation of the soul, which is an application of the Sacrament of the Immortal King.”

Beatrice: “Both Restoration Magic and the Sacrament of the Immortal King aren’t the kind of techniques that can be used immediately upon understanding the theory, in fact. To begin with, given the feat of combining such fundamentally different types of magic, it can’t be said that there are even a handful of geniuses who can do it, I suppose. Those who could do it would be…”

Roswaal: “—Of Teacher’s lineage. However, it cannot be Teacher. Therefore…”

The “teacher” that Roswaal spoke of and the “mother” that Beatrice spoke of were the same person, and by no means could it be said that that person was completely unrelated to Garfiel.

Although it could be confusing because there were multiple people with the same name, when he heard that the name of that Witch was involved, Garfiel immediately understood.

A single word from Beatrice had cut through Roswaal’s agony, and his attitude of trying to admit what he did not want to admit might have also played a role in Garfiel’s understanding.

However—

Mizelda: “—What a boorish gaze.”

Suddenly, Mizelda murmured in a low voice.

Because it was about the intricacies of magic, Mizelda, who probably could not keep up with the conversation between Roswaal and Beatrice any more than Garfiel, had given up on understanding the cause of Roswaal’s agony and was focusing solely on attacking the undead.

The woman had stopped in her tracks, and she was looking upwards with her fierce eyes narrowed in aggression.

Garfiel also looked towards the target of the hunter's piercing gaze and choked up. Not only Garfiel, but Beatrice and Roswaal as well.

However, the reason behind the reactions from those three were slightly different.

For Garfiel, it was because he saw a familiar figure that should not have been there.

For Beatrice and Roswaal, it appeared that a more negative feeling was the reason.

—In the night sky, with long, fluttering pink hair, was a girl clad in black.

Her face was the same as the being Garfiel had admired ever since he could remember; however, with cold eyes that had never been directed at Garfiel, she was looking down at him.

Girl: "This was not desired, but implementation was successful… Seemingly, this world has recognized my existence as its own life."

The familiar face murmured in a familiar voice, gently tracing the crack that ran through her face with her hand and glaring at Garfiel and the others through her golden irises.

In response, Roswaal swallowed his saliva with an audible gulp and opened his mouth.

Roswaal: "So, you were alive… Sphinx."

Sphinx: "No, I am dead. —Observation: Required."

With an indifferent voice as if teasing, the girl with an appearance that looked exactly like Ryuzu, Garfiel's grandmother—The Witch, Sphinx, with the face of an undead, declared so.

Chapter 18:
Reunions Are but a Moment

1

Her long pink hair fluttering, a young girl clad in black floated in the air.

The young girl of slightly elongated ears narrowed her slim eyes, that outward appearance serving as proof of her elven descent, a race that was loathed in this world.

However, those external features were, strictly speaking, a misperception.

The reason being that, upon pursuing the history of the young girl, the most peculiar fact about her would not be the elven part, but rather the way in which she was born.

Using the elf, Ryuzu Meyer, as a model, a certain technique established in the Sanctuary was used to produce replicants—Constructed using mechanisms similar to the Artificial Spirits, each one was a brand new life.

Among the many such replicants produced, there was one evaluated as being the greatest failure.

That had betrayed the intentions of the Witch who had devised the technique and utilized the mechanisms, resulting in a large number of victims, and it was engraved into the history of the Kingdom as a major catastrophe.

—The artificial monster created as a result of Echidna, the Witch of Greed, failing to replicate her own existence; that was Sphinx.

Roswaal: "…"

At the sight of the "enemy" floating in the night sky above him, Roswaal gasped.

The unexpected encounter with an enemy that should not exist brought no small shock to his psyche. —No, let it be recognized without any pretenses.

It had been an utterly crushing blow, quite capable of causing Roswaal's heart to fissure.

This was a reunion that should not have been possible.

Regarding the monster overhead, the one who was most cognizant of its existence was Roswaal. Indeed, he had actually faced Sphinx when she was wreaking havoc in the Demi-Human War.

Back then, the monster's life should have been crushed by the fist of that generation's Roswaal.

And yet—

Sphinx: "Absence of four limbs, negative. Regarding memory, intact up to just prior. My form is… anchored in an unintended state. Self-awareness is troublesome, is it not? Countermeasures: Required."

While stretching out her arms in mid-air, Sphinx muttered in a quiet voice.

Her golden irises and pale skin drained of color were unmistakably those of the undead, but she also possessed a stronger sense of self than any of the undead that Roswaal and the others had encountered thus far.

The presence of memories and sense of self from their lifetime; deciphering the degree to which that element varied between undead individuals was the reason why Roswaal and the others had come here—But it was a mistake.

A mistake that spanned around forty years, at that.

Sphinx's survival was a major blow to Roswaal, but what he lamented even more, was that Beatrice and Garfiel were also present here.

He should have never allowed them to meet.

Regardless of Sphinx's true identity, for the "enemy" to have that appearance, an appearance which both Beatrice and Garfiel had emotional attachments to; he should have absolutely never allowed them to meet.

Hiding that regret behind a blink of his eyes, Roswaal clad his heart in armor, and without taking his gaze off Sphinx—

Roswaal: "—Garfiel, you must not rush ahead."

Garfiel: "—Beatrice, get behind me."

Beatrice: "—Roswaal, calm down, in fact."

All three simultaneously raised their voices towards another, and a moment of silence ensued.

If each of them had called out to the one they thought would be the most emotional, then all of them must have dealt with the initial shock and were now thinking ahead.

The exploration of the perceptions from Beatrice and Garfiel were postponed.

Mizelda: "Not only can it speak, it has a different air about it. That undead is special, right?"

Unlike Roswaal and the others, Mizelda, who had no reason to stiffen, narrowed her eyes.

Drawing back his chin at her words, before Beatrice or Garfiel could hurl some words at Sphinx, Roswaal opened his mouth.

Roswaal: "I find it hard to believe, but have you been surviving as an undead ever since the Demi-Human War?"

Sphinx: "I sense a slight discrepancy in that phrasing. If the term "undead" is adequate, would the term "surviving" not be unsuitable?"

Roswaal: "I see. You have no intention of answering the question. —As always, you tend to get on people's nerves."

Sphinx: “The form of your question was improper; I merely pointed it out.”

It was a reply that was nothing short of vexing, and yet, Sphinx’s expression showed no change.

From the very beginning, the girl was a monster without any semblance of emotion, so by becoming an undead, she had also lost what could be called the warmth of a heart. To be precise, it could be described as the coldness of a lifeless body.

But, the moment she took on that undead body, the sense of unease that Roswaal felt was unbearable.

This was employing the same mechanisms as the technique of producing replicants devised by the Witch of Greed, Echidna, as well as the Artificial Spirits, whose bodies were constructed using mana.

There were also the improvements that had been made to the Sacrament of the Immortal King, which he and Beatrice had hastily deciphered earlier.

Clearly, this monster had become an existence more dangerous than ever before.

Garfiel: “Bastard, what the hell even are ya, oi?”

Perhaps frustrated upon seeing the lack of progress in Roswaal’s exchange, Garfiel interjected.

The boy, his sharp canines clattering, and emerald-green eyes brimming with indignation,

Garfiel: “I know there’s others who look ‘n speak like Nanna. But ya see, I know everyone who has Nanna’s face by name, ‘n exactly where they’re at.”

Sphinx: “…”

Garfiel: “So what the fuck are ya?”

Garfiel was talking about Ryuzu, the grandmother he loved dearly, and the replicants, who had the same manner of birth as her but lacked a sense of self due to not being assigned a role.

Even those replicants were given names, and the Ryuzus who lived independently were now in charge of their education, hoping that one day they could be entrusted with carrying out the camp's duties.

Anyhow, it seemed that through Garfiel's intuition, he discerned that Sphinx was not one of those, but rather, another that had been born in the same manner.

To Garfiel, she was no different from a blasphemous existence that tarnished his family. In response to the question from the fervent boy, Sphinx silently lowered her eyes, and,

Sphinx: "Since a short time ago, it seems the atmospheric mana has been disturbed by you two."

Garfiel: "—Tch!"

She had completely ignored Garfiel's presence.

As if the question had never even been asked, Sphinx's gaze turned to Roswaal and Beatrice. At that fact, Garfiel's throat clenched, and the intensity of the anger in his eyes grew.

Understanding Garfiel's anger, Roswaal closed one eye. With only his yellow eye, he glared at Sphinx, torn between cursing at her and provoking her.

Beatrice: "There is a vague idea as to who you might be, I suppose."

Roswaal: "Beatrice."

Beatrice: "Be quiet, in fact, Roswaal. That thing came out while Betty was secluding herself in the Forbidden Library, so your silence about the matter will be overlooked for now, I suppose. But—"

Having been beaten to the punch by Beatrice as he was still choosing his words, Roswaal sighed.

She seemed to have discovered the reason why Roswaal had not disclosed the existence of Sphinx. Given that, Roswaal's ineptitude would surely catch up with him later.

However, right now—

Beatrice: "This time, you will not be able to get away, in fact."

Raising her hand, Beatrice fixed her gaze on Sphinx with her round eyes. Meeting the strong determination in Beatrice's eyes head-on, Sphinx nodded.

The monster, directing her hand towards Beatrice,

Sphinx: "I, too, have recognized the threat. Elimination: Required."

With that, in the moment where words that should never have been spoken were voiced, the emotion in both Beatrice's and Sphinx's eyes slightly intensified—

Roswaal: "—Please die."

Faster than anyone, the inferno of the magic unleashed by Roswaal signaled the commencement of the battle.

2

Stopping in the corridor of the coupled dragon carriage, Subaru glanced out the window with a sudden uneasiness.

The dim night sky stretched across the Empire's plains, and praying for the safety of the little girl who had been sent there yonder, he placed his hand over his chest, and felt the faint beating of his heart.

Emilia: "Subaru, are you alright?"

And, noticing that state of Subaru's, Emilia called out to him from beside.

Emilia narrowed her beautiful amethyst eyes as she gazed at him, and Subaru raised his hands saying, "Yeah, I'm okay".

The discussions between the Emilia camp, the leaders of the Vollachian Empire, and the Kararagi emissaries had come to a close, and experts were now exchanging ideas within numerical areas, such as calculating military potential and securing logistics.

He could be useful if a strategic breakthrough was required, but when it came to the pragmatic management of such a large number of people, Subaru could not help but feel that he lacked in ability.

Subaru: “Even in the Pleiades Battalion, that was left to Gustav-san and Idra…”

Emilia: “Yeah, I also know how Subaru feels. Honestly, I would like to be useful in these kinds of discussions… But I’d only be holding Otto-kun back.”

Subaru: “Rather, there’s gotta be something wrong with Ram and Otto who’ll stay back there and participate in such an intense discussion. Regardless of Nee-sama, I think that guy has lost the ability to feel fear.”

Emilia: “Geez, no matter how you put it, you’re exaggerating. Otto-kun is working reaaally hard for us.”

Emilia puffed up her cheeks at Subaru’s evaluation of the camp’s all too-reliable internal affairs officer.

In this calm setting, as he faced Emilia, the joy of having been able to reunite with her, and the fact that she was still just as perfect for him as always, made his heart restless.

Seeing her every morning made his heart flutter, but after such a long time, the impact was tremendous.

Subaru: “How I wish I could fill my heart with praise for Emilia-tan’s adorableness today, but…”

Emilia: “Beatrice and Roswaal, you’re worried about them, right?”

Subaru: “For my sake, Beako might be working herself too hard.”

When she correctly guessed why he had looked out the window into the sky beyond, Subaru gave a wry smile.

Though he had said it jokingly, it was no surprise that he had been greatly concerned. In reality, Beatrice had indeed departed with heavy breathing for Subaru's sake.

Cooperation with Roswaal, with whom she had complicated feelings, was another of his worries.

Beatrice and Roswaal, who had been brought up in the conversation, had left the coupled dragon carriage and converged with a group performing a tactical delay on the enemy forces, and were conducting inspection of them.

That inspection was, precisely speaking, to ascertain the characteristics of the undead.

Subaru: "As a matter of fact, they'll see if the zombies are being resurrected using the Sacrament of the Immortal King that we've heard so much about, or if it's actually using magic…?"

Emilia: "Vollachia seems to have fewer magic users than Lugunica, so I'm sure there are things that only the well-versed Beatrice and Roswaal would notice. If they can explain what they find to Abel and his group, I think it'll help."

Upon having said that, Emilia tilted her head slightly,

Emilia: "Honestly, I wish I could have been helpful too… But, I'm not really knowledgeable in magic. I always just use it while saying "Hiyaah!" after all…"

Subaru: "That's because Emilia-tan is more of an intuitive person, you know. Your needs are different from the bookworm Beako or the otaku-type Roswaal. There are scenes where you really shine, so it'll be alright. In fact, in my eyes, you're always shining like the evening star!"

Emilia: "Sorry, I've got no idea what you're talking about."

He had tried to encourage Emilia, who was frustrated at not being able to help Beatrice and Roswaal, but his words came up short.

Nevertheless, it was fortuitous that Emilia and he were able to share their concerns in this way and not burden themselves with them.

To begin with, Beatrice and Roswaal were not the only ones Subaru was concerned about. He was worried about Garfiel, as well as everyone else from the Pleiades Battalion, who were all fighting in the same place.

Among the members of the battalion, only Tanza had remained on the coupled dragon carriages, while the rest of the members had temporarily disembarked and arranged to join the tactical delay force.

The members of the battalion were his comrades, who up until now, had all become one to overcome fierce battles.

Including Cecilus, who for some reason had still not converged with them no matter how much time had passed; Subaru trusted all of them.

Subaru: "But even so, worrying is worrying~! Please, everyone, don't be too reckless or get too carried away…"

And so Subaru put his hands together in prayer.

???: "—Subaru, Emilia-sama, so this is where you were."

Emilia: "Ah, Julius."

The door that separated the aisle was opened, and Emilia raised her eyebrows at the handsome man who appeared from the other side of the door. Just as she had called, there appeared Julius, wearing a Knight's sword over his traditional Japanese outfit.

After doing a small bow, he went right up to Subaru and Emilia, who were standing along the corridor, and then relaxed his lips, which had been somewhat stiff just a few moments prior,

Julius: "Back there, I was unable to exchange many words with you."

Subaru: "Uh… yeah. I caused you, Anastasia-san, and Echidna all to worry. Really, thank you for coming all the way out here to find me."

Julius: "—. How surprising."

As soon as Subaru sincerely expressed gratitude to Julius and Anastasia for their efforts, Julius raised his eyebrows slightly in earnest, and,

Julius: "To think that you would so honestly express your gratitude. Perhaps it is because you are younger in age, and your stubbornness has been lessened in a way that is appropriate to your appearance?"

Subaru: "Shut it! There might be harm in that, but I'd at least say thank you even if I hadn't shrunk! Just where do you think we even are? It's hell!"

Emilia: "It's Vollachia, not hell, right? Putting it like that is inconsiderate towards Abel and the others from the Empire."

Subaru: "Oh, really? The majority of why I feel like this country is hell is because of the way that guy does things, so don't I have the right to offend him?"

Of course, he thought that Abel had his own perspective, and it was not difficult to imagine that he went through trial and error trying to manage the Empire effectively in his own way. But, since the result of that was the agony that Subaru had experienced, he should have the right to say at least this much.

Emilia seemed at a loss as to what to say to Subaru's complaints, and she must have felt, in no small part, that she could not deny what Subaru had to say.

Julius, on the other hand, while stroking the scar around his eye with his finger in response to Subaru's scathing remarks,

Julius: "…I thought this during the meeting earlier, but Subaru, what is your relationship with His Excellency the Emperor Vincent? Your language just now, it was far too excessive."

Subaru: "If you say that was disrespectful, you'd faint if you found out what I did to that guy. I'll say this now, but I'm not acting out because I have special privileges as a kid. In fact, the reason I'm like this is because that guy wasn't able to keep the reins on that old man."

Julius: "I am fearful to even imagine. Emilia-sama, have you any details about what happened?"

Emilia: "Yeah. You're talking about how Subaru and Abel are reaaally a lot closer than expected, right? At first I was worried if the two of them would get along… but honestly, Subaru makes friends very quickly."

Subaru: "Friends, hmmm…"

With regret for Emilia, who boasted as if it were her own accomplishment, Subaru was subtly pondering where to place Abel's presence among his relationships.

At the very least, despite the fact that they had beat each other up while spilling their hearts, it was not as if they were a couple of delinquents who fought each other in a riverbed and immediately warmed up to each other.

Julius: "—. Subaru, have you decided on whether you think of me as your friend?"

Subaru: "Huh? Well, that's, um, I guess so? I used to think it was questionable, but for the time being, we crossed the Sand Sea together, so we're good, I think? I think we're good."

Julius: "I see, that is a relief. This is the second best thing to hear after the report that you, Emilia-sama, and the others were all safe."

With an exaggerated joke, Julius's doubts were resolved for the time being.

However, that was only the start of things considering Subaru's current situation, which at a glance was obvious to anyone. Subaru's biggest problem had not yet been solved.

Julius: "Subaru, about your body…"

Subaru: “The old shinobi did it to me. You should also give it a try. I’d like to see it.”

Julius: “I will refrain. I do not really want to face my younger self. Rather, someone like Anastasia-sama or Emilia-sama would have been quite adorable when they were children.”

Subaru: “Emilia-tan’s younger self! Oh yeah! Why didn’t I think of that!”

Emila: “Me? Hmmm, I don’t know. I had seen my younger self in the Sanctuary, and I think the current Subaru and Beatrice are cuter.”

Emilia, who did not rate herself highly, would say as much, but there was no way that could be true.

Since the grown-up Emilia was this beautiful, she must have been a beautiful little girl even when she was young. That was, she might have been evenly matched with Beatrice—.

Julius: “Nevertheless, hearing you speak like that, I am relieved. It seems the path to returning you to normal has already been set.”

With Julius’s words, Emilia also nodded, saying “That’s right”.

Being taller than Subaru, she placed her hand on his shoulder from behind and,

Emilia: “The old man who made Subaru tiny also seems to be one of Abel’s allies. Right now he’s out there fighting the “zombees”, so when he comes back, we’ll have to ask him to return Subaru back to normal. And then…”

Subaru: “Ah~, actually, there’s something I need to tell you about that.”

Emilia: “—?”

Feeling slightly uncomfortable, Subaru glanced back at Emilia, who was standing directly behind him. Emilia, who was resting her hand on Subaru’s shoulder, widened her eyes at his words.

Julius, who was facing him, also furrowed his brows. Subaru, while scratching his own cheek with a finger, said,

Subaru: “I plan on not returning to my original size even after Olbart-san returns. I think it’ll be more convenient to stay in this small form for the time being.”

Emilia: “Eh?! Why? Ah, could it be because a child’s body needs less food to eat? If that’s the case, I can share my side dishes with you…”

Subaru: “Your concern is incredibly cute, but it’s not that.”

Shaking his head, Subaru gently dismissed Emilia’s assumption. In response to Subaru’s reply, Julius wore a serious expression, narrowing his yellow eyes,

Julius: “It is you after all. So it must be something you think is necessary…”

Subaru: “Ah. I haven’t introduced them to you or Anastasia-san, but I became comrades with some people from Vollachia, the members of the Pleiades Battalion.”

Julius: “Pleiades…”

Because of the existence of the Pleiades Watchtower, Julius was alert to the sound of its name. However, not wanting to interrupt, he disregarded the doubt and urged Subaru to continue.

Nodding to that concern, Subaru continued.

Subaru: “When the members of the Battalion, I don’t know all the details, but when all of us, including me, unite our feelings as one, we become incredibly strong. It’s not just emotional strength or anything.”

Julius: “—. Emilia-sama?”

Emilia: “Hm, that seems to be true. That girl called Tanza-chan and Subaru’s other friends are all reaaally strong and fight very hard.”

Subaru: “And, I’ve been lying to all those friends. —The lie that I am the Emperor’s son.”

Even with Emilia’s affirmation, the words that followed had Julius staring in astonishment. Emilia, also taken aback, placed a hand over her mouth which had gasped out an “Ah”.

Emilia: “That reminds me, you did say that you introduced yourself like that… Um, but, Vollachia is not where you were born, right Subaru?”

Subaru: “Ahh, of course not. My hometown isn’t like this hell. It’s more harmonious, filled with love and peace.”

Julius: “…Even in the Fortified City, I heard talk of a black-haired Crown Prince. When I heard “black hair”, I did somewhat think of you.”

Subaru: “Just so you know, Abel’s the one who came up with it, so please direct your complaints over there. Anyway, it’s important that everyone in the Battalion believes in it. That’s why…”

When departing from the Gladiator Island, Subaru made his companions, who he had persuaded to go with him, believe that he was the son of the Vollachian Emperor.

Today, the foundation of the Pleiades Battalion’s unity rested heavily upon that lie. He was not going to leave things like this forever, Subaru had not wanted to continue lying to them.

For, when the unprecedented Great Disaster that was shaking the Vollachian Empire was resolved, Subaru would return to his normal size and, together with Emilia and Rem and the rest of the camp, they would make a triumphant return to the Kingdom of Lugunica.

And if Subaru and the others were to finish this battle with an overwhelming victory, the Pleiades Battalion’s assistance was surely needed.

Subaru: “That’s why I can’t go back yet. I have to be the Natsuki Schwartz who everyone in the battalion believes in. At least until this battle to take back the Empire is over.”

Emilia: “Subaru…”

Tightly clenching the small fists that he had become accustomed to seeing, Subaru clearly stated his decision.

Until declaring as such to Emilia and Julius like this, Subaru had also been unsure of what to do.

It was a matter of course, but his larger form was more his body than his smaller form. He had a strong desire to get back to his original body, to hold Beatrice in his arms lightly, and to talk with Emilia on the same eye level.

But, that yearning of Subaru’s could not be compared to what was truly necessary.

Julius: “—. Truly, regardless of where you are or what form you take, you remain the same.”

Hearing Subaru’s resolve, Julius spoke as he let out a small exhale. He brushed his bangs back with his hand, and looking at Subaru with a look of equal parts wonder and understanding,

Julius: “You force the most difficult and unexpected decisions to be made. Be that for yourself or someone else.”

Subaru: “…It isn’t such an admirable resolve. “I want to be a child for a while longer”; that’s the kind of determination you’d hear in a Showa-era song.”

Told such by Julius as he faced him, Subaru replied feeling somewhat embarrassed. Then, a hand was gently placed on Subaru’s head, he turned his head and found his gaze meeting a pair of amethyst eyes.

Emilia lowered the ends of her eyebrows and looked affectionately at Subaru.

Emilia: “Doing that, Subaru is going to get me worried again.”

Subaru: “Uh, I don’t really have an excuse for that. No, I really want to return to my normal body and flirt with Emilia, you know?

But…”

Emilia: “I know. Subaru has thought about it a lot, and chose what he thought was the best option, right? I also feel the same as Julius, that’s just who Subaru is.”

A flustered Subaru moved his hands up and down, and Emilia smiled at him as he panicked. She placed her hand on Subaru’s head and this time, poked Subaru’s nose with her finger, continuing, “But you know,”

Emilia: “No matter how small Subaru is, I know that Subaru will still be Subaru. Even if you don’t revert from being tiny, I’ll keeeep waiting for you until you grow big again.”

Subaru: “All the same, I’d also like to avoid being unable to go back to normal, but… Huh, what did you just…?”

Emilia: “—?”

With a gentle manner and tone of voice, it made Subaru’s eyes blink as he felt like he had been told something incredible. But, the person who had said that to him, perhaps not understanding the meaning of Subaru’s reaction, tilted her head curiously with a face that was completely innocent.

No, even just tilting her head to the side made him embarrassed. She had an incredible temptress inside of her.

Emilia: “…”

Feeling the red color involuntarily rising in his cheeks, Subaru looked to Julius for help. However, he shrugged his shoulders at Subaru’s gaze and heartlessly brushed aside the latter’s dependence.

He cursed at the unreliable Julius in his mind, thinking that maybe they were not friends after all, and looked around regretting his earlier judgment—

???: “Huh?”

And, just as a girl entered the corridor from one of the cabins, his gaze collided head on with hers, as she stared directly at him.

3

???: “Huh?”

Yes, it was a girl with blue hair and light blue eyes who had called out to Subaru and the others—and as soon as Subaru saw her, his face lit up.

Subaru: “Rem, great. I wanted to talk to you too.”

When Rem showed up, Subaru’s mind was whisked away from the events that had just taken place.

Subaru, who had lost consciousness after the trouble in the Capital with Emilia, Beatrice, and others, had not had the time to talk with Rem.

After the confrontation with Abel and telling Katya what needed to be said, Subaru left her in Rem’s hands and went straight to discussions.

That discussion came to a close, and then they finally met again.

Subaru: “Well, what about Katya-san? Has she calmed down?”

Rem: “—. Because the circumstances are what they are, that won’t happen so easily. However, she has now tired out herself crying and has fallen asleep, so her brother is looking after her by her side.”

Subaru: “I see. Oh, yeah. I’m sorry to entrust you with such a difficult role.”

Rem: “…I did it because I wanted to do it. Um, by the way…”

Responding to Subaru in front of her, Rem’s tone of voice lowered slightly. Subaru tilted his head and wondered what was going on.

But before Rem could speak a word—

Julius: “—Miss Rem, you are awake!”

Yes, Julius, surprised by Rem's presence, was quicker to speak up.

His eyes widened, and his voice burst with honest surprise and joy, and Subaru nodded with a "That's right!".

Subaru: "My bad. I should have told you, Anastasia-san, and Echidna. Rem woke up after we got separated from everyone else. But…"

Julius: "I have no recollection of Miss Rem. So her circumstances are the same as mine?"

Subaru: "Not only that, but she's in a hybrid situation similar to Crusch-san."

Julius: "…Then, she has no memories?"

Julius's shapely brow furrowed at Subaru's explanation.

He quickly realized that it was not a situation to rejoice openly, and seemed to be at a loss as to what to say. But once he closed his eyelids, upon opening them, he regained his fearless expression,

Julius: "Miss Rem, I apologize for the unexpected manner in which I addressed you. I am Julius Juukulius… and I am a Knight in the service of a certain person and a friend of Subaru."

Rem: "You are his, friend…"

Subaru: "The emphasis on that makes me want to protest, but yes. He's one of them. One of the people who helped me a lot when you wouldn't wake up, Rem."

Rem: "That is—"

Rem raised her eyebrows in surprise when she was told of his relationship with Julius, who bowed graciously. Taking a moment to pause in surprise, Rem also bowed her head in response.

Rem: "Thank you for your concern. I can't say I'm at full strength yet, but for the time being, I am able to stand and walk on my own feet just fine."

Julius: “That makes it all the better. For yourself and for everyone around you who was thinking of you.”

Rem: “—Yes.”

It was tempting for Subaru to swear at him, as usual, for his carefree and thoughtful way of speaking, but in front of Rem, who had put her hand on her chest and nodded softly, it was impossible to say such a reproachful thing.

Anyway, he was glad to be able to tell Julius that Rem was now awake. Later, he would have to tell Anastasia and the others.

Subaru: “But I’m really glad that Anastasia-san and the others came to the Empire so that I could see Rem like this. You guys were also worried about us.”

Julius: “Yes. Anastasia-sama was also deeply concerned. Although Miss Rem will not remember it, as someone who traveled with her, I am truly pleased.”

Emilia: “Yeah, I think so, too. It’s all thanks to Subaru’s hard work.”

So said a smiling Emilia, patting Subaru’s head once more.

Because of the height difference, it was easy for her to pet him, but being petted like this over and over again made him feel like a child, and it was very frustrating.

It felt very good, but his manly heart did not want to allow Emilia to treat him like a child.

Subaru: “E-Emilia-tan, don’t dote on me so much.”

Emilia: “I think you’re cute, but I’m not trying to be overly affectionate, you know? I think Subaru is splendid. As expected of my Knight.”

Rem: “Hah?”

Emilia: “What?”

And, just as Emilia was petting Subaru's head like that, there was a sharp voice unexpectedly released, and Emilia's hand stopped.

Emilia's eyes widened, and she saw Rem facing her across from Subaru.

It was Rem, with her pale blue eyes, who stared at Emilia's hand placed on Subaru's head.

Emilia: "Rem? Is everything okay?"

Rem: "No, there's something I'm a little confused about. Emilia-san, can I check something?"

Emilia: "Check something? Yeah, go ahead and shoot…"

Subaru: "Who even says, "go ahead and shoot" these days…"

With one side placing her hand on his head, and the other having her hand placed on his head, Subaru and Emilia tilted their heads in unison at Rem's words.

Rem looked at Subaru and Emilia alternately with a suspicious look,

Rem: "…What kind of relationship do you two have?"

Emilia: "Subaru and I?"

Subaru: "Me and Emilia-tan?"

Subaru and Emilia exchanged looks at each other in response to Rem's question.

Indeed, as it stood, Rem had just reunited with everyone in the Emilia Camp, and although he was told that an understanding of her relationship with Ram had been reached, beyond that, there were no further details yet.

If that were true, maybe they should do this where everyone was present—

Subaru: "Right. To put it simply, Emilia-tan is the top of our camp, the future Monarch of a country called the Kingdom of Lugunica."

Emilia: "I'm still working on becoming one, so I'm a candidate. And so, Subaru is my number one ally, my Knight."

Rem: "Your number one ally…"

Subaru: "Yeah, I'm doing everything I can to make my Emilia-tan's dream come true."

Emilia: "Yes, he's doing his best. Although I'm not his, Subaru is mine."

Subaru's proud words were answered by Emilia's bashful response. Thereupon Rem, having heard their answer, put her hand on her forehead.

Then, after she pondered it for a while,

Rem: "Excuse me. This is confusing; am I the cause of this?"

Julius: "—. No, I do not think you are responsible, Miss Rem. Though that is coming from a third party's perspective."

Rem: "Thank you for that…"

For some reason, Julius answered Rem in such a manner, the latter seeming like she was troubled by something.

It was not clear why Julius, who was from outside the camp, seemed to have such an understanding attitude when not only Subaru, but also Emilia, did not understand Rem's confusion.

Emilia: "Maybe I just said way too much about Lugunica to the current Rem…"

Subaru: "I've told her bits and pieces of it here and there beforehand… Perhaps, Priscilla may have told her some unnecessary things in Guaral…"

Julius: "Wait. Why is Priscilla-sama's name being mentioned here? I find it hard to believe, but is Priscilla-sama also here in the Vollachian Empire?”

Rem: “Um, would it be alright if we dealt with my confusion first?”

In seeking to resolve the questions that had been raised before, new questions had emerged, so they were on the brink of going around in circles.

For the moment, there was a struggle to decide on the priority of questions, with the feeling that there were too many topics that needed to be properly discussed with Julius and Anastasia and the others.

The first and foremost priority, though, should have been to clear up Rem’s confusion, but—

Subaru: “…”

As he and Emilia were trying to find a solution to Rem’s confusion, Subaru’s attention was suddenly drawn to something that passed slightly out of the corner of his eye.

It was something outside the window, descending from the night sky to the field in a flash.

Emilia: “Subaru?”

As Subaru’s eyes widened involuntarily, Emilia’s questioning voice called out to him. Putting off responding to her, Subaru rushed to the window and peeked outside.

Normally, Subaru would never ignore Emilia’s call. However, right now, rather than responding to it, he gave priority to confirming the glimpse of what he just saw.

His eyes strained at the landscape as it passed by, and he re-focused his vision on the thing that had descended from the night sky.

That was—

Subaru: “—What are they doing here?”

A person who should not be here; pulling it out from the fringes of his memory, Subaru blinked his eyes repeatedly, and would vocalize that name.

The person present there who was supposed to be living a peaceful life in the Kingdom of Lugunica—

Subaru: “—Ryuzu-san?”

???: “…”

There was probably no way she could have heard Subaru’s whisper.

Despite the distance and volume of his voice, which should have been impossible to hear, Subaru’s eyes met those of the small figure heading towards him, and he instinctively sensed that they had both perceived each other.

With her eyes still locked with Subaru’s, the small figure moved its lips and said something.

Subaru leaned forward to try and hear what it was—

Subaru: “—Ah.”

—Immediately following, a white light rained down upon the coupled dragon carriages, engulfing Natsuki Subaru and most of the occupants onboard, utterly blowing them away.

SETOWI

Chapter 19:
Valga Cromwell's Stratagem

1

The battle began forcibly with a salvo from the impatient Roswaal.

Roswaal: "—Please die."

And then, in contrast to those cold words, a scorching inferno erupted as if burning the sky to nothing.

The flames furiously blazed, spreading across the night sky all at once. The inflamed sky caught the eyes of everyone, including the warriors who were still fighting against the undead with their lives on the line.

Even though the goal was just to reduce a single enemy to ashes, this was overkill.

Beatrice: "An act of barbarity akin to burning down a whole mansion in order to kill a small insect in a room, I suppose."

Burning down a mansion to accomplish an objective was a reckless act that only Petra and Otto would dare to do.

If not for that resolve of theirs, she may have never mustered up the courage to leave the Forbidden Library; Beatrice was secretly grateful for that, but she still thought it was overdoing things.

With his first strike, Roswaal demonstrated that his overkill would not fall short of that of those two.

However—

???: "Threat level recognized, Adjustment: Required."

After evading through the air to escape from the burning night sky, the enemy—Sphinx, was still going strong.

Even though they had gone through the trouble of burning down the mansion, it would be meaningless if the small insect that had been targeted were to escape. In this case, it seemed like Roswaal had only scorched the sky and startled everyone around without achieving anything.

If only Roswaal was the only person present here.

Beatrice: “El Minya.”

With her pink hair fluttering as she soared freely through the sky, Sphinx had been floating in the path of shimmering deep purple flashes that had suddenly appeared. It was the pinnacle of magic that had the power to freeze the time of the target and shatter it.

It was a deadly attack that had already been verified to be the most effective against the undead.

Beatrice: “It is not good that no one except Subaru and Betty can cultivate Yin Magic, in fact.”

Against an army of undead, there would have been nothing to fear with a full line-up of Yin Magic users.

Even Beatrice, who had lived such a long time, had never witnessed a scene where more than ten Yin Magic users were all assembled in one place, so she knew it would be an impossible proposition.

With such useless thoughts, Beatrice preemptively killed all hesitation within herself.

—In order to strike down the loathsome “enemy” who wore the same face as Ryuzu Meyer.

Beatrice: “Ryuzu…”

Ryuzu Meyer’s fleeting smile passed through Beatrice’s mind.

Unlike the Ryuzus, who Garfiel and Frederica dearly loved as their grandmothers, Ryuzu Meyer, their progenitor, was Beatrice’s first lifelong friend.

At the time, she was unable to recognize that. She had been far too late in recognizing that.

But, it was different now. Now, Beatrice could fully accept the magnitude of her presence. That was precisely why an "enemy" that took this form, as far as Beatrice was concerned—

Beatrice: "Betty has gotten angry, I suppose!"

As Beatrice howled, she saw Sphinx charging head-on into the unleashed purple arrows.

The eyes of the "enemy" narrowed briefly as she raised both of her hands in front of her face, and white light shot out from all ten of her fingers, clearing away all the Minyas that stood in her way.

With nary a sound of shattering, the deep purple crystals had been blown apart into pieces—But, that would not be enough to destroy Beatrice's frustration.

Sphinx: "—Hk."

Although Sphinx had supposedly dismissed the threat, her expression slightly contorted.

The reason being, the deep purple crystals she had cleared away had turned into flying shrapnel in their shattered state, spreading out and chasing down the fast-flying Sphinx.

Beatrice: "Magic is an idea, as soon as you think you've stopped it, it all goes wrong, in fact."

However, the crystalline arrow shape that represented Minya was not what was important. It was about the effect of freezing and shattering the time of the person it struck.

Indeed, even if it did not have the shape of an arrow, as long as it pierced the opponent, the form and size did not matter.

Hence, the flying shrapnel of Beatrice, with her competitive spirit alight, would not allow Sphinx to escape.

And then—

Sphinx: “Threat level recognized, once again, Adjustment: Requi—”

???: “—Yer a hundred years too late to rethink this.”

Evading the flying Minya that would turn her to stone as she strenuously tried to escape, directly next to Sphinx was the malicious countenance of Garfiel, who had leapt off the ground with a kick.

His eyes sharp, his fangs bared, Garfiel roared like a ferocious beast, and swung his refined arms with a mighty swing in an attempt to hit Sphinx with all his might.

For a moment, Garfiel’s and Sphinx’s gazes met.

Garfiel’s hesitation to strike his fist into an opponent with the same face as that of his grandmother made his heart—

Garfiel: “Compared to Nanna, the smell of yer heart is completely fuckin’ different—!!”

Such outfield concerns were unnecessary for the dependable military officer of the Emilia camp.

A fist was unleashed, striking Sphinx’s cheek; the girl’s body was shot from the air straight into the ground, and the fist continued to press her against the ground with tremendous force.

There was a thunderous crash and a cloud of dust that rose as if a large rock had fallen; Beatrice could see Sphinx’s body flutter like a leaf on the other side of Garfiel’s arm.

Garfiel’s blow was one of pure fury, void of any semblance of mercy or hesitation.

If she suffered a direct hit, even one shot would likely reduce Beatrice to mana; Sphinx was blown away as she rolled behind the plume.

Roswaal: “It’s a three-person encirclement. That was some nice teamwork, waaasn't~ it?"

Beatrice: "Says the guy who lost his temper first, I suppose."

Garfiel: "Teamwork with ya is fuckin' disgustin'."

As Roswaal shrugged his shoulders, as if to say that he was completely unperturbed, Beatrice and Garfiel each responded with abusive language.

Receiving such cold treatment, Roswaal shrugged his shoulders once more.

And then—

Sphinx: "…Once again, threat level… recognized. Adjustment: … Required."

Sphinx muttered as she slowly moved her body on the ground as the plume began to settle.

Felled to the ground and coated in dirt, Sphinx did not show any expression of pain, but it was clear that she had accumulated damage from the sound of her voice.

Sphinx: "…"

Still, her golden irises shone as she trained her gaze on the three of them.

They were not filled with feelings of hostility or anger, but rather a monstrous gaze of intelligence that saw them as nothing but targets of her curiosity.

Garfiel: "Tch, don't like this."

Like Beatrice, Garfiel felt a chill go down his spine at the gaze of his enemy and clicked his tongue. Roswaal narrowed his eyes in silence as well, and began to knead mana within himself in obvious discomfort.

Once again, Roswaal gave a sidelong glance wondering if he should rush ahead, and Beatrice glared at Sphinx as she stood up, then immediately moved forward.

Acting as the representative for the unreliable pair, she would try and find out her true intentions—

Beatrice: “Sphinx, Betty dares to call you out, in fact. Just what are you—”

Thinking?; It happened when Beatrice tried to finish her question.

Sphinx: “…”

Now standing up, Sphinx’s body trembled, and her gaze fell on her own chest.

From Sphinx’s small chest protruded the tip of a blade. It was a deadly blade that had stabbed her in the back and jutted out of her chest.

And, the one who was holding the blade was—

???: “I have a bad feeling about this girl. There are no reasons to keep her alive.”

Mizelda, who had stated so in a brutal manner, pulled out the dagger that had stabbed her, and then stabbed her again.

After three concentrated stabs had bored through the back and chest, she grabbed Sphinx by the hair and forced her head upward, then mercilessly slit her neck with a dagger held in a backhand grip.

It was the body of an undead. No blood was spilled, but there was no doubt that all of it was lethal.

Sphinx’s body also fell forward onto her knees, then collapsed face down.

Beatrice: “Y-Y-You… Hk.”

Beside the collapsed Sphinx, Mizelda made sure that no blood had gotten on her knife; upon witnessing this, Beatrice was frozen still as she stared with widened eyes, at a complete loss for words.

Roswaal and Garfiel were also left speechless at Mizelda's actions.

Mizelda tilted her head, beautiful and with eyes that conveyed a strong impression as it was, at the state of the three of them,

Mizelda: "I know that she had a history with you guys. But, speak at her grave. That's the battlefield custom."

Garfiel: "Well, I guess that's true…"

It was a blunt outlook, but Garfiel resigned himself to the fact that it was irrefutable.

Beatrice had been frequently surprised by the sense of values in Vollachia, but she had altered her perception of their severity, believing her perception to have still been naive.

Roswaal: "Sphinx."

Roswaal, ignoring Beatrice's and Garfiel's turmoil, stepped forward. He looked down at the collapsed Sphinx and called out her name in a sidelong glance that showed little emotion.

Mizelda's blow, a fatal one, was evident not only in the location of the wounds, but also in the way Sphinx's body crumbled.

Most of her lower body had already been reduced to dust, and the girl's face, on which cracks had been present from the start, was beginning to crumble away, and it would only be a matter of time before her whole body was shattered to pieces.

However, Sphinx's life force as an undead had yet to be exhausted.

She had no power to counterattack or struggle in vain, but she had enough energy remaining to move her golden irises and look back toward Roswaal, who was looking down at her.

Roswaal: "…"

Even though he knew she was a different person inside, it still pained his heart to see Ryuzu's appearance crumble.

What Roswaal was feeling was probably different from Beatrice's sentimentality, but Mizelda's thorough realism had gotten in the way, and perhaps deprived her of the means to alleviate that sentimentality.

In any case, the main culprit behind the anguish of Beatrice, Garfiel, and Roswaal was—

Sphinx: "…Deliberation, should have been: Required."

In the midst of her body crumbling, one could hear Sphinx mumbling, never showing any signs of pain on her face.

At first, Beatrice thought those were words lamenting her own lack of ability.

Sphinx: "—For you three."

However, the words that followed indicated otherwise.

Beatrice caught her breath at the added words, and Garfiel groaned, "Huh?"

Beatrice, as well, was not quite sure of their true meaning. But, she could sense that it was not a throwaway line that could be ignored.

From there—

Roswaal: "—Damn it!"

Roswaal looked up as if he had been played.

He had a look of impatience and remorse on his face, and turned around toward the rear. —Back behind, to the sky he had flown through with Beatrice, towards the coupled dragon carriages that were still advancing forward.

Likewise, drawn in by Roswaal's unease, Beatrice also turned to face there.

Then, while she was struck by the turmoil in her own small chest,

Beatrice: “—Subaru.”

So she had called out his name.

2

An instant, yes, everything happened in an instant.

Having taken notice of something out of place, immediately after he vocalized his doubts, everything was engulfed by a white light.

Emilia, who was by his side, Rem, and even Julius, none of them were given a chance to react. Naturally, Subaru was also unable to do anything as the white light swallowed everything up, and vanished.

Natsuki Subaru immediately intuited what that meant.

—That his life had been expended, and Return by Death had been invoked.

As proof of that—

???: “—I love you.”

As if to say that she, having found him once, would never let him go again, he heard the whisper of her voice.

Rem: “Um, would it be alright if we dealt with my confusion first?”

The moment that he heard that voice, filled with equal parts astonishment and exhaustion along with a tinge of irritation, Subaru flipped on the “Ready, GO!” switch inside of him.

Subaru: “…”

Verifying his footing and the situation around him, he discerned the specific moment from the faces that were present.

The scene was in a corridor of the coupled dragon carriages, when Rem had joined in on the conversation he was having with Emilia and Julius. From the flow of the conversation, Subaru's last remark was "Perhaps, Priscilla may have told her some unnecessary things in Guaral…", which was made in deliberation over Rem's state. Towards the front of the coupled dragon carriages, Abel, Otto, and some others were working through the details regarding military potential. Beatrice had been sent off quite far away together with Roswaal, and they were taking an approach from a magical perspective in order to find means to counter the undead. The two were headed to the place where Garfiel and the People of Shudraq were fighting hard, alongside all the members of the Pleiades Battalion who should have also been there. The feeling akin to a prayer for nobody to get seriously injured, along with the faith that if it was them, they would be alright, caused his heart to feel obstreperous.

—With that, having flipped the switch, Subaru ran through everything up to that point in an instant.

Emilia: "Subaru?"

In a surprised voice, Emilia called out Subaru's name. For a moment, her eyes must have caught the rapid movement of Subaru's eyes darting round and round.

Once before, after having seen Subaru in the same state, Tanza had pointed it out.

Tanza: "Schwartz-sama's eyes were darting around all over the place. It was, um, eerie."

That was Tanza's comment, choosing her words carefully and yet still unable to find the right ones, concerning Subaru's unusual behavior as he endeavored to grasp the situation immediately after Returning by Death.

Having laid eyes upon the same thing, Emilia's reaction being much more reserved was understandable.

Anyway—

Subaru: "Emilia, just wait a little."

As he raised his hand to avoid being questioned, Subaru's awareness was sharpened to a knife's edge.

In an environment where retrying upon death was a given, the very intuition that had been essential in ensuring the survival of everyone on the Gladiator Island enveloped Subaru, and in order to investigate the cause that brought about his Death, his concentration was exerted to its utmost limit.

This was no time to be fussing over overly sluggish thoughts such as "Did I just die?".

Without the intuition that could catch up to reality by saying "If I just died…", he would never be able to arrive at a solution.

It was absolutely essential for him to understand that if he could not make that switch quickly, it would cause Subaru and those around him to lose their lives twice as many times.

Rem: "—? Um…"

Emilia: "Rem, please."

Next to Subaru, who was concentrating, Rem with her eyebrows slightly knitted looked at him with questioning eyes. But, Emilia stopped her from questioning with a gesture of her hand, as if holding her back.

Meanwhile, Subaru had finished correlating his Death with the events just prior to Returning by Death—

Subaru: "…"

Outside the window of the coupled dragon carriage as it ran, he once again caught sight of the foreign object blending into the landscape.

Instantly, Subaru jumped toward the window of the dragon carriage and,

Subaru: "—Julius! Outside!"

Julius: “Understood!”

Emilia and Rem had felt the sudden change in Subaru, and naturally, so did Julius.

The fact that he sprung into action with nary a moment’s hesitation upon Subaru’s call was proof of that. Behind Subaru as he jumped towards the window, Julius drew his Knight’s sword, slashing the wall of the corridor with a diagonal swipe, and extended his long leg, kicking it down.

Then, carrying Subaru under his arm, he leaped outside of the effective range of the Divine Protection of Wind Evasion from the numerous ground dragons.

Julius: “Leave the landing to me!”

Subaru: “I’m counting on you.”

The moment they exited the Divine Protection’s range, fierce winds and inertia battered Subaru and Julius. But, Subaru passed all the preparations for survival over to Julius, who took it upon himself.

Two Quasi Spirits of hues yellow and green gently emerged around Julius, with one turning into a blanket of wind and the other turning the ground into a cushion to support their landing.

Julius’s technique, woven together by his renewed bond with his Quasi Spirits, was masterful, however, Subaru’s attention was not drawn to it in the slightest.

Even when the window he had jumped through was cut off together with the wall, even when he elegantly landed in through the wind storm that followed, his gaze remained fixed on a single point—the girl who was descending from the sky.

Subaru: “I knew it, the same as Ryuzu-san…”

With her pink hair and black robes, she was identical to the lovely and old lady Ryuzu. But, no matter how much Emilia and the others were worried about Subaru and Rem, they would not have dragged Ryuzu to the Vollachian Empire.

In other words, that could not have been the real Ryuzu, nor was there any possibility that it was any of the replicants, like Pico or the others, all of whom took the same form as Ryuzu.

In order to tell them apart, they had all been given different hairstyles, individual ribbons, and hair ornaments. The fact that none of those were present meant that it could not be any of them.

Subaru: “Julius! It’s that girl! Seize her!”

Subaru shouted, pointing to the fake Ryuzu in the air, before they had even landed on the ground.

Hearing Subaru’s request, Julius also spotted the girl blending into the night sky. Leaving all questions about who or what she was doing behind, the Finest jumped into action.

Dropping Subaru on the soft soil beneath his feet, Julius’s body was enveloped in the remnants of the blanket of wind, using it as a foothold to leap through the air and advance towards the fake Ryuzu in a straight line.

Because of his extraordinary momentum, the fake Ryuzu also recognized him as a threat.

That instant, he realized that the eyes of the fake Ryuzu shone a brilliant golden radiance even at night, and understood that she was a pale-skinned undead, something he had not been able to recognize from a distance.

Without any delay, the fake Ryuzu directed her hand towards Julius, and as she was about to unleash an abominable white light at Julius—

Julius: “—In, Ness, lend me your strength.”

A white light, different to the one alight on the fake Ryuzu’s fingertips, made Julius’s whole body faintly luminescent, and in turn, a black light faintly enveloped the fake Ryuzu’s whole body.

The moment it became clear that Yang Magic and Yin Magic were being simultaneously employed by the two Quasi Spirits respectively, Julius's Knight's sword flashed, and the strength drained from the fake Ryuzu's arm, which had been housing light.

Fake Ryuzu: "Explanation: Required."

Julius: "I cut the tendon in your shoulder. Of course, it will likely reconnect soon…"

Julius sincerely replied to the fake Ryuzu, who asked the reason for the lack of strength in her arm. At the end of his answer, Julius twisted in mid-air, and his long, howling leg struck the floating girl, knocking her body to the ground.

At the spot where the fake Ryuzu fell, the ground transformed together with a yellow light. The ground, which had become viscous, softly and deeply received the girl's body, and then hardened all at once.

As a result, the fake Ryuzu was stuck, as if wrapped in a quilt made of stone.

Julius: "I recommend you do not resist. If you fail to heed this warning, I will treat you as an enemy, be you alive or dead."

Fake Ryuzu: "…"

His sword thrust before the fake Ryuzu, who lay on her back atop the ground, Julius declared.

Having thus rendered his opponent powerless, Julius nodded to Subaru, who had ascertained that for himself. Having had no choice but to watch the sequence of events go down, Subaru scratched his cheek with his finger,

Subaru: "No, that's what I had wanted you to do… but seriously, this guy. Clearly, you've gotten a lot stronger than you were before."

His style of fighting with the support of the Quasi Spirits was more sophisticated and refined than before.

Contracted with Quasi Spirits of six different attributes, the Spirit

Knight displayed his hybrid fighting style, combining both magic and swordsmanship.

Emilia: “Wow, amazing, you took her down in the blink of an eye.”

And from behind Subaru, running across the grass, was Emilia.

It seemed like she had jumped off the dragon carriage in pursuit of Subaru and Julius, her eyes widened when she saw that she would have no opportunity to do anything because of Julius’s brilliant skill.

Subaru: “Emilia-tan, what about Rem?”

Emilia: “I asked her to tell Otto-kun and the others that you and Julius jumped out. I needed to hurry, too, so I followed you right away, but still…”

Subaru: “No, it’s not that you were slow, Emilia-tan. It’s that this guy was too fast. Also, it was the right choice to not bring Rem here.”

It seemed possible that if it was the current Rem, she might have come down with Emilia, but thanks to the latter’s good judgment, she would not get wrapped up in any danger.

When he thought about it, he reconsidered that the Rem who did have her memories would have definitely jumped down, so Emilia was very correct in instructing her to stay behind anyway.

In any case—

Emilia: “This isn’t Ryuzu-san, right?”

Subaru: “She looks exactly like her, but there’s no doubt she’s a zombie. Come to think of it, could someone like Beako or Ryuzu-san become zombies…?”

He did not even want to think about Beatrice or Ryuzu dying, but there was room to question whether zombification was possible for these women, whose bodies were composed differently to those of normal creatures.

In reality, since there was an undead that took the form of Ryuzu, her origins should have been the same as Ryuzu's unless she was a miraculous look-alike.

In that case, they would conduct an investigation without needing to give it a second thought, so Subaru and Emilia headed over to the fake Ryuzu, who had been captured by Julius.

Julius: "This is a zombie that is able to think and speak. Subaru, please be careful."

Subaru: "Yeah. Actually, there's a high chance she's way more dangerous than her appearance suggests. Emilia-tan, could you also be careful and keep an eye out?"

Emilia: "Yeah, leave it to me. If you behave, umm…"

Entrusted to be vigilant, Emilia roused herself, but found herself lost at what to say to the fake Ryuzu.

It was doubtful whether the warning, "If you don't resist, we won't hurt you," would be meaningful against an undead. Nevertheless, they must never let their guard down.

This small existence had just utterly blown away the coupled dragon carriages holding Subaru and the others in the span of a breath.

Even if her four limbs were bound, it was uncertain if she was perfectly immobilized.

Subaru: "Sure is a shame that your preemptive strike failed."

Fake Ryuzu: "—. You are…"

Subaru: "My name is… is what I would say from my conditioned reflex to give my name, but I'm not trying to be friends with you. It's fine if our relationship remains with you being a dangerous person, and me being the one who hindered your plans."

Fake Ryuzu: "I see, you are a strangely capable person. At first glance, you seem to have no outstanding ability though."

The fake Ryuzu, lying sprawled on the ground and looking up at Subaru, expressed her views.

He had grown accustomed to being underestimated, so he was not upset with that assessment. Beside him, it seemed Emilia wanted to say something, but Julius shook his head to stop her.

In any event—

Subaru: “No other zombies are coming. Did you just go ahead on your own because you could fly? If you rushed ahead thinking you could beat us, that’s too bad.”

In reality, he had already been killed once by her preemptive attack, but he would not let that be known.

If his provocation would make the opponent speak up, it would be profitable. However, it seemed that her skin turning pale was not just for show, and no emotional response was given.

But, it was a cliché for this type of person to be tempted to show off their intelligence by making repetitive statements that ran contrary to their objectives.

If necessary, Subaru was ready to put on the performance of a lifetime as the stupidest child he could manage.

However—

Fake Ryuzu: “—Valga Cromwell.”

Subaru: “Huh?”

Suddenly, the lips of the girl lying there uttered an unfamiliar term.

—No, it sounded like something he had heard somewhere before, but Subaru could not immediately recall when that was or what it was about.

While Subaru furrowed his brow at that doubt, Emilia and Julius had a different reaction.

Both of them reacted as if they knew the name.

But, before Emilia or the others could question the fake Ryuzu's words—

Fake Ryuzu: "This was a stratagem of his that had not been carried out at the time."

Indeed, the fake Ryuzu had been the one to continue first.

Thus, the development thereafter also connected seamlessly, giving no room for the question that had already been delayed from being asked once.

Emilia: "Subaru!!"

A moment later, Subaru saw Emilia's facial expression change, and he was forcefully pulled into her arms. As it was, Emilia gnashed her molars, and created a wall of ice around Subaru, Julius, and herself.

Inside the wall of ice, Julius also readied his Knight's sword, which had been aimed at the fake Ryuzu near his feet, and clad himself with the rainbow light of the concentrated power of his six Quasi Spirits.

In response to the forthcoming danger, Emilia and Julius had completed their preparations in an instant.

Then they would—

Subaru: "—Wha…"

—A white light rained down from beyond the sky, wiping them all out at once as if in a cruel mockery.

3

Rem: "Um, would it be alright if we dealt with my confusion first?"

Subaru: "—Hk."

The voice of Rem, filled with equal parts bewilderment, exhaustion, and irritation, was heard, and Subaru took a short breath.

The feeling of remorse at being unable to avert the arrival of the Death, which unlike last time, he knew was coming, along with the trembling of his soul caused by the shock he had anticipated, pummeled Subaru's heart from within.

—He had completely misjudged the cause of his Death.

This was the result of latching on to the most obvious visible change, and the conceited thought that he had prevented it.

The first time, the interval between noticing the existence of the fake Ryuzu and then Death was too short, causing him to miss what had actually happened.

The absurdly powerful white light that had obliterated Subaru and the others had not been released by the fake Ryuzu, but had rather originated from somewhere else.

Emilia: "Subaru?"

Subaru: "—. Emilia, just wait a little."

Noticing Subaru's introspection, Emilia tilted her head, to which he raised a hand in response.

Pausing his introspection, he cast aside all regrets. While there was still room for growth in reflection, regret was nothing but self-pity of something one wished they could have done.

With that, neither the self that he had pitied, nor all the others whom he had ignored, would be saved.

That, he would not allow. That, he would absolutely, never allow.

At that moment, the fake Ryuzu had mentioned the name "Valga Cromwell". Subaru had still yet to understand what it meant, but Emilia and Julius seemed to have recognized it. Perhaps he should ask for more details. —No, that could wait. Even if he found out who this Valga was, the wrath of the white light that followed would not simply disappear. That attack was very much real, and more so, it was an outrageously powerful danger that stood in the way of Subaru and the others. It needed to be dealt with, but was it possible to prevent it from being fired in the first place? It was impossible for the situation with the fake Ryuzu and that attack to be unrelated, but would she, an undead being, be willing to negotiate? If she was an undead that could communicate, would it not be dangerous to close the door on negotiations? No, if she could be reasoned with, then she would not have tried to kill them outright with no dialogue. Whether she could be reasoned with or not, in order to sit around the negotiations table, a table first needed to be set—.

Rem: "—? Um…"

Emilia: "Rem, please."

Beside Subaru, whose thoughts were sparking in full throttle, Emilia stopped Rem's question.

The flow of events was the same as before, however, from this point on, it had to be steered toward a different progression. Within his mind, he processed everything that had happened in order, and in order to get off this railtrack that ended in Death, a change had to be made at this critical juncture.

For that reason—

Subaru: "—Julius! Outside! Emilia, you come too!"

Julius: "Understood!"

Emilia: "Yes! Got it!"

The moment that he glimpsed the form of the young girl outside the window, the harbinger of the Death that would soon arrive, he jumped towards the window and called out to Emilia and Julius behind him.

Without hesitation, Julius's sword strike sliced through the wall of the coupled dragon carriage, and once the wall was kicked down, Subaru and the other two headed outside. Just before they escaped the range of the Divine Protection of Wind Evasion, he yelled.

Subaru: "—Rem! I need a favor!"

So he declared.

4

A long leg flashed, a kick knocked the fake Ryuzu to the ground, the changed nature of the earth caught the body of the undead, and once again, an earthen quilt restrained her entire body.

Julius: "I recommend you do not resist. If you fail to heed this warning, I will treat you as an enemy, be you alive or dead."

Fake Ryuzu: "…"

Right beside her as she lay on the ground, the fake Ryuzu stared at Julius, who thrust his sword before her. She may have been marveling at Julius's elegant skill, but his fighting style had not capitalized on any advantages from Subaru's Return by Death.

Seeing Julius, who had dominated his opponent with his pure ability, Subaru clenched his fist.

Emilia: "This isn't Ryuzu-san, right?"

In a split second, Julius neutralized his opponent and Emilia, who had jumped down from the coupled dragon carriages at the same time, furrowed her shapely eyebrows at the fake Ryuzu by his feet.

Subaru, too, did not know the true identity of the fake Ryuzu. But, he knew that she was an undead, both willing and capable of doing harm to Subaru and the others; outside of that, he knew nothing.

Subaru: "The way they look is identical, but she is neither Ryuzu-san nor Pico or the others. More importantly, put me down and be on guard! Get ready, Emilia!"

Emilia: "Be on guard? Even though that girl has already been taken care of by Julius?"

Subaru: “Something bigger is coming. Something that can kill us if we’re not prepared.”

Saying that, Subaru jumped down from Emilia’s arms.

This time, Emilia was left to cover the landing, and Julius was asked to immediately restrain the fake Ryuzu. With that, Subaru nodded to the surprised Emilia and rushed toward Julius, who was restraining the fake Ryuzu,

Subaru: “Good work! But there’s more to come! There is going to be a huge shot coming from beyond the sky! If we don’t stop it, we’re all in big danger!”

Julius: “From the sky?”

Subaru: “I also have Emilia taking deep breaths!”

Skipping over the minor details, Subaru pointed to Emilia behind him.

There, with her arms spread wide, Emilia was taking slow, long, deep breaths. Her concentration was improving in preparation for what was to come.

Julius nodded his head at that, and the Quasi Spirits of six colors gathered around him.

Fake Ryuzu: “—. You are…”

Quickly, both Emilia and Julius hurried their preparations, and the fake Ryuzu, who was restrained to the ground, gazed at Subaru with skepticism.

With the current exchange, she understood quickly that the cause of her head being pinned down was Subaru’s quick comprehension. But, the fake Ryuzu’s surprise did not end there.

Subaru: “Valga Cromwell.”

Fake Ryuzu: “…”

Subaru: “That’s the name of your military strategist, isn’t it?”

Closing one eye, Subaru conveyed to the fake Ryuzu that he saw through her plans.

In truth, neither the intentions of the fake Ryuzu nor even the identity of Valga Cromwell were known to him, but it was a bluffing technique that did not reveal that fact.

The information that had come from the fake Ryuzu herself, was now causing the fake Ryuzu to be astonished.

In fact, up until now she had remained expressionless, but now her cheeks stiffened, and she was looking at Subaru with more intensity in her eyes than ever before.

Fake Ryuzu: “I had thought prudence necessary for the magic user and Spirit Knight; but it seems for you, too, Caution: Required.”

Subaru: “…Your stratagem has been seen through. Be graceful and accept your defeat.”

Subaru tried to continue bluffing. But, since a bluff could not affect the spirit of the fake Ryuzu, it meant her planning had been different altogether.

The fake Ryuzu’s stratagem, it was not the kind that would fail if it was seen through.

Fake Ryuzu: “Valga’s stratagem, is something that cannot be prevented even if it is perceived.”

At that moment, that white light from beyond the sky aimed at Subaru and his friends—no, it was not.

The white light was not aimed at Subaru and his friends, it was aimed at the fake Ryuzu lying on the ground, unleashed to obliterate everything atop the surface.

Emilia: “—Subaru!!”

Before the imminent light of Death annihilated Subaru’s existence, Emilia reached out her hands and deployed an ice barrier, which violently collided head-on with it.

At the same time, Subaru was pulled up by his collar and his body fell to the ground at Emilia's feet. In front of Subaru's eyes, the fake Ryuzu, who was closer to the light than Subaru, was engulfed by the white light, and disappeared.

Perhaps this had always been the case.

That white light was something unleashed aiming for the fake Ryuzu. Her presence became the marker for the white light to aim at, and the aftermath of the impact swallowed Subaru and the others, as well as the coupled dragon carriage.

She became a living target of overwhelmingly powerful bombardment as she traveled into the midst of the enemy. —No, since she had died, she was a dead target. Either way, the one who had originally proposed that was completely crazy.

Subaru: "That damn idiot Valga Cromwell—!!"

Julius: "Al Clauseria!!"

Subaru's heartfelt cry was met by Julius's incantation as he thrust the tip of his sword toward the light.

A rainbow aurora was born, its brilliance collided with the white light like a wall; it just barely restrained the light enough to prevent it from shattering the several ice barriers created by Emilia.

A white light of destruction, and the protective ice wall clad in an aurora.

Unlike the last time, when they had no choice but to face it without sufficient preparation, there was time to formulate strategies against the white light. This was the reason why Emilia and Julius were able to resist the attack compared to the last time.

But, even still—

Emilia: "Ugh, yaaaah—Hk!"

Julius: “Guh, kuu… Hk.”

With desperation in their voices, Emilia and Julius fought against the white light.

But, for this to be something that even the combined efforts of these two could not overcome, just how powerful was it? Unable to do anything in this situation, Subaru could only support Emilia’s back as she stood her ground.

Subaru: “Hang in there! You two, keep it up!”

Clenching down on his molars, and unable to provide physical support, Subaru shouted out psychological support.

It would have been nice if that roused the two of them and gave them the strength to extinguish the white light completely, but things did not tend to go so smoothly.

No matter what the situation, salvation would not be suddenly offered out of the void.

No matter how much one wished or prayed, one could not play cards that they had not been dealt in the game.

That was why—

???: “—Ya did well callin’ for me, so darn praiseworthy.”

Indeed, hearing a carefree voice that contrasted the urgency of the situation, Subaru held his breath.

Somebody had walked out next to them. Then, the person gave Subaru’s head a pat with their large hand and walked out in front of Emilia and Julius, as though they were merely taking a relaxed stroll.

Those two were also surprised by the sudden behavior of the person, but—

???: “Here’s the deadspot.”

As soon as they said it, the figure advanced in front of the three, and swung the arm they had taken out of its sleeves, tossing something into the white light.

The light possessed the power to swallow everything and turn it into dust. Beyond the barrier that Emilia and Julius had used to hold it back, that too would be swallowed up and then disappear.

Or, so it had seemed.

Emilia: “No way…”

Letting out a voice akin to a gasp, Emilia’s amethyst eyes widened.

Reflected in her beautiful eyes was not the white Death that had been so close at hand, in fact, that had disappeared entirely; and instead reflected was the night sky, covered with thick clouds that had now been hollowed out in the shape of the light.

Witnessing the same thing, both Subaru and Julius were left speechless.

The aurora-clad ice wall that had collided with the light had also disappeared, and the fake Ryuzu, who had used herself as a target, disappeared into the light, leaving nothing behind—

???: “Was thanks ta that Blue Oni girl who went ‘n came callin’ for me. But, the three of ya did a real darn good job hangin’ in there. How ‘bout I give ya some candy?”

While saying that, having just wiped away the overwhelming Death with his own hand, the wolfperson—the strongest of the City-States, turned around and gave a huge grin at Subaru and his friends, utterly dumbfounded as they were.

Then, his hand rummaged around in his clothing, and while tilting his head with a kiseru still in his mouth,

???: “Ah, oops, I ain’t got no candy on me.”

With that, he waved his empty hand about in the air, causing the exhausted Subaru to fall on his buttocks.

Vic.ll20

Chapter 20:
The Two Lights

1

Roswaal: “—The identity of the enemy has become clear. The Witch’s failure that once wreaked havoc in the Kingdom… a being by the name of Sphinx, the worst kind of monster.”

An emergency meeting had been convened once again in the coupled dragon carriages, and Roswaal, who had rushed back from the battlefield, looked over everyone assembled and gave such an explanation.

Sphinx—that was the name of the fake Ryuzu that Subaru’s group had faced.

Also—

Subaru: “You said she rampaged in the Kingdom, when did that happen?”

Roswaal: “—Approximately forty years ago, in the midst of the Demi-Human War.”

Subaru: “—Hk!”

Hearing Roswaal’s response, Subaru’s eyes widened in surprise.

The Demi-Human War was an incident that frequently came up in conversation, but it was an event that had taken place exclusively within the Kingdom of Lugunica, the stage for the civil war. To think that he would hear about it even when in the Vollachian Empire.

Julius: “As per the records, during the Demi-Human War, Sphinx was among the three people on the demi-human side who required the most caution. I have heard that her deep knowledge of magic significantly escalated the horrors of the Demi-Human War.”

Emilia: “I think I also came across that name while studying the history of the Kingdom. That and, the name Subaru mentioned as well… Valga Cromwell, right?”

Julius: “—. Indeed. That name also corresponds to one of the individuals who warranted caution.”

Having actually confronted the fake Ryuzu—Sphinx, and experienced the threat she posed, Emilia and Julius also referenced the other name that had been mentioned at that time.

To them, it must have seemed like Subaru had suddenly thrown out that name, but by judging from Sphinx’s reaction to it, they understood that she and the named individual were not unrelated.

Then again, Subaru himself had not been aware that it was the name of a person involved with the Demi-Human War.

Subaru: “In other words, our enemies are Sphinx and this Valga Cromwell guy, and the people who rampaged during the Demi-Human War are now on a rampage in the Empire? I don’t really get why…”

Anastasia: “The Demi-Human War was already over forty years ago. I’ve also studied the history of the Kingdom, ‘n I know ‘bout what the demi-human side was advocatin’ for durin’ the civil war… I feel this situation ain’t alignin’ with that.”

Subaru: “Right. Anyway, I’m just glad that Beako and the others are safe, but…”

In the past, Sphinx and Valga had wreaked havoc in the Kingdom, but it was illogical that these two would now be rampaging in the Empire, so both Subaru and Anastasia tilted their heads in doubt.

At this rate, it seemed likely that the last of the three people to be wary of from the civil war, would also turn out to be an enemy.

Beatrice: “That’s impossible, in fact. The last person… the one named Libre Fermi, was confirmed to be in the library of the Pleiades Watchtower, I suppose. There is no doubt that he is counted among the dead, in fact.”

Snuggling up to Subaru's side, Beatrice negated his worry.

Ever since hearing about the predicament in which Subaru's group had found themselves in, Beatrice, who had literally flown back with Roswaal, had firmly resolved to not leave Subaru's side.

For Subaru as well, letting her go to the battlefield had been heartrending, so he was more than willing to accept Beatrice's cute resolve.

Anyhow—

Subaru: "So we can rest easy if they had a Book of the Dead… but is it really okay to say that? We're dealing with zombies, so I'm starting to feel like it's natural that it was there."

Julius: "If that is the case, it is a frightening prospect. The possibility that we may not just be dealing with ordinary zombies, but with the likes of heroes or villains whose names have been engraved into history."

Subaru: "The heroes engraved into history, huh…? Hey, you aren't gonna get too excited, right?"

Julius: "Regrettably, I have already confronted Reid Astrea. Thus, I am disciplining myself as to not harbor excessive expectations."

Julius shrugged his shoulders, and Subaru gave him a doubtful look.

In fact, when the topic of Reid had come up at the tower, it became more evident that Julius was a history geek. He had also properly settled matters with Reid. He was not the kind of man who would fall behind, but Subaru doubted his remark that he could keep his composure when facing an eminent figure.

Otto: "Now is not the time to be talking about that… For the time being, Natsuki-san's group has been able to stop one of the opponent's trump cards, but it was not perfect. The good news is that Sphinx, who seemed to have been a formidable opponent, has dropped out early, but…"

Garfiel: “Sorry ‘bout this, Ottobro. Truth is, can’t be sayin’ that for sure.”

Otto: “Huh?”

As Garfiel, with his arms crossed as he grit his fangs, told that to him with poor enunciation, Otto widened his eyes. Staring fixedly at Otto, Garfiel had returned from the battlefield with his whole body covered with dirt, and he gestured to Beatrice and Roswaal with each of his hands,

Garfiel: “That Sphinx fucker was in front of my amazin’ self, Beatrice, ‘n that bastard. That face she wore, it pissed me the hell off, like, ya gotta be fuckin’ kiddin’ me…”

Emilia: “Yeah, that’s right. She had the same face as Ryuzu-san. That must have been reaaally tough for Garfiel.”

Garfiel: “Well, if she ain’t my Nanna, she ain’t my Nanna, no matter how much she looks like her. That’s why I didn’t have any hesitation to fight her. Problem is what happened after.”

Emilia: “After?”

As Emilia tilted her head, Garfiel nodded deeply.

His brave countenance was unusually clouded over, and with a sigh he said,

Garfiel: “—There’s no doubt that our amazin’ selves took down that Sphinx. Saw her shatter to pieces with my own eyes, to the point that it was like “Rigirigi’s Wasted Trump Card”. That was…”

Beatrice: “That was Sphinx’s goal, I suppose.”

Taking over Garfiel’s conclusion, Beatrice squeezed Subaru’s hand tightly.

She gripped Subaru’s fingers so tightly that they turned white, indicating the extent of the shock that Sphinx’s goal brought to Beatrice.

Looking fondly at Beatrice, Roswaal continued, “Allow me to conclude,”

Roswaal: “Sphinx certainly died in front of us, she then died once more in front of Subaru-kun and his group. What can be inferred from this is plain and simple… Sphinx is able to die several times, and each time, she can be resurrected as a zombie.”

Subaru: “Wha…?!”

Roswaal: “Perhaps making it even worse, the next resurrected zombie could be aware of her previous death and the circumstances that caused it. In other words, she could know that Subaru-kun and Halibel-dono were the main factors that stopped her plan to blow away the coupled dragon carriage.”

Everyone: “…”

Though it was just conjecture, Roswaal explained a dreadful thought at the very end.

But, there were many parts they could certainly agree with. In the midst of the destructive light that rained down, while being exposed to a blow that would reduce her to dust, Sphinx did not seem the least bit distraught.

When facing their own death, there existed people who remained unfazed.

However, if Sphinx’s lack of reaction to Death was because she had not considered it to be Death, it strangely made sense to Subaru.

Subaru: “It’s just like…”

—Return by Death, Subaru thought, though he did not say it out loud.

Thinking that losing one’s own life was not a detriment, but rather, that it could even be a weapon used to accomplish a devastating attack. The functional difference was the fact that the reality of Death itself would not disappear.

Come to think of it, rather than Subaru's Return by Death, it may have been more comparable to the troublesome "possession" ability of Petelgeuse, who he had once fought against.

Julius: "No matter how many times they are defeated, hm?"

For a moment, as Julius muttered that, his gaze met with Subaru's.

Perhaps Julius, like Subaru, had compared the troublesome nature of Sphinx to Petelgeuse. Though unlike Petelgeuse, Sphinx did not "possess" others, so perhaps this could be called Escape by Death—

Subaru: "If you can't defeat them, no matter how many times you try, then there is one sure way to defeat such a person: just keep defeating them until they run out of spare lives, that's it!"

Emilia: "Spaer laives? Eeh, that's…"

Subaru: "It means the remaining number of times they can come back to life. No matter how dangerous the opponent is, there's no way they can revive as many times as they want without limit. There is definitely a limit. Right?"

He felt like he was not one to talk, but the remaining lives seemed to have to be exhausted eventually.

If they killed Sphinx repeatedly until she ran out of lives, her otherwise composed face, despite the fact that she might have thought she could not die, would no longer be able to retain its composure.

Subaru: "So that's why we don't have to stay in the dumps. Let's just be happy we knocked them down a peg! Thanks, Rem!"

Rem: "—! I-I didn't do anything that important."

When suddenly prompted, Rem shook her head. However, she was too modest to say that she had done anything important.

Immediately upon using Return by Death, Subaru had exited the coupled dragon carriage accompanied by Emilia and Julius, then asked her who remained inside to convey a message to the others.

—To seek out the most powerful of Kararagi.

Subaru: “If Rem hadn’t gone and retrieved Halibel-san, then Emilia, Julius, myself, and the coupled dragon carriages would all be dust by now. If that had happened, Beako would be a widow who lost me, and a nun who would be mourning me forever.”

Beatrice: “Don’t just casually state the worst possible outcome like that, in fact! It’s something unthinkable! If you die and leave Betty behind, then Betty will really become that nun, I suppose!”

Emilia: “Hm, I guess it’s thanks to Rem that Beatrice didn’t become this nun and that we can talk like this. Thank you.”

Rem: “…I, understand. At least, I think I do.”

Rem was somewhat reserved in accepting the thanks from both Beatrice, who was almost in tears, and Emilia, who was smiling.

The sight of Emilia, Beatrice, and Rem all together again made Subaru’s heart swell with emotion. Then, he turned his gaze to the tall figure standing there,

Subaru: “Of course, thanks, Halibel-san. To be honest, I was just banking on the reputation of Halibel-san’s name to see if you could do something about it…”

Halibel: “Hahaha, ain’t it a good thing ta be honest? In fact, I was also surprised when I was suddenly called by the young Blue Oni girl. If I’d been hit by it without knowin’ I’d also be dead y’know? If anything, I feel like I narrowly escaped death ‘cause she told me ‘bout it.”

Halibel laughed with an attitude that was not befitting of his accomplishments.

His laid-back tone lacked a sense of urgency, but without him, Subaru and the others would have been annihilated. It was a good decision by Subaru to have called him on the second time, but it was horrifying to imagine him not having been there in this coupled dragon carriage in the first place.

In that short time, he had to assemble all of the combatants on board of the dragon carriage and find the best solution. Even so, there was no guarantee that there could have been a solution, and that was truly because of the strongest of the City-States.

Anastasia: “Ya say it like that, but how did ya actually do that?”

Emilia: “Yeah, Julius and I did our best, but I think we came up a little short, so I’m reaaally glad that Anastasia-san had Halibel-san on our side.”

Anastasia: “I see, I see. Well then, it was worth spendin’ allat money to get him to come with us.”

Quietly, Emilia and Anastasia also re-assessed Halibel, who lacked a sense of urgency, and in any case, were able to reflect on the situation because everybody had taken the best possible action.

That was Subaru’s takeaway from the incredible assault just before —

Subaru: “So, that’s how the whole mess went down earlier. Well, that was fast, and all of us did our best to save everybody’s lives, you know. And of course, there’s something to be said for that, right?”

Vincent: “It was a great service.”

Subaru: “You bastard…!”

When the Emperor, Abel, who had been quietly listening to the report up to this point, expressed his gratitude, Natsuki Subaru shook his fist intensely.

2

Though it was a matter of course, the Escape by Death strategy that Sphinx had used when attacking the coupled dragon carriages needed to be shared with the Imperial leaders who had become relevant parties before they could even become aware.

The coupled dragon carriage was supposed to be a considerably important and highly classified secret typical of the Vollachian Empire; since it had been necessary to destroy a part of the valuable vehicle, a concrete explanation was needed.

Be that as it may—

Subaru: "Even though we put an end to such a situation, you're just settling it with the words "great service"…"

Goz: "What are you saying, Natsuki-dono! How could you ask for any greater reward than words of gratitude from His Excellency! You should feel ashamed as a subject of the Empire governed by His Excellency!!"

Emilia: "Goz-san! Don't be mistaken! Subaru is not a child of the Empire, but of the Kingdom like us!"

Subaru: "Emilia, your voice is getting wound up all loud again."

Unlike the Imperial Soldiers, who had maxed out their loyalty, Abel's words of gratitude were not enough of a reward for Subaru.

Though, if it was thanks from Emilia, whose voice had grown loud to match Goz's, it might have made up for Subaru's dissatisfaction.

Vincent: "Currently, we have been driven out of the Imperial Capital, and are en route to reestablishing a condition from which we can deal with the situation. Even if you demand a reward corresponding to your achievement, I shall not make empty promises. Therefore, I have naught but words to grant you."

Subaru: "Don't tell me so proudly that your wallet is empty…! Waaaah, Anastasia-saan!"

Anastasia: "Yes, yes, ya ain't got no need to get so frustrated. I'll be makin' sure that you, Julius, 'n Emilia-san get yer fair shares paid exorbitantly by the Empire."

Subaru: "Whoopee! Rip 'em off!"

Subaru raised his hands with tears in his eyes at Anastasia's dependability, and Abel frowned before sighing. Then, restoring the discussion to the original topic, he said “So”,

Vincent: “This undead in question… the one called Sphinx, you mean to say she is at the center of the current Great Disaster?”

Roswaal: “At the very least, she must have been the one who constructed the technique that revived such a laaarge~ number of zombies. Alteration and improvement of existing techniques, that’s what that failure would do.”

Emilia: “Roswaal, I know you hate her, but don’t use so much nasty language.”

Roswaal responded to Abel, and Emilia raised her eyebrows slightly at his statement. Her gentle amethyst eyes grew severe, and as she fixed her gaze on Roswaal,

Emilia: “We don’t want to speak with foul mouths, right? Even if you happen to do a good thing, if you’re always saying nasty things, no one will be willing to listen to how you really feel.”

Roswaal: “—. Yes, I’ll bear that in mind.”

Emilia: “Yes, please do.”

Roswaal gave a wry smile as he obediently bowed his head to the smiling Emilia’s complaint.

Though her gentle nature remained unchanged, Subaru felt that Emilia’s way of thinking had grown more sophisticated. It would be nice if Roswaal also felt the same thing.

Then, leaving Subaru’s thoughts aside—

Vincent: “I hear that Sphinx had gone on a rampage during the Kingdom’s civil war. What became of these circumstances?”

Julius: “Kingdom records state that Sphinx, Valga Cromwell, and Libre Fermi were all killed before the civil war concluded. The loss of these three resulted in the demi-human side’s disadvantage in the civil war… That is what I remember.”

Vincent: “I see. —But, there is no possibility that the undead are simply sprouting from the earth without cause. Is it not the fault of your Kingdom that they have become undead and presently ravage the vast lands of the Empire?”

Roswaal: “Oh my, someone as eminent as His Excellency the Emperor Vincent is saying the most nonseeensical~ things.”

As Abel posed that question with a single eye closed, Roswaal smiled and shrugged his shoulders.

Indicating to the view outside the window with his hand,

Roswaal: “The deepest depths of their thoughts are still unknown, but since they are bringing disaster to the Empire, and not to the Kingdom where they have memories of defeat, it’s clear that their agenda is different to what it was back then. Considering their silence for the past forty years, it is unrealistic to think that the Kingdom’s record is wrong.”

Having said all that, Roswaal moved his hand back from gesturing outside and held up one finger, saying “But then again”,

Roswaal: “If there was anyone who participated directly in the Demi-Human War and had the opportunity to kill Sphinx, but failed to do so, then just as you say, Your Excellency, I believe they should be blaaamed~.”

Vincent: “Foolish. They would have participated in the Kingdom’s civil war over forty years ago; asking an old soldier who decided the outcome of the battle, it is not even worthy of discussion.”

Subaru: “Well, that’s right. For a start, I’m relieved you’re not a guy who would make such unreasonable demands… Huh? What’s the matter, Beako, you’re making an ugly face.”

Beatrice: “…Betty’s face is always adorable, I suppose.”

Abel quickly conceded that Roswaal had made a sound argument, and retracted his point.

Such restraint might have been a habit, but it was a bad habit, so it would be better to change it. To Subaru's side as he thought that to himself, Beatrice wore a glum expression for some reason.

It was true that it was adorable, but apparently there was something in the current exchange that weighed on Beatrice's mind. Perhaps this face of Beatrice's was Roswaal-related.

Vincent: "So, what else did you uncover? Making such a dramatic show of jumping out is no accomplishment if it yields the same result as having stayed on the dragon carriage."

Beatrice: "It was Subaru, not Betty and the others, who made a dramatic show of it, in fact. But, it is also Betty's duty to take responsibility for Subaru's dramatic show, I suppose."

Roswaal: "Of course, there were some fruuuits~ of our labor. Not so much about the peculiarities of zombies, but we did learn several thiiings~."

Asked by Abel, Beatrice and Roswaal responded confidently.

To the two of them, Subaru snapped his fingers and said, "As expected of you,"

Subaru: "So, so? Did you figure out the zombies' weak spot? If we figured that out, we don't have to be afraid of Sphinx when she appears again."

Otto: "Natsuki-san, please do not get your hopes too high. No matter how you look at it, such impressive results are…"

Beatrice: "You underestimate Betty and Roswaal too much, in fact. Of course we figured it out, I suppose."

Otto: "Waah?!"

Subaru: "For real?!"

Subaru and Otto were astonished at Beatrice's words, with her chest puffed out and her face smug. Beatrice, pleased by their reaction, smiled and said, "Naturally, in fact.", Beatrice: “The hint was Garfiel’s intuition, I suppose. Garfiel, who was already rampaging across the battlefield before Betty and Roswaal, noticed something strange, in fact.”

Garfiel: “That said, if Beatrice ‘n that bastard hadn’t come along, might’ve forgotten ‘bout it.”

Roswaal: “I think it’s a real waste that you’re someone with excellent intuition, but you don’t trust in it… Oya? I had intended to compliment you, but…”

Garfiel: “I ain’t gonna be happy whether ya praise or criticize me.”

As Garfiel rebuked and stuck out his tongue, Roswaal closed one eye and shrugged.

Aside from their usual bickering, Beatrice continued.

Beatrice: “The discrepancy Garfiel noticed was the difference in the durability of the zombies, I suppose. Some zombies would die from a single arrow, while others would still be alive and well even after being pierced by ten arrows. That’s the discrepancy, in fact.”

Emilia: “But, isn’t it because each ”zombee’s” strength is different? I’m stronger than Subaru, so it could be that kind of discrepancy.”

Beatrice: “That was not it, I suppose. Even with the same difference in strength between Subaru and Anastasia, there was still a discrepancy between one arrow and ten, in fact.”

Anastasia: “Bein’ compared with me, seems like Natsuki-kun’s still as pitiful as ever.”

With an elegantly wry smile, Anastasia glanced at Subaru. But, since Subaru had been shrunk, there was no room for him to refute the claim, and he responded to her concern with a wave of his hand.

However, Beatrice’s mention of a discrepancy was certainly something that caught his interest. Also, the fact that Beatrice and Roswaal had uncovered the truth behind that discrepancy.

The answer was—

Vincent: “State your conclusion. What caused the discrepancies between the undead?”

Beatrice: “—Bugs, I suppose.”

Subaru: “Bugs…?”

When Abel’s question was answered, Subaru furrowed his brow at the contents of the answer.

Then, Beatrice looked towards Roswaal, and nodded. With that signal, Roswaal took something out of his own pocket, and,

Roswaal: “Everyone, please be extremely careful. It has been frozen to stop its activity, but if the ice breaks, it is presumed that a zombie will be booorn~ here.”

Subaru: “What are you talking about… Hey, hey, hey, what the hell is that?!”

Roswaal: “Beatrice said it, didn’t she? It’s a bug. I’d even venture to call it a Corebug.”

As he stated this, in Roswaal’s hand was a small block of ice being pinched between his fingers, about the size of a coin; inside, there was a red, round object.

Upon closer inspection, he understood that it was a small round bug that looked like a caterpillar—.

Roswaal: “This Corebug is lurking within the body of every zombie. And, this worm is the zombie’s lifeline… in other words, it is undoubtedly their core.”

Subaru: “These bugs are their cores, that means…”

Julius: “—I see. So, the true nature of Garfiel’s perceived discrepancy was the difference in the points at which an arrow killed the Corebug within the zombie’s body.”

While Subaru's shock from the impact of the bugs had still yet to disappear, Julius comprehended the details in such a manner.

Hearing Julius's words, the others also reached an understanding. Of course, Subaru also finally understood the purpose of the bugs' existence—

Subaru: "So you're saying that the Corebug is basically the heart of a zombie?"

Roswaal: "We will be working to unravel more about the technique, but this Corebug acquires the data of the target that is to turn into a zombie, and then reproduces the original form by making a vessel out of earth… That is our conclusion."

Beatrice: "Indeed, in fact."

Without objection, Beatrice nodded her head in agreement with Roswaal's conclusion.

But, Subaru was utterly shocked at the conclusion that the two had reached.

If the zombies were being created by magic, he could accept it in a fantasy sense. However, when it came down to magic bugs creating the zombies, the feelings of disgust prevailed.

Subaru: "Even though I loved catching bugs when I was a kid, how pathetic…"

Otto: "Though, I do not think that is the kind of situation where you should be reflecting on that. —In any case, our people have produced good results. How do you like that, Your Excellency the Emperor?"

Vincent: "At the very least, you have proved that you are not merely an incompetent bunch who make big talk and produce no results. I recognize that. It was a great service."

Otto: "…Perhaps it would have been better had I not asked."

Regardless of the people of the Empire, those words of praise were disreputable to the people of the Kingdom, including Subaru.

Anyway, as Otto went out of his way to corner him with words, even the obstinate Abel had no choice but to acknowledge the results that Beatrice and Roswaal had produced.

Deep down, he was probably grumbling “Grrr”.

Subaru: “You did a great job; that’s my Beako.”

Beatrice: “Naturally, I suppose. That is the competency of Subaru’s partner, in fact. Unlike that deergirl, who has only gone through a little bit of hardship with Subaru, I suppose.”

Subaru: “Instead of getting huffy, shouldn’t you get along with Tanza?! Emilia-tan also said not to say anything nasty!”

Soothing Beatrice, who was showing her competitiveness in a strange way, Subaru promised to pet her a hundred times to restore her mood, and then looked at Abel and the others again.

When Abel returned the look, Subaru said, “Well?” with a puffed-out chest, and,

Subaru: “These are my reliable allies. All my big talk paid off, didn’t it?”

Vincent: “I recognize your achievement in protecting against the earlier attack on the dragon carriage. For what reason must you insist on boasting your success to me in order to feel satisfied? Your achievements are visible enough to the eye.”

Subaru: “Heh, whatever you say makes you sound like you’re a sore loser. I’m feeling great right now after all.”

Subaru snorted in a good mood in response to Abel’s displeased reply. Emilia said “No!”, angry at him for this attitude, but Subaru could not disguise his true feelings.

Then, perhaps impatient with Subaru and his party’s achievements, the Imperial Leaders—Berstetz and Serena exchanged a few words, and then Abel looked over to them, Berstetz: “Your Excellency, the people of the Kingdom… Since our acquaintance Margrave Mathers and his companions have shown so much success, would it not be dishonorable if our side was unable to produce beneficial answers?”

Vincent: “High Countess Dracroy, for what reason are you so amused?”

Serena: “Amused, you say? Apologies, Your Excellency. I wasn’t conscious of it myself, but perhaps it is the result of the feeling that my own dignity as Imperial nobility is being put to the test, supposing we are in a situation where the Empire’s prestige must be demonstrated to maintain our honor.”

Vincent: “…”

Putting her hand over her ample chest, Serena replied as the white scar on her face contorted. She was not smiling, but the tone of her voice and the intensity of her eyes were rather good-humored. In a situation where she was absolutely not the superior, she exhibited an outstanding mental fortitude to be dealing with the Emperor with such a tone.

Subaru: “Could it be that Serena-san is quite the dangerous person?”

Garfiel: “I dunno if she’s bad or not, but she’s pals with Roswaal.”

Subaru: “Ah~.”

Seeking information about Serena, with whom he had little contact, the first bombshell thrown in was enough to break down the wall of doubt.

However, it was hard to say whether it had been Roswaal or Serena who had decided to be friends. After all, it was clear as day that their cross-border friendship was a factor behind why Emilia and the others were able to come all the way to the Empire, to look for Subaru and the others.

Come to think of it, Roswaal was also very impudent during the ceremony for the Royal Selection.

It made sense to hear that he was friends with Serena, who held that attitude towards Abel.

Anastasia: “Enough time’s passed that I can talk ‘bout it, but Natsuki-kun was also like that back then, right?”

Subaru: “I can’t hear you, I can’t hear you, I can’t hear you…”

As Subaru covered his ears and ran away from his unpleasant past; “The things you’ve done in the past won’t disappear”, the lukewarm eyes of the very person who had once preached that to him, now felt like they were stabbing into him.

And, with a similarly lukewarm gaze, Serena graciously faced the Emperor, and continued to persuade him about something.

Serena: “Anyway, Your Excellency must think those things are useful. That’s exactly why you’ve kept them by your side, but those are just the suspicions of a woman like me.”

Vincent: “Cease. Even if you had not gotten so unscrupulous with your words, I would still understand.”

With a snort, Abel obstructed Serena’s gaze with his hand. Then he erased all hue of deliberation, and revealed what Serena had encouraged him to.

That was—

Vincent: “—There is someone who possesses information that may or may not prove useful as we confront this Great Disaster. It is necessary to hear what that person has to say before we arrive at the Fortified City.”

3

???: “My ohhh~ my, are you finally going to listen to me? In that case, I’m overjoyed, Your Excellency.”

The person, who had been said to be confined beyond the door of a firmly locked cabin within the dragon carriages, gave an amiable smile upon seeing Abel’s figure.

However, for him, in such a state of confinement, it really was not something that he should have been smiling at.

After all, his entire body was bound by chains, tied to a chair so as to never let him escape.

Subaru: “Oioi, Abel, no matter how you look at it, this is…”

Vincent: “A necessary measure. For better or worse, losing this man would be a major blow to our side. Allow me to warn you, if his restraints are removed, he will easily go off to his death.”

???: “It’s preeeposterous~ that I’d go off to die! It’s just that I’ve been doing everything I can to stop this Great Disaster until now… If it’s for that purpose, it doesn’t matter if I lose my life.”

Subaru: “Ohh…”

Thoughtlessly smiling, the delicate man rocked back and forth in the chair he was bound to.

Feeling a sense of insanity from that manner of speaking, even Subaru could not help but believe that Abel’s argument was no exaggeration.

However, even though they seemed to be nothing but suspicious—

Subaru: “This, Stargazer is… Ubilk-san, was it? You said we could rely on this person?”

Ubilk: “Whaaat’s~ this, it’s upsetting that I’m being doubted… Wait, taking a closer look, aren’t you the Stargazer-san of the Kingdom that I paaassed~ by in Chaosflame?!”

Subaru: “You’re completely wrong. Ah! By any chance, were you the one who instilled the idea that I’m a Stargazer into this guy’s head?! I ended up in a fist-fight with him because of that!”

The delicate man with a sparkling face—Ubilk, had uttered a rash remark that caused Subaru to snap back.

For Subaru, being treated like he had the dubious occupation of a

Stargazer was a huge inconvenience. Of course, since Stargazers took on some sort of prophet-like role, Subaru understood there was a risk that he, who could Return by Death, could appear to be like them; even so, it was a huge inconvenience.

In any case—

Subaru: "I'm not the same as you. Keep that in mind."

Ubilk: "Huhhh~? That sure is strange. I heard that you were the same, though…"

Subaru: "Was that from the stars? In that case, Abel, we aren't gonna be able to rely on this person."

If it turned out that the stars gave incorrect answers, they were something he would unfortunately want to avoid right now.

At the present moment, the important thing was to acquire accurate information from the stars, no matter how trivial. Vague prophecies that could be taken either way, along the lines of the Barnum effect, were unnecessary.

Hence, he promptly turned his back in disappointment, but—

Ubilk: "Wait wait, please waaait~! I understaaand~! You areeen't~ a Stargazer! That doesn't matter to me!"

Subaru: "I'm bothered by your manner of speaking, but even if you amend your statement, it's not like your credibility is suddenly restored…"

Ubilk: "I don't care if you keeeep~ me locked up like this. But, please at least listen to what I've gazed from the stars. That's all you need to do!"

Subaru: "…"

Twisting around in his seat with a burst of strength, Ubilk appealed so, his eyes ablaze. With such vigor, the chains wrapped around him forcefully tore into his skin, to the extent that his blood mercilessly started to spill out.

Completely ignoring the pain, he was trying to convey some information that he had heard from the stars as a Stargazer. If he could do that, injuries would not matter to him.

It seemed as if even his own life did not matter to him.

Subaru: “Abel, these Stargazer people are…”

Vincent: “Do away with that sentiment. Hear what he must say, and then decide if it is worth consideration.”

That intense fixation towards the stars gave Subaru an unpleasant sense of déjà vu. But, Abel did not agree with that judgment of Subaru’s, and he proactively fixed his gaze on Ubilk.

Seeing Abel’s willingness to listen, Ubilk ceased his writhing, his gentle face forming a smile.

Ubilk: “Rest assured, Your Excellency. No matter how mighty the Great Disaster may be, the staaars~ are on the side of Your Excellency.”

Vincent: “The same cruel stars that make no distinction as to which Vincent Vollachia is left behind, hm? Do not make me laugh. —Speak. What must you convey?”

Ubilk: “Two, there are.”

Abel posed this question with arms crossed, and Ubilk gave that short reply.

Hearing it, Subaru muttered “two” inside his mouth, and Abel urged him to continue through his silence.

Subaru was extremely apprehensive as to whether they could put their trust in him, but at the very least, this Stargazer was said to have predicted the arrival of the Great Disaster itself; and right now, they would provide information for the sake of the shaking Empire.

That was—

Ubilk: “Two lights, to overturn the peril of the Great Disaster. The first, brought by a Stargazer of the Kingdom… or rather, by the boy who is not that, a girl unable to communicate with words.”

Subaru: “…What?”

Ubilk glanced towards Subaru, and the latter widened his eyes, motionless at the words that had been spoken.

He had been questioning whether to fully believe Ubilk’s words or not, but the words that had then been spoken made it unthinkable that there was any cause to believe him.

After all, there was only one person who met the conditions of which Ubilk had just spoken.

Then, without sparing a moment for him to recover from that impact, Ubilk continued.

With the same lips that had just revealed one of the so-called two lights, he continued to the light which yet remained.

That light, it was—

Ubilk: “—The most well-versed in curses across all the Empire, a beastman who stands upon one of the nine summits.”

4

Kicking off the ground, out of breath, he ran up the rocky mountain path with sheer force.

???: “Fuck fuck fucking fuck, these fucking shithead bastards…!”

Even the vigor in his words had grown weak; he was aware that he was wearing himself out.

Running across plains, and continuing to fight without sleep or rest, were things he had always been doing in order to survive in the vast lands of the Empire since he was a child.

Nevertheless, the stress from going over ten days without eating or drinking was a different dimension entirely.

???: “—Hk.”

Sniff; when the stench of earth mixed with something strange entered his nasal cavity, he furiously began to exert his limbs.

He neither tried to catch a glimpse with his eyes, nor tried listening with his ears. He was able to fully grasp the world through what his nose could smell alone. Even the positions, numbers, and general armaments of his enemies.

Because of that, he understood that he was surrounded by a hundred enemy troops, that it would be hopeless no matter how much he whittled down their numbers; it made him want to think that his nose had gone stupid.

???: “These, FUCKING ASSHOLES!”

But, he immediately dispelled those thoughts, and slammed his weapon into the scent of earth.

A first, a second, and third; the bodies of the enemies that received a direct hit were blown to pieces, and the impact perforated through to the opponents on the other side, allowing him to forcefully break through the encirclement and get away.

No matter how many he took down, the pale earth puppets ceaselessly sprang forth.

Those nightmarish things of poor craftsmanship were undoubtedly prowling after his life.

The army unit he commanded was annihilated, and it was already all too late when he realized; while doubting his talents as a General, he continued to run east, further east, clinging to his dear life.

Even if he tried to converge somewhere, the paths continued to be obstructed; not only was he starving and thirsty, but his last contact with a living person had been when he parted with his second-in-command.

At the very least, it would be nice if a few of his subordinates had been able to survive.

???: “Tch—!!”

The moment his thoughts veered off topic, his reaction to the enemy slashing at him had been slow.

His shoulder plate protected against the attack as it grazed his shoulder, and taking the opportunity to escape the impact, he kicked off the surface of the mountain trail. Compared to proceeding up the narrow path filled with those hindrances, slipping off the side of the cliff was much better.

Deciding that, he ran down the cliff, steep as a right angle as it was, and began to shake off the pursuing enemies quicker.

Even if he was going to be cornered by the number of enemies being thrown at him, a small breather would be somewhat helpful.

Having faith in that, he ran, ran, and ran—

???: “—Hk, this smell is…”

Mixed among the earth, vegetation, and slight fragrance of flowers, the smell of life tickled his nasal cavity.

Sensing something that was different to the scent of iron from the weapons his pursuers held, his thoughts were scattered into a thousand pieces for a moment, but he immediately consulted the situation and followed the smell of life.

He hesitated about dragging other people into his fight with this enemy.

However, if he were to avoid that, he would suffer from hunger and thirst and lose all his strength. That would be the stupidest, most idiotic fucking conclusion he could reach.

???: “…Fuck, a hidden village?”

Following the smell of life, he entered an isolated settlement among the mountains.

In the Empire, there were a considerable number of people who abandoned their land in order to evade taxation, and either became bandits or went to live in the mountains or forest. This settlement was probably one of those hidden villages.

As a General of the Empire, he typically would not let the existence of this hidden village slide, but—

???: “It’s a fucking emergency! It’s fine for now! More importantly…”

Wondering if anyone was present, he gazed over the whole settlement, and sniffed his nose when nobody entered his vision.

The origin of the smell of life was this settlement, but what potently ticked his nasal cavity was not a lingering scent, but the stench of somebody who was currently present here.

He headed in that direction, and if they were someone who could fight, he would request their assistance.

Even if they could buy him a little time, he would probably be able to use it to regain his physical strength through a meal and water.

Rousing his heart right before he was about to wither and die, he relied on the scent and went towards a large building in the settlement.

He approached the entrance, and burst inside.

???: “Oi! I dunno who you are, but would you lend me a hand against these fucking bastards—”

—That instant, two columns of wind violently flashed to meet his entry.

???: “FUCKING CLOSE ONE!!”

Right away, he leaned his head and hips back in order to evade; he was late in sensing that what had been unleashed were sharp slashing attacks.

He had barged in requesting help, but instead an attempt had been made to kill him; he snarled his fangs and intently glared at the opponent who had performed such a foolish fucking action.

And then—

???: “Oh? Now this is quite the strange happening! To think we’d try and see whether the next dead person’d be a man or a woman, only for a living person to plunge in… Redhead! Looks like I’m the winner of our bet!”

???: “Shut the fuck up, be quiet, die. Winning, losing, it’s all fucking worthless…”

As he glared, what had entered his vision was the inside of a spacious building, where two middle-aged men sat by a circular table—Furthermore, they were men who absolutely reeked of liquor.

One held a katana, and the other a Knight’s sword; while looking at the drunken state of the two, anger surged up within him, and for a moment, it caused him to forget about his empty stomach and parched throat—

???: “Hey motherfuckers, these perilous days of the Empire aren’t the time for you to be getting fucking shitfaced drunk, FUCKING HELL!!”

With that, the Master of Curse Tools, Groovy Gumlet, exclaimed in a terribly straightforward manner.

Chapter 21:
A Destiny Unavoidable

1

A thick air of liquor and an earthy scent hung over the tavern.

Heaped up near the entrance were emptied alcohol bottles and barrels, as well as a wreckage of earth puppets, which likely once were in the form of people.

All of that had been heaped up by these two middle-aged men, grumbling over booze inside the bar—

???: “Oh? This gentleman, got a slight feeling that I’ve seen him somewhere before… Whatd’ya think, redhead?! Recognize this Furball Gentleman over here?!”

Groovy: “Who’re you calling a fucking furball?! Don’t fucking fuck around! I’ve been doing nothing but running without drinking or eating anything, SO I’M FUCKING EXHAUSTED…!”

As the man with a ruddy face grinned in good humor, giving his knees a good slap, Groovy flared up at him.

For some reason, the middle-aged man, blue-hair tied behind his head, began to laugh with increasing amusement and an “That’s inevitable, inevitable!” after hearing Groovy’s complaint.

It seemed like he was in a completely drunken state.

Since the blue one was out of the question, Groovy looked towards the other, towards the red-haired middle-aged man. He was sat quietly in his chair, glaring at the bottle in his hand.

Groovy: “Oi! You over there, fucking redhead! Are you the same type as this fucking blue-haired motherfucker?!”

Redhead: “…”

Groovy: “Don’t ignore me! Stop fucking keeping silent, and look over…”

Redhead: “—Shut the fuck up.”

Here; Before Groovy could finish his sentence, a flash of silver surged toward him in retaliation.

While still seated in his chair, he unleashed a horizontal slash aiming for Groovy’s neck. Something similar had happened when he had first barged into the tavern, but this was precise swordsmanship that sought to strike the opponent’s vitals.

If the opponent had not been Groovy, it might have been a fatal attack, but.

Groovy: “Who do you think you’re picking a fucking fight with, ASSHOLE!!”

Evading in a way such that the sword attack only skimmed the tip of his nose, Groovy took a step, and closed the distance in an single instant as his fist howled; equipped with a gauntlet, it slammed into the side of the red-haired middle-aged man’s torso, the resultant shock wave launching him into the wall.

Coughing out a “Kahh” with cries of pain, the red one’s body spun around as it flew. The man crashed into the wall without taking any measures to defend himself, and as Groovy gave that a sidelong glance, he caught the bottle of booze out of the air as it flipped around vertically.

The alcohol that the red one had been drinking, Groovy poured it down his throat with tremendous vigor.

Groovy: “Kuah!! That fucking burns…! I’d prefer water and some fucking food, but…”

Blue-Haired Man: “—Bravo, bravo! My my, yer skills sure are nothing to scoff at, Mister Furball. The redhead shoulda also been considerably strong, I’m amazed that ya dealt with him so easily!”

Groovy: “Hahh?”

Glancing back towards the red-haired man who was upside down against the wall, the blue one went down onto his knees, and offered up his katana as if to say he had already been beaten.

Sitting on his knees and with his face flushed red, the blue-haired man praised Groovy's strength, and while displaying that he had no intention of fighting back, he deeply bowed his head.

Blue-Haired Man: "We've caused ya a terrible inconvenience, Mister Furball! We fellas are just wanderers, and we ended up aimlessly stopping by this settlement. However, by the time we stumbled here to this village, it was already like this; all the villagers were gone, and it was occupied by a group of those there earth lumps."

Groovy: "…So, you're tryna say that you fucking dumbasses had no choice but to drink up all the booze that the dead left behind?"

Blue-Haired Man: "Deary me, it's a bit embarrassing but you're exactly right! We were bored, so we ended up betting on whether the next earth lump that came through the door would be a man or a woman."

Smiling like a fool, the blue-haired man divulged the particulars of a bet that would make one forget that this was a time of emergency.

Those particulars were nonsensical, but Groovy could not tell if they were gambling with the alcohol that did not really belong to them, or if it was with their own lives on the line. Wherever these men lived or died was all up to their own whimsy.

However—

Groovy: "—I really don't fucking like this."

Blue-Haired Man: "Heh, whatd'ya mean?"

Groovy: "Bastard, you got the nerve to get on your knees and offer up your katana, acting like you got no fucking intention of fighting, but my nose can't be fucking fooled… Don't fucking stare at me with that murderous intent, fucking hell."

Blue-Haired Man: "…"

Sniff; Groovy snorted his nose and glared at the blue-haired man, to which he responded with a troubled expression, scratching his cheek with an “Ehh”. But, the fact that he did not voice words of denial, rather than him being unable to find the right words immediately, it was likely because he understood that a sloppy excuse would incur Groovy’s wrath.

This blue middle-aged man, ever since the red one was beaten, had been constantly hiding an intent to kill Groovy behind his words and attitude.

Having barged into this place after being chased by the earth puppets, instead of getting to rest, he had gotten entwined with a troublesome opponent—And, just when he thought that, Groovy realized.

Groovy: “…Bastard, I remember your fucking scent.”

The stench he had smelled somewhere before, Groovy recalled it as all the hairs on his body stood on end.

He would not say that he could remember every scent he had ever smelled, but distinctive smells were difficult to forget. Faced with that scent diluted by a murderous intent, when he tried to recall his opponent’s identity—

Groovy: “—Hey asshole, are you that fucking Cecilus’s fucking shitty dad?”

Voicing the memory that came to mind, Groovy glared at his opponent.

Under that sharp gaze of Groovy’s, the blue-haired man made an loathsome expression, and,

Blue-Haired Man: “Yikes, looks like ya remembered me.”

Groovy: “FUCKING HELL! You have the fucking nerve to try and kill me because you didn’t want that leaked?! STOP FUCKING JOKING AROUND! To begin with, why the fuck are you even alive?! Didn’t Cecilus kill you?!”

Blue-Haired Man: “Even if ya ask me why, I can only answer that I’m alive ‘cause I’m alive. That said, if it came to light that I survived, it’d be awfully inconvenient for me.”

Loosely shaking his head from side to side, the blue middle-aged man answered shamelessly—He was the father of Cecilus Segmunt, First of the Nine Divine Generals.

In the past, he frequently visited the Crystal Palace together with Cecilus, so he was someone who Groovy had passed by many times. However, a few years ago he committed an act of blasphemy in the Imperial Palace, and was cut down by none other than his own son, Cecilus; he should have been considered dead.

Blue-Haired Man: “They got wanted posters for me everywhere, musta been a slip o’ yer memory if ya thought I’d died.”

Groovy: “I just thought that that Cecilus fucker wouldn’t fuck it up. That asshole’s sword skills are the only fucking reliable thing about him; if he still fucked it up, then he’s nothing but a fucking piece of shit. There’s no fucking way he took discretion just because it was his fucking parent.”

Blue-Haired Man: “—That ain’t it. That guy’s swordsmanship’d never be dulled by the likes of familial bonds.”

Groovy: “…”

Witnessing that firm declaration, Groovy withdrew the words that he was going to bite back with.

He did not know much about the parent-child relationship between this blue-haired man and Cecilus. But, this was the father who raised Cecilus to become that Cecilus. It was not difficult to imagine that he was also a good-for-nothing monster.

If Cecilus’s skills had not dulled when cutting down his father, then that also probably stood to reason.

However—

Groovy: “Fuck…”

After being chased and chased, constantly running away, even though he had finally just managed to come across living people, they were a pair of drunkards—Furthermore, one of them was a wanted criminal, and the other was prone to drunken violence.

He cursed his poor luck, and began wanting to wallow in his despair.

Redhead: “Ugh, guhh…”

Blue-Haired Man: “Oh, ya also let the redhead live. You’re a kind one, Mister Furball.”

Groovy: “…I didn’t really take it easy on him or anything. That fucking redhead is just fucking sturdy.”

The violent red-haired man, now upside down against the wall, had endured a strike from Groovy that had been intended to make the insides of his body all mushy, and was nearly drowning in the vomit overflowing from his mouth.

Even in his battered state, Groovy would be able beat down this blue and red duo of middle-aged men, but—

Blue-Haired Man: “…Quite the racket outside, ain’t it?”

Just as the blue-haired man said, an aroma of loathsome earth had entered the settlement.

Having chased down Groovy, it seemed like quite a large number of them had surrounded the hidden village. Sensing with his nose that the encirclement was gradually closing in on them, Groovy anguished.

He would beat these two middle-aged men to death, and fight as hard as possible to break through the besiegement; then, he would find someone better than these two drunkards, and make the time to fill his belly with food and water.

That ideal, could it realistically be achieved? If not that—

Groovy: “…You fucking bastard, let’s make a deal.”

Blue-Haired Man: “Respectfully listening.”

Still seated on his knees, the blue-haired man humbly placed his katana by his side.

Until just before, this guy had been trying to kill Groovy with the exact same posture and attitude, to the extent that he wanted to call him a barefaced liar, and yet, the scent of murderous intent had now subsided.

While feeling irritation at that, Groovy spoke.

Groovy: “No matter what it takes, I gotta get back to where His Excellency and the others are. Even if that means I gotta use you fucking dumbasses to get there. That’s why…”

Blue-Haired Man: “…”

Groovy: “I’ll use my power as General First-Class to get you off the wanted list. In return, you’ll cooperate and help me get back to the Imperial Capital.”

For Groovy, this was a desperate last resort.

If he were in perfect condition, he would have never thought to rely on such men. But, if he remained stubborn and collapsed, just who would that benefit?

Groovy: “That would be the fucking piece of shit who constructed this whole fucking incomprehensible situation.”

Honestly, he felt like there was lots going on in the shadows behind the civil war shaking the Vollachian Empire.

Keeping vigilance over the west side was indeed a believable reason for why he had been sent far away from the Imperial Capital, but in that case too, he slightly suspected that Vincent had had other motives.

The reason he obediently followed that was because he had thought it was fine to believe in Vincent’s judgment.

Thus, in order to hear the answer of what he had believed in, Groovy had no choice but to go back.

Therefore—

Groovy: “DO YOU ACCEPT THE DEAL OR NOT, HURRY UP AND DECIDE, YOU FUCKING ASSHOLE!”

Groovy bared his fangs and howled, opposite him, the blue middle-aged man closed a single eye in deliberation.

Before the man, whose mind was difficult to read, could voice his answer, there was a loud crash behind Groovy; the tavern’s door had been destroyed from the outside.

Maintaining the vigor from breaking down the door, the pale earth puppets burst inside. Right before their hands could reach Groovy’s small back—A sword flashed.

With a slash from the unsheathed katana, the heads of the earth puppets were parted from their torsos, and turned into clods of earth.

The one to perform those actions, the blue-haired man, returned his katana to its sheath in a natural motion, and stood up. Then, the man, his face ruddy, stroking the stubble on his chin with his empty hand,

Blue-Haired Man: “In addition to erasing me from the wanted list, how much am I getting paid?”

Groovy: “You sure are a fucking piece of shit through and through, fucking bastard…”

Taking that shameless question as an answer, Groovy took a long, deep breath. Then, it seemed like his vision spun around, and,

Groovy: “Fuck.”

Indeed, his physical strength had reached its unavoidable limit, and overwhelmed, Groovy’s consciousness sank to a dark riverbed.

Blue-Haired Man: “Goodness gracious, to think he’d doze off and delay sorting out the finer details for later, this Furball Gentleman is quite the pleasant character.”

Having languidly tumbled down on the spot, the small beastman began heartily snoring.

One of the apexes of the Vollachian Empire’s military strength, Groovy Gumlet of the Nine Divine Generals; looking down on him, Rowan Segmunt, his face red from drinking, tilted his head in contemplation.

The terms that had just been presented, Groovy did not seem like the kind of person to go against his word.

Upon consideration, these terms were sufficient. Of course, he also considered continuing to run away; he could stab the sleeping Groovy in the heart here, but then he would merely proceed with his life on the run.

Rowan: “If I did such a thing, just who in the world would it benefit? Plus, it’d be more proactive of me if I took this as luck being on my side. —At long last, the curtain rises on the third act of my life!”

As he took firm steps upon the ground, Rowan worried about the slight cramp in his left leg; however, he then chuckled to himself, realizing that there was no longer any need to act reactively.

Nevertheless, the top priority right now was to get out of this place alive, so as he sensed the presence of the earth lumps gathering outside the bar, he heaved Groovy up.

Then, he stepped towards his companion who was upside down against the wall—Heinkel, and gave him a good kick.

Rowan: “Hey, redhead, wakey wakey! The situation’s changed!”

Heinkel: “Uh, hah…?”

Rowan: “I’d have trouble sleeping if I just left ya here! Redhead, if yer life has come to a dead end, then yer best bet is to turn the tables by taking up the sword and fighting alongside me here!”

Rowan spoke in an intensely loud voice, and Heinkel reluctantly opened his eyes up wide.

Through his upside down vision, he looked at Rowan, and at Groovy upon the former’s shoulder; he slightly swung his legs and flipped himself back upright, then immediately began to stagger due to the dizziness,

Heinkel: “What the…? I feel like shit…”

Rowan: “Rather, to give such an answer after taking a hit from a General First-Class is nothing short of a big shot. Come on now, we just about drank up all the booze here, so it’s a good time to start drifting over to the next place.”

Heinkel: “…What about that beastman? We eating him?”

Rowan: “Maybe if we’re ever really pressed for food, but for now we ain’t intending on doing that. Well then…”

Using his sleeve to wipe the vomited booze off Heinkel’s mouth, Rowan gave him a hearty clap to the back. Then, adjusting Groovy’s body on his shoulder once more, he turned around.

All at once, the lumps of earth surged into the tavern. Facing them, Rowan used a single hand to tear his katana out of its sheath, and as he wore a large grin on his face,

Rowan: “Stay alive and wait, prodigal son of mine. —You’ve still some way to go, before ya reach the Heavenly Sword.”

2

—To overturn the peril of the Great Disaster, two lights there were.

That was the prophecy brought forth by the Stargazer Ubilk, shackled in chains—No, as he would put it, it was the commandment.

This statement from the Stargazer, a being treasured in the Vollachian Empire and reputed to have accurately predicted numerous events, struck Subaru with a profound impact.

Frankly, Subaru did not have much faith in prophecies or premonitions.

He considered such things as a sort of fraud through the employment of various psychological techniques. Of course, he recognized that in this different world, phenomena unconstrained by common sense could very well occur.

After all, depending on how one saw it, the results that Subaru's Return by Death brought about could be regarded as a way to avoid the worst possible future through foresight.

If possible, he would have been more grateful to know the future without having to die.

Regardless—

Subaru: "…A girl, unable to communicate with words."

To rephrase and say that Subaru was not the Stargazer, going to such lengths just to transmit accurate information.

The implication brought to mind an individual, and Subaru caught his breath.

However, before Subaru could inquire about the true intent, Abel, standing beside him, turned a cold gaze towards Ubilk,

Vincent: "One of the lights you spoke of, if it is Groovy Gumlet, he is dead."

Ubilk: "Eh?"

Ubilk's eyes widened and his mouth gaped open at the outright declaration.

That was to be expected. If someone were told the subject of their grand announcement was dead, anyone would have such a reaction. In fact, Subaru was also taken aback by Abel's claim.

Ignoring Subaru and the others' surprise, Abel, his arms folded, shrugged his shoulders lightly,

Vincent: "Out of a mouth that pompously declared that the stars are on my side, came that? It is rather a letdown, to say the least."

Subaru: "Hold on, hold on, hold on! Don't just speak as if it's true! It's still unconfirmed!"

Vincent: "Fool. With no signs of him converging, he is as good as dead."

Subaru: "Don't lump "as good as dead" with "he is dead"! You overthink the worst-case scenarios so much that you kill people off in your mind!"

Subaru snapped back vigorously at Abel's words, which seemed to be needlessly stirring up Ubilk. There was no particular reason to deceive Ubilk right here and now, so this was a well-deserved retort.

In response to Subaru and Abel's exchange, Ubilk released a conspicuously relieved sigh,

Ubilk: "I-I received no indicaaation~ if he was alive or not. So, wouldn't it be fine to assume General First-Class Groovy haaasn't~ died?"

Vincent: "We have long lost contact and there is no movement from the army he was supposed to be leading in the west. If his whereabouts are unknown, it would be more constructive to speak as if he is dead."

Subaru: "Constructive in building what? A graveyard?"

Possibly taking Subaru's words as teasing, a hint of severity entered Abel's gaze. However, since there was no reason to back down from his stance, Subaru stuck out his tongue in response and turned to Ubilk.

His trust in the Stargazer, it remained shaky at best.

Subaru: “At the point when the stars spoke to you, Ubilk-san, was this Groovy person definitely alive? It would make convincing this guy easier if he was.”

Ubilk: “I’m sooorry~ to say, all I received from the stars were the essentials of those who could resist the Great Disaster. I’m not privy to whether these individuals are aliiive~ or not.”

Vincent: “So Groovy Gumlet, having died, holds a countermeasure against the Great Disaster?”

The issue of life or death was getting tiresome, and Subaru gave up on correcting it further. However, Abel’s offhand remark held significant implications for the future.

If one assumed Ubilk’s prophecy was believable, then whatever unique thing Groovy alone possessed would be a necessary component to stop this disaster.

In addition to that—

Subaru: “—Louis.”

If one of the two lights Ubilk spoke of referred to Groovy Gumlet, a General First-Class of the Empire, then the other pointed to her.

The girl who was transported to the Vollachian Empire alongside Subaru and Rem. She who had overcome countless hardships with them, joined them in these coupled dragon carriages, and was one of the most troublesome characters, even in this world; Ubilk stated that she was necessary to repel the disaster.

Louis and Groovy, there should have been something common between these two that was effective in defeating the enemy.

Vincent: “Groovy Gumlet is known as the Master of Curse Tools, he is familiar with magic and Curse Arts, possessing the skill to create equipment incorporating these techniques.”

Perhaps he had followed the same line of thought as Subaru.

What Abel revealed was a unique skill that Groovy possessed. One that could not be replicated by others, which likely contributed to his selection as one of the lights.

Subaru: “So, as one of the Generals of the First Class, he must be pretty strong himself, right?”

Vincent: “There is no doubt that he is sufficiently competent. Even amongst beastpeople, his senses were exceedingly sharp, especially in his sense of smell; none across all the Empire could rival him. But, based on the conditions stated by this damn Stargazer, his skills as a warrior are not what requires attention.”

Subaru: “I know… Magic and Curse Arts, huh?”

In regards to magic, Beatrice and Roswaal had already shown promising results.

They had discovered that the Corebugs, lurking within the undead, were undoubtedly at the center of the mechanism that birthed the undead.

However, neither Beatrice nor Roswaal were included in the two lights Ubilk had mentioned.

In essence, the emphasis should not have been on exceptional magic users, but rather—

Subaru & Vincent: “—Curse Arts.”

Subaru and Abel spoke simultaneously, their black eyes exchanging glances.

The fact that not only he, but also Abel, had come to the same conclusion strengthened Subaru’s conviction. Almost certainly, Groovy had been chosen as a countermeasure against the undead due to his knowledge of Curse Arts.

On top of the magical approach, the addition of a Curse Arts-based approach could lead to some sort of effective measures to use against those undead.

Vincent: “Excluding Groovy Gumlet, the only one with knowledge of Curse Arts is Olbart Dunkelkenn. It is urgent that we gather all those with such insight. What about your side?"

Subaru: "As for us, Beako has a bit of knowledge, and I myself am still cursed. I wonder whether Roswaal or Nee-sama is more knowledgeable…"

Vincent: "—. Disregarding that one part, it is necessary that we have them speak from their knowledge."

In the past, when he had been bitten and cursed by a pack of Ulgarm Witchbeasts, Subaru had been told that the aftereffects were still nested within his body.

Fortunately, since it did not interfere with his daily life, he had left it alone; though, since the curse was like having an unidentifiable wart on his body, it would be a lie if he said it did not worry him.

In any case, as Abel suggested, it was necessary for them to gather all those who had knowledge about curses, to arrive at the insights that the leading expert, Groovy, would have provided them with.

As Subaru considered this, Abel quietly added, "On top of that,"

Vincent: "—Do you possess an answer as to what kind of advantage that girl's existence will bring to the Empire?"

Naturally, the conversation spread to Louis, and Abel's inquiry was thrust unto Subaru.

Subaru: "…"

Closing his mouth, Subaru kept Abel waiting for a beat before giving an answer to that question.

However, a beat soon turned into two, then three, and still he could not arrive at a clear answer.

What he was being asked was clear, and it was equally clear without any doubt that Subaru himself did not have an answer.

Vincent: "Back when we shared that appa, I had told you. —That what I had intended to say was not that we ought to execute someone whose apparent identity was that of a Sin Archbishop on the spot.”

As if in lieu of the silent Subaru, Abel pushed further on the topic of Louis.

At the end of their disgraceful brawl, Subaru and Abel had divided the appa and ate it together, and during that exchange, they had also mentioned Louis.

Back then, Abel had indeed then said that he would not punish Louis due to her identity, but—

Vincent: “Even now, those thoughts remain unchanged. —For it is not I who ought to decide what that girl shall be defined as, but you.”

Subaru: “…I, ought to define Louis?”

Vincent: “The one deeply involved with that girl’s conduct is not me, but you. Even should that girl entrust her fate to another, it would not be me, but you who is desired.”

Beside Subaru as he felt a thirst in his throat, Abel stated thus matter-of-factly, and returning his gaze from Subaru back to Ubilk,

Vincent: “There is no mistake in what you have heard from the stars? That in order to oppose the Great Disaster, the existence of the girl whom this one brought along is considered a key?”

Ubilk: “—. Yes, my story hasn’t chaaanged~. Just like for General First-Class Groovy, I don’t knooow~ what the stars have acknowledged in that child.”

The chains jingling as he shrugged, Ubilk replanted the seed of the unchanged dilemma.

He was yet unaware of how it would sprout, what buds it would form, and what flowers it would bloom. Even if he was unaware, Subaru had fully understood that he could not merely continue to carry the seeds with him, neither allowing the flowers to bloom nor wither.

Then, as Subaru worried himself over that reality, the Emperor, who would never conduct himself to try and understand the pain of others, proceeded to tell Subaru without a shred of mercy.

Vincent: “Arrive at a conclusion swiftly. Though, that is only if the taste of that appa, and all of your big talk, were not falsehoods.”

3

Emilia: “—Subaru, did you get to hear what you wanted?”

Upon exiting the cabin where Ubilk was being held captive, he was greeted by an anxiously awaiting Emilia.

The existence of the Stargazers was pretty much considered confidential information in the Vollachian Empire, so people from the Kingdom, with the exception of Subaru, were not allowed to be present in the room.

Subaru was already acquainted with Ubilk, and it seemed that Abel had made the judgment that he ought to be allowed to hear what the Stargazer had to say.

Subaru: “If you’re asking if I heard it, then I did, and if you’re asking if I didn’t hear it, then I didn’t…”

Beatrice: “…That answer completely avoids the point, in fact. Are you saying it was just a waste of time, I suppose?”

Subaru: “No, I don’t think so.”

Beatrice had trotted across to Subaru, whose enunciation had unconsciously gotten worse, and had taken hold of his hand, furrowing her brows.

However, neither Beatrice nor Emilia, nor Otto nor Garfiel, who also happened to be present, wanted to rush Subaru’s answer.

With a vague feeling that their consideration was different from that of the Imperial people, he ended up wanting to indulge in the warmth of their kindness that he had so dearly missed.

But—

Subaru: "—That's a no go."

It was not something that he could keep turning his face away from forever.

Outweighing his dishonesty, the situation had reached a point of urgency. Above all, at the time when he was separated from those who would forgive his avoidance, it would not be Subaru who would suffer the most.

Therefore—

Subaru: "Everyone, though it's also for the sake of the Empire, there's something I want to have a serious discussion about."

Emilia: "Something you want to discuss with, everyone?"

Subaru: "Yeah."

As Emilia asked in return, Subaru nodded and took a deep breath.

For everyone here, and even for those who were valuable to Subaru but not present here, it was a subject that they absolutely could not avoid, that they must not avoid.

And that was—

Subaru: "—About the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, Louis Arneb; let's have a proper discussion."

Chapter 22:
Want To Believe. Will Not Forgive.

1

???: “—Village Chief-kun, may I have a moment?”

As a voice called out to him from behind, Vincent Vollachia halted his step.

Before he even turned around, he knew who the owner of that voice was. Once he heard a voice, or laid eyes upon a person, he would never forget them. This was no exception; he immediately grasped that this was the blond, blue-eyed peddler—Flop O’Connell.

Vincent: “Unfortunately, the survival of the Empire is currently in crisis. I have not the time for frivolous chatter with you.”

Though he had grasped it, Vincent would not engage any further than grasping it.

The oracle he had received a moment ago from the Stargazer, Ubilk, left him no choice but to discuss with Berstetz, Serena, and the rest of that lot regarding how they should handle it.

Groovy had been designated as a countermeasure against the enemy, but since there was a high chance he had lost his life, to formulate a plan that depended on him would be an act akin to the height of stupidity. On that point, putting his expectations in Natsuki Subaru, who was headed to persuade the other person who had been designated, was a foolish idea that was less objectionable.

In the first place, there was no chance that Vincent would be able to persuade that girl.

He would not even be able to come to a mutual understanding with her. Since the cards in Vincent’s hand could not be used on the young girl, it was logical to let Subaru deal with that side of the two lights.

Ergo, the only thing Vincent could do was continue scrutinizing the details for a realistic plan—

Flop: “Woah there, you can’t know whether it’s frivolous chatter or not unless you talk and find out! No matter how clever Village Chief-kun is, I doubt you’d be able to tell what seeds of conversation I have before you water them!”

Vincent: “You…”

Speaking those words, Flop grabbed Vincent’s shoulder as the latter tried to resume his walk, preventing him from moving forward. Naught could that be called but a reckless action, the very pinnacle of imprudence.

Under different circumstances, it would have been a barbaric act that caused Flop to be beheaded on the spot.

Vincent: “Release me at once. If not, wish your life goodbye.”

Flop: “Of course, I’d also like to start talking with you right away. But, I want a suitable amount of time to have a proper discussion about this matter. We can’t be rushing things.”

Vincent: “I did not tell you to speak, but to release your grip…”

???: “Now, now, don’t say that, Abel-chin. Instead, you should talk about what big bro wants to tell you.”

Vincent: “—Hk?!”

As he looked back with his head and scowled at Flop, who still had his hand placed on Vincent’s shoulder, a voice had called out from in front of him; simultaneously, another reckless act had been performed, that of two hands grabbing him by his sides and lifting him up.

Having held her breath, and now giving a cheerful broad smile, the one who had done that was Medium O’Connell—The sibling duo of Flop and Medium, had pincered Vincent with smiles from both front and rear.

Medium: “Abel-chin, you’ve been disregarding big bro this whole time, right? Big bro is so injured and worn-out that he always needs to lie down for even just a second longer, so don’t be mean and just listen to what he has to say~.”

Vincent: “Speak not of foolish things. To begin with, how long shall you continue to contact me with such a familiar attitude? Should the situation change, so shall individual positions. Things are no longer the same as they were in the Shudraqian Village and the Fortress City.”

Medium: “Well, Abel-chin may be acting like the Emperor, but I think it’s mistaken of you to make light of us! Big bro!”

Flop: “Got it, dear sister!”

The unreasonable sibling pair, did not lend their ears to Vincent’s words.

At the high-spirited call of his younger sister, Flop, responding in a similarly energetic manner, promptly opened the door to the adjacent passenger cabin; Medium then carried Vincent inside, and the door was closed.

After quickly confining the Emperor in a locked room, Medium finally released Vincent.

Vincent: “You two, are you aware that this is an act so barbaric that not only you, but all members of your household will be punished for?”

Flop: “Hahahaha, unfortunately for you, Village Chief-kun, our family purely consists of us two siblings. So, your objection isn’t really much of a threat.”

Medium: “Ah, but, big bro, what about everyone from the orphanage? Even if we aren’t related by blood, everyone who escaped is our family!”

Flop: “Hahahaha, now that you mention it! Village Chief-kun, please find it within yourself to forgive us!”

Vincent: "—Set me free immediately, and behave."

No matter the situation, the conduct of the O'Connell siblings seemed invariant.

Medium had been shrunken and stretched, and Flop seemed to have been injured, but seeing the both of them like this was causing him to grow suspicious.

If one had their body shrunken and stretched, it would typically be a heavy burden on their mind, but Medium was far too lacking in awareness that her body had shrunk and then stretched back again.

He had heard that Flop had also suffered a grievous wound that brought him to the verge of death, but he too was full of life. —No, his neck had a visible complexion, but it seemed he was concealing the color in his face using make-up.

Flop: "After all, it's quite important for merchants to put on an act."

Vincent: "…"

Flop: "But, although it's always been an ironclad rule of trade to barter for what you want, I'm unable to meet Village Chief-kun's current demands. I don't wanna put this off any longer."

Vincent: "What are you saying…"

Flop: "I've been entrusted with a message. —A message from the person who, in your place, had acted as Emperor."

Having expected him to start speaking more nonsense, Vincent's eyes slightly widened.

Going out of their way to confine the Emperor in an empty cabin, the O'Connell siblings were attempting to report something to Vincent. —In this world, there was only one person who had held that position.

That was why—

Flop: "You ought to hear his words, Village Chief-kun. —No, Your Excellency the Emperor, Vincent Vollachia.”

Thus, when Flop displayed a serious expression for the first time, Vincent had chosen not to interrupt him with words.

2

—The Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, Louis Arneb.

When he spoke those words aloud, Subaru had heard a grating sound reverberate within his heart. While it was always within arms reach, he had always hesitated to take the lid off of that box of taboos. It was a Pandora’s box that could be opened at any time, so long as he was willing to do so.

Subaru: “…”

Deciding this was not a conversation suitable for a corridor, they had relocated, moving to a spacious passenger cabin.

Abel’s thoughtful allowance for them to use this cabin if necessary was a rare display of consideration for the feelings of others. —Though, since the resolution of this matter was of critical importance to the Empire, it might have been natural for him to give that thoughtful allowance.

Gathered in the cabin were Emilia, Beatrice, Otto, Garfiel, and Roswaal of the Emilia Camp, and in addition—

Anastasia: “The Sin Archbishop of Gluttony… Really, it’s a connection that seems to pop up indiscriminately.”

Elegantly touching her cheek, Anastasia quietly murmured so, and Julius was maintaining a solemn silence by her side. The participation of these two was also essential.

That was not merely because they had traveled a great distance to cross the border to assist Subaru and his friends, but because they too had suffered from the damage caused by Gluttony.

Subaru: “The person at the crux of the matter, Louis, she’s currently with Rem and some others. I think everyone except Anastasia-san and Julius should already know about Louis, but…”

Beatrice: “Of course, in fact… Frankly, it was an outrageous surprise at first, I suppose.”

Subaru: “That… was the case for me too.”

Beatrice’s wording of “surprise” was likely a generous understatement.

In fact, when Subaru had first realized that he had been transported with Louis, his sole intention had been to protect Rem, which caused him to adopt a rather aggressive stance. At first, this led to Rem being quite wary of him, perceiving him as someone who could not be trusted.

Subaru did not know under what circumstances Emilia and the others had met Louis, but it was not difficult to imagine that their initial contact would have been fraught with tension.

With that in mind, he wanted to express his gratitude that no one had resorted to extreme measures.

Subaru: “You all did well to hold yourselves back. I’m sure Otto and Garfiel were ready to erupt at any moment.”

Otto: “Indeed, Garfiel and I were of the opinion that we should either eliminate or restrain her. The fact that she was not subjected to either was due to Emilia-sama persuading everyone else.”

Subaru: “Emilia-tan did that…”

As one might expect, it seemed that Otto was at the forefront of the radical faction, but his views had apparently been tempered by Emilia, who was of the moderate faction.

As Subaru and the others turned their gazes to her, she gave a short nod, saying “Yes,”

Emilia: “Medium-chan was defending that child… Louis, with all her might. Considering how much those around her cherished her, I was scared of trying to decide anything and everything on the spot."

Subaru: "I see, Medium-san did that…"

Hearing that Medium had defended Louis, Subaru felt a faint sense of relief.

Originally, Louis had grown quite attached to the cheerful and caring Medium. Still, the last time Subaru had witnessed that between the two was back in the Demon City of Chaosflame, when Medium had been afraid of Louis after her identity as a Sin Archbishop had been revealed.

If Medium had still defended Louis after that, there must have been some shift in her feelings that had taken place somewhere unbeknownst to Subaru. That made him happy.

Emilia: "That's something I've also experienced. Having people say that I'm reaaally scary, that I seem like a Witch to everyone, and nobody around me would want to talk to me. So…"

Otto: "For Emilia-sama's case, it is due to irrational prejudice against half-elves. However, with this girl, there is a difference. A clear distinction, resulting from none other than her own actions."

Emilia: "Otto-kun…"

As Emilia explained why she stood by Louis in addition to Medium's protection, Otto bluntly offered his stern comment. He did not hesitate to clarify his position as an ally of Emilia and, simultaneously, an adversary of Louis.

Indeed, their journey together so far had been nothing more than a deferment until the final conclusion.

Roswaal: "May I have a word?"

Into the tense atmosphere created by Otto's declaration, Roswaal raised his hand casually.

As Subaru's glance urged him to speak, Roswaal closed his blue eye, and, Roswaal: “Ram, Anastasia-sama, and I joined later, after aaall~. We really don’t know how that girl, Louis, behaves… but, is there anything suspicious about her? Of course, Garfiel has been keeping his eyes, ears, and nose peeled on her, hasn’t he?”

Garfiel: “I wasn’t exactly peeled from head to toe like that. But, I gotta agree with Ottobro. That’s why, from the moment we met her till the big battle, I kept a close eye on her, but…”

Roswaal: “So, it turned out to be in vain. Theeen~, how can you definitively say that the girl is a dangerous Sin Archbishop?”

Otto: “Because of Beatrice-chan and I. We encountered a girl claiming to be Louis Arneb, the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, in Pristella. I had my leg gouged in then, and it is not something I will forget.”

Roswaal, representing those who had less interaction with Louis, made a statement to which Garfiel and Otto expressed their respective views.

As Otto stroked his leg, it was a reminder of the injury that had caused him to be taken out of action for quite some time.

It made sense as to why Otto, in particular, was very cautious of Louis.

Julius: “My apologies for following the Margrave, but may I also speak?”

Once Roswaal’s question had been addressed, Julius quickly joined the conversation.

In this discussion about Gluttony, Julius, who had been making a difficult face from the beginning, glanced at an even more grim-looking Subaru out of the corner of his eye and said,

Julius: “First, I would like to confirm. Is it correct that the girl named Louis, who is currently riding in this dragon carriage, is indeed the same individual as Louis Arneb, the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony?”

Emilia: "—? What do you mean by that?"

Julius: "Emilia-sama and Lady Ram must be aware. In order to replicate the powers of those it devours, there were instances where Gluttony had changed its appearance to match that of its victim. In other words…"

Anastasia "So, yer suggestin' the possibility that the Louis we're talkin' 'bout 'n the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony might not be the same person, but one who was consumed by the other?"

At Julius's conjecture, Emilia and the others wore faces of surprise.

Indeed, considering the nature of Gluttony, it was not an improbable theory. If Gluttony could mimic the form of the person it consumed, it would make sense that the original, who was consumed, would still exist somewhere.

If this was true, then the existence of this Louis could be separated from that of Gluttony.

However—

Subaru: "…No, that's not likely. Louis, I believe, is reproducing the abilities of those she has devoured. It must be due to the Authority of Gluttony."

Julius: "I see. My apologies for such misleading speculation."

Julius closed his eyes and apologized as Subaru shook his head.

It was no fault of Julius. If his hypothesis were correct, Subaru would not be as troubled as he was right now. But, they could not resort to makeshift solutions created by tiptoeing around the issue.

What they needed was not just an answer, but an answer derived from a shared understanding of the truth.

Louis had been transported alongside Subaru to the Vollachian Empire; and yet, despite being treated so harshly by Subaru, she pushed herself time and again to help him, suffered injuries, and even put her life at risk.

It was her, Louis Arneb, the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, who was the same person as the Louis that they all knew. To get everyone to acknowledge that she was an essential presence for the upcoming battle…

Subaru: "—. First, let me explain what happened with me and Louis in the Empire after I was sent here with Rem, before any of you came across Louis."

???: "…"

Silently, everyone directed their gazes towards him.

Under the scrutiny of his trusted comrades, Subaru unmistakably felt a sense of suffocation. It was as if a grading of exams or a verification of answers was about to begin.

It was a verification of whether Louis could truly be accepted by his comrades for who she was.

Emilia: "Subaru, there's no need to rush."

Emilia gently reassured Subaru, who was bracing himself for what was to come. Beatrice, by his side, gave his hand a gentle squeeze with a nod of affirmation.

Comforted by their consideration, Subaru took a deep breath and began to speak.

Subaru: "The very first thing we noticed was that we were next to a large forest far to the east—"

3

He had intended to speak plainly, choosing his words to convey the facts as succinctly as possible.

Still, the things he had to talk about sprang forth like a gushing spring, making him acutely aware that the days he had to recount were filled with significant moments, despite the brevity of the time in question.

To begin with, a tremendous amount of trouble had occurred in just a short period.

All of it comprised accidents that endangered the lives of Subaru, Rem, and their companions, and, naturally, Louis was inevitably involved in these.

Naturally. —Yes, it was indeed natural.

After all, Louis had been with Subaru and the others the entire time, enduring Subaru's hostility while receiving kindness from Rem, and she persevered without being discouraged by the harsh treatment from Subaru.

So—

Subaru: "—Louis and I, collaborating with Yorna-san, managed to win our bet against Olbart-san. It was with a bit of cheating, though, as we changed the rules from hide-and-seek, to a game of tag."

???: "…"

Subaru: "After that, something unimaginable happened at Chaosflame, as you may have heard. The people living there miraculously survived and we were able to join up with Abel and his rebels. I lost consciousness there and got separated… You guys probably know more about what happened with Louis after that, right?"

Emilia: "—. Yes. We met Abel and the others when they came back to the destroyed Guaral, which happened right after."

As Emilia nodded in confirmation of Subaru's statement, he finished his explanation and took a long breath.

Even though Subaru had intended not to take up too much time, in the end, the story lasted nearly an hour. He was grateful that during that time, his companions mostly refrained from interrupting and listened intently.

Inevitably, Subaru had to tell the story from his own perspective, but he tried to be as detached as possible in narrating the events.

With that in mind—

Subaru: “As I’ve told you, there wasn’t any suspicious behavior from Louis while she was with me. I believe you can hear the same story from Rem.”

Otto: “We are not really doubting that. If we truly thought her suspicious, there is no way Ram-san would have allowed her to stay near Rem-san.”

When it came to her family, and especially Rem, there was no need to mention the intensity of Ram’s scrutiny.

In fact, the primary reason she overwhelmed Gluttony’s Ley Batenkaitos at the Pleiades Watchtower was her profound objection to any interference with her relationship between Rem and herself.

Ram, who could go to such lengths for a sister she did not remember.

If she felt even the slightest hint of danger from Louis, it would have been unthinkable for her to leave Louis near Rem, who had just awakened.

Anastasia: “…We’ve roughly grasped how tough it was for ya, Natsuki-kun.”

Anastasia, who had been silently listening until now, was massaging her brow with a finger, acknowledging the harshness of Subaru’s journey.

Even for a woman as wise as she, the sequence of events presented a volume of information that took time and effort to fully digest. Having somehow swallowed it all down, Anastasia removed her finger from her forehead and,

Anastasia: “I’m curious ‘bout what happened to ya, Natsuki-kun, after ya lost consciousness in the Demon City, but since that ain’t the main subject, let’s put it aside.”

Subaru: “Yeah, right now, what’s important is Louis. As I’ve said, Louis hasn’t shown her dangerous side to us so far. And there’s the prophecy of Ubilk, the Stargazer… that’s a factor too. So, in the upcoming battle, having Louis cooperate with us—”

Anastasia: “—The question’s ‘bout yer story, where’s the point of compromise that you’re gonna take?”

Just like that, her quiet interjection stopped Subaru’s train of thought.

Anastasia, having voiced her thoughts, gently traced her lips with the finger that had been massaging her brow. Her intellectually vibrant aqua eyes seized Subaru’s heart as she continued.

Anastasia: “I ain’t against yer idea of usin’ everythin’ at our disposal, Natsuki-kun. Even Meili-san, who helped us cross the Augria Sand Dunes, was originally an enemy. If we’re makin’ such distinctions, then the same applies to that girl.”

Subaru: “That’s, well, the same, right? Meili and Louis should be in the same position.”

Anastasia: “No, it ain’t the case. —I’m sure everyone but ya, Natsuki-kun, would think so.”

Subaru: “—Hk.”

Confronted with that calm assertion, Subaru looked around at the others in surprise.

Anastasia’s words echoed in Subaru’s mind as he scanned everyone’s faces, hoping that someone would disagree.

However, not one of them met his expectations.

Subaru: “Everyone… Hk.”

Otto: “Since no one seems to be willing to say it, I will.”

Among the group, all wearing grave expressions, Otto raised his hand without changing his demeanor.

However, his unchanging demeanor did not denote a lack of emotional response, but was the mere reflection of his calmness, sustained since the start of the meeting.

Neither his gaze nor his voice were unconditionally supportive of Subaru.

Otto: “I agree with Anastasia-sama. The situation with her and Meili-chan is different. They are not in the same position.”

Subaru: “Otto!”

Otto: “I will take it upon myself to say what no one else seems to want to. —It is because she is a Sin Archbishop.”

Otto answered Subaru, whose voice had inadvertently risen, with a calm tone.

Anticipating Subaru’s question, Otto’s response was as fitting as it could possibly be for the reason why none present could side with Subaru.

Beatrice: “Subaru, Betty wants to stand by Subaru, in fact. If Subaru says that girl… Louis, is a girl without evil intentions now, Betty can believe that too, I suppose. But…”

Roswaal: “The fact is, Gluttony’s victims include us. Not to mention, considering that the damage is not easily apparent, I wonder what the extent of the potential victims is, riiight~.”

Julius: “Though there is no way to confirm it… The bitter regret of those who lost themselves, forgotten by others, and could not return while having anybody to turn to, I cannot imagine how they must feel.”

Following up on the concerned Beatrice, Roswaal and Julius expressed their genuine opinions, as a person heavily concerned with a victim, and as an actual victim of Gluttony’s authority respectively.

???: “…”

Roswaal and Julius were correct, those who knew they had been affected were comparatively better off.

There must have been many victims who could do nothing but be truly wrought in despair, having lost their Names and Memories, left without a place to return, unable to be saved.

And thus, the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, who had created numerous victims—

Emilia: “It’s not that everyone doesn’t believe it.”

Subaru: “Emilia…”

Emilia: “It’s not that… Rather, I think they won’t forgive her.”

Subaru’s explanation was not lacking, nor did his feelings not get through to them.

Emilia’s words, with her eyebrows furrowed, shattered his heart as she explained that the real problem was not there.

Knowing about Louis’s time with Subaru, and knowing what happened after his absence, Emilia and the others knew the “current” Louis was not a threat to them.

Having understood that, the issue at hand was the actions of the “past” Louis.

Anastasia: “—The things you’ve done ain’t ever gonna disappear.”

Subaru: “—Hk.”

Quietly, Anastasia murmured those words.

Once before, it was a despairing warning that had frozen Natsuki Subaru, crushing him to pieces.

The fact that those words were thrown at him only existed within himself. And once again, in a different turn of events, they were delivered from her mouth to Subaru’s ears.

Anastasia: "No matter how much Natsuki-kun tries to convince us that that child is harmless, it doesn't even up the harm she did. In reality, the victims remain victims… It ain't a superficial problem that can be brushed aside with pretenses for yer own benefit."

Subaru: "—Hk."

Anastasia: "First off, don't ya think that should come after gettin' back all the Names n' Memories that have been eaten so far? Even if ya try to proceed without them, wouldn't Natsuki-kun also be dissatisfied with that?"

Anastasia's sharp words sliced through the stiffened Subaru one after another.

All of their arguments were valid, but the one that caused the greatest pain was the final point—that they could not even stand on the very foundation for deciding Louis's fate, if they did not return the Memories and Names that had been taken.

That was the crucial premise leading to what Emilia had said, "They can't forgive her."

Roswaal: "Well, His Excellency the Emperor is aware of this prophecy Subaru-kun heard. Saying that we won't let this girl, Louis, cooperate in the battle is just not realistic, is iiit~?"

Garfiel: "Huh? Whaddya wanna say? Speak clearly."

Roswaal: "It's troubling to have your irritation taken out on me, but… no matter how our discussion ends, the plan to involve the girl won't change. The only thing left is how she will be treated afterwards."

Subaru: "Treated…?"

His heart grew impatient with Roswaal, who still continued with his roundabout way of talking after being told to speak clearly. In response to Subaru's earnest gaze, Roswaal shrugged his shoulders and spoke.

That was—

Roswaal: “It’s a matter of what we can tell her to make her cooperaaate~. For instance—we could promise her amnesty once we overcome this crisis threatening the Empire. And then, once everything’s done, the appropriate punishment for her crimes will be executed solemnly. This is the best way to handle it without any future problems.”

Garfiel: “—Hk, stop messin’ around!”

In response to Roswaal’s explanation of his wicked plan, Garfiel clicked his fangs and snapped at him. He glared fiercely at Roswaal, and,

Garfiel: “Even if the other guy’s a villain, we don’t have to stoop to the same level! Danglin’ some bait that doesn’t even exist just to get her to help, no way I’ll approve of that!”

Roswaal: “Oh, really? You know, I think Otto-kun was thinking the same thing…”

Garfiel: “Don’t lump yerself in with Ottobro!”

Otto: “—. The Margrave is speaking for the majority. Sin Archbishops should not be granted any amnesty. Or rather.”

There, Otto paused for a moment and gazed fixedly at Subaru.

As Subaru gulped under his gaze, he continued mercilessly.

Otto: “Is Natsuki-san trying to create a precedent where Sin Archbishops are forgiven?”

Subaru: “—Hk, I don’t intend on doing anything like that. In this world, there are villains who mustn’t be forgiven. The Sin Archbishops of the Witch Cult are definitely among them.”

Petelgeuse, Regulus, the brothers Roy and Ley, Sirius, Capella; every Sin Archbishop Subaru had encountered up until now were all invariably far beyond redemption.

They were beings who would not hesitate to sacrifice others to satisfy their own desires.

However—

Otto: "—Are you saying only Louis Arneb is different?"

Subaru: "That's, well…"

Otto's query attempted to lay bare the depths of Subaru's heart.

Sin Archbishops should not be forgiven. Not just Otto, but everyone drew this line in the sand, something Subaru could clearly understand.

Yet the insistence on putting Louis in a separate category, as Otto put it, was indeed strange.

Subaru: "…"

Under the scrutiny of everyone's gazes, Subaru once again questioned himself.

What did Subaru want to do with Louis? They harbored great hatred for each other in the Hall of Memories, and Subaru chose not to save her as she suffered from the aftermath of Return by Death. He did not think that choice was a mistake. Even if he were to be placed in that situation once more, he would most likely make the same decision.

However, at the same time, he knew the Louis who had shared hardships with him in the Vollachian Empire.

The fact that he had witnessed her risk her life to save him and die for it multiple times was certainly engraved in his soul.

Somewhere along the way, Subaru's vigilance had been melted away by Louis's earnestness—

Emilia: "How?"

Subaru: "…"

Suddenly, a hushed question was posed to Subaru just as he was deep in thought.

As he opened his closed eyelids, he found himself looking directly into Emilia's amethyst eyes. She narrowed her long-lashed eyes and repeated the same question once more.

That was—

Emilia: "How did Subaru come to think that way?"

Subaru: "How, you ask…"

Emilia: "You reaaally couldn't stand the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, could you, Subaru? You thought you couldn't forgive her. So, why now?"

Subaru: "That's because… didn't I already tell you? She… Louis, in this Empire with us…"

They had shared many hardships, and Louis had bravely tried to protect Subaru and Rem.

The events in the Empire had left their mark on Subaru, as much as or with even more intensity than the unforgivable enemy she had been thought to be in the Hall of Memories. That was why.

That was why Natsuki Subaru's feelings towards Louis had changed.

Julius: "Subaru, let me once again convey a harsh truth to you."

Julius said this in a low voice to Subaru, who had answered Emilia's question falteringly.

The fact he prefaced his words as harsh made Subaru brace himself. As Subaru prepared himself for it, Julius traced the scar under his left eye with his finger and addressed him.

Julius: "Humanity in this world will not forgive the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, the girl known as Louis Arneb. Whether it be the Kingdom or the Empire, you can say it is the consensus of the world."

Subaru: "…"

Julius: “Even if she were to flee to any corner of the world, there is no place where she would be pardoned. Acts of crime will be met with punishment. And, a Sin Archbishop is a criminal whose sins can only be atoned for with their life.”

There was no falsehood in that preamble of the harsh truth.

Julius decisively pronounced it in a clear, strong tone, leaving no room for misunderstanding.

There was no place in this world where Louis Arneb could live and be forgiven.

At those heavy words, Subaru was left unable to respond.

However—

Julius: “I too, desire nothing but death for Sin Archbishops. Nothing but Death for the beings we consider enemies of the world. That is what I can say, with all my soul.”

Subaru: “…What?”

Otto: “Julius Juukulius!!”

The person who had raised their voice sharply, glaring at Julius, was Otto.

Subaru, unable to comprehend the meaning behind those added words, was left aside with widened eyes as Otto and Julius stared at each other piercingly.

Julius’s gaze was filled with pain, while Otto’s was bitter, their eyes wounding each other.

Otto: “For you, an outsider, to say that is outrageously selfish…!”

Julius: “I am sorry, but I would like to correct your perception on this matter. I am also one of the parties involved. I am in a position to voice my opinion, so allow me to exercise that right.”

Otto: “—Hk!”

Gritting his teeth, Otto's glare towards Julius grew sharper.

Despite knowing he was no match in terms of fighting strength, the intensity of his gaze did not even budge. Julius, too, closed one eye at that strength of Otto's will and let out a small sigh.

Subaru: "Nothing but Death, for the Sin Archbishops…"

Beside the back-and-forth between the two, Subaru muttered while feeling as if a part of his brain had gone numb.

What Julius had tried to say, and why the perceptive Otto had snapped at him. Subaru had not noticed what had been hidden beyond the surface level of words.

Nothing but Death for the Sin Archbishops was desired. The world would not forgive Louis Arneb.

The Sin Archbishops, Louis Arneb, the world would not—.

Subaru: "—Ah."

Beatrice: "Subaru, Betty will speak now, in fact."

The moment he felt the sensation of a slight breeze blowing across the labyrinth of thoughts, Beatrice spoke up.

Looking up at Subaru with her round eyes of a distinctive pattern,

Beatrice: "Betty ran into the Sin Archbishop Louis back in Pristella, I suppose. After that, this time when we happened to meet in the Empire, this is what Betty thought about that girl's state, in fact. — It's as if she's a different person, I suppose."

Subaru: "…"

Beatrice: "That girl, she's different from the Sin Archbishop Betty knows, in fact. How was it from Subaru's perspective, I suppose? From the perspective of Subaru, who had directly spoken with the Sin Archbishop up close."

Beatrice's kind, yet inescapable words questioned him.

He understood what she meant. For Subaru, it was something he had refused to acknowledge because he did not want to acknowledge it.

That the current “Louis” and the Louis Arneb he had met in the Hall of Memories, seemed to be different people.

However, just as he had refuted Julius’s suspicion, “Louis” had been using her Authority. Just as Gluttony had used it, she was able to freely utilize the special abilities of her eaten victims.

“Louis” still possessed the Authority of Gluttony, but her mind alone had been born anew.

That was just like—

Subaru: “Just like me, when I had lost my memories.”

If that was indeed so, had “Louis” been suffering this whole time?

Just like how back then, Subaru had chased after the phantom of “Natsuki Subaru”, troubled and distressed at being unable to trust anyone around him, had “Louis” also been seeking help?

Even if that was the case, “Louis” had still helped Subaru and Rem, and had made it through to this day.

Then—

Emilia: “—You know, I’ve been thinking about this the whole time. Once you do something bad, is it already too late to undo it?”

Subaru: “Emilia…”

Emilia: “You apologize, you atone, but even then if you’re told that it’s not enough, then sometimes you’d get fed up with apologizing and atonement, right? So, I’ve been thinking about a way to prevent that… but it’s not easy to find such a terrific solution. But…”

Subaru: “But?”

Emilia: “There’s just one, one method that might work. It’s a method that Subaru taught me.”

Emilia placed her hand against her chest, and she carefully chose words that could fully convey her emotions.

Hearing the words that she had spoken, Subaru searched his own heart. But, among the things Subaru had taught Emilia, as for something that could be applied to this moment, nothing came to mind.

To Subaru, who had no idea what to expect, Emilia, with her gentle gaze upon him,

Emilia: “It’s to think “I want that person to be happy” more than you think “I will not forgive that person”.”

Subaru: “…”

Emilia: “For lots and lots of the people around them to think “I want that person to be happy.” I think that in order for us to forgive that child, it’s necessary for her to make us think that way.”

Emilia’s words slowly and gently seeped into Subaru’s heart.

A method, to forgive bad people. A method, to forgive evil deeds. A means of salvation that might lay beyond apologizing and atonement, that was the earnestly thought-out answer that Emilia had given.

Whether she had learned that from something Subaru had done, or it was something he had once taught her, he had no idea.

But, it felt like those words had fallen firmly into Subaru’s heart with a thump.

Why was it that Subaru was so concerned for the sake of a Sin Archbishop, for the sake of “Louis”?

That was because “Louis” had done more for Subaru than what Louis had done to him.

Therefore—

Anastasia: “Once more, lemme ask ya the same thing.”

Hearing Emilia’s words and Subaru’s faint sigh, Anastasia had thus spoken.

While stroking Eridna, who was wrapped around her neck, she looked at Subaru and Emilia in turn, and spoke.

Anastasia: “—In yer story, jus’ what point of compromise d’ya intend on takin’?”

So she declared.

4

Louis: “Aau?”

As she cupped Louis’s face between her hands, who was looking at her curiously, Rem let out a long, deep sigh.

That reaction of Rem’s caused Louis’s face to look more and more puzzled as her cheeks remained cupped.

From the girl’s demeanor, Rem reflected that she must have caused her to worry.

Even though she reflected—

Rem: “Haah…”

???: “That’s quite the sigh, Rem. Is something the matter?”

Rem: “Nee-sama…”

Just when she gave a big sigh, a gentle voice called out from beside her.

It was Ram, who had returned to their assigned passenger cabin, having prepared some tea. Behind her, she was accompanied by a girl with antlers—Tanza, Rem recalled her name to be.

Noticing Rem’s gaze, Ram nodded and said, “Ah,” Ram: “It seemed like she had nothing to do with the time on her hands, so Ram brought her along.”

Tanza: “It is not as if I have nothing to do…”

Ram: “Really? There was a look of dissatisfaction on your face when you were kept away from the rest of those loudmouths. Even the Empire has ideas like wanting to fight to protect women and children. Ram thought they would have been more foolish.”

Rem: “N-Nee-sama, that is a bit of an exaggeration…”

Rem’s cheeks stiffened slightly at her sister’s rather blunt statement.

It was still taking quite a bit of time to come to a thorough mutual understanding between herself and her sister, but even so, since the appeal from the root of her soul was honest, Rem could feel her heart stirring with every single move Ram made.

Regardless, Tanza looked discontent with the way Ram had put it.

Tanza: “It may be true that many of the people in the battalion, especially Cecilus-sama, think about things in a simple manner, but among them are those who are as sharp-witted as the Governor.”

Rem: “I see. So, it was that sharp-witted Governor who told you to stay behind?”

Tanza: “—. No, it was Schwartz-sama who had told me to rest.”

Louis: “U.”

At Ram’s switch-up, the corners of Tanza’s mouth slightly stiffened as she replied. Immediately, Louis, whose cheeks were being cupped by Rem, moaned as the pressure of the hands grew stronger.

Oh no! Thought Rem as she apologized to Louis with an “I’m sorry”.

Rem: “I carelessly did such a thing. Are you alright, Louis-chan?”

Louis: “Auu… Uau?”

Rem: “…No, that has nothing to do with this.”

Louis: “Uu.”

Her cheeks still being sandwiched, Louis cast a doubtful gaze on Rem after hearing the latter’s answer.

Turning away from Louis’s gaze, her eyes met Ram’s, who had just been serving the tea. She placed a cup of warm, fragrant tea in front of Rem,

Ram: “Despite being a confidential dragon carriage of the Empire, it’s not as well-stocked with tea leaves as you’d expect. The flavor isn’t anything too notable, but it will keep your body warm.”

Rem: “Th-Thank you. I’ll take a sip now.”

Ram: “So? Did Barusu do something rude to you?”

Rem: “Ptooey.”

Finally releasing Louis’s cheeks, as soon as she put her mouth on the tea, she sputtered it out. As Rem quickly put down the cup, Louis tried to wipe her face with her own sleeve.

Rem: “I’m fine, I’m fine, Louis-chan… Um, what is it, Nee-sama?”

Ram: “Nothing at all. Barusu’s behavior is usually rude and inconsiderate. Even if it is guesswork, chances are high that it is the reason why Rem’s face looks so gloomy.”

Rem: “That’s also a bit of an exaggeration, no matter how you say it…”

In other words, it was just some guesswork off of a hunch, so Rem breathed a sigh of relief as Louis wiped her face. But, that reaction was enough for the perceptive Ram to guess the reason for her sigh.

Sitting cross-legged just in front of her, Ram stared at Rem as she tilted her cup.

Under the pressure of that silence, Rem soon relented and confessed.

Rem: “Um, about Emilia-san…”

Ram: “Emilia-sama? Yes, Emilia-sama is also clueless and inconsiderate in some aspects, isn’t she? So is that why Rem’s face was so gloomy?”

Rem: “N-no, that’s not it! It’s just… I wanted to ask what the relationship between that person, the person called Natsuki Subaru, and Emilia-san is…”

As the tone of her voice fell, Rem succeeded in asking her question while keeping as calm as she could.

However, at this time, Rem did not realize that the very choice of topic was enough to make Ram’s light-crimson eyes narrow.

But, her astute-looking older sister quietly muttered, “I see,”

Ram: “Well, Ram ought to tear Barusu limb from limb. Let’s do that together later.”

Rem: “Nee-sama?!”

Ram: “Hehe, it will be a sisterly collaboration. I suppose Barusu can be useful sometimes.”

Her faintly smiling sister possessed enchanting beauty, but her remarks were extremely disturbing. And after hearing Ram’s remarks, it was Tanza who quite literally had a horn to pick.

She took a sip of the tea that had been brewed for her too, and though she was surprised at the taste with a “Wow”,

Tanza: “Is that not a bit of an imprudent statement? Barusu… I suppose that is referring to Schwartz-sama. But, if you lay your hands on Schwartz-sama, I and the rest of the battalion will not show mercy.”

Ram: “That’s quite the courageous response… Tanza, how old are you?”

Tanza: “—? I will turn twelve this year.”

Ram: “That’s it. That explains it.”

Tanza: “Even though you have reached some comprehension, I am unable to understand.”

Rem approved of the dissatisfied Tanza’s view.

Why had Ram reached an understanding when she had heard Tanza’s age? To begin with, was it not so that Ram had not even answered Rem’s question yet?

Um, what kind of relationship does that girl Emilia have with Subaru?

Rem: “…They were, awfully close.”

If she were then to be asked “So what?”, even Rem would be unable to reply with anything but “Ha?”, but Rem did have many thoughts about how close those two were.

Thus, Rem preferred to resolve this as soon as possible so she could focus on her own problems.

Rem’s problems, that was to say—Anyway, it was Rem’s problem.

Rem: “That’s right. It’s just a trivial matter that needs to be taken care of quickly so that I can face the bigger issues. Nothing more, nothing less.”

???: “—Rem, you got a minute?”

Rem: “Ha?!”

With a loud jolt, Rem reflexively stood up on the spot. This caused Rem to unconsciously pick up Louis, who had been on her lap.

Rem lifted Louis up, who in her surprise let out an “Auu!”, and Rem yet again apologized to her, looking toward the door of the cabin, in the direction where she was called from,

Rem: “Wh-Who is it?”

Ram: “Not just who, it’s Barusu, the one to be torn to pieces. —It seems that their discussion is over.”

Rem: “Ah…”

At Ram’s words, as she gracefully tasted her tea, Rem let out a small sigh and hugged Louis. With an “Au?”, Louis twisted her head, and Rem closed her eyes as she buried the tip of her nose into her golden hair.

Just before, Rem was present when an attack was launched on the coupled dragon carriages, but afterward, she did not join the subsequent discussion where Abel had taken Subaru with a serious look on his face.

Of course, there was also the fact that she would not be useful even if she got mixed up in an important conversation, and there was also the small issue that she had ascertained earlier that was still bothering her.

However, the biggest reason was—

Louis: “U?”

The reason was that she had an unpleasant apprehension about the one in her arms, Louis.

She did not fully know why, but Rem’s heart instinctively knew that she needed to be by Louis’s side. Thus, when she had shut herself in this cabin like this—

Tanza: “—Schwartz-sama, come in.”

Subaru: “Ah, thanks… Wait, Tanza was here too?”

Tanza: “Yes, since Schwartz-sama conspired with everyone, and forced me to stay behind.”

Subaru: “Something about the way you put it makes me feel guilty…”

While Rem was flustered, Tanza instead welcomed the visitor into the room.

When Tanza hit him with some resentful complaints, the person who entered scratched his head in a troubled manner. Even though his stature had shrunk, the atmosphere of his troubled profile had not changed much.

That was probably because even if he grew somewhat taller, the childish look of his face would not disappear.

Rem: “Despite the mean looking eyes, he’s a strange person…”

Subaru: “Hey?! Just now, did someone say something bad about my eyes? I heard you, you know?”

Ram: “This is quite the considerable feat. To think that the complaints of the people of the Kingdom of Lugunica could be heard across the border.”

Subaru: “There’s no way the whole Kingdom is talking about my eyes! They’re making delightful conversation about dinner and plans for tomorrow and whatnot, I bet!”

Giving an exaggerated response to Ram’s teasing, Subaru strode into the room with a great deal of swagger.

For some reason Rem felt unable to look at Subaru, so she hid her face behind Louis, whom she was holding up with her arms, and did not face him directly.

Instead, Louis took her place and spoke an “Uau” to Subaru.

Subaru: “Yo, Louis, I also have some business with you. Would you happen to know where Rem is?”

Louis: “Aauu.”

Subaru: “I see, so you don’t know. Welp, I’m beat. Even though I had something important to tell her…”

Rem: “—. If it’s an important matter, please don’t joke around and get to the point.”

Subaru: “Whoa, Rem! So you were behind Louis?! I didn’t notice!”

Subaru forced an unnatural and exaggerated reaction when Rem interjected. But then again, his forced behavior seemed to have fooled Louis, as she shrugged her shoulders in disappointment that she could not hide Rem from him.

As she lowered Louis to the floor and stroked her head to comfort her, Rem narrowed her eyes.

Rem: “…Perhaps, you’re overdoing things?”

Subaru: “…”

Rem: “I think I’ve said it before. Please stop overdoing things and shouldering reckless burdens like that. After all, you’re not a hero who can do everything.”

Subaru’s attitude just before seemed to be some sort of brave front, so Rem quoted the same words that she had told him in the past.

Subaru’s eyes widened at those words, however, he immediately smirked and said,

Subaru: “Nah, surprisingly, I’m objectively viewed as Superman, so while I’m grateful for Rem’s opinion, I’ll just accept it as a cute voice.”

Rem: “Please don’t joke around.”

Subaru: “I’m not joking. —Rem, I have something important to tell you about Louis.”

Straightening his posture, Subaru erased his smirk and said so straightforwardly.

Hearing that, Rem gulped, and in her place, Ram sighed at the exchange of the two, and,

Ram: “Barusu, shall Ram and Tanza excuse ourselves?”

Subaru: “Nah, it’s fine if Nee-sama and Tanza stay. Nee-sama can be the representative of the Big Sister Division, and Tanza can be the representative of the Loli Division.”

Ram: “You are saying Ram is superior to Frederica as an older sister. Naturally.”

Tanza: “Um, what do you mean by “lolly” division…?”

Requested to be present, Ram puffed out her chest and Tanza cocked her head.

Then, Rem gently pulled Louis closer as Subaru turned his gaze towards them again. Holding the back of Louis’s head to her chest, Rem fixed her eyes on Subaru.

And then—

Subaru: “—Let’s resolve it. This lovely relationship between us, that we don’t really understand.”

Chapter 23:
Louis

1

Truly, their relationship had been a peculiar one, Natsuki Subaru thought.

Perhaps rather than peculiar, it ought to be called a malignant providence that had guided Subaru and his companions thus far.

Their ideologies, their ways, he despised absolutely all of it with every fiber of his being; the Vollachian Empire.

The one who had given him the unbearable yearning to cry his heart out for reasons he did not understand; bereft of her Memories, Rem.

The one he had cast the entirety of the blame upon, who he had utterly loathed; the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, Louis Arneb.

Served with a situation he could not help but curse, lamenting and raging in accordance with the path that had been laid out for him, while he repeatedly continued to crash, Subaru had been able to survive through these days by dying over and over again.

Here, there were also people who he had made contact with, who had helped him, and he had helped; the Vollachian Empire.

He was together with the one whose kindness and deep thoughtfulness made him yearn to weep; bereft of her Memories, Rem.

The one who had risked her life time and time again, bravely devoting herself to him; the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, Louis Arneb.

Processing the curse that had been served to him, refusing to follow the path that had been laid out for him, while they continued to gently hurt each other, Subaru had been able to survive through these days by dying over and over again.

Was it malediction, grief, or hatred? Or perhaps, without cursing, without grieving, it could be forgiveness?

The time had come to resolve this relationship, which up till now had continued to remain ambiguous.

Subaru: "…"

Subaru's declaration upon entering the passenger cabin cloaked the space with an air of tension.

Present in the room were Rem and Louis, joined by Ram and Tanza, totaling four. The former two were directly concerned in the matter, the latter two, witnesses; Subaru desired to converse with them.

Emilia, Beatrice, and the rest were waiting for the resolution.

Regardless of the form Natsuki Subaru's answer would take, they were waiting.

Rem: "…Has the important discussion with Abel-san concluded?"

Before Subaru, who had been considering how to broach the subject, Rem was the first to speak.

Seated beside Louis, with her hand in hers, Rem's words, whether she was conscious of it or not, seemed like an attempt to keep things in check.

In response to her question, Subaru shook his head,

Subaru: "It's paused for now. That discussion can't proceed until we've resolved our own matters… The discussion with Abel also involves Louis."

Louis: "Aau?"

Rem: "Why, is Louis-chan involved?"

Subaru: “It’s because according to the prophecy of the Stargazer guy, Louis’s presence is crucial for us to win this battle.”

Rem: “—Hk.”

As Subaru presented the prerequisite without concealing anything, a bitter expression crossed Rem’s face. Holding Louis’s hand, Rem looked at Subaru with her pale blue eyes and said “So that means”,

Rem: “You’re saying that you’re going to make Louis-chan fight? Despite her being so small, just a child who doesn’t understand anything, you’re suggesting such a cruel thing…”

Subaru: “Whether she needs to fight or not is a question for later. But, let me clarify something first. —The notion that Louis is just a kid who doesn’t understand anything, is a mistaken one.”

Rem: “What do you…”

Subaru: “Even though communicating with words is difficult, Louis clearly understands the situation she’s in. She chooses who she wants to side with, and who she doesn’t. Knowing that, she is here with us.”

Rem: “That’s… Hk.”

At Subaru’s calm words, Rem lowered her head, speechless.

Rem, too, understood that Subaru’s objection was the truth. If it were not so, Louis would not be here in the first place.

From the moment she had been cast into the Vollachian Empire, she was in an incomprehensible situation; she acted like a clingy child, imprinting herself onto the first people she encountered, Subaru and Rem. —However, such an explanation could not account for the myriad of brutal trials that they had surmounted together.

If the imprinting was not a sign of love, but rather a manifestation of a defensive instinct seeking a protector in order to survive, it would go without saying that being together with Subaru and Rem was detrimental to Louis’s survival.

If she merely wanted to survive, it would have been easier for Louis had she not been with Subaru and his companions.

Ram: “On that point, Ram agrees with Barusu. Although only bits and pieces of the situation have been heard from Rem, that child being here, despite having been separated from both Rem and Barusu, is a result of her own choosing.”

Rem: “Nee-sama…”

Ram: “Don’t misunderstand, Rem. Ram is entirely on Rem’s side and has resolved in her heart to tear Barusu apart together with you later, but she won’t twist the truth.”

Subaru: “There was one part of that declaration that I can’t ignore, but thank you.”

With a feeling somewhere between gratitude and bitterness, Subaru thanked Ram, who had interjected.

To Subaru, that too felt like an attempt to keep things in check from Ram’s side. At the same time, it was an indication that Ram would be impartial in this conversation and had no intention of emotionally siding with Rem.

That was exactly in line with the way that Rem used to often describe her assessment of Ram’s behavior.

Subaru: “Nee-sama, is far too kind… huh?”

Whether those words murmured within his mouth could be heard or not, Ram snorted without giving any words, then crossed her slender legs and brought her cup of tea to her lips.

Beside her, Tanza, who seemed to have been somewhat bored, looked at Subaru with her dark eyes, and,

Tanza: “Similar to Ram-sama, I also shall not support Schwartz-sama. I am unable to gauge the situation, so please do not be mistaken if you were intending to make me an ally here.”

Subaru: “I know. Tanza is being reliably strict with me. I didn’t think you'd take my side anyway."

Tanza: "…"

Subaru: "Huh? That seemed to have upset you a little? Why?"

Having followed Ram's lead and declared her status as an impartial witness, Tanza's expression became a bit sulky.

Tanza's expression rarely changed, but this sullen face was relatively common. Most of the time, it popped up in response to Cecilus's unreasonable words and actions, or when Hiain said too much.

Also, it was quite frequently directed toward Subaru.

Nevertheless, thanks to Ram and Tanza stating their positions, he had finished mentally preparing himself.

With that, Subaru once again turned to face his main focus, Rem and Louis.

And then—

Subaru: "Louis, we're about to discuss something important. It's about you, and I won't conceal any of what I feel within my heart of hearts. Will you listen, without running away?"

Louis: "…Aau!"

Subaru: "I see. You're a good girl. Thank you."

After a moment's hesitation, Louis nodded with a lively voice.

That reaction was yet another piece of evidence that she had a good understanding of what Subaru and the others around her were talking about. Rem, avoiding any eye contact, glanced at Louis's profile.

Therein, Rem was hoping to see the emotions she desired; if Louis would show even the slightest sign of discomfort, she could use that as a reason to stop the conversation.

But, in Louis's profile, she had been unable to find a reason to do so.

Subaru: "Rem, Louis, I think both of you have realized. That from the start, I was always really wary of Louis, and that I always shunned her… and, that I had always hated her."

Rem: "…"

Subaru: "The reason for Rem being so excessively suspicious of me at first; that was the main source. When I tried to somehow separate the two of you, I even got my fingers broken."

Rem: "About that time… I also went too far."

Subaru: "It's fine. Looking back, it's just another good memory between me and Rem."

Rem: "Huh?"

Subaru flexed the fingers of his left hand as he answered, and Rem made a face as if doubting his sanity. Not only Rem, but Ram and Tanza too made similar faces, so despite the topic being broken fingers, Subaru changed the subject by saying, "Anyway" before his heart could be broken.

Subaru: "I was actively wary of Louis. And so, Rem was actively suspicious of me. I don't know how Louis was feeling, but you must have felt that tense atmosphere, right?"

Louis: "Uu?"

Subaru: "Even after we got separated at one point and later were reunited with all the Shudraqians, even after we retreated from Guaral, and after that around the time of the siege of Guaral, it had always been like that."

Because of that, the gap between Subaru and Rem kept getting wider and wider, making it difficult to fill.

As for the reasons Subaru had felt hatred for Louis, the fact that her existence caused his relationship with Rem to worsen was something that undoubtedly had a great influence.

His animosity towards Louis only began to change after they arrived at the Demon City of Chaosflame, having separated from Rem.

While spending time with Louis without Rem as a mediator, she had worked her hardest to protect Subaru, and little by little, Subaru had no choice but to acknowledge that.

That was why, after they had split in the Demon City, and he was reunited with Beatrice at the Imperial Capital, he had been honestly happy that Louis was also there. At that point, none of the animosity that he had from the beginning remained.

Subaru: "If we just stayed like that, continuing to go on without thinking too much about it, I think it definitely would have been easier. But, that's just not possible. It's the same as a wound. Some wounds will heal if left alone, while others will only get worse. This is a wound that we can't just leave alone."

In order for the wound to heal, it needed to be treated.

And, for treatment, one could not just rely on magic or medicine, in some cases, more daring methods had to be used.

Thus, this was a wound of the sort where they had no choice but to resort to such means.

Therefore—

Subaru: "Up to now, I've never once said it. The reason, Louis, why I hated you."

Louis: "Uau…"

Staring into those blue eyes, Subaru poured out his feelings.

As if responding to Subaru's serious gaze and tone of voice, Louis did not avert her gaze either. This girl had resolved herself to accept whatever he might say.

Instead—

Rem: “…Please stop.”

Biting her lip, it was Rem who spoke in such a trembling voice.

In a voice that trembled as if she was pleading, she remained holding Louis’s hand as she spoke. —No, that was wrong. It was not that. The one with their hand being held, was not Louis.

It was Rem. It was Rem whose hand was being held by Louis, that much was clear.

Rem: “I don’t… want to hear it. The reason that you hated Louis-chan, I don’t care about such a thing. Isn’t it fine to just think that you were cold-hearted?”

Weakly shaking her head in refusal, Rem rejected Subaru’s words.

Stopping herself from putting pressure on Louis’s hand by instead clenching her other hand so tightly that her bones creaked, Rem tried to refuse what came next.

He wanted to respect those feelings of Rem’s. He wanted to grant all of Rem’s wishes.

Subaru: “I’m sorry. I won’t let you plug your ears on this matter.”

But, he must not do so.

Neither could he fulfill Rem’s wishes, nor could he show them respect.

If she did not want to listen, her only option was to flee this room. Subaru had no right to stop Rem if that was what she truly wanted to do.

However, Rem also understood.

That plugging her ears to Subaru’s words here would be tantamount to turning her back on her own missing Memories, and—

Rem: “…”

And it also would mean betraying the feelings of Ram, who was silently watching over her.

Rem: “Even so, I don’t want it… I don’t want… to hear it… hk.”

Clenching her eyes shut and gritting her teeth, Rem chose to not run away from here.

However, she felt a very, very strong urge to refuse Subaru’s next words.

While struck by her words, Subaru, again, kept his eyes fixed on Louis.

Louis: “Uau.”

Louis’s lips moved, indeed, she voiced a sound that did not form a coherent word.

That sound, he understood perfectly well that it was calling out his name, “Subaru”.

And because he understood that.

Subaru: “Louis, the reason why I hated you… why I detested you, is…”

Rem: “STOP… hk!!”

Subaru: “—Because you are the one responsible for stealing Rem’s Memories, the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony.”

—Because he understood that, Subaru had no choice but to respond.

2

He had said it. At last, he had finally said it, the words that had always been left unspoken.

The moment he told her, there were no deep emotions of a secret being laid bare, no heartbreaking sensation of a detestable individual being condemned.

Even now, as he revealed that which had been bottled up in his heart, there was naught but anguish of intensified weight and anguish.

And, it only got worse with the developments that followed thereafter.

Rem: “Waaaaahhh—!!”

Her voice raised, her face grimacing, Rem’s hands reached towards him.

Her hands seized Subaru’s collar, and with tremendous force, pushed him down onto the ground; he was unable to offer any resistance, as she was positioned on top of his body.

He probably would not have been able to do so even if his body had not become smaller, but now that he was smaller, it was especially true.

If Rem were to have put all her strength into her arms, she would have easily been able to cover Subaru’s mouth.

Yet, until those definitive words were spoken, Rem had done no such thing.

Even now, in this moment as she was mounted atop Subaru.

Rem: “Why… Just why… Hk.”

Her voice strained, her face contorting with fury, she scowled at Subaru’s face at a distance so close that he could feel her breath, but still she did not utilize all the strength in her arms.

Her emotions were bursting out, but even so, Rem remained rational before crossing the final line.

Subaru: “…”

Feeling Rem’s hot breath on his face, Subaru stretched out his hand to restrain the bystanders.

At the moment that Subaru was pushed down, Tanza immediately attempted to move to protect Subaru. Out of the corner of his eye, he could see that Ram was holding Tanza back by the arm.

From Subaru's side, too, he appealed to the two indicating that they had done enough, and looked back at Rem who was in front of him.

Drop by drop, tears streaked from Rem's pale blue eyes and fell upon Subaru's cheeks.

Her eyes housed neither anger nor sadness, but rather were intensely brimming with frustration, and the reason why she had maintained her rationality and opted not to cross that last line. That was what was embodied in her tears.

That was—

Rem: "Even without you telling me, I could tell… that Louis-Chan, that she had something to do with the Memories that I couldn't remember, I knew that…!"

Subaru: "Rem…"

Rem: "After all, what else could it have been? The only reason why you were so cruel to Louis-chan, trying to keep her away from me over and over again was because you thought I would be in danger if I stayed with her, there couldn't be any other reason, could there…? Hk."

Her breath, her voice, her eyes, all of them trembling feebly, Rem poured her heart out.

Upon being told this, Subaru shut his eyes. It was only natural.

Indeed, it was none other than Rem who was the victim of these lost Memories.

The thought that Rem herself could be less concerned about her own Memories than Subaru and everyone else, such an absurd notion could absolutely never be the case.

It was natural that more than anyone else, she would have been in anguish, longing for the whereabouts of her own Memories.

Rem: “I’m well aware… Do you think I’m stupid? Maybe I am stupid. I’m just a stupid woman who doesn’t know anything. After all, I don’t know anything about you! And I don’t even want to! And yet you just barge right in… I hate you!”

Subaru: “…”

Rem: “You are nothing compared to Louis-chan. Louis-chan has always stayed beside me, she’s always cared about me… She is, Louis-chan, is my…”

Those endless streams of tears not only hit Subaru’s cheeks, but they also ran down Rem’s cheeks and chin, embellishing her body and heart with teardrops, disguising them.

She knew, but she still wished that she did not.

Rem: “Everything, all of it has to be some kind of mistake… All of it, all of it is your lies…”

Subaru: “—Rem.”

Rem: “—Ah.”

Feebly, Rem’s eyes welled up with tears, and when a large teardrop fell, her blurred vision must have been temporarily cleared, for she could see Subaru’s face right before her.

Subaru, pinned down as he was, gently cupped Rem’s face between his hands, and fixed her gaze on himself.

Black and blue eyes met, and Subaru spoke to her lovely face, soaked with tears as it was.

Subaru: “It’s not a lie. Everything you thought, Rem, was true. Louis, was our enemy.”

Rem: “—Hk, what do you mean, enemy? Is it because of what she did to me, to my Memories? If so… then!”

With a strong shake of her head, Rem raised herself up as she left Subaru’s hands. As it was, she turned toward Louis, who remained standing in her initial position,

Rem: “Then, I will… I’ll forgive Louis-Chan. I’ll forgive her, so isn’t that enough? See, with that, everything will be solved, won’t it…?”

Subaru: “No, that’s not enough. That, doesn’t solve anything.”

Rem: “WHY?!!”

Subaru: “—Because I will never forgive Louis for the pain she caused you.”

Her voice cracking, Rem said she would forgive Louis, to which Subaru thus declared.

Hearing Subaru's words, Rem's eyes widened, letting out a hoarse breath. Suddenly, Rem's body lost its strength, and Subaru slowly raised himself up.

Rem, still on top of Subaru's body, stood up and exchanged glances at close range.

Subaru: "It's not just me. It's Ram, it's everyone else, it's everybody who cares about you, Rem. They won't forgive Louis. No matter how much you say you forgive her."

Rem: "That's, just…"

Subaru: "Besides, Rem… the things Louis did, they weren't all to just you. Many, many more people are suffering from Gluttony's wrongdoings because of the things Louis did."

Even if Rem really forgave Louis, even if she forgave her out of compassion and not out of impulse, there were many more "Rems" in this world who could not forgive Louis.

So long as those people were not saved, Rem's desperate plea would never come to fruition.

Rem: "…Many, others?"

Subaru: "Yeah. To an outrageous extent. So many people are suffering."

Rem: "Well… Well, there's nothing that can be done about it, right?"

Subaru: "…"

Rem: "From the very beginning, there was nothing that could be done, that's the sort of issue this is, right? You're saying that there's nothing that can be done… Is that the resolution you were speaking of?"

Her lips trembling, more large tears began to well up in Rem's eyes.

In a manner likely more intense than how she anguished over her own Memories, Rem wept for Louis.

That she wanted to save Louis regardless of her own Memories, that she truly desired to save her; in accordance with how emotional she had gotten, Rem's lips trembled. She, wept.

Those tears, that trembling voice, both caused Subaru to feel the pain of being torn apart.

Subaru: "I'm sorry, it must feel like I'm messing with you."

Rem: "…Please, don't apologize."

Subaru: "But, I'm sorry. This whole time, I've only been saying things that are hard and painful for you, Rem."

Rem: "Like I said, please don't apologize… Hk. I, I don't want to hear it…!"

Subaru: "I'm sorry, but you have to listen to me."

Rem: "Like I said… Hk!"

Subaru: "I don't want to give up. —I don't want, to continue being unable to forgive Louis."

Rem: "—Huh?"

A gasp escaped from Rem's throat, and her eyes opened wide.

Facing Rem, Subaru took in a deep breath and licked his lips. Word by word, he ensured that his thoughts, exactly as he had intended them, were fully conveyed to the girls who he wanted to hear them.

Subaru: "I'm the same as you, Rem. I want to forgive Louis. I don't want to continue being unable to forgive her. But, I can't. After all, Rem is really important to me."

Rem: "—Hk."

Subaru: "That's why, I won't forgive Louis for the terrible things that she did to you, for taking away your Memories, and for causing you to still suffer like this, Rem.”

Gently reaching out, Subaru wiped a tear from Rem’s cheek with his finger.

By the time he wiped off that single droplet, many more teardrops had already moistened Rem’s cheeks. Even so, Rem did not break Subaru’s finger.

It was as if to say he had not been denied, thus Subaru continued to speak.

Subaru: “Everybody really let me have it. They scolded me a whole lot, telling me not to say or think such stupid things. I think Otto probably still thinks things would work out better if Louis were dead.”

But, that was surely the natural mindset.

This was not to say that it was a self-purification process, but everyone knew in their hearts that it had to happen. Even Subaru knew it in his mind, and that was why he strongly faced strong opposition.

However—

Subaru: “Julius told me. He’s an incredible guy. On the other hand, he might be an idiot. He’s as much a victim as you are, Rem, but he shouldn’t say those things like they’re normal. He’s an idiot.”

Rem: “…”

Subaru: “I’ve been told lots of things by smart people, by stupid people… tons of things by cool people, by kind people, by amazing people, and I’ve thought. I’ve thought about it a whole lot, and I’ve decided. My point of compromise.”

Rem: “Point of, compromise…”

Subaru: “I want to believe in Louis. I want to forgive her… But, I won’t forgive her right now.”

So, as he voiced his thoughts, watching Rem's eyes waver in front of him, the words of a certain man passed through Subaru's mind.

???: "How could I go along with someone who decides who lives or dies based on his own fickle whims?"

The words of a man, with whom Natsuki Subaru had been incompatible, clawed painfully at his soul.

He was told that his attitude of deciding to forgive or not based on his own fickle whims, was not something worthy of trust.

There was no doubt that those words were correct. That which was the least reliable, was Subaru's own heart.

Even so, it was a matter of reaching a compromise with this heart, something that he could not yield to anybody else, and proceeding onward.

So easily moved, so quick to come around, with this fragile and pathetic soul of his, he would reach a compromise.

Rem: "—Ah."

Subaru hugged Rem tightly, who was surprised by his words and unable to move.

Despite the difference in height, Subaru pulled himself out from under her body and embraced the slumped over Rem's head to his stomach.

Subaru wished to convey that he truly cared about Rem from the bottom of his heart.

And then—

Louis: "—Uau."

At the sound of that voice calling his name, Subaru looked at Louis.

Parted from Rem's hand, Louis had been standing still, and knowing that it was now her turn, she called out to Subaru.

Louis: “Uu…”

Witnessing how forlorn Louis appeared as she stood, Rem, still in Subaru’s embrace, let out an “Ah” and hurriedly stood up.

Then, as Rem hugged Louis from the front,

Rem: “I-I’m sorry, Louis-chan… We, on our own…”

Louis: “Au, Uau, aaau.”

Rem: “I’m, sorry… Hk.”

With a feeble apology, Rem wiped her face with her sleeve, then stood up beside Louis.

Once again, she tightly squeezed Louis’s hand, however, this time it was with a face that did not rely upon her. He felt just a little bit envious of Louis, who was able to move Rem’s heart like that.

In addition to that—

Subaru: “—Louis, do you still want to become me?”

Louis: “…U?”

Rem: “…What, are you saying?”

Seemingly not understanding the meaning behind Subaru’s question, the two of them tilted their heads together.

Indeed, they had both tilted their heads. Not only Rem, Louis had too. —”Louis” had, too.

Subaru: “As I told you earlier, Rem. Even if you forgive Louis, I won’t forgive her. The many other people who have suffered harm due to Gluttony won’t forgive Louis either. But…”

Rem: “…But?”

Subaru: “But, Louis, I want to forgive you. If I was able to forgive you, that’s what I would want to do. So, let me ask you this.”

Firmly, conscious to not let his voice waver, Subaru looked straight at Louis.

He saw Rem squeeze Louis's hand, and Louis squeezed it back. While he hoped that this would be the answer to the relationship between the two.

Subaru: "Are you a Sin Archbishop? Or, is it possible?"

Louis: "…"

Subaru: "It's been said to me a lot. And, I agree. The world will not forgive the Sin Archbishops, and it must not forgive them. The Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, Louis Arneb, is a being who must not be forgiven."

Louis: "…"

Subaru: "But, you helped me. You protected me over and over again. You didn't even know that you once wanted to become me. You're completely different to the Louis Arneb that I knew. Still, you can use the Authority of Gluttony. You possess a Witch Factor."

That was Subaru's full impression of "Louis" from the time he had spent with her thus far.

She was of the same appearance as the Sin Archbishop, Louis Arneb, whom he had encountered in the Hall of Memories, and even though she possessed the same Authority, she did not seem to be the same person.

That was just like "Natsuki Subaru" from some time ago, and "Rem", who was like this now.

Someone who, while being the same, was different.

Someone who could make that choice of their own will, to be the same, or to be different.

To that "Louis", he wished to ask.

Subaru: "Are you a Sin Archbishop that no one in this world can ever forgive? Or, is it possible that you might be able to take back what the Sin Archbishop has done?"

Louis: "A, uu…"

Subaru: "Can… can you, start your life anew?"

What if, just what if.

What if the situation that "Louis" had been placed in was the same as that of "Natsuki Subaru" and "Rem"? Then, Subaru was asking a terribly cruel and unfair question.

Having no memories, having no clue as to what was happening, the hardship of being burdened by the self that one is not; Subaru was keenly aware of those feelings. Rem, too, knew them well.

And now, he was trying to force those same things upon Louis like this.

However—

Subaru: "If you can do that, if that is what you desire, then take my hand."

As he said this, Subaru slowly held out his hand to Louis.

Louis's eyes traced back and forth between Subaru's face and the proffered hand; similarly, as Rem held her breath next to her, her gaze shifted between Subaru's eyes and hand.

Subaru: "Louis, a lot of people curse you the same way that I do. I can't speak for all of their feelings. But, I can just say one thing."

Louis: "…"

Subaru: "I don't know what you would need to do to get everyone to forgive you. It's just… just, what you need to do for me to forgive you, I can tell you that."

Before he had come here, before he had been permitted this time, Emilia had told him.

Emilia had said it was something Subaru had taught her, but that was unthinkable. After all, Subaru was always learning from everyone else.

He did not even know how to resolve his own feelings without being taught how to do so.

Questions like, why did Subaru want to forgive Louis?

And, how could Subaru be able to forgive Louis? All of it.

Thus, the way to reach that, to reach the point of compromise, was —

Subaru: "—Louis, save lots of people."

Louis: "…"

Subaru: "Right now, you're going through unreasonable circumstances. I know that without any memory, you're being forced to bear an outrageously unreasonable cross. Even so…"

Taking a deep breath, with unwavering eyes his gaze fell upon Louis, he told her.

Subaru: "You can help lots of people."

Louis: "…"

Subaru: "If you help and help, and keep helping, continuing to help more than you've stolen… at least I, and I alone, will be on your side."

—The things you've done won't ever disappear.

That was what Anastasia had said to him once in the past, and then again just before, a statement that froze Subaru in his tracks.

Now, Subaru found those words no different to traumatic advice that there were some things that even his Return by Death was unable to overturn.

However, when Anastasia had made that statement, she had also said,

Subaru: “If you want people to believe you’re doing the right thing, you have no choice but to show them something that backs that up. The only way to change their appraisal is to overturn it with a different one.”

That was the most important part of the traumatic advice that Subaru had received.

The fact that Subaru was offering his hand to Louis like this now, was also because through her actions, she had overturned the animosity Subaru harbored towards her.

That change of heart that had happened to Subaru, would happen to all the people who suffered from the damage of Gluttony.

That was—

Subaru: “—That’s the “From Zero” I’m offering you.”

Not just from zero, but on a world-wide scale, she had no choice but to start from the negatives.

Facing such an absurd, outrageous, and tremendously nonsensical challenge, it was grandly delusional reasoning, for who in their right mind would believe that such a thing could be accomplished?

But, that was the best that Subaru could offer.

So then, if facing this absurd, outrageous, and tremendously nonsensical challenge, was a grandly delusional reasoning that nobody in their right mind would believe could be accomplished, Subaru would lend his aid.

In the same way that it had once been done for none other than Natsuki Subaru in the past.

Louis: “…”

Hand outstretched, Subaru remained still, awaiting an answer to come.

He did not rush her. Nor could he wait forever. He was giving her the time she needed, and quietly awaited the needed answer.

Rem: “I… I don’t know…”

During that stillness, beside the silent Subaru and Louis, Rem muttered.

For but a moment, it seemed as if that statement meant that she did not comply with Subaru’s proposal. However, Rem’s eyes said otherwise.

She, continued.

Rem: “About the ones called Sin Archbishops, about the name Louis Arneb, all of it.”

Subaru: “…”

Rem: “But, if those so-called Sin Archbishops, and also this Louis Arneb person, if their existence is not forgiven in this world… then what, what will this child become?”

Her voice, trembled. But, her pale blue eyes were not filled with tears.

As if to say that with a blurred and moist vision, neither would she be able to see the answer she coveted, nor the answer the other person presented, Rem’s eyes were direct.

To be neither a Sin Archbishop, nor Louis Arneb, if such was her choosing, what would she become?

As “Louis”, she would bear many unreasonable burdens, and walk a path seeking forgiveness, unaware of whether it truly existed on the other side of it all. —Such a girl, just who would she become?

When proffered this question, all Subaru could say was—

Subaru: “—Spica.”

Rem: “Huh…?”

Subaru: “To this girl, starting over as a new self, with a new way of life, I bestow this name.”

Rem’s eyes widened, and Louis’s eyes followed suit.

If she chose to live in a different way to how she had lived thus far, and set her sights on a completely different future from now on, Subaru intended to do everything he could to support her.

Because, in a world where nobody would forgive a Sin Archbishop, in a world where nobody would forgive Louis Arneb, he still wanted to forgive the girl who stood before him from the bottom of his heart.

So that Subaru could forgive the girl, he wished for her to become such a person, thus—.

Rem: “Spica…”

Stunned, dumbfounded, Rem uttered the name, then looked to her side.

The young girl fixed her eyes on Subaru. He, too, looked at her without averting his eyes.

He wanted things to be like this, such was his wish.

But, if he spoke it out loud, the girl would surely do so. Not of her own wishes, but because she respected Subaru’s; thus, he would not say it.

Because he wanted her to choose for herself, and not for anyone else.

He wanted her to walk and walk and keep walking, so that when she looked back at the path she had walked, she would be able to think that it was a path that she had chosen to walk.

Louis: “—Uau.”

Subaru: "…"

The girl's thin lips moved. Subaru's name, was called out gently.

Silent and still, Subaru waited. He did not want to rush her. Nor could he wait forever. He had given her the time she needed, and she had chosen what was needed; he wanted to hear her answer.

Then, as Subaru desperately tried to contain himself, the girl's expression changed.

Louis: "Auuau."

Gentle and tender, words were spun, and a smile emerged.

Then, as tears trickled down from the corners of her blue eyes, the girl's hand softly grasped the hand Subaru had held out.

Welcoming that light, soft touch, Subaru clenched his eyes shut.

To be neither a Sin Archbishop, nor Louis Arneb, a new way of life.

Having been a Sin Archbishop, having been Louis Arneb, a past that could not be erased.

Taking that upon herself, she would need to walk a thorny path, the girl—"Spica", he held her hand so tightly and firmly, as if to never let go.

Subaru: "One day, I want to forgive you. —So, let's do our best together."

Spica: "…Au!"

Flashing her white teeth, Spica gave a wide grin with her tearful face.

Having witnessed that smile of Spica's from the side, Rem's emotions swelled up inside of her, and burst forth.

Rem: "—Hk."

With more passion and more tears than ever before, Rem embraced

Spica.

Embracing her, cradling her, wailing her heart out, Rem cried. Startled by the embrace, Spica was drawn in by Rem's emotions, and as her expression clouded over and scrunched up,

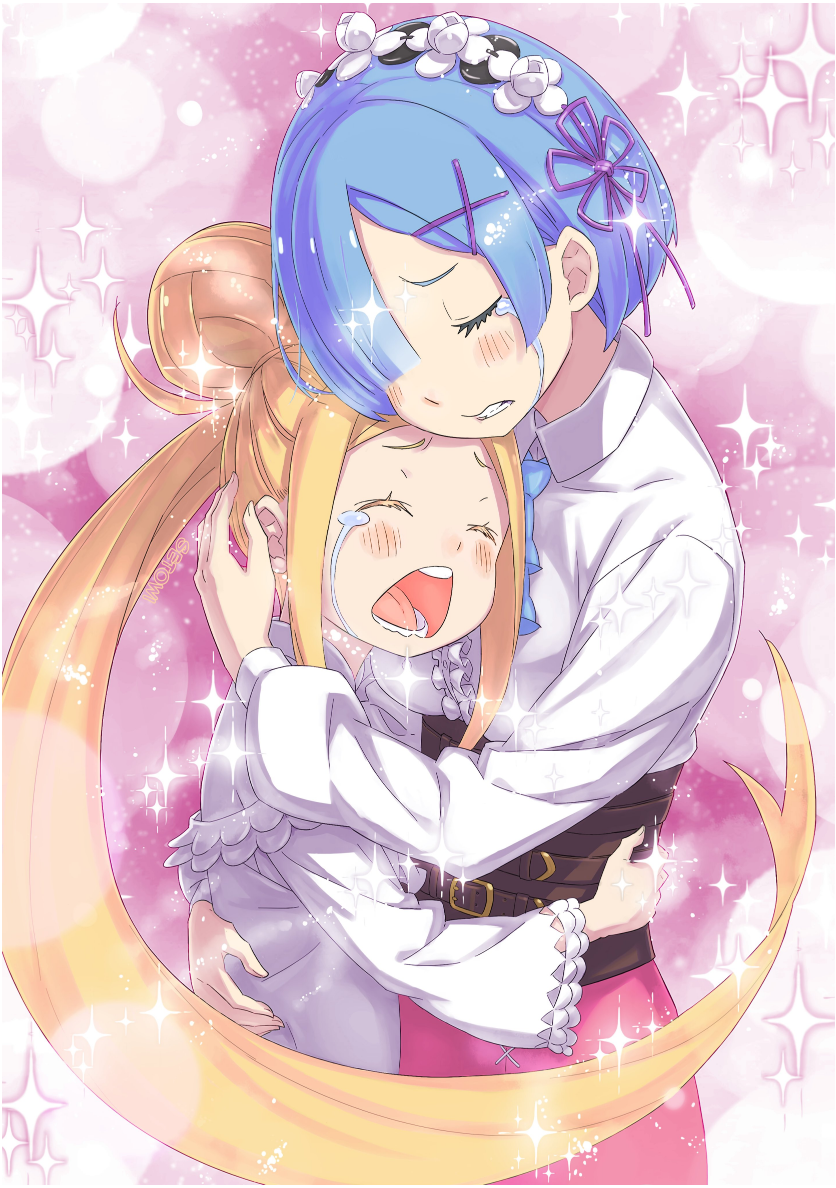
Spica: "—Aaaau!"

Spica, too, with a loud voice, her face scrunching up, in a manner befitting her age, while shouldering a destiny that someone of her age should never have to, she burst into tears.

Just like how any other being who was newly born into this world would.

Wailing like newborn babies, the girls kept crying. They just kept crying.

—Subaru, also, cried a little.



SETOMI

Chapter 24:
To Walk in the Light

1

???: “—Spica, is it?”

Looking at the two crying, Rem and the girl who had been Louis up until that point, a voice muttered.

Subaru wiped his tearful eyes with the back of his hand and turned around to see Ram, the person who had spoken. With her usual calm expression, she sat with her long legs crossed and her chin propped on her arm that rested on the table.

She tilted her head slightly and looked at Subaru with narrowed light crimson eyes,

Ram: “Where did that name come from?”

Subaru: “…It’s the name of a star. From my hometown, though.”

Ram: “So, you’re a poet, out of character for Barusu. But do you understand?”

With narrowed eyes, Ram’s gaze turned toward the two in an embrace.

That was enough to let Subaru know what Ram was actually saying.

Naturally, this was something he had discussed extensively before coming to this cabin.

Ram: “Do you know exactly what it means to use a Sin Archbishop, even if it is for a greater purpose?”

Subaru: “—. Of course, I thought about it. I can’t say I understand for sure, but…”

Ram: “If that’s the case, then stop.”

Subaru: “—Hk.”

Subaru’s throat let out a small sound as the cold, hard words struck him.

However, Ram, with eyes unmoved by his pain, continued to add.

Ram: “If you don’t properly understand, then don’t do it. —That is, to understand the meaning of facing these eyes.”

Saying this, Ram extended her hand, which had been supporting her chin, and touched the slender shoulder beside her.

It was Tanza, who stood next to Ram and watched the exchange between Subaru and the others along with Ram. Tanza was asked to be a witness and was present.

Her black eyes flickered at Subaru’s gaze,

Tanza: “I am very aware of Schwartz-sama’s feelings, as we have weathered many hardships at Ginunhive and along the way since then. However…”

Subaru: “Tanza.”

Tanza: “However, I would be inclined to think that even Schwartz-sama, who brought even Cecilus-sama with him, should not bring a Sin Archbishop with him.”

Resolutely correcting the wavering light in her eyes, Tanza looked at Subaru and said this.

Tanza did not flatter anyone by choosing words that were pleasing to the ear, but rather asserted her honest opinion. Tanza’s honest, yet childlike, opinions were thus deeply felt by Subaru.

Subaru: “…Yeah, I know, I’ve been an idiot.”

After Tanza’s words, he was once again acutely aware of the truth behind Ram’s words.

And that was the mistaken weight of what Natsuki Subaru had chosen.

Subaru: “I understand it all right. I’ve been told a lot, and I’m going to take it all on.”

Ram: “Yes. Ram is telling you, whatever Barusu or Rem may say, Ram will not allow it.”

???: “…Hk, Nee-sama.”

Ram: “No, Rem, as your older sister, your kindness makes Ram proud, but this is different.”

Holding Spica in a tight embrace, Rem looked at Ram with tearful eyes. But, shaking her head in response to her sister’s gaze, Ram clearly stated her viewpoint.

It was natural. Ram was yet another victim of Gluttony, robbed of her other half, Rem.

He would never think of trying to say something so presumptuous such as that her position was comparable to Subaru’s.

That was why—

Ram: “For her to want to be forgiven, the entrance for such a wish has yet to be opened. The only reason why this girl… Spica, has not been torn apart by Ram even now, is the issue of Memories, that is all.”

Rem: “…I don’t know how to get my Memories back right now, if anything happens to Spica…”

Ram: “Though it is unlikely, Rem’s Memories not coming back is an outcome that cannot be allowed to happen. Rem said it would be fine if they do not return, but Ram doesn’t want that. For Rem and Ram to recall just how much we loved each other, Ram will ensure we remember.”

Flatly declaring that she would regain her love, Ram’s conclusion was the same as before.

When the battle of the Pleiades Watchtower concluded, with Ley Batenkaitos dying, and Roy Alphard successfully being taken into custody, Roy's life was not taken, as he was a possible means of helping the victims of the Authority of Gluttony.

However—

Ram: "The only difference is that when compared to that Sin Archbishop, she is more cooperative."

Subaru: "Ram…"

Ram: "Stop making that face. Alright? If she wants to be forgiven, she has to make amends first. That is the logical thing to do. Anyway, she had already been told this."

Subaru: "—. Right."

With a nod in response to Ram's words, Subaru pressed his small fist against his chest.

Exactly as she said, Spica has been allowed a generous deferral for now. The people involved with her extended the period of deferral of her punishment because of her deeds and usefulness.

All Subaru could give her was a name to kick-start her determination to begin living anew, and assist her by getting a lot of other people to agree to extend the deferment.

Subaru: "For the time being, Spica… Are you unable to use the power of your Authority to restore Rem's Memory and Name in one go?"

Spica: "Uu, au…"

Subaru: "As expected, that's asking too much…"

Peeking over the shoulder of Rem's embrace, Spica shook her head apologetically.

She was opening and closing both her hands, but it did not seem easy to freely control her Authority and return that which the Gluttonies had collected.

Rem: "…Are you sure that Louis-chan… No, Spica-chan, can do this? Can Spica-chan bring back mine and other people's missing memories?"

Subaru: "At least, Spica is the one with the highest chance, being able to do that is the minimum requirement. That in itself is already a different matter from what the Stargazer talked about."

Rem was worried, but that was something that Spica would need to be able to do.

This was the essential condition needed for Spica to walk while bearing the cross of "Louis" on her shoulders.

To that end, Spica needed to master the use of the Authority of Gluttony—

Subaru: "…"

Rem: "—? Um?"

A momentary, fleeting anxiety shut down her words and made Rem's eyes waver.

The generosity exhibited by Ram, the conditions necessary to undertake that, knowing the means that must be achieved in order to do so, the Authority's very existence was dreadful.

It was dreadful that in order to become something that was not the unforgivable Sin Archbishop, the Authority utilized by the Sin Archbishop would continue to be used, and Spica's way of life would once again draw closer to that of "Louis Arneb".

To keep Spica alive, meant to continue fighting against that fear.

With that resolve settled—

Subaru: "—I'll have you do it. I'm counting on you, Spica."

Spica: "U! Auau!"

With definite determination housed within her blue eyes, Spica nodded vigorously at Subaru's words.

Though Spica and the villainous "Louis Arneb" shared an appearance, their innermost feelings did not overlap. That was a hope that could certainly be believed in.

Subaru: "Tanza, I'm sorry I didn't take your advice."

Tanza: "—. Do you expect me to just smile and forgive you, saying it is something that always happens?"

Taking his eyes off Rem and Spica, Subaru turned back towards Tanza. The tone of Subaru's voice worsened, and Tanza responded in a voice stiff in emotions.

At that response, Subaru shrugged his shoulders with a "No,"

Subaru: "I don't expect that. After all, you rarely smile at me."

Tanza: "That is not what I…"

Subaru: "I do know what you mean. But, give me a break."

Tanza: "…If that is what you want, there must be countless methods to choose from. Why not just say that her power is for the sake of the Vollachian Empire and, by extension, for Yorna-sama's salvation?"

Tightly pursing her lips, Tanza vehemently argued so to Subaru.

Regardless of the authenticity of the Stargazer's prophecy, if attention was drawn to the fact that Spica's presence was essential to this battle, then Tanza would not be able to say no with Yorna's life on the line.

But, Subaru did not like that approach.

Subaru: "I could probably get Tanza to do as I say using that unfair tactic, but I don't like that idea. I don't want to use any unfair methods on anyone. You're one person who I feel that especially strongly about."

Tanza: "—. In that case, it is impossible for Schwartz-sama."

Tanza finally turned away from Subaru, hugging her own thin arms.

Confronted face-to-face with gestures and words regarding his cowardice, Subaru let out a long sigh.

The things Subaru wanted to do were always a path that would do nothing but hurt the people around him, the people who cared about Subaru.

Ram: "Well? How well did the unfair and cowardly Barusu play his cards out there?"

Subaru gave a wry smile at the way Ram phrased it.

Ram was kind for not letting Subaru's self-mockery be replaced with self-satisfaction in this way. Although he really wished that he could have played his cards as well as Ram put it.

Subaru: "I didn't do anything so perfectly. I had the means to do it over until I did it perfectly, but…"

For example, at the Gladiator Island, Subaru had been able to do that without hesitation.

Whenever he went down a mistaken path, or progressed into an undesired relationship, he gave it another go using a method to recover from those mistakes, with an assertiveness to just keep repeating in a cycle of trial and error.

Subaru: "But, now that I'm reunited with everyone, I don't want to do that."

As he said this, Subaru slid his tongue around inside his mouth; that which had been stored there for an awfully long time, the drug cartridge hidden behind his molar—Ascertaining that he did not feel that package of poison, he closed his eyes.

Even if he did resort to that method again, he would never use it in order to avert his eyes from mistakes in his relationships.

And precisely because he had firmly decided that in his heart—

Subaru: “—After all, Otto also punched me really hard.”

That even if the path he trod would force him to make sacrifices, he must not repeat it.

2

Garfiel: “Ottobro, show me yer hand, ‘n I’ll fix it up.”

Upon hearing this, Otto turned to face Garfiel, who stood in front of him.

This rough-looking boy, despite his rugged exterior, had a very delicate nature. He was considerate and kind-hearted, truly embodying the essence of a member of the Emilia camp.

In response to Garfiel’s offer, Otto shook his head and replied,

Otto: “There is no need to be so concerned. It is not that serious…”

Garfiel: “Ottobro, that ain’t like ya.”

Otto: “…”

Garfiel: “Y’know, it ain’t like my amazin’ self don’t have my own thoughts ‘n feelings. So, I kinda understand how ya must feel.”

Garfiel scratched his head and closed one of his eyes. Then, he gestured toward Otto’s hand with a jerk of his chin.

It was a painful sight, Otto’s right hand, which was swollen and bruised.

For a moment, Otto tried to turn away, to hide his hand from view, but it was foolish to think that he could do so in front of his sworn younger brother who was a skilled warrior. Above all—

Garfiel: “You ain’t plannin’ on goin’ into an important battle with that untreated hand, are ya Bro?”

Otto: “…With you saying that, I really cannot argue, can I?”

With a wry smile, conceding to the reasonable persuasion, Otto extended his bruised right hand.

The dark, swollen fist throbbed with pain. From the sensations that he had accumulated over the more than two decades of his life, Otto was pretty sure that the bones in his fist were broken.

If anything, thinking so only intensified the pain. Whether it was broken or not, it sure felt like it was broken.

Garfiel: “This feels like the “Timid Domus is the first to die on the battlefield”.”

Otto: “Did that not mean that someone who is usually timid going all out on the battlefield and dying a pointless death?”

Garfiel: “Well, I wouldn’t exactly associate “timid” with ya, Ottobro.”

As he spoke, Garfiel gently grasped the offered hand and cast a healing spell.

A sensation like being gently warmed by hot water enveloped his hand along with a faint light. In just a few seconds, the pain in Otto’s fist had subsided.

Garfiel: “It’s freshly healed, so if you’re gonna punch again, use yer left.”

Otto: “I do not want to break both hands. I will leave the next punch to you, Garfiel.”

Garfiel: “If my amazin’ self did it, there’d be a massive hole, wouldn’t there? It’s only ‘cuz of yer strength that it stopped at that, y’know?”

With a gritting of teeth, Garfiel turned his head, sending his gaze towards the wall of the carriage.

Indeed, just as Garfiel had said, there was a slight indentation and a crack in the wall. That mark was made by Otto’s fist, and the height of that mark—

Garfiel: "—Is right around our shrunken Captain's head, huh?"

Otto: "It is fortunate of Natsuki-san that he was small at that time. If I had punched him in that state, no matter the explanation, I would have come across as the villain."

Garfiel: "No doubt about that. Well, if the Captain were his usual size, after ya were done, I might've taken a swing myself."

Garfiel chuckled at Otto's light-hearted remark.

Seeing Garfiel's reaction, the corner of Otto's mouth twitched into a smile. "Oh, honestly," he muttered, scratching his head with his right hand that had just healed.

His freshly healed right hand still hurt when he handled it roughly. But, the pain was reassuring.

Otto: "Simple as it may be, pain can be therapeutic… Oh, maybe I should have just gone ahead and punched Natsuki-san regardless of his size after all."

Garfiel: "If that's what you're thinkin', wanna go give him a smack together now?"

Otto: "No thank you. If we go now, we will see something we would rather not."

Garfiel, trying his best to be comforting, groaned with a low "Gao…", struggling for words upon hearing Otto's response.

Even though he had not intended to, Otto reflected on his words, feeling as though he had unfairly lashed out. —But, did he really have no such intention?

Could he confidently say that he had not aimed those sharp words at Garfiel who was always looking out for his best interests, fully knowing that he would never turn against him?

Otto: "…This is frustrating."

Muttering to himself, Otto, once again, smacked his forehead with his right hand, a bit harder this time.

The forehead that was smacked and the right hand that smacked it both cried out in pain.

—Presently, Subaru had headed towards the cabin where Ram and Rem were waiting. There, he was expected to confront “Louis” and engage in a conversation.

The topic likely to be discussed there was something that Otto, from the bottom of his heart, did not want happening. He could loudly declare that he absolutely did not want to be present for it.

Emilia and Beatrice, more worried about Subaru himself than the nature of the conversation, had followed him. Whether they would enter the cabin or not remained uncertain, but he could easily imagine them anxiously awaiting the outcome.

However, considering the circumstances—

Garfiel: “…”

Garfiel, with his awkward expression and silence, probably had stayed here out of concern for Otto.

Emilia, Beatrice, and Garfiel all had a way of making Otto’s heart sour.

—Otto’s stance on the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, Louis Arneb, had consistently been that she must be eliminated at all costs.

Because he believed this and had strongly resolved himself to it, there was a fact that Otto had deliberately not shared with Emilia and the others.

Since their reunion in the Fortress City of Guaral, and through several encounters with “Louis”, the girl who was unable to speak—his ears had never once picked up on any malice from her.

Otto: “…”

Otto’s Divine Protection of the Soul of Language had a simple function, one that enabled him to communicate with any living being, and only that. While he had most frequently used it to exchange words with ground dragons or insects in order to gather information, if Otto so wished, he could even communicate with an infant.

There was a time during his difficult days as a traveling merchant, when he had taken on the task of looking after the infants of influential figures in various lands, simply to earn some money for his traveling expenses.

Even though an infant's voice might not be able to form words, Otto could understand the underlying intention.

In the same vein, while the utterances of "Louis" might not have formed coherent speech, Otto was able to discern her intentions. And within them, he found no malice toward others; instead, her affection towards Subaru and Rem had made up the most of it.

That was why Otto had placed a lid over this certain truth and never told Emilia or the others about it.

As long as doubts were harbored, he could prevent them from getting too close to "Louis."

Once those doubts were dispelled, it was needless to say what kind of attitude the kind-hearted Emilia and others would display towards "Louis" or how they would approach her in terms of emotional distance.

That would—

???: "—Otto-kun, Garf-kun, mind if I have a word?"

Otto: "…"

With a light knock-knock on the cabin door, peeping in was Anastasia, clad in a kimono.

Upon seeing her, who had brought Julius beside her in a similar fashion, Otto tightened his cheeks and gave a nod, signaling "Yes."

Anastasia: “It seemed like things over there were gonna take a while, ‘n I thought it might be a bit much for all of us to wait together. I was also worried ‘bout Otto-kun’s hand…”

Garfiel: “Even without yer worries, I already healed Bro’s hand. Besides…”

Anastasia: “Hmm?”

Garfiel: “I ain’t comfortable with ya callin’ me “Garf-kun”.”

Garfiel voiced his grievance while crinkling up his nose, to which Anastasia widened her eyes in surprise. She then chuckled, “Sorry ‘bout that,” and said,

Anastasia: “Y’see, Mimi’s always callin’ ya “Garf” ‘n talkin’ ‘bout ya like that, so I just got used to thinkin’ of ya as “Garf-kun”. Is “Garf-kun” not okay?”

Garfiel: “Not that it ain’t okay, but…”

Otto: “Garfiel, there is no need to fuss.”

While Garfiel reluctantly stood his ground against Anastasia, Otto patted his shoulder and shook his head.

When Anastasia and company had entered, Garfiel shifted his position, placing himself between Otto and them. —To be precise, it was not due to Anastasia.

Garfiel: “…”

The presence of Julius, standing right beside Anastasia, was the reason.

When he had appeared in the cabin, Otto’s demeanor had shifted, and Garfiel noticed it. Grateful for Garfiel’s thoughtfulness, Otto nodded.

And then, standing beside Garfiel, who was basically his younger brother at this point, Otto presented his right hand to Anastasia and company.

Otto: “As Garfiel has said, my hand has already been treated.”

Anastasia: “I see, I see. That’s good to hear. I was thinkin’ ‘bout havin’ Julius heal it if need be, but I guess I was bein’ kinda nosy.”

Anastasia playfully stuck out her tongue while looking smug as she spoke, grating on Otto’s nerves. If she thought they could not refuse her suggestion, she was unfortunately mistaken.

While Otto and Garfiel were absent from the Augria Sand Dunes, it was possible that the duo of Anastasia and Julius had deepened their friendship with Subaru, Emilia, and the others, but—

Otto: “Unlike them, I properly remember that you two are our enemies.”

Anastasia: “—. Ya really are good, Otto-kun. Of course, I don’t dislike Emilia-san ‘n’ the others, but… without that kinda response, I’d lose my competitive edge, too.”

Otto’s gaze sharpened, to which Anastasia responded with a gentle smile. Although her expression and voice were soft, the light in her pale blue eyes was firm, and Otto too understood.

Even though they had gone to the trouble of crossing the border into the Vollachian Empire, Anastasia clearly established camp delineations. That was precisely why they had boarded the Dragon Carriage in a position of such importance to the Kararagi City-States.

In that regard, the problem was not Anastasia,

Otto: “Knight Julius.”

Julius: “Earlier, I made an excessive statement. Allow me to apologize for that.”

Otto: “Apologize, huh.”

After addressing the other party with a harsh voice, hearing Julius’s reply caused a sigh to escape Otto’s lips.

The “excessive statement” seemed to be the comment that was expressed over the treatment of the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony from the earlier exchange.

In the sense that he was voicing his opinion, Julius was merely exercising his right to do so.

Those were supposed to be Julius’s own words to the then agitated Otto.

Otto: “So, you say that you have reconsidered? That you are an outsider, after all.”

Julius: “No, the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony’s Authority… I am involved in the sense that I have been harmed by it. I also have a younger brother, whose existence I cannot recall. From that point of view too, I do not consider myself to be an outsider.”

Otto: “…In that case, in what way did you exceed yourself?”

Lowering his voice, Otto furrowed his brow as he listened.

Despite having offered an apology, Julius stated that he had no intention of changing his opinion regarding the part that Otto was concerned about.

It did not come to mind, however, another reason for Julius to apologize.

To the puzzled Otto, Julius then said.

Sincere gratitude and even a certain kind of respect towards the other permeating his yellow eyes,

Julius: “Otto-dono, for taking away your role, I apologize.”

Otto: “…”

Julius: “I could tell by your reaction. Had I not brought it up, you would have spoken the same yourself. Nevertheless, using the fact that I myself am a victim of Gluttony as a pretext, I took away your role as a person partaken in the camp. Therefore,” Cutting his words off there, Julius bowed deeply.

Then, with the crown of his light purple hair facing them,

Julius: “From the bottom of my heart, I apologize. I am truly sorry.”

Yes, when shown such a genuine display of apology, Otto bit hard on the inside of his cheek.

Had his reaction been any slower, he would have almost bit his lip in front of the other party. Bowing his head, Julius could not see it, but Anastasia could.

That absolutely had to be avoided.

Anastasia: “Julius really wanted to apologize for that, didn’t he? So, I was thinkin’ that if Otto-kun’s hand hadn’t healed yet, it’d be easier to start the conversation that way.”

Garfiel: “…’s that right? Well, sorry ‘bout that.”

Anastasia: “That’s fine. Even if without a cue, my Knight is good at apologizin’ properly.”

Setting aside Otto and Julius, the two parties involved, exchanging such words were Anastasia and Garfiel. Meanwhile, Julius kept his head bowed, and Otto belatedly realized that his response was being awaited.

Otto needed to give a response, or this apology would not be complete.

Otto: “…Your head, raise it, please.”

Taking his time, Otto slowly addressed the other party.

In response, Julius also began to slowly raise his lowered head. Seeing the Knight in his waso, with the scar under his left eye accentuating his dashing features, Otto sighed.

And—

Otto: “That your statement was not malicious, and that you were trying to cooperate with Natsuki-san, I do not doubt. But, you are our enemy. That remains the same.”

Julius: “Otto-dono.”

Otto: “I am not a Knight, so we have no opportunity to cross swords. You are neither a merchant nor a civil official, so we have no opportunity to cross words. —Nevertheless, though we are in a position to cross neither swords nor words, you are my enemy and I am yours.”

Tightly clenching his fist hard enough that it hurt, Otto declared to Julius.

Taking Otto's words head on, Julius's eyes widened. Be it astonishment or amazement, the fact that it was not the kind of surprise you would direct at someone you don't think of as an enemy protected Otto's pride.

Otto: "Anastasia-sama, I would like to say this beforehand… No matter what Natsuki-san's and Emilia-sama's opinions are, the reason for making use of the Sin Archbishop is in the Empire. If we are slandered because of the Sin Archbishop's existence, it is the Empire that should bear the blame."

Anastasia: "—Hmm, I have no objection to that either. Even if I did, I don't think I would take such a thing in my hands. 'Cause ya know, that's how it is right?"

Anastasia closed one eye at Otto, who turned in her direction and made a pertinent argument.

As she stroked her white fox scarf, she turned her gaze in another direction—towards the cabin where Subaru and the others probably were.

Anastasia: "No matter what kind of plan it may be, as soon as a Sin Archbishop is allowed to be involved, people around us will be disgusted, regardless of how deep or shallow the relationship is. This isn't true just for the Empire, nor just Emilia's camp, it's true for us too."

Otto: "—If you understand, then that is fine."

Nodding to Anastasia's answer, Otto relaxed his shoulders slightly.

If a Sin Archbishop was involved in a matter, it could not be received positively in any situation. That was the framework of this world and an unshakable truth.

No matter what the victim Julius said, no matter how the kind-hearted Emilia showed the path to forgiveness, and no matter what the foolishly hopeful Subaru wanted, this remained true.

For that reason, they must thrust at one another.

Knives pointed at each other's necks, while mutually pressing their fatal wounds.

Otto: "—Sorry, there is something I need to do. Excuse me."

After confirming their common understanding, Otto suddenly said so.

Hearing that, Anastasia tilted her head with a, "Is that so?". Beside her, Julius digested Otto's earlier declaration, his surprised expression tightened, but Otto could not bear to look at him for too long, so he quickly turned away.

Garfiel: "Bro! My amazin' self too…"

Otto: "Garfiel."

Garfiel: "Huh?"

Otto: "I'll be fine by myself."

Swiftly, Otto attempted to leave the cabin. As Garfiel tried to follow him, Otto blocked him with his hand, saying so in an easy to understand manner.

It was not that he was okay alone, it was a plea that he wanted to be left alone. And then, the considerate younger brother obediently listened to him, nodded, and saw him off.

Otto: "…"

Closing the quiet cabin door, Otto departed with long strides.

He left Garfiel in the same room as Anastasia and Julius. He was worried about what they would talk about, but he did not have the emotional leeway to support him.

He did not run, but his mind was in such disarray that he wanted to run.

Otto: “My role, taken…?”

Wanting to apologize, his head bowed, Julius’s words echoed within Otto’s head, causing him to clench his molars.

To be able to apologize, Julius was indeed the Knight of Anastasia, a sincere and earnest person. Such a pleasant thought, did not at all come to his mind.

He just felt very bitter about Julius’s misunderstanding.

Julius was making a big mistake.

Had Julius not said anything, Otto would never have said something that would poke a hole in Subaru’s impasse.

It was true that as Julius said, he would be lying if he said he did not have the same thoughts as him, but one could be assured that Otto would never say that, even in his death.

It was not because he was deprived of his role that he was so furious.

Otto was furious with Julius there because he said something he should not have said—No, he did not want him to say. Julius did not understand that.

And yet, the one making that misunderstanding—

Otto: “Indeed, those two are alike.”

At his core, this was proof that Julius was an idealist just like Subaru.

He believed that human beings were fundamentally good. But that was not because he was carefree. It was not because he was ignorant of reality. Even knowing the reality, he was still able to boast like that.

That was the same as Natuski Subaru and Emilia, their way of walking in the light.

Otto: "—Hk."

??? "—Otto-kun, that's no good."

Suddenly, Otto felt his arm being gripped, snapping him back to reality.

Looking to see what had happened, he realized that he had unconsciously raised his arm, which was now being restrained by someone from behind.

Most likely, in a surge of emotion, he had just been about to punch the wall. It was the very right hand which had just been healed by Garfiel.

Roswaal: "This is Garfiel's healing magic, isn't it? It seems that it has just been healed, so it'd be awkward for you if you break it again right away."

Otto: "…I acknowledge that I did something stupid, so would you let me go?"

He involuntarily muttered with a low voice, surprising himself a little. But, the other party, seemingly used to it, made no mention of it and released Otto's arm.

Standing there was Roswaal, who he never really wanted to run into. Although Otto never really wanted to encounter him, he now felt especially averse.

Roswaal: "That expression suggests you don't even want to speak with me, doeeesn't~ it?"

Otto: "If you can see that and still approach me, then you, Margrave, are truly relentless."

Roswaal: "That's an uncharacteristically dull retort from you. Seems like you're taking it harder than I thooought~."

Otto: "…"

Naturally, Roswaal had also been a part of the earlier discussion in the passenger cabin.

He was well aware that Otto's heart was furious during that meeting, as well as that he held an unyielding stance on how to treat the Sin Archbishops.

Knowing this and still acting this way, it was clear as day that Roswaal intended to provoke Otto.

If that was not the case, then he was far too inept at interacting with others.

Otto: "I am sure you can tell, Margrave, but I don't have the patience for this right now. If you do not wish for your whole body to be munched on by the rats that I have purchased, I would advise against ruffling my feathers."

Roswaal: "If I ever find myself being nibbled by rats, I'll know that you were behind it. That may have been useful to hear, but… I'm genuinely concerned about you."

Otto: "…About me?"

As Otto responded with skepticism, Roswaal nodded.

With that response, Otto understood that Roswaal was pestering him from a different angle. That being done to him in a situation where he lacked patience made him truly feel nauseated, making it all the more abhorrent.

Otto: "Margrave, what are your thoughts?"

Roswaal: "Me? I'm of course in the same boat as you, Otto-kun. I couldn't care less if the Empire is destroooyed~."

Otto: "…"

Roswaal: "Oh, perhaps I was mistaken? The Sin Archbishops are nothing but poison incapable of doing any good. Instead of pondering on how to make use of them, it would be better if the Empire just disappeared. Just as you suggested to Subaru-kun, it'd be fine if we just returned home bringing back only the members who he would feel guilty about abandoning."

Roswaal's attitude, shrugging as if to say "It was a great idea", plainly displayed Otto's own views back at him, giving him an unpleasant mood.

Shamelessly speaking in order to draw close to him, Roswaal went out of his way to fire Otto's approach back at him, showing that the sheer nastiness of his character was reaching its peak.

At the same time, even though Otto recognized the pragmatic side of his own suggestion, he was repelled by his own inclination to think of it as the best solution.

Observing this self-loathing Otto, Roswaal peered closely and remarked,

Roswaal: "I will tell you this much, I think you're doing more than enough, Otto-kun."

Otto: "…It seems that without makeup, even your sharp tongue is dulled, Margrave. It almost sounds as if you are trying to close the distance with me."

Roswaal: "I have no talent for getting close with people, so don't assume I am doing so. Either way, I believe you're doing more than enough. But, there's also the matter of "no matter how much you struggle"."

Otto: "—. No matter how much, I struggle?"

Caught off guard by Roswaal's choice of words, Otto's eyebrows twitched.

As Otto repeated it, Roswaal gave a deep nod. He rested a hand on the slender chin of his makeup-free face, and as he closed a single eye, leaving his blue eye open,

Roswaal: "This recent incident serves as a perfect example. In most cases, things go according to how Subaru-kun and Emilia-sama desire them to. Everyone rallies around, organizing their efforts, arranging the path for their wishes to be met."

Otto: "…What are you saying?"

Taken aback by Roswaal's sudden assertion, Otto furrowed his brow.

The idea that Subaru and Emilia's wishes always came true was incredibly absurd. If that were the case, Emilia would have been crowned king and taken on the name Natsuki Emilia long ago.

The fact that this had not happened, meant that it was not the case.

Otto: "Are you mocking me? Or perhaps, are you ridiculing Natsuki-san and Emilia-sama?"

Roswaal: "Neither. I merely pity you. Your family's contributions played a part in our journey from Lugunica to Vollachia. For that, I am grateful to you, and it is out of this gratitude that I offer this earnest advice."

Otto: "…"

Roswaal: "Becoming overly engrossed and finding yourself at odds with Subaru-kun and Emilia-sama is toxic for you. This toxin will erode you, and I fear that it may eventually kill you. After all, someone as capable as you is hard to come by."

Gently, as he calmed the tone of his voice, Roswal spoke in a straightforward manner.

At some point, he had dropped the clownish intonations in his speech, and he appealed to Otto Suwen with sincerity in his heterochromatic eyes.

At those words and attitude, Otto stayed silent for a while, and after a bit, he noticed it.

The aim of the person named Roswaal L. Mathers.

Otto: “Margrave, I have understood your words. Therefore, I shall not follow your advice.”

Roswaal: “Hmm…”

Narrowing his eyes, Roswaal let out a long sigh with a hint of concern.

After that, to him as he tried to hear the truth for why his advice was rejected, Otto declared.

Otto: “I understand. —I must be a hindrance for you. After all, I have not forgiven what you had orchestrated, Margrave, and I suspect that you are still plotting something.”

Roswaal: “…Oh?”

Otto: “That was why you decided to approach me after seeing that I had a great deal of discontent built up. Perhaps you thought it a perfect chance to get rid of me under a plausible pretext, but that was a grave mistake.”

Indeed, Roswaal’s assessment was accurate.

The earlier exchange had been, in the time since Otto had joined the Emilia camp, perhaps the moment he had felt the most anger. Before joining the camp, there had been an incident that had angered him to the point of punching Subaru, and this anger rivaled that.

Otto: “Although, if you were thinking that I would just give up on everything because of that, you are gravely mistaken.”

Roswaal: “Otto-kun…”

Otto: “First of all, what was all that nonsense just now? Whatever Natsuki-san and Emilia-sama wish for will come to pass? Please do not utter such absurdities. That is not true in the slightest, which is why I, Garfiel, Beatrice-chan, Ram-san, Petra-chan, Frederica-chan, Patrasche-chan, and everyone else have struggled so desperately to get to this point.”

Saying that he was extremely misguided, Otto was viscerally furious at Roswaal.

Roswaal's earlier assertion was this.

Whatever Subaru and Emilia desired, the people around them would somehow make it happen, so it was not necessary for him to be overly concerned and wear himself out. That no matter how much he objected, his opinion would be suppressed, making his presence meaningless.

However—

Otto: "Such a thing, I could never."

Roswaal: "…"

Otto: "Margrave, about what you said, I do not know to what extent you were indicating that everyone rallies around them… At the very least, supposing I were to side with all of Natsuki-san's opinions, affirming them all, and arranging the path such that everything would come to pass. —I do not consider myself capable of doing such a thing."

He was not like Beatrice or Garfiel, who could lend their powerful abilities.

Nor was he like Ram, Frederica, or Petra, who could provide their indispensable support.

He did not have the power to grant all their wishes either, so what was the meaning of Otto being there?

Otto: "I cannot do that. I will not acknowledge that. I will not allow that. Whenever Natsuki-san and Emilia-sama desire something, the moment that I stop speaking out, will be when my very reason for being ceases."

Roswaal: "…"

Otto: "Unfortunately for you, Margrave, it will not be as you desire."

While intensely staring at Roswaal, Otto plainly declared so.

It was probably the first time that Roswaal had been so one-sidedly pressured in the span of a single breath.

Of course, while it had never been expressed aloud, there had always been this kind of intense tension between Otto and Roswaal.

For that reason, when Roswaal saw the opportunity, he approached Otto in an attempt to remove a hindrance, and attempt to set the board to his advantage.

But, Otto would not yield. At least, not because of today's ludicrous reasoning.

Otto: "I have decided where I stand. I cannot walk in the light, and that is fine."

Roswaal: "…"

Otto: "That was a bad move, Margrave. It would have been better had you not approached me."

Nevertheless, the outcome would have remained unchanged, or so he would have liked to say.

However, if he had at least taken more time before reaching an outcome, it may have swayed. But, Roswaal's haste to get the result that he desired had led to the opposite, to an undesired result.

And, it was at the moment when Otto caught his breath in front of Roswaal, who wore a pleasantly different sullen face.

???: "Ah, Otto-san! Found you!"

Upon being called by a high-pitched voice, accompanied by the patter of tiny footsteps, Otto turned around.

Thereupon, his eyes met with Petra's, who was running towards him while waving her hand.

Otto: "Lady Petra… I mean, Petra-chan."

Reflexively addressing her out of the habit that had formed when they were undercover, Otto placed a hand over his mouth and corrected himself. Petra, who had run up to Otto and was slightly out of breath, asked,

Petra: “Otto-san, is your hand okay? I heard you punched the wall with all your strength…”

Otto: “Everybody seems to be asking me that. Fortunately, Garfiel healed it for me, so it is fine. Sorry for making you worry.”

Petra: “No not at all, as long as you are okay, then it’s fine… What is the Master doing?”

Giving a wry smile, Otto showed Petra his unharmed hand since she had been worried. Relieved, Petra immediately changed her expression and glared at Roswaal.

In response to that gaze, Roswaal weakly shook his head and said, “No”,

Roswaal: “I was just reflecting on my habitual behavior.”

Petra: “The Master is…? Since you never reflect on anything, would it not taste like nothing?”

Roswaal: “Uwah.”

Otto had also intended to put a lot of pressure on Roswaal, but the impact of Petra’s single comment was incomparable.

In fact, Roswaal’s shoulders had drooped, but Petra, who had been watching Roswaal intently, suddenly exclaimed “Ah” as if she had just remembered something.

Then, she turned towards Otto, the ribbon on her head swaying,

Petra: “Speaking of which, I didn’t just hear about your hand. A little while ago, you guys were talking about Louis-chan, so…”

Otto: “Ah, yes, that is right. For that as well, sorry for making you —”

Petra: “So I, in place of Otto-san, went ahead and hit Subaru.”

Otto: “…”

Thrusting out her small hand that was tightly clenched into a fist, Petra declared so.

Looking alternately at the outstretched fist and at Petra’s enthusiastic face, Otto blinked his eyes in surprise.

At Otto’s reaction, Petra’s breathing became a little rough, and,

Petra: “Otto-san, I heard that you held back. Because Otto-san would have felt sorry for hitting the now-small Subaru. So, I did it myself!”

Opening her closed fist, Petra showed off her palm. As she peeked at him from behind her palm, Otto stayed silent for a while.

But, he could not hold back.

Otto: “Ha, hahaha, ahhaha!”

When Julius had apologized to him, he had endured the discomfort.

When Roswaal had gone on the offensive, he had even endured the helplessness of being showered with blows.

But now, when faced with Petra’s words of good sentiment, he could not endure it.

Laughter did not mean that everything was settled.

With the issue still remaining, as always, Otto was opposed to Subaru’s thoughts.

Even so, while remaining opposed, since his reason for being was to keep saying that the point of compromise Subaru had found was unacceptable, he would continue to say it.

He would never give in.

Otto: “Petra-chan.”

Petra: “Yes?”

Otto: “Thank you.”

Saying that, Otto placed his palm against the palm that the young girl had extended.

A light clap resounded, and Petra laughed, saying, “My pleasure.”

Chapter 25:
The Wishes of Those Who Near Death

1

—Your Excellency the Emperor, Vincent Vollachia.

Looking at him with a serious expression, Flop had addressed him in such a manner, and Vincent closed a single eye.

Flop and Medium had abruptly confined Vincent in a cabin of the coupled dragon carriages; this blond-haired sibling duo did not comprehend exactly how terrible of an act they had perpetrated.

A reckless act, that would likely warrant them the death penalty if witnessed by anyone; their reason for doing such a thing was to transmit a message from somebody else, so there must have been something wrong with them.

And to top it all off—

Flop: "Before I deliver the message, may I take a little while to tell you an old story?"

Still donning his serious expression, he had suggested such a thing.

Vincent: "…"

Unable to read Flop's motives, Vincent stayed silent with one eye still closed. Perhaps thinking that the silence put him in an advantageous position, Flop continued with "That and,"

Flop: "I'm aware it's impudent, but… after you hear the message, would you allow me to ask a favor of you?"

Vincent: "Hey."

Flop: "My my, that's quite the scary face, Your Excellency the Emperor! However, please don't forget. I'm the only one who knows the message you ought to hear, so you shouldn't carelessly try to silence me.”

Vincent: “I also have the option to order Olbart Dunkelkenn, who would force it out of your mouth via Shinobi torture methods.”

Flop: “Isn’t it fine if we just have a peaceful chat together, Your Excellency the Emperor?!”

Once Vincent included a threat, Flop immediately raised both of his hands.

This was not merely a matter of having the courage to engage in negotiations against the Emperor. That said, the matter of the old story he had prefaced with, and the matter of the favor that had followed must have both been quite important to him, such that he went out of his way to bring them up.

But then again—

Medium: “But big bro, there isn’t a lot of time, right? At this rate, if Abel-chin doesn’t return~, won’t Goz-chin and the rest kick up a fuss? Regardless of your request, what’s the old story?”

As Medium tilted her head, it almost seemed as if her brother had not shared any information with her.

Vincent: “You, do not support your brother’s reckless actions without questioning anything.”

Medium: “Huh~? But, it’s what big bro was doing, right? If it’s him, then I’ll help out, no matter what he’s doing~. That’s my family oath. Isn’t that the case for Abel-chin too?”

Vincent: “Fool. Are you unaware of how Vollachian Emperors are born?”

Medium calmly spoke in a foolish manner, and when she heard his reply, her eyes blinked in surprise. Witnessing her sincere reaction, Vincent cast a reproachful gaze upon Flop, as if to say “even a lack of common knowledge ought to have its limits”.

Though it was by no means a nice story to hear, it was common knowledge that the brothers and sisters of the Vollachian Imperial Family would kill each other to decide the next Emperor.

For Medium to not even know that, Vincent suspected some bias in Flop's methods of teaching.

But, for whatever reason, Flop smiled upon receiving that gaze of Vincent's,

Flop: "I know what that gaze means, Your Excellency the Emperor. You're surprised at my sister's lack of common knowledge, aren't you?"

Vincent: "What else is there to be said? Additionally, cease referring to me as "Your Excellency the Emperor" every single time. If naught else is applicable, just "Your Excellency" shall do fine."

Flop: "I see, I see. Understood, Your Excellency the Emperor-kun."

Vincent: "…"

Nodding his head and maintaining his smile, Flop continued, and Vincent narrowed his eyes.

It could also be felt in his serious expression from just before, but today, Flop was not just a friendly merchant, rather, it seemed as if he intended to show the face that laid beyond his title.

To be precise, a person who had some sort of reservations while facing Vincent, was the face he intended to show.

Flop: "Dear sister, you just asked me, right? About why I want to tell an old story. Well, that's because in our past, there's a connection between us and His Excellency the Emperor-kun."

Medium: "Huhh?! Really?! Between us and Abel-chin?! What is it?!"

Flop: "Hahaha, come on now, no matter how you look at it, you're far too forgetful, dear sister. His Excellency the Emperor-kun is the Emperor of the Empire. In other words, because he has connections with the Nine Divine Generals—"

Medium: "—You mean Ballebro?"

Her eyes widened in surprise, and the liveliness of Medium's expression suddenly vanished.

She had voiced somebody's nickname, and there was also the term Nine Divine Generals from just before. Drawing a connection between the two, a single name naturally emerged in Vincent's mind.

Vincent: "Are the two of you related to Balleroy Temeglyph?"

Flop: "Yeah, that's right, Your Excellency the Emperor-kun. He's what you'd call our sworn-brother. We spent some of the most sentimental years of our lives with him, he's our extremely, extremely precious and beloved family!"

Firmly clenching his fist, Flop raised his voice as he answered, to which Vincent let out a sigh.

The ends of Medium's eyebrows drooped, and her gaze alternated between her brother and Vincent. It was clear that bewilderment and signs of sorrow had emerged on her countenance.

Flop: "It also seems like High Countess Serena Dracroy happens to be riding this dragon carriage too. As a matter of fact, my sister and I were also in the care of Countess Dracroy for a period of time."

Medium: "Sisrena…"

Flop: "By the way, this is a nickname that Countess Dracroy forced Medium to use so that they wouldn't feel like strangers, and so that the Countess would never be treated like a woman who's older than she really was. Amusing, right?"

Vincent: "Get to the point."

To bring up meaningless topics and cause people to lose concentration was the style of a peddler.

He had formed an estimation the moment it had been revealed that this sibling pair had connections to both Serena and Balleroy.

Originally, Balleroy Temeglyph was a subordinate of Serena Dracroy, and thanks to his definite capability, he was called upon to become a Divine General; there were great expectations for his future as a General.

However, knowing Balleroy's whole story, the gazes of many generals and soldiers would turn to disappointment.

He had rebelled against the Emperor, and had died a violent death upon his failure—That was the end of Balleroy that the world knew; the conclusion of the man whom these two called family, that would be recorded in the history books.

Vincent: "—No."

Resurrected and having become an undead, it was likely that the descriptions of Balleroy Temeglyph left in the history books, would not end with just insurrection, but with him becoming a being that brought ruin to the Empire.

Despite having thought about that fact, Vincent did not speak of it to Flop and Medium.

Because he anticipated that if he were to bring up the matter of the undead Balleroy right here and now, the topic Vincent desired would only get further and further away.

Either way—

Flop: "Right, let's get down to business. My old story isn't really that long either. After all, Medium happened to already touch on the main point."

As the ends of his eyebrows slightly lowered, Flop slowly shook his head.

At his words, Medium gave a clueless face, but Vincent made no made no comment of it. This conversation with the siblings constantly veered off course, and thus he would only interject when it did get off topic.

Flop: "Medium and I were orphans, we were raised in a shoddy institution. We got rescued from there, and were brought to Countess Dracroy's domain… that's where we met Balleroy, and became sworn-siblings with him. Got everything so far?"

Vincent: "—Continue."

Flop: "Those really were some busy days. Both Medium and I were pretty ignorant about the outside world, so anything and everything we saw was fresh and new. Countess Dracroy was someone who had a very broad outlook on things, so she gave us, who had no place to go, an education."

Vincent: "Considering all that, it has not produced any results for your sister."

Medium: "That's 'cause, I preferred doing physical activities with Ballebro and the others…"

Pouting her lips, Medium seemed to have regained at least a small amount of her good mood.

Vincent had also heard of the circumstances in the Dracroy domain that Flop spoke of, and surprisingly, the administration of the territory was something that could be evaluated favorably as well.

Known as the Scorching Lady, she was often evaluated as having a rough temperament, but the special quality of Serena Dracroy was the flexibility of her ideas, which were unbound by any preconceived notions.

In most cases, the people of the Vollachian Empire did not have the vision to look at things from a long term perspective.

Since the majority of children did not show promise of serving effectively as manual labor or as military strength, many people were born, and among them, those who were blessed with ability and circumstance would survive, with very few attaining great success as strong individuals.

Though it was a different case for the people of one's own family, this was a country where the endeavor to raise a broad range of capable people by cultivating them during their childhood was mostly considered to be an impracticable theory.

Flop and Medium were two siblings who had been blessed with that rare opportunity. —No, Balleroy, whose talent had been discovered, had also been one of those people.

Flop: “Of course, it wasn’t all just fun things, and Countess Dracroy couldn’t always be kind to us. Back then, Countess Dracroy had just usurped the territory from her father by herself, so it was pretty busy for her.”

Medium: “We also faced plenty of dangerous situations.”

Flop: “Like when those assassins attacked, aiming for Countess Dracroy’s life. Those were tough times.”

While the two reminisced on their fond memories, Vincent searched for the main point of the matter.

But then again, the main point had already been touched on near the start. Putting it this way, there were words he had grown accustomed to being told, and gazes that he had grown accustomed to being turned to him.

The words and gazes of these two likely conformed to those.

That was to say—

Flop: “We got through those days together, there was a strong bond between us siblings and Balleroy. It’s precisely because of that relationship, that I want to ask you this, Your Excellency the Emperor-kun.”

Vincent: “…”

Flop: “Our sworn-brother, Balleroy Temeglyph, as is widely known to everyone, he was a foolish traitor who couldn’t see ahead, and lost his life after failing to achieve a desire beyond his station… but is that really true?”

Having asked that question, a stillness returned to Flop’s expression once more.

For himself and his sister, he was a sworn-brother, but to the Empire, he was a traitor; such was the position of Balleroy Temeglyph, and of his death, Flop now enquired the truth from Vincent.

As expected, these were words that had been said to Vincent plenty, and a gaze that had been turned to him many times.

To die on the battlefield was the honor of a warrior, to refuse to yield even when pierced by swords was the way of the Sword Wolf.

Even the Vollachian Empire, a place where such things were valued, was not entirely filled with those who would celebrate the deaths of those close to them. It was logical that human emotions would seek out the meaning and reason behind death.

Henceforth, Flop and Medium asking him this here, was lamentation that he had grown accustomed to.

Vincent: “For what reason, do you doubt? Do you suspect that impurities have mixed into the rumors that have circulated through the streets, and feel you cannot place trust in them?”

Flop: “Nah, that’s not it. It’s just, I finally got my long-awaited chance to speak with someone involved. Then, it’s not that strange to think that I’d want to hear a story that’s much more trustworthy than the gossip, right?”

Vincent: “Though, this opportunity for dialogue was forcibly created by the two of you.”

When Flop tried to twist it into a matter of being an unlikely convenience, Vincent added that brief comment.

And then, for a short while, he went into an unusual state of deep thought.

The death of Balleroy Temeglyph, as was spoken of on the streets.

The descriptions of his death left in the history books, would have been that he died violently in the failure of his attempted insurrection.

What Flop and Medium heard, too, should have been nothing more, and nothing less than that. Thus, Vincent would not consider restoring Balleroy's honor past his death.

The story was nothing more and nothing less than that, thus the world in which it was propagated was correct.

Flop: "I want you to answer, Your Excellency the Emperor-kun. Once I know that, I'll deliver the message to—"

Vincent: "—. I do not know what it is you desire, but…"

The rumors you have heard are not mistaken, thus Vincent had tried to answer.

However—

Medium: "—Abel-chin."

Vincent's words were interrupted by a feeble, short call.

Vincent: "…"

Standing before the cabin door, Medium was obstructing him from going outside—No, it seemed like she no longer had such intentions.

Standing stock still, Medium's shoulders, of rather high stature for a woman, had been made smaller as she tightly hugged her own arms and looked at Vincent. In her blue eyes, tears had welled up.

He had long become used to seeing people get teary-eyed while they made entreaties or pleaded for their life.

Hence, that did not cause Vincent's heart to waver in the slightest. But, although his heart did not waver, it gave his presence of mind a short while longer to ponder.

—Flop and Medium, though he did not know what it was they desired.

Indeed, Vincent had tried to give that answer.

However, was that truly the case? What these two desired, he was sure to know. What these two desired was obvious, and Vincent had the answer.

He had it, but even so, he did not speak. That was Vincent's way of doing things.

But, that way of doing things, it could be crowned with the title of "same as ever was".

Vincent: "…"

The "same as ever was" method, was something that decided everything based on Vincent's own thoughts.

But, with the "same as ever was" method, Vincent had the rug pulled out from under him by his loyal retainers. He had received a hard punch from a man with a naive mind, saying that the act of regarding conjecture as a certainty was off the mark.

The "same as ever was" method, had its limits.

What was required of Vincent, had to be the "beyond what ever was" method.

Thus, in order to obtain that method—

Vincent: "—The true circumstances behind the death of Balleroy Temeglyph, they differ from the rumors that have been disseminated throughout the streets."

Indeed, Vincent had chosen to give an answer that differed to the "same as ever was" method.

2

Flop & Medium: "…"

The moment they heard Vincent's answer, an alteration was yielded in the expressions of Flop and Medium.

Flop's eyes slightly widened, and Medium's eyes blinked in amazement. Though astonishment could be seen in both, the nature of each varied.

Seeing the difference between their reactions, Vincent understood.

Vincent: “Flop O’Connell, you already knew that reality was not in accordance with the rumors, did you not?”

Medium: “Huh… big bro?”

Flop: “To say that I knew, would be a tad incorrect. The rumors just didn’t sound much like Balleroy at all, really, even Medium thought that much.”

Medium: “Y-yeah…”

Invoking her attention, Medium nodded with a countenance of unfading perplexity.

But, Flop, who prompted his sister to nod, had not denied Vincent’s query.

Receiving Vincent’s gaze, Flop slightly tilted his head,

Flop: “Don’t tell me, did Your Excellency the Emperor-kun think that just because I’m close with Balleroy, I would have already heard about it from him beforehand, and so I just tricked you into confirming the truth?”

Vincent: “—. There is a possibility, but it is close to nonexistent. The man I knew would not have raised the margin of error even slightly, and he would not have disclosed his actions to anybody until the very moment in which he carried them out.”

Flop: “…Right. I think it’s as you say, Your Excellency the Emperor-kun. I’m glad. It seems like with you, I can talk about the Balleroy that I knew well. After all…”

Vincent: “…”

Flop: “Ever since that incident, whenever we heard Balleroy’s name somewhere in the Empire, Medium and I could only think of it as being someone we didn't know."

Knitting his well-shaped eyebrows, a sense of loneliness wavered in Flop's blue eyes.

That must have been true. Vincent was not surprised by that.

In order for it to be so, Chisha had tailored the rumors to become so, Berstetz had directed them like so, and it was Vincent, who had given the orders for them to do so.

Everything, was in order to conceal the truth of the situation, to conceal the reason as to why Balleroy Temeglyph had become a rebel.

That was—

Flop: "—That rebellion, it wasn't Balleroy's true motive."

Medium: "Big bro?!"

At the words Flop had spun, Medium shrieked out loud.

Her round eyes were wide open, and as she vigorously shook her head side-to-side,

Medium: "That's weird, you're talking crazy. Ballebro was, because… Abel-chin! Say something! Tell big bro that he's being crazy…"

Vincent: "If there is a need to correct him, I shall. If not, I shan't. That is all."

Medium: "You have, no reason to say anything…"

At a complete loss for words, Medium's face looked as if it was saying she could not comprehend what was happening.

Meanwhile, Flop took a long, deep breath, coming to grips with the fact that Vincent had not denied the misgivings he had voiced— About the true circumstances behind Balleroy's death.

According to the rumors on the streets, Balleroy Temeglyph had been unsatisfied with his position of Divine General, so he launched a rebellion aiming to reach a higher standing, and died a dog's death as a foolish failure.

That had served the role of proving the sturdiness of Vincent Vollachia's throne, and weakened the flames in the hearts of many who would have plotted treachery.

Vincent: "As irony would have it, now it is my own strategy that has supported the rebellion, causing those weakened flames to intensify once again."

Flop: "—. Yeah, it was only peaceful for a little while. But, that's probably just how the outcome got used, his original objective wouldn't have been that."

Vincent: "…"

Flop: "Balleroy had a different goal. Your Excellency the Emperor-kun just made use of the outcome, but the prerequisite should have been something different. Your Excellency the Emperor-kun, do you know that objective?"

There had been plenty of time for him to think about it. That was likely the reason Flop could speak without hesitation.

Upon Balleroy's death, a rumor that differed from the truth had been circulated, and Flop always continued to think about just where the truth was. Ergo, he had not let this golden opportunity slip.

The Magical Sharpshooter, Balleroy Temeglyph.

His objective in taking part in that rebellion, that was—

Vincent: "—To exact revenge upon the killer of Private First-Class Miles, who had lost his life on a special mission to the Kingdom of Lugunica."

Flop: "—Hk."

Vincent: “What is so surprising, Flop O’Connell? This ought to have been a fact of which you were aware. At every turn, you are attempting to test the Emperor. It is disrespectful.”

As Flop held his breath, Vincent spoke those words and snorted.

Similar to how he had previously asked if the rumor about Balleroy was true or not, this had likely been another trap that Flop had set for Vincent.

It was in order for Flop to ascertain if there was value in continuing this conversation.

However, in response to Vincent’s voice, Flop shook his head with a “no”.

On his expression of surprise, as a second type of surprise emerged,

Flop: “I have no intention of making shameless excuses. I certainly have tried to test you. But…”

Vincent: “What is it?”

Flop: “…Your answer, it surprised me that you said the name of Big Bro Miles.”

Vincent: “…”

As surprise flowed through Flop’s voice, Vincent narrowed his eyes.

Setting aside the first answer about testing Vincent, the second answer was of a matter not worthy of surprise. Vincent knew about Private First-Class Miles, who had a close relationship with Balleroy. —No, it was not just Miles.

Vincent: “It is natural that I grasp the positions, names, and appearances of those who serve me. Whose orders do these soldiers and generals believe they are receiving, to whom do they think they are devoting the entirety of their souls?”

If not for that, the position of Emperor would be tantamount to always having blades pointed at one’s back.

He was ordering them to put their lives on the line, so he ought to know about those people. They might come to try and take his life, so he ought to ensure that he knew their faces.

And, the names of those who had lost their lives while following his orders, were something that he would never forget.

Vincent: “I am different to those of the Kingdom. My heart shall not break for the death of each soldier and general. I merely ought to remember. Therefore, regarding both Private First-Class Miles and Balleroy Temeglyph, I shall—”

Medium: “Abel-chin, won’t forget…?”

Vincent: “—That is all. I shan’t offer consolation.”

Vincent replied so to Medium’s feeble, tottering words.

On top of that, Vincent added one more comment to Flop and Medium.

Vincent: “Supposing you two desire to restore Balleroy’s honor, that is impossible.”

Medium: “—! Wh-Why?”

Vincent: “If it were to be known that the rumors differed from the truth, people would begin to sow distrust in every rumor. The rise of that would lead to needless cracks in the foundation of the Empire. Such a thing would not have…”

Flop: “Balleroy wouldn’t have wanted it. Right?”

Flop confirmed that with Vincent, who wondered just how much Flop understood.

Since it would be futile to keep it concealed, Vincent nodded. Then, an intense turmoil spread further and further across Medium’s face.

To that sister of his, Flop spoke gently, like a big brother, but also with a level of strictness, Flop: “Dear sister, you said it yourself, didn’t you? That you’d help me out, no matter what I do. That’s our family oath. I can also puff my chest out and say that.”

Medium: “Th-That’s right? But, what do you mean? That’s…”

Flop: “If Balleroy had truly intended on starting a rebellion and killing His Excellency the Emperor-kun, he would have come to us and asked for help. Even if it would have only raised the chances by a small amount, if he was truly serious about it, that’s what he would have done.”

Medium: “—Ah.”

At Flop’s words, Medium’s eyes opened wide.

The “family oath” that had also been spoken of earlier—Vincent did not know how much of a binding force that was, but if it carried a meaning so strong that one would not refuse the invitation to rebel against the Emperor, Flop’s theory would be valid.

Flop: “Balleroy had no real intention of succeeding in that rebellion. At the same time, he had the objective of wanting to get revenge for Big Bro Miles. The inconsistency there is that Balleroy wouldn’t have thought that Big Bro Miles’s killer was His Excellency the Emperor-kun.”

Vincent: “…”

Flop: “Finally, may I ask just one more thing?”

Though he should have already shamelessly spent all of his time, there were no words to describe Flop’s courage as he still held up a single finger.

Vincent responded with nothing, but as if Flop had taken that as the situation being in his favor,

Flop: “Did Balleroy fulfill his dearest wish? Did he get revenge for Big Bro Miles?”

Vincent: “—. No.”

Flop: “I, see.”

With just that brief response, Vincent would not hand over any more information.

Even if Flop requested such, he had no intention of handing it over. Even if Flop aspired to get revenge for the two siblings, for Balleroy and Miles, it would be impossible for him to accomplish that.

And above all else, that was because—

Vincent: “Balleroy Temeglyph would not have desired it.”

3

Flop: “Sorry for taking so long, Your Excellency the Emperor-kun.”

His dialogue with Vincent concerning Balleroy Temeglyph having concluded, Flop bowed his head.

His head had been bowed. In truth, the dialogue had taken a long time.

Vincent: “Are you unable to imagine just how valuable my time is during this crisis?”

Flop: “I have confidence in my appraisal of things. That’s why I could tell that the message entrusted to me was of the highest value right now, and used it to get the answers that my sister and I wanted.”

Vincent: “Your disrespect knows no bounds. Additionally, do not speak falsehoods to me.”

Flop: “Hm?”

Vincent: “Those were not the answers that you and Medium had wanted, those were the answers that you had wanted. This was nothing more than her simply going along with your request. That was the “family oath” you spoke of, was it not?”

Jerking his chin, Vincent corrected the mistake in Flop’s speech.

Hearing that, Medium widened her eyes, and after a moment of surprise, Flop nodded with a “Right”.

Flop: “I was the one who wanted to know the answer. If you’re planning on an execution, my head is the only one I want you to lop off.”

Vincent: “Fool. You think I will engage with your careless remarks any longer? Medium, do not look at me with those eyes.”

Conveying that he did not have the time to go along with frivolous chatter, Vincent snorted at the gaze of Medium, which was seeming to plead for her brother’s life, and then,

Vincent: “So, have you been satisfied?”

Flop: “Yeah, that’s right. I fully understand that amidst Your Excellency the Emperor-kun’s precious time, you’ve earnestly engaged with me. And you did so without even getting caught in my repeated tricks.”

Vincent was silent as Flop unashamedly declared that he had tested the Emperor.

Supposing Vincent’s answers had not fulfilled Flop’s desires, what would he have done?

Inferring that question from the silence, Flop smiled.

Flop: “If that happened, I would’ve brought the message to Husband-kun instead of Your Excellency the Emperor-kun, saved the Empire, and then have him become Emperor.”

Vincent: “You…”

Flop: “Nah, it’s really, really good that we settled things without that happening! …You weren’t one of the makers of the world that I must get revenge on.”

Vincent: “Revenge, on the world?”

At the words mixed into Flop’s sigh of relief, Vincent raised an eyebrow.

Then, beside the conversation between her brother and the Emperor, Medium sniffled as she responded “Um, well”,

Medium: “Big bro is always saying it. The reason that something unpleasant happens isn’t because of a single bad person, but because of the world that made that person bad~.”

Flop: “That’s quite a loose paraphrasing, but yes, exactly! Well, since this is an unpleasant world where those kinds of unpleasant things happen unreasonably, I’m striving to steadily improve it, even if through small things. That’s my revenge against the world.”

Vincent: “—. What nonsense.”

The world on which revenge must be taken, and the makers of that world.

While thinking that the way it had been put was similar to Cecilus Segmunt, Vincent muttered. Hearing that mutter, Flop gave a wry smile, and Medium got angry with flaming eyes, saying “What’s with you~?”.

At the reactions of the siblings, Vincent thought of it as increasingly foolish.

There was no doubt that Vincent was one of the people who had shaped the world which Flop felt to be absurd. Even if someone thought about making change for certain reasons, as long as they did not enact it, they would remain as a target of that revenge.

So, why had Vincent been excluded from that? He could not understand.

Considering that the origin had been him abandoning the “same as ever was” method, and then using somebody else’s thinking as a reference while aiming for the “beyond what ever was” method, it was something that he did not even want to think about.

More importantly—

Vincent: “You had said earlier. If I did not meet your expectations, you would deliver the contents of the message to another person, and thereby eliminate the peril to the Empire.”

Flop: “Yeah? That’s right. I had intended to entrust it to Husband-kun.”

Vincent: “It matters not who you were to entrust it with. Rather, if entrusting it implies that the Great Disaster will thus be eliminated, it must be a very important measure.”

A measure left behind by Chisha, who deceived Vincent, and had schemed all sorts of things.

Just what sort of thing was it?

Vincent: “Every single word and phrase, deliver it without leaving out anything. Assume that even a single omitted phrase can alter the future of the Empire.”

Flop: “That was my intention from the start, but man, that’s really scary! In total, I’ve been put in charge of three messages… ahem ahem. Cheer me on so I can do it well, dear sister.”

Medium: “Yep! Leave it to me, big bro! Do your best~!”

Receiving Vincent’s threat, Flop hyped himself up as Medium raised her voice.

As Vincent watched their charade, Flop cleared his throat a little once more,

Flop: “First is number one. —About Cecilus Segmunt, I had replicated a technique of Olbart Dunkelkenn’s to shrink him, then he was sent to the Gladiator Island. Likely, he has already crawled out using his own strength, but supposing he is late in his escape, assume that he is there.”

Vincent: “…”

Flop: “Well, because when he was talking to me, he looked just like you, Your Excellency the Emperor-kun. His tone and manner of speech were like yours as well. But, that was exactly how he put it."

As Vincent narrowed his sable eyes, Flop added that on in a panic.

But, there was no need for him to explain. In reality, ever since Chisha had ousted Vincent from the throne, it was an undeniable truth that he had begun playing the role of Emperor.

Since Chisha had been cautious, he probably would have never returned to his original form, and there was no doubt that he approached his final moments while imitating even Vincent's tone of voice.

When he had witnessed the shrunken Cecilus in the Imperial Capital, he had roughly fathomed a guess that it was something done by Chisha. The objective of that was also clear, since with Vincent ousted from the throne, Cecilus's presence would still be an impediment.

Vincent: "Even Chisha could have never deceived him. If Cecilus had been living his days normally in the Imperial Capital, it would have been impossible for me to have been removed from the throne, no matter what Chisha had prepared."

To put it plainly, it was the right decision to shrink and banish a hindrance to his plan. If it was Chisha, Cecilus would have had enough negligence to get shrunk.

Vincent: "No objections. Continue."

Flop: "Then, number two. —The Sanctum has been detained in the Fortified City. Depending on its presence, you may discover the way of being of the Great Disaster, which invites ruin to the Empire."

Vincent: "…"

Flop: "To be honest, this seems quite important, but I don't really get what it means. But it doesn't seem like you need me to repeat it, so…"

Then, Flop let out his words with an attitude that lacked confidence, and held his breath.

The reason for that was because, upon hearing that message, a change was yielded on Vincent's expression.

Vincent tightly clenched down on his teeth, then placed his hand to his mouth and kept silent. He would not close both eyes at the same time. Thus, he forcefully shut only his right eye.

The reason he had aimed for the Fortified City of Garkla, was because he had thought that if it were Chisha, he would have left some sort of countermeasure there. —But, that was incorrect.

What Chisha Gold had left behind in the Fortified City was not a countermeasure. It was an "answer".

Vincent: "We need to enter the Fortified City as soon as possible."

Medium: "Wait wait, Abel-chin! There were three messages, right? There's still one left!"

Vincent headed for the door, as his time was too valuable to remain at a standstill, but Medium stopped him. Halting his step at her words, Vincent took a deep breath.

The first was concerning Cecilus, the second was an "answer", so then what had been left as the third?

Vincent: "Let me hear it. If there is a card that still remains unturned—"

He would make full use of it, and protect the Vollachian Empire from the Great Disaster.

As Vincent requested that, Flop looked back into his sable eyes, and, clearing his throat again to try and deliver the message exactly as it had been entrusted to him—

Flop: "—Your Excellency."

Vincent: "…"

Flop: "My assistance in getting the wheel out of the ditch, concludes hereee."

—.

——.

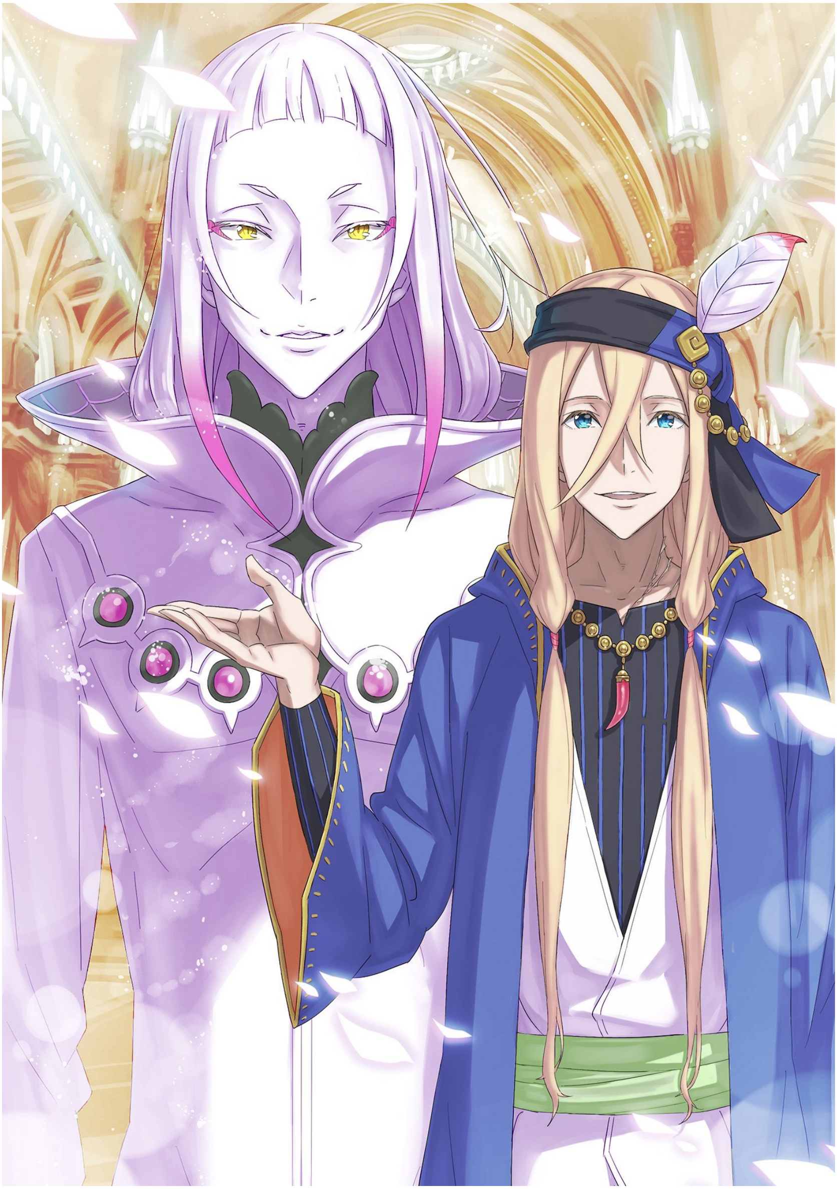
———.

Vincent: “—What an enormous fool.”

Declaring that and nothing more, Vincent headed for the door of the cabin.

Flop, having ceased his imitation, raised his own voice in a “Please wait!” towards Vincent’s back.

Flop: “Even if you hurry and rush out of the cabin, the speed at which we reach Garkla won’t change! It would only be different if Your Excellency the Emperor-kun could run faster than an earth dragon!”



Vincent: “I have no choice but to make haste for the Fortified City. If necessary, I shall fly there using the dragon ship or by other means.”

Flop: “The sky isn’t safe either! There might be dead flying dragons soaring around! Besides, there’s still one part of this conversation remaining… Medium!”

Medium: “Y-yeah! Got it, big bro!”

He felt impatient to head to the Fortified City.

Flop had pointed out the danger of the dragon ship from a reasonable angle, and as he ordered Medium, his younger sister once again blocked Vincent’s path.

Vincent: “Even if it is to hasten the dragon carriage, or to share the information with Berstetz and the rest, there is no better option than for me to hurry. Get in the way, and you shall be executed.”

Medium: “Big bro, Abel’s eyes are serious?!”

Flop: “But, if it’s about the degree to which we seriously live our lives, then there’s no way we’d lose! Your Excellency the Emperor-kun! I said this at the start. After you hear the message, I’d like to ask a favor.”

Vincent: “…”

While harboring impatient emotions, Vincent turned around to face Flop, who was pincering him together with Medium.

If he recalled correctly, Flop had impudently thrust the two conditions of the old story and a favor before him.

He had no memory of accepting, but in order to hear the message, he had not outright rejected them either.

Vincent: “Say it.”

He had already informed him that restoring Balleroy's honor was an impossible goal.

Something that Flop and Medium would have desired beyond that, Vincent could not think of a single candidate that would be impossible to achieve.

If it was too far-fetched and unacceptable, then he would not be able to do anything, but—.

Flop: "Your Excellency the Emperor-kun, after the current crisis passes, you'll return to the seat of Vollachian Emperor, and the Empire will go back to normal… No, you'll do your best to make it even better, right?"

Vincent: "I have reservations about the way you phrased it, but generally that is so."

Vincent once had a plan of his own, but now that it has lost its footing due to Chisha's scheming, he felt that he needed to discuss whether it was feasible.

For that reason, Vincent nodded, as there was no room for denial.

Flop gave an "mm-hmm" to his response, and smiling as if to say that it had benefited his intentions, he nodded,

Flop: "Then, I wonder. After everything is over, I think Your Excellency the Emperor-kun is going to welcome many wives… but, would you let Medium be one of them?"

Medium: "Eh?"

Vincent: "What, so it was something like that? I do not mind."

Medium: "Eh?"

Originally, the reason why Vincent had not welcomed any wives until now was in order to reduce the annoyances that would serve no purpose to his aforementioned plan.

Now that his plan had broken down, he had no reason to overly adhere to it.

Regarding the Imperial Selection Ceremony, too, he felt the need to get his hands in the game.

Henceforth, Vincent was merely facing the obligation he had to fulfill as a Vollachian Emperor.

As Vincent gave that response, Flop patted his chest in relief.

And then—

Medium: “Eh?”

With that, only the person who was placed as the subject, Medium, continued to tilt her head in confusion.

***

Note from the author:

The topic of “Balleroy Temeglyph” comes up quite often, but the book “Re: Starting Life in Another World From Zero Ex4—Travelogue of the Finest” deals with his character in a major way.

And similarly, the topic of “Miles”, which comes up rather sparsely, is a character who makes an appearance in the book “Re: Starting Life in Another World From Zero Ex1—The Dream that the Lion King Saw”.

Since nothing more than the contents that emerge in the main story will be written about in the main story, readers who wish to know more details, by all means, check those books out!

Chapter 26:
The Poison Princess

1

—At the same time as when the open palm of Petra Leyte caused Natsuki Subaru's cheek to swell, and when Flop O'Connell's bombshell statement caused Medium O'Connell to be confused.

???: "—As expected, seems like y'all couldn't wait for us ta arrive."

Gazing up as he gnawed on his kiseru, the strongest shinobi of the City-States languidly muttered.

Slouching his already sloped shoulders, having sat down cross-legged, the wolfman—Halibel, amidst the flowing nightscape, maintained vigilance of the quiet evening hours on the roof of the dragon carriage.

Just before, the coupled dragon carriages had been targeted.

Thanks to the children who had noticed the surprise attack before Halibel, they had been able to avoid that danger, but accidents like those did not happen very often. To ensure that they did not happen, was Halibel's duty.

Halibel: "After that, lil' Ana's gaze was real darn unsparin'. I hafta make up for it."

The young girl who he had known since long ago due to ties with his kin, had paid an extraordinary price in order to go to the Empire on this occasion.

Accompanied by Halibel, she had taken on the role of an envoy for the City-States. —Contrary to the expectation that this was an untapped business opportunity that ignited her merchant soul, her objective was actually to search for a friend who had disappeared.

She was a girl who did not want to show weakness. Of course, that was not something she would ever admit.

Halibel: "'Cause of that, she told the middle-aged geezer who she knew from long ago ta not lend her a hand."

As he said that, Halibel slowly stood up.

Consisting of multiple dragon carriages coupled together, the coupled dragon carriages were being pulled without rest by a great number of ground dragons—An outstanding piece of engineering truly characteristic of the greedy Empire, fully displaying the haphazardness of the Divine Protection of Wind Evasion.

Even so, Halibel could not get used to that unnatural sensation.

Even though the wheels were stumbling along an uneven path as the scenery flowed, neither wind nor shaking could be felt. Kararagi had a low overall number of ground dragons, and beast carriages were commonly used, so he was well acquainted with shaking and sluggishness.

And, speaking of unnatural sensations that he was not used to—

Halibel: "Dang, even tho' the movin' corpses were already quite considerable… seems like flyin' dragons're also becomin' "zombies"."

Reaching his finger into a gap in his Japanese-style clothing, Halibel sloppily scratched his belly as he grumbled.

Reflected in his slit-eyes as he gazed into the night sky, with cracks throughout their grand large bodies and spread wings, were flying dragons that had been reduced to corpses—a flock of "undead flying dragons".

A dense flock that concealed the stars like dark clouds, were slowly approaching the coupled dragon carriages.

Halibel: "—There's a troublesome one in there."

As Halibel gave such an evaluation to a presence mixed in among the flock of undead flying dragons.

As if noticing the presence of that repulsive enemy, unrest began to sprout among the ground dragons pulling the dragon carriages.

Even though the ground dragons were known as loyal friends of people, it was not as if they had lost their wildness upon being domesticated. Feeling a sense of danger at the looming threat, even they would have a frightened heart.

The coupled dragon carriages were a big deal as an invention, but such danger was always present. Ground dragons were already highly empathetic creatures. If one of them got frightened, that fear would spread like a chain reaction—

???: “—DODOGYUUUN!!”

Right after Halibel had worried about that, a neigh that seemingly tore through the dusk reverberated.

A lethal cry of the approaching threat, that paralyzed the ground dragons with fear—was not what it was.

The neigh had originated from near the foremost wagon, where several dozens of ground dragons were lined up to pull the coupled dragon carriages; the thing that had played the most important role, was the loud cry of a single jet-black ground dragon.

Halibel: “Heh, seems like there’s a young’un who’s got a considerably manly spirit.”

With the quick wittedness of the black ground dragon’s neigh, the contagion of fear was intercepted from spreading throughout the ground dragons.

Thanks to that, they had avoided the worst possible situation of the fearful ground dragons abandoning their duty, which would have caused the mid-air breakage of the coupled dragon carriages. And, just when Halibel was impressed, he had suddenly realized.

Halibel: “Golly, the black ground dragon young’un was actually a female. Rather than manly, guess she’s got a maidenly spirit.”

Unusually widening his narrowed slit-eyes as he muttered, Halibel laughed a small “Kaka”.

Smiling, the shinobi wolfman walked lightheartedly outside the dragon carriages that continued to run—Stepping forth into empty space, he leaped into the sky.

He would engage. The formidable enemy that even the Admirer deemed to be troublesome, in order to prevent it from drawing any closer.

That formidable enemy was—

2

Subaru: “Whoa whoa whoa, what the heck is that?!”

Clinging to the window frame of the corridor, Subaru’s voice croaked as he gazed at the scene outside.

Having finished his discussion with Rem and Louis—no, with Spica, in the passenger cabin, he had joined Emilia and the others who had been worriedly waiting for him; in the midst of giving them a report, he had been slapped by Petra.

Petra: “This is for me, and a little bit for Otto-san too!”

Then, after receiving that physical reprimand, he grappled with the concern he had caused the girls and the worry he would continue to burden them with in the future, and that was the moment he braced himself.

A sudden roar, as if to shatter the night sky itself, was heard, prompting Subaru and the others to rush to the window.

Subaru: “That thing’s, a black flying dragon… No, it’s way too massive to even be compared to a flying dragon!”

Beatrice: “That size, it’s not a flying dragon, in fact. Unmistakable, it’s Dragon-class, I suppose. And furthermore…”

Emilia: “—That Dragon, it has three heads!”

Above Subaru and Beatrice, who were clung to the window side by side, Emilia also pressed herself against the window and exclaimed just that; not only Subaru, but also the people of this other world had recognized it as an atypical being of imposing appearance.

Amidst the nightscape, soaring through the sky as if to race alongside the coupled dragon carriages, a fearsome colossal black Dragon swung its massive body and three heads around.

Cracks running through its majestic figure and expansive wings, the three pairs of golden eyes asserted its presence even in the night sky, vividly revealing its true nature.

Subaru: “Dragon Zombie…!!”

Ram: “A black Dragon with three heads… No way, the Three-Headed Valgren?”

Subaru: “Do you know it, Nee-sama?!”

With their cheeks still pressed against the window glass, the trio of Subaru, Beatrice, and Emilia turned their gazes to Ram behind them. Ram, cradling her own elbow, and as she stared out at the Dragon with her light-crimson eyes,

Ram: “It’s the infamous Blight Dragon that once wreaked havoc in a city by the border between the Empire and the Kingdom.”

Subaru: “I thought as much! It’s a given that a unique monster with such a nickname would be formidable…”

Ram: “A few years after the Demi-Human War, that Dragon almost scorched the Commercial City to the ground. Furthermore…”

Subaru: “Furthermore, what? Is there something else?”

Ram: “—. It was that battle in which the head of the family from two generations prior, Roswaal-sama’s grandmother, lost her life.”

After a moment’s hesitation, the words Ram delivered made Subaru and the others catch their breaths.

The threat of an enemy became far more visceral when one learned that a relative of somebody close to them had been a victim. All the more when it was Roswaal's grandmother. There was no way she could have been weak.

That stupendous Blight Dragon had been forestalled and was presently being held at bay by Halibel, but—

Tanza: "Um, who exactly are those wolfpeople over there?"

Pulling closer, with Subaru in the middle, Tanza peered out of the same window, unable to hide her astonishment at the confrontation unfolding outside.

Surprised as she was, her phrasing was not incorrect, no matter how much it may have seemed so.

Regarding the appearance of the fighting Halibel, her phrasing of "those wolfpeople" was indeed accurate.

The reason was—

Subaru: "Halibel-san, it looks like there's about three of him…"

Emilia: "No, there are four of him, Subaru. It seems one has been on the Dragon's back the whole time, trying to whittle down its wings."

Beatrice: "In this case, Betty doesn't think the exact number is the issue, in fact…"

Touted as the strongest shinobi of the City-States, Halibel had erased Sphinx's deadly attack in an instant. Those actions alone already lived up to his reputation, but the battle now within the view of Subaru and company was equally, if not more, befitting of that reputation.

It was no big deal for him. Halibel, like a ninja, had split himself into clones and was engaged in aerial combat with the Blight Dragon.

Given this high-speed combat, it was understandable that Tanza, unacquainted with Halibel, might have been fooled by the illusion into thinking that the true form of the strongest entity of the City-States was actually a shinobi group composed of multiple people, called the Admirers.

In any case—

Spica: “Uau!”

Rem: “I believe the Blight Dragon isn’t our only enemy. Wouldn’t it be best for us to regroup with everyone else?”

Spica raised her voice in alarm, while Rem, who held her hand, suggested regrouping.

Ideally, Subaru would have wanted to share the details regarding the handling of Spica with everyone in a more calm situation. However, given how the situation was moving, they did not have that luxury.

Subaru: “Yeah, you’re right… We should head to where everyone is! Abel and the others should also be on the move. Right now we—Urgh?!”

Emilia: “Subaru?!”

Following the proposal of Rem and Spica, Subaru was just about to suggest moving to another location.

Midway through, suddenly, a burning pain on Subaru’s chest interrupted his words, and Emilia supported his body as he tried to crouch down.

But, it was not just Subaru who had experienced this strange phenomenon.

Tanza: “…Are you alright?”

Beatrice: “To be supported by you is humiliating, I suppose, deergirl…”

Ram: “Even Beatrice-sama… Barusu, what happened?”

Just like Subaru, the sudden pain had staggered Beatrice, and she expressed her displeasure as Tanza promptly supported her.

Ram asked a question upon witnessing that exchange, to which Subaru replied, “I-I don’t know”.

Subaru: “I just felt pain on my chest all of a sudden…Huhh?!”

As he spoke, Subaru pulled down the neckline of his clothes, widening his eyes in shock.

Seeing the same thing Subaru had, both Emilia and Ram furrowed their brows in confusion.

Present there was a scar that seemed like a swollen red welt—And, it was not just an ordinary scar.

Beatrice: “What is this…? It’s shaped like, somebody’s eye?”

Subaru: “Ah, so you see it too? It’s a mark shaped like an eyeball… Wait, don’t tell me, Beako! Do you…”

Beatrice: “…Betty has the same mark on her soft skin, in fact.”

What had appeared on Subaru’s chest was a mark roughly the size of a child’s palm—a deformed design that appeared to depict an eye.

It seemed like the same emblem had been carved into Beatrice, and Tanza confirmed by nodding deeply as she peered into the neckline of Beatrice’s dress.

Subaru: “But, it’s just me and Beako? Why is everyone else unaffected?”

Ram: “Disgusting.”

Subaru: “I’m genuinely worried?! Do you really think I’d say something obscene given the situation and my current size?!”

Ascertaining that the others did not have that same mark, which was still pulsating with pain, Subaru rubbed the mark on his chest and scowled.

This was an abnormal sign that had emerged in this situation. Of course, it was clear that this was an action taken by someone opposing Subaru and company, but the intentions behind the targets were unclear.

Perhaps, due to the contract binding Subaru and Beatrice, something cast upon one of their bodies could possibly manifest on the other as well.

Subaru: “No good, the limits are unclear no matter how much I think about it. The best thing would be to talk to someone knowledgeable about this. For now, we need to get out of here…”

Spica: “Aau!!”

Rem: “—Hk! You can’t!”

Once more, just as he tried to suggest they leave, he was interrupted yet again.

In a flurried state, Spica and Rem forcefully pushed Subaru and the rest aside from where they were lined up. It was a sudden move, however it turned out to be the right one.

—Because from directly above them, the roof was penetrated, and the silhouette of an enemy wielding great shears dove in, violently tearing through the spot where Subaru and company had stood just moments before.

3

Otto: “Margrave!”

Petra: “Master!”

In unison, two voices called out to him in concern, eliciting a wry smile from Roswaal.

These two might not have easily heeded his advice, and they certainly had not given their trust to Roswaal, but their genuine worry was evident. Their inherent kindness not only spoke for itself but also served as a testament that they, too, were part of Emilia's faction.

—This was a distinction that set them apart from Roswaal, who could never truly connect with them at the core.

Roswaal: "…Hk, they've marked me."

Swallowing his fleeting smile, Roswaal pulled open his shirt to reveal his chest.

There, a red swollen mark stood out, depicting the pattern of an eye. Petra, her face covered, had her eyes widened in shock upon seeing it.

Otto's expression clouded over upon seeing the mark, murmuring, "That is…"

Otto: "Margrave, did you say "mark"? I hope it is not what I'm thinking…"

Roswaal: "It's exactly what you're thiiinking~. —This is most likely a sign that we've been recognized as enemies, or perhaps designated as targets. Either way, it's not a welcooome~ sign."

Petra: "Enemies, or targets?"

Otto's glance fleetingly shifted to Petra beside him. She quickly grasped the implication behind his look, fervently shaking her head in response.

From their reactions, neither Otto nor Petra had this emblem manifesting on them.

While that in itself was a relief—

Petra: "What kind of effect does this emblem have?"

Otto: "—. Effects that I can think of could be a slow sapping of one's life, the ability to read the target's thoughts, or simply a means to continuously locate the marked individual."

Petra: “You deliberately listed the worst effects first, didn’t you? So, the most likely possibility is that this mark serves to pinpoint our location?”

Roswaal: “Indeed, both of you are truuuly~ astute.”

Roswaal closed his eyes, seeing Otto and Petra’s broad, calm judgement on the range of possibilities.

The most dangerous kind of curse, one that drained life, was not something that could be remotely inscribed and probably did not need to be considered.

However, being constantly located due to the mark would be problematic in itself.

Roswaal: “We might need to consider splitting up to ensure our movements aren’t entirely transparent. With the assistance of Halibel-dono outside, you two should distance yourselves from me…”

Otto: “—No, it seems it is already too late.”

Right after responding in a low voice, Otto pulled Petra’s shoulder beside him.

Petra, her eyes widening in shock, watched as an immense figure suddenly crashed through the window right beside her, entering the corridor of the coupled dragon carriages.

The intruder, covered head-to-toe in black armor and wielding Great Shears, emanated a malevolent aura—it was an undead.

Petra: “—Hk.”

Suppressing a scream, Petra pointed at the enemy from within Otto’s arms.

While praising the bravery of the girl who had tried to take the initiative in the sudden situation, Roswaal stepped forward and thrusted his palm forward before the enemy could swing the Great Shears upward.

He swiftly drove his hand into the gap between the helmet that covered the face as if it was a sword, inserting his fingers into the opponent’s eye sockets as he chanted.

Roswaal: “Goa.”

In an instant, flames engulfed and exploded from the creature’s head, causing the armor to rupture from within.

Despite their flashy entrance, the intruder had not landed a single blow. Believing he had chosen the best course of action, Roswaal turned around, only to realize he had been overly optimistic.

One by one, soldiers in similar gear began pouring into the carriage from the roof and corridor.

In no time, the entire coupled dragon carriage had transformed into a mobile battlefield.

4

Medium: “Abel-chin, over here! Hurry! Big bro you run too!”

Flop: “To tell you the truth, this is me running with my full strength, dear sister!”

Raising her voice with all her might, Medium protected the rear by repelling the enemy’s attacks with her twin swords.

The barbarian swords and the great shears clashed violently, and as they slipped through the openings she created, the two men she was protecting—Vincent and Flop, kept away from the enemy’s onslaught.

At first glance, that was a pitiful aspect, but there were reasons other than the fact that these two were respectively an injured man and a non-combatant.

Flop: “Your Excellency the Emperor-kun! Are you alright? Please don’t tell me you’ve been poisoned! I’d be troubled if you were unable to keep your promise!”

Vincent: "…Hmph. If you are worried, then hide your ambition a little. It is disrespectful."

Flop: "It may come as a surprise to you since you surround yourself with ambitious people, but there are people in the world who approach you for reasons other than ambition, Your Excellency the Emperor-kun!"

Vincent snorted at Flop who spouted such a thoughtless remark while supporting his shoulder.

Vincent's expression stiffened as he experienced a faint pain akin to his chest being pierced. It seemed as if the sudden pain along with the red scar was a thorn that ate into Vincent's flesh.

Directly after that came the invasion of enemies which Medium was now keeping in check, Vincent was convinced that he was being assailed by the same thing that had once attacked him in the past, and in a way that was more troublesome than that time.

That was—

Flop: "That painful chest wound is…"

Vincent: "Though it is an annoyance, it is likely the Evil Eye of one of my siblings, Palladio Manesque. During the Imperial Selection Ceremony, that man died in defeat, it seems he was unable to rest in peace."

Flop: "Evil Eye…! So that effect is…?"

Vincent: "Back then, it was something that allowed him to transmit his voice to somebody whose location he knew, but its precision seems to have improved after his death."

While answering Flop's question, Vincent recalled the sibling who he had once allowed to die.

Among his siblings competing for the Imperial throne, Palladio had been in a particularly formidable class, but his cause of defeat ended up being that he had grown complacent about the power of his Evil Eye, and had been unable to make full use of that ability.

It had never occurred to him that Palladio would rectify that after his death, but—.

Vincent: "…No, even if he died, his way of being was not something that could be so easily changed. There is someone who has ordered Palladio to do this to me."

Flop: "But, if he was your sibling, that Palladio person must also be a member of the Imperial Family, right? No matter how undead he's become, for such a person to just do what he is told…"

Vincent: "—You have generally guessed it. If Palladio were to obey, it would only be to either the former Emperor, Drizen Vollachia, or someone to whom he had yielded to as being above himself."

One person who fit that criteria was Vincent himself, but considering that Palladio was on the side of the undead, he was excluded from the candidates from the start.

As a definite undead, Drizen, the former Emperor and his biological father, emerged as a candidate, and as an important matter worthy of no consideration, the face of his missing younger sister also came up.

But, taking the equipment of the enemy Medium was facing into account, there was only one possible option for the real enemy—.

Vincent: "—Lamia, hm?"

A being who satisfied the conditions for Palladio to obey, and was accompanied by brutal soldiers who carried great shears—the Pruning Corps; there was nobody else but Lamia Godwin.

Vincent presumed that the enemy was one of the three siblings whom he had evaluated highly while competing for the Imperial throne in the Imperial Selection Ceremony, and he forcefully clutched his aching chest.

And, there—

???: "You're fuckin' annoying, damn dead people!!"

A rough, bellowing voice could be heard, and a drawn blade rampaged ahead of the path of Vincent and the two siblings.

At a glance, coming from the opposite direction of Vincent and company, the soldier—a man with unruly hair and an eyepatch, was mincing up the undead that had broken through the window and entered the carriage, and was reducing them to dust.

Then, breathing heavily, the soldier noticed Vincent and company, and,

???: “Oi! You lot, gimme a hand! My sister’s exhausted inside of there…”

Vincent: “Nay, it is you who ought to lend a hand.”

???: “Huh? The hell are you saying… Y-Y-Yo-You-Your Excellency the Emperor?!”

The man who had approached them with such a rough manner of speech, shouted upon realizing Vincent’s identity.

Thinking that was the natural response, Vincent found satisfaction in the reactions of those who were insolent and disrespectful, and, as he gestured to behind himself with his chin,

Vincent: “Cooperate with the ones behind me and stop the enemy forces. With this, your sister shall be brought out.”

???: “Y-yes sir! Private First-Class Jamal Aurélie reporting, yes sir!”

Vincent: “Exert your utmost efforts, Jamal Aurélie. The survival of the Empire hinges upon your performance.”

Jamal: “—Hk!”

At Vincent’s words, the one-eyed Jamal trembled all over. Immediately after, he let out a fierce, beast-like roar and ferociously leapt over Vincent and Flop’s heads, rushing to aid Medium, who was fighting strenuously behind them, and he began to hold back the undead.

Flop: “You with the eyepatch! The one fighting alongside you, Medium, is a candidate for the Most Honorable Empress Consort, so please treat her courteously!”

Medium: “I still haven’t said yes to that~!”

In response to Flop’s voice, Medium’s reply lacked tension.

Behind her, Flop burst into the room where Jamal’s sister was, and he brought out a woman in a wheelchair, whose eyes were darting about.

The woman clung to the wheelchair, and as her eyes pitifully brimmed with tears,

Katya: “Wh-what? What is it? Why, why can’t you just leave me alone…!”

Vincent: “—. That is likely something that everyone in the Empire is currently thinking.”

While he sincerely agreed with the voice of the woman who lamented the situation, Vincent shook his head.

No matter how dire the situation became, they could not afford for the wheels of the coupled dragon carriages to come to a halt right here and now.

If it were to stop, how much time would it take for the dragon carriage to start moving again?

If that were to happen—

Vincent: “—There is not a moment to waste. We must arrive at the Fortified City.”

5

Serena: “If you stop the dragon carriage right now, we’ll be surrounded by even more enemy forces. The mechanism behind the coupled dragon carriages rely on the Divine Protection of Wind Evasion. So if we start going without the Divine Protection, we’ll probably roll over.”

Anastasia: “I knew that’d be too convenient, but that’s a pretty big drawback, ain’t it?”

Serena exposed the shortcomings of coupled dragon carriages when it was suggested that the dragon carriages be stopped, given the situation of the coupled dragon carriages being attacked and the enemies and allies being mixed up in the moving carriages.

Once Anastasia was told this, it was clear that it would be impractical for them to stop.

Anastasia: “Even if that ain’t the case, the ground dragons have been runnin’ for almost half a day… ‘n once they stop, they won’t be able to start runnin’ again tonight.”

Serena: “There’s also a difference in manpower between us and our opponents. This is undoubtedly made up for by the mobility of the dragon carriages. If that gap were to disappear, our fate would be the same as that of the aging Prime Minister, Berstetz.”

Garfiel: “This ain’t the time to be talkin’ like that! Gramps, quit lettin’ everyone tell ya what to do!”

Berstetz: “This is the nature of High Countess Dracroy’s character, not to mention the fact that it is only natural that I will be executed after the Great Disaster has been resolved…”

Garfiel: “Don’t be so fuckin’ determined to just give up!”

Serena made a light remark that was hard to judge as such, and Berstetz responded with words that had no air of frivolity, to which Garfiel raised his voice.

This new attack occurred at a point in time where Anastasia and Garfiel were in the same room. Normally Garfiel would have wanted to join up with Emilia and the others, but—

Anastasia: “I’m sorry that ya were forced to be with us, Garf-kun, but thanks to ya, both me ‘n Serena-san ‘n the others were saved, right?”

Garfiel: “Tsk… I ain’t worried ‘bout the Captain, as long as Ram ‘n Emilia-sama are with him. But, I’m worried ‘bout Ottobro…”

Anastasia: “Reason doesn’t disappear when we get emotional. Otto-kun’s a merchant, so don’t worry, he can take care of himself. Whoops…”

Garfiel, his arms not looking particularly strong, snarled in frustration as he intercepted the Great-Sheared Jäger, who was boarding the carriage.

With a blistering onslaught of punches, blows, and crushing strikes, he quickly hunted down the Jäger in the blink of an eye.

Then, Berstetz, who was grouped on the same side as Anastasia as a non-combatant, narrowed his eyes even more at the sight of the undead, beaten and crushed to dust,

Berstetz: “The Pruning Corps… It seems that Her Excellency Lamia is here, after all.”

